sionary field, as shown by this Report, to be as satisfactory as usual. In reference to the Mission to the Jews, they regret that, not being in possession of the document referred to in that portion of the Secretary's statements, they are not able to form a correct judgment of its present efficiency. They must content themselves, therefore, with expressing the hope, that God will bless with the influences of his Holy Spirit, our endeavors in behalf of his ancient people; and that he will hasten the time when the veil which now covers their hearts will be taken away, and they will see, in the crucified Redeemer, Him whom types prefigured, and prophets foretold.

The Committee have observed, with great satisfaction the prominence given in this report to the subject of the building of churches, as one of the chief means, under the divine blessing, of giving permanence to the results of Missionary labor throughout our land. Experience proves, that, until a sanctuary has been reared for the descent maintenance of the public means of grace, there can be no assurance that the most assiduous efforts will not be found to have been spent in vain. This is a subject to which the members of our Church have not, in the opinion of your Committee, given the attention which it deserves; and, as more liberal contributions to the building of churches, when not interfering with the stated gifts of the people to the Missionary treasury, are ardently to be desired, they have recommended to the Board the adoption of a resolution upon the subject, to be hereafter submitted.

The statement made in the Report of the Domestic Committee, in regard to the falling off in the contributions to the treasury, as compared with the amount reported in the previous year, is explained by the fact familiar to the members of the Board, that, at the Triennial Meeting in 1847, a resolution was passed, which caused an unusual exertion to be made in all the Dioceses of the country. We cannot forbear calling attention, however, to the renewed evidence hereby afforded of the transient effect of these occasional and awakening appeals. Our dependence for the prosperity of the Kingdom of Christ, so far as human instrumentality is concerned, must ever be upon that steady stream of Christian offerings which flows from a fountain-head of love for the Redeemer's cause. When the various parishes of our Church, moved by principle, systematically give, the wilderness of spiritual death will begin to blossom as the rose; and for the cultivation of this abiding interest in the work of Missions, the ministering servants of Christ, in their respective spheres, are His chief and responsible agents. In connexion with this subject, your Committee beg leave to direct the attention of the Clergy to another topic of great importance, of which they have been reminded by that portion of the Domestic Committee's Report which relates to testamentary bequests. We desire to express our gratitude to God for those instances here recorded, in which members of our Church, in prospect of their departure from this world, have been led to devote some portion of their substance to the extension of the Saviour's Gospel. But, in view of the rareness of such examples, compared with the wealth of our Church, and with the responsibility which such a privilege brings in its train, we are compelled to mourn over the evidently low state of feeling in reference to accountability to God for benefits received. How few are the bequests, considering the number of those who have property to bequeath, to the godlike objects of circulating the Holy Scriptures, of building sanctuaries for the ministration of the word and ordinances, and of sending the herald of a Saviour's love to the waste places of the earth! This is a duty which may well be pressed upon Christian men, by those who are set over them in the Lord; and the faithful exhibition of such responsibility is in exact accordance with one of the admonitions of our Prayer Book to the Clergy, in its impressive office for the Visitation of the Sick.

The Committee cannot omit to record their sense of the obligations under which the Board are laid, by the untiring and laborious services of the Treasurer of the Domestic Committee. Not only does he deserve our thanks for time and thought gratuitously rendered, but for the large advances of money with which he has relieved the pressure upon the Treasury. To other liberal friends of the cause, referred to in the Report, we would also tender the sincere offering of our gratitude.

The next subject which came, in regular order, before the attention of the Committee, was that of the interesting Mission, proposed by the Government of the United States, but not as yet carried into effect, to the Chickasaw Nation of Indians. In reference to this noble object, they feel that they cannot do better than to incorporate with the present Report an extract from the last year's report of the Domestic Committee. It is in the following words:

"While attending to this, the Secretary was informed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that the Chiefs of the Chickasaw nation had recently applied for Manual labor and Mission Schools, to be conducted among them by the Episcopal Church; and that he had communicated their wish, at their request, to the Bishop of Tennessee.

"The Government of the United States propose to advance out of funds belonging to this nation, $6,000 towards the erection of necessary buildings, and an equal sum annually, for 20 years, towards the current expenses of the Mission.

"No answer had been received from the Bishop, nor is any additional information in possession of the Committee, except of a general nature, obtained by the Secretary during interviews with a deputation of said chiefs at Washington.

"But the Committee earnestly trust that this favorable opportunity of establishing Missions among the Indian tribes west of the Mississippi, will not be disregarded. The Committee have sought, though in vain, to rouse the Church to a proper sense of this duty. And now, these natives of the forest themselves come, knock at the portals of our Church, and with money, the price of the soil where the bones of their fathers lie, they offer to pay for the privileges of the Gospel, in possession of the white man, and for the instruction to be given them and their children, in the arts and blessings of civilized life."

In view of the above remarkable opening of Divine Providence for the spiritual benefit of the aborigines of this country, we would once more appeal to the united interest of the ministers and people. We would urge upon them the heavy responsibility, incurred by such an opportunity of laboring for the souls of the heathen. May the gracious spirit carry the application home to their hearts; and draw forth, in cheerful response, that contribution which is the condition of the national grant, and which has been so long and so strangely withheld.

The Report presents, with great force, the demand for some further provision of Episcopal Services, growing out of the spiritual necessities of the territories of Oregon and California. In reference to the subject of a Bishopric for the latter country, we are of opinion that any action on the part of this Board will be inexpedient. In the mean time, we believe that the jurisdiction of the present Missionary Bishops, agreeably to the terms of their appointment, reaches to the Pacific Ocean; and we can only say, that, so far as the immense demands now made upon their exertions, and a conscientious regard to duty, will allow them to extend their care to the regions not hitherto visited by them, we have confidence that their active interest will not be wanting.

There is a suggestion in the Report, of the expediency of withholding the accustomed appointments, until the present indebtedness of the Domestic Committee shall have been liquidated. This would be in effect a suspension, to a very considerable extent, of our Missionary operations. While your Committee cannot but feel, in the strongest manner, the duty of paying just debts, they are constrained to deprecate any measure which shall interrupt the proclamation of the glad tidings of salvation to dying men. We would only recommend, therefore, that no new Missionary Stations be created, and that no vacancies, except in cases of death, be filled up; and, together with this method of relief, that there be a diminution to the lowest possible point, of the expenses incurred by the Committee in their official labors.

In the Report of the Bishop of the North-West, will be found an urgent appeal for aid in Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, and the Indian Territory, to which he would direct the attention of the Board, while, at the same time, we have no means of effectually meeting the appeal.

In conclusion, your Committee would submit the following resolutions, for adoption by the Board:

1. Resolved, That the subject of the extension of our Church, by means of the building of edifices, is hereby commended to the hearty interest of our Clergy and people; and that the members of our Church are invited, without diminishing the amount of their contributions for the support of Missionaries, to aid in the erection of sanctuaries, in all cases where applications for such objects have the sanction of the properly constituted authority.

2. Resolved, That, in view of the affecting call of the Chickasaw Nation, for the Scriptural ministrations of our Church; and also, of the liberal and highly advantageous offer made by the United States' Government; the members of our Church are, hereby, urgently asked to make provision for improving this golden opportunity; and the Clergy are implored to exert themselves with hearty zeal for so glorious an object.

EXTRACT FROM BISHOP OTEY'S ANNUAL ADDRESS.

BRETHREN OF THE CLERGY AND LAITY:

A little more than ten months have elapsed, since we met in Convention, to counsel and encourage each other, in the discharge of the duties incumbent upon us, entrusted with the management of that portion of Christ's flock, committed to our care in this diocese. Within that time several important changes have been made in the condition of the Church, a notice of which will enable you to form correct views of its present state and prospects, and assist us in the adoption of measures to promote its increased prosperity. These changes will come under review in the detail of the official duties in which I have been employed since the delivery of my last annual address.

Saturday, July 22, 1848.—St. John's Church, Knoxville, was by solemn act, and in the manner prescribed, set apart and consecrated to the service and worship of Almighty God, Father, Son and Holy Ghost, and thus far as the authority and power of the Church could secure the object, separated from all unhallowed, ordinary, common and profane uses. The morning prayer was read by the Rev. Thos. W. Humes, Rector of the Church, the lessons by the Rev. Dr. Page, of Cavalry Church, Memphis, and the sermon by Rev. Charles Tomes, of the diocese of Missouri, since transferred to this diocese, to whose exertions in former years, aided by the efforts of the present Rector, we are indebted for the erection and completion of this Church, one of the most beautiful and commodious in the diocese, and creditable to the liberal spirit of the city of which it is now a chief ornament, and to the citizens of which we pray it may prove an imperishable blessing. The letter of request from the Vestry was read by the Hon. Judge Reese, and the instrument of consecration by Rev. Mr. Humes. These interesting services were witnessed by a very considerable congregation, notwithstanding a heavy fall of rain prevented the attendance of many others, who would have been glad to participate in the joy of such an occasion. In the afternoon of the same day prayers were said by the Rev. Mr. Tomes, when I preached, and then confirmed eleven persons, and delivered an address to strengthen and encourage them in their purpose to lead a godly and a Christian life.

Monday, July 24.—Accompanied by Mr. Wm. L. White, I left Knoxville this morning, on a visit to Greenville, where a parish had been organized and received into union with the Convention, by the name of Greenville Parish. We arrived on Wednesday, and received a cordial welcome from the members of the "little flock" in that place.

Thursday and Friday were spent in visiting various families in the village and neighborhood, chiefly for the purpose of conferring with persons desirous of Confirmation, and embracing opportunities when presented, of lecturing upon the subject of the Gospel, and the duty of man to accept its free and gracious offers of pardon and reconciliation. There being no minister in charge of this parish at the time, some such course as this was indispensable, in order to arrive at a correct understanding of the views and state of preparation of those who were expecting to be confirmed. The congregation had enjoyed the advantages of occasional visits from Rev. Mr. McCabe, of Abingdon, Virginia, and Mr. Humes of Knoxville, who managed between them to furnish a monthly service, and they were further aided by the labors of Mr. M. L. Royce, who to his duties in the public academy, had recently added those of a lay-reader. From all these sources of help, I found the little band of friends there united in the best of all causes, in a state of hopeful encouragement, and with God's blessing determined to labor on for the dissemination of His truth, and the establishment of His Church. Two or three spirited and generous-minded individuals, whom we pray God to "remember for good," resolved upon the erection of a church, and the call of a minister. Before I left Greenville the Vestry met and pledged a salary of $300 for the support of a minister, and the church building had already been contracted for. Within a few months past, the Rev. Wm. H. Good has been received into this diocese, upon letters dimissory from the Bishop of Virginia, and has taken charge of Greenville parish, and from the last accounts received, I am induced to believe that the church will be ready for consecration by the ensuing summer. This will add another to the many instances already recorded, of what the zeal, energy and perseverance of a few persons can accomplish, under God's favor, in the extension of His truth, and the planting of His Church in the world. May others be encouraged to go and do in like manner.

St. Luke's, Jackson.—During my visit to this parish the Vestry adopted measures to procure the services of a resident minister. Their efforts have resulted in the employment of Rev. J. W. McCullough, D. D., late of Indiana, who has been transferred to this diocese by Bishop Kemper. Dr. McCullough has reached Jackson, and entered upon his duties as Rector of the parish, to the great joy, I doubt not, of his little flock, and with good hope, I trust, on his part of building them up in the faith, confirming them in hope, and at last partaking with them of eternal life and glory.

Leaving Jackson on Wednesday morning I reached Brownsville the same day. The next day I went to see the Rev. Thos. West, then residing at the house of a friend—Mr. Harrison—a few miles in the country. Here this aged servant of Christ, then in his 83d year, who had spent more than sixty years as a laborer in his Lord's vineyard, had found a quiet retreat and hospitable home with friends, in the evening of life. His piety and simplicity of character had won their affections, and he was loved and cared for as a parent by dutiful children. His days were evidently drawing rapidly to a close. An accident with which he met in Philadelphia a year or two past, and by which his thigh bone was broken, had made him a cripple for life, and he was now able to get about only by the aid of crutches. Such a misfortune added to the weaknesses and infirmities of old age, and to many other troubles and perplexities growing out of the state of his domestic affairs, called upon him for the exercise of much patience, and of steady faith. I found him, not only patient, submissive, and confident in faith, but manifesting that cheerfulness for which through life he was remarkable. A few weeks after I saw him, he was gathered to his fathers in peace, and has doubtless entered into that "rest which remaineth for the people of God." He was a native of Ireland, originally a preacher among the Methodists, and travelled with Mr. Wesley in many of his journeys to preach in remote and neglected districts. After the death of that great man, and after a portion of the Methodists in Ireland and England had separated from the Church by forming a separate ecclesiastical organization, he came to the United States, was ordained by the Bishop of New York, and ever after continued a loving, dutiful and obedient son of the Church. His withdrawal from the Methodist connection was attended by no asperity of feeling, so far as is known, on either side. He continued ever to love them and all Christian people, and though firm in the maintenance of his opinions, and bold in the declaration of what he believed to be the truth, he never forgot that allowances were to be made for ignorance as well as other infirmities of human nature, and therefore avoided all controversies which did not spring up from the preaching of the simple truth as it is in Christ Jesus. I have thought this passing notice due to the memory of one whom we all respected and loved for his virtues, and a tribute which my own heart pays to the affection and love of a brother, with whom in years past I have enjoyed seasons of blessed communion, "when times of refreshing came from the presence of the Lord."

Friday, Sept. 22.—Rev. Mr. Jansen read morning prayer in the court-house, at Brownsville, and I preached. The like services were performed in the afternoon, and the evening devoted to conversation with persons who had been awakened to a sense of the importance of the saying, "What must I do to be saved?"

Saturday, 23.—This morning accompanied by Rev. Mr. Jansen and several others, I went to the Hatchee river and administered baptism to two persons, by immersion. The court-house being occupied by a large political meeting, we had no opportunity for holding service till night, when Mr. Jansen said prayers and I preached.

Sunday, 24.—This morning prayers were read by Mr. Jansen, and I preached to a large congregation in the court-house. As there was much excitement in the town and neighborhood upon the subject of religion, I took the opportunity on this occasional to address the multitude assembled upon the subject of the Church, her doctrines, worship and ordinances. This was done especially for the purpose of removing misapprehensions which seem to be very prevalent in regard to the character of our Church, and to do away as far as possible with prejudices, which it seems to be the pleasure and business of some to create and to cherish. After this address I admitted five persons to the rite of Confirmation, and administered the Holy Communion to a large number.

PREACHING WITHOUT NOTES.

Mr. E. T. Baird presented in the last General Assembly the following resolution:

Whereas, This General Assembly has reason to believe that the practice of reading sermons in the pulpit is on the increase among our ministers; and being decidedly of opinion that it is not the most effective and acceptable method of preaching the gospel. Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we do earnestly repeat the recommendation of the Assembly of 1841, that this practice be discontinued as far as practicable, and affectionately exhort our young ministers, and candidates for the ministry, to adopt a different method, as more scriptural and effective, and more generally acceptable to God's people.

"Dr. Plumer moved to lay the resolution on the table.

"Division was called for, and 56 voted to lay on the table and 76 against it.

"Dr. Plumer—When such a subject as this is taken up by an Assembly, it is absurd to expect to do anything for the edification of the church of God, by means of a mere resolution: and if this resolution is adopted, does not the Assembly thereby express by their vote that Samuel Davies was not a pattern of preaching—that he who never on any solemn occasion, entered the pulpit without having every word written, with a determination not to depart from his manuscript, who was the best preacher of his day—the man who has left behind him the best gospel sermons which were ever printed, that he to whom the king of Great Britain listened with awe—that this servant of God knew not how to preach to edification; and that Dr. Chalmers did not do right who always laid his manuscript before him. The best sermons I ever heard from Dr. Archibald Alexander, of Princeton, were from his manuscripts. What do you do by this vote? Do you change the practice of the Church? Do you effect anything but to put an instrument in the hands of certain self-conceited members of the Church, to find fault with their ministers? Whenever I preach on the Trinity, or any abstruse doctrine of the gospel, when I want to weigh every word, and give sound doctrine to my people, I will use a manuscript. I will do it when I please. I never will consent to take instructions from such a quarter. I'll carry my manuscript where I please, and when I please. I am not responsible for this to the Assembly, or to any man, or body of men. The only effect of legislation on this matter will be vexation."

After considerable discussion the resolution was adopted. We are of the number of those who think all such legislation unwise and derogatory to the character of the Assembly. Such matters lie beyond the legitimate sphere of their action. Their votes on such subjects can change no man's practice, and therefore only serve to lessen the dignity of the body that passes them.—In some parts of the Church one method of preaching is preferred, and in others a different. Such preferences cannot be altered by the resolutions of any ecclesiastical body. Besides this, the sentiment expressed is one-sided. No one mode of preaching is best for all men, or for all circumstances. Men must be left free to follow their own tastes or talents, and to adapt themselves to the circumstances in which they are placed. To force the same method on all, would be like making all wear clothes of the same size and pattern.

There are three different modes of preaching which have their peculiar advantages and disadvantages. The first is that of mental composition, when not merely the heads or outline of the discourse, but the whole sermon is fully elaborated and impressed on the mind before going into the pulpit. This is the method in which the great speeches of such men as Webster and Calhoun, Lord Brougham and Sir Robert Peel are prepared. And in this way some of the first preachers of our own and of other churches are accustomed to indite their discourses. This is perhaps, of all methods, the best. It is however laborious. It requires great mental discipline, and great self-denial to carry out this method. It is also expensive. Discourses thus prepared perish usually with the delivery. We have heard it said by some who adopt this method, that it is as difficult for them to preach an old sermon as to make a new one. This is a great disadvantage. For so much depends on the bodily and mental state of the man when called upon to prepare a discourse, that if he must always depend on his present state, and have no provision laid up from whence to draw, he must often labor to great disadvantage.

The second method is to write out the discourse, and then commit it, or familiarize the mind with it so as to read it more or less freely. There are indefinite degrees of confinement to notes in the delivery of a written sermon. This has been the plan adopted by many of the greatest preachers the world ever knew. This was the method of Bossuet, Massillon, Bourdaloue, Saurin, of Edwards, Davies, Tennent, Chalmers. Even Whitefield and Wesley often adopted this method. This plan is laborious. There is indeed, such a thing as extempore writing, as well as extempore speaking. But most men when they write, must think. The very process of putting their thoughts on paper gives them a definite form. Writing is the very best method of mental discipline. And the exceptions are so few to the remark, that no man understands a subject on which he has not written, as not to need being taken into account. Writing sermons and using notes more or less in their delivery, we therefore believe to be one of the very best means of securing not merely instructive and effective sermons, but a studious and progressive ministry. We hail the increase of this method as proof of the intellectual progress of our Church, and as one of the best omens of its true prosperity. We heard one of the most popular preachers of Alabama, if not the most popular in that or any of the Southern States, say, that he always wrote his discourses, and that all the most promising ministers of his part of the country were in the same habit. While this method secures studious habits, intellectual progress, and instructive preaching, it has the further advantage of associating itself naturally with the other methods. It is impossible that a minister should write all the sermons he is called upon to deliver. Those most addicted to writing, probably deliver two discourses without notes to one with. Their weekly lectures, funeral and occasional sermons, are seldom or never written. It is said a young man asked the late Dr. Richards how many sermons a man could write in a week. The Dr. replied, a first-rate man could write one, a common man two, and that he knew some men who could write a dozen. The danger is not that writing will become too common, but that speaking without writing, which every minister must do so frequently, will supersede the more laborious method of preparation.

The third method of preaching is what is properly called extempore. By this we mean the plan of depending on the moment not merely for the language, but for the thoughts. This, of course, admits of degrees. The common method of extempore preachers is to think over a subject, and frame a general outline of the discourse in their minds, and leave the filling up to be suggested at the time of delivery. This previous preparation may be carried so far as to merge this plan into the first above mentioned; or it may amount to nothing more than may be done in a few minutes.

This is the easiest of all methods of preaching. There is not one man in a thousand who cannot attain the gift of extempore speaking. This is proved by the fact that all Methodist and Baptist ministers make the attainment. So do ninety-nine hundredths of all men who enter the ministry in other denominations. It is the lowest of all attainments, requiring nothing beyond composure, which, to some men, is natural, and by others is soon acquired. As it is the easiest, so it is the laziest of all methods. A man may teach, or farm, or engage all the week in what business he pleases. He wants but a few minutes before service on Sabbath, to be prepared for an hour's flow of words. As it is the laziest so it is the most unprofitable method both to speaker and hearer. Some men of natural eloquence will occasionally stir up the emotions of an audience and produce a powerful effect, but the general run of such preaching is rapid common-place. None but a man of rare abilities, of large and varied attainments, of mature and well digested knowledge, should venture to turn the spigot of his mind, and let the thoughts that first come run out for the nourishment of the people. If the sole object of preaching was excitement, there might be some reason in preferring a method whose only advantage is fervor. One of the speakers on the floor of the Assembly, asked how a lady would make out, who should undertake to scold from notes. The very illustration betrays the lowest possible conception of the office of a preacher. A preacher is no scolder, nor is he a mere exhorter, but a teacher. Teaching is his peculiar official duty; and none but a very thoroughly informed, or an inordinately conceited man, would think of teaching any grave subject extempore—least of all, the awful mysteries of God. These remarks have reference, of course, to extempore preaching, properly so called; and not to mere preaching without notes, after due preparation. The main thing is preparation. And it is because writing, in the great majority of cases, is essential to the habit of proper preparation for the pulpit, we are so desirous it should not be neglected. All the tendencies are towards such neglect, and the authority of the Assembly, in our humble judgment, was far more needed in the other scale.—Princeton Review.

THE FISHERMAN'S WIFE.

A SWEDISH STORY.

The vicar went on his road with the fisherman's wife. They soon arrived near the cabin, and all the children rushed out impetuously to meet their mother. Whilst she was at Church, they had spread pine branches over the floor of their dwelling, which gave out an agreeable scent, and they were enjoying the thoughts of surprising her.

"You are rich, my good woman," said the Priest, "for you have several children, and they all appear strong and healthy. It is a pity that you yourself should be ailing, but do not let yourself be discouraged, your husband will most likely return to-day with a good supply of fish."

"Fish! fish!" exclaimed the children joyfully, for to a great part of the inhabitants of Sweden, fish is almost their only resource. It is fishing which produces money and clothes; which suffices for all wants; it is the harvest, it is the vintage of the poor inhabitants of these shores.

"Tell me," said the pastor, "have you never been at Calmar? I think I have seen your features somewhere."

"No; I was born here, and I have never been in any town but Carlserona."

"Ah yes," said a child, "when my mother went to visit my grandfather who was in prison."

He uttered these words with the ignorance of childhood, which takes no account of the affairs of this life.

"Let us speak of something else," said the pastor in a sorrowful tone. "Have you never lost any child?"

"No, not one."

"That is the goodness of God. The children of the poor are in general strong and vigorous."

"Yes," said the woman, "it is a great source of joy to have many children, when one can provide for them, and that one need not fear that some day Poverty—"

"Do you mean to say," cried the eldest boy, "that Poverty might lead them to steal like our grandfather? Oh no, that shall never happen. I will be an honest fisherman, gain plenty of money, and get my grandfather out of prison."

Joy sparkled in the eyes of the poor woman, and the Priest said to her, "The sexton has not so many children as you?"

"The sexton? he has not any. He had but one son, who died a long while ago. He has no one to feed, and that is why he is so rich."

"Yes; but he does not enjoy, one of the greatest of God's blessings. This man appears to me hard and proud."

"Oh, there is no harm to be said of him. He is good and civil, in spite of his being the richest man in the village, and of having five fishing boats which go to sea for him. He gave me some lessons in singing, and I am mindful of it. I wish you could hear my young girl sing."

"Which, this one?"

"No, another of twelve years old, who is in service at Vernanes."

"Ah! now I know where I have seen your features. I met your child; she is like you."

"What," cried out two or three of the children at once, "you have seen our sister? Ah, how kind she is! She always sends us presents."

"I think," said the pastor, "that I have one; here is a ribbon that she lost on the road; I will give it you."

The children took the ribbon with shouts of joy; the Priest looking at them with interest; when suddenly the door of the cabin opened, and the old sexton entered.

"Ellen," said he, "you have not yet prepared the dinner of the pastor, and as your husband is absent, you perhaps have no provisions. You have known me from your childhood, and I had wished to make you dine at my house with the Pastor and with your children; but since I was prevented from receiving you in my dwelling, I ask your permission to have the dinner which my servant had prepared served up here."

Ellen gave the old sexton a look which expressed deep gratitude, and the old man had a humble and contrite air.

The servant placed on the table some roast birds, two dishes of fish, and some fresh butter, all of which astonished the children exceedingly, and made them send forth exclamations of joy.

They sat merrily down to table; the old sexton, animated by the good action he had done, took affectionate care of the fisherman's wife, and her children, and chatted gaily.

"Drink, Pastor," said he. "I must tell you that the Priests who came here before you did not prefer seeking out the poorest people: they only paid attention to those who were well at ease."

"Do not let us speak of that," said the vicar. "I hope that your generous action will bring you a blessing. But have you then no wife or children?"

"No, sir, all are dead."

"God has deprived you then of His most precious gifts."

"In depriving me of children? Ah! children cost dear.—When they are untractable and bad, it is a terrible calamity."

"But a good mother can preserve them from these defects."

"A good mother; that is a matter of course. But we seek the richest, that is to say, the least poor."

"According to these principles, you did not think of seeking the most gentle, or the most virtuous woman."

"Ah, ah, sir, my wife has been dead these forty years, and I still live in the house which she gave me, and I have as much fish as I want. What can a man wish for more?"

"And your son, what has become of him?"

"My son! he was a great rogue. May God have mercy on him. He has been dead for these ten years."

"Yes, yes," said the eldest boy of Eric; "it was he who led our grandfather into theft."

"What do you know about it?" said the old man, angrily.

"Alas! it is but too true," said the poor woman, heaving a deep sigh. "Had it not been for your son, my father would not be in prison now."

"Yes," murmured the old man; "may God have mercy upon us, poor sinners."

So then, said the Priest to himself, this man accused this unfortunate woman, and his own son was the cause of the crime with which he taunted her. Then turning towards him, he said to him in a compassionate voice, "If, as I think I understand, your son has plunged this family into grief, it is in your power to make these poor people some compensation, and to procure for yourself happiness in your old age."

The old man looked at him with surprise.

"Yes," said the Priest, "my idea is, that you ought to take care of these children, to bring them up, and adopt them."

"But they have still their father."

"He has been gone some time. His boat has been wrecked, and perhaps at this moment he is

"Drowned, you mean to say. Oh, that is impossible; there is not a stronger or bolder fisherman than Eric."

"Whichever is the case, you ought to be the friend of this woman and her children. It is not without reason that Providence has taken away yours."

The old man looked at the Priest, the fisherman's wife, and the children, and was going to answer, when all at once a sound of voices was heard, "There they are, there they are," cried they; "the fishing boats are arrived." The children ran out, exclaiming, "Our father—our father is coming." The mother followed them with indescribable emotion. The sexton also went out, thinking of his five boats, and the Priest ascended a little hill, from which he could see the sea and the fishermen. Young and old, every one in the village, was in movement; they exclaimed, they leaped, and about thirty boats reached the shore. The fathers embraced their children, the wives ran to meet their husbands; there was nothing but agitation and transports of joy.

The Priest looked at this spectacle with a lively interest, and sympathized in all the emotions of these poor people, who after several days of painful expectation, enjoyed the greatest pleasures of their humble lot; the happiness of seeing again their relations and friends; and the joy of counting over all the fish collected from the waves of the sea.

All at once he heard sounds of grief and despair. They came from the children of Ellen, who separated themselves from the crowd, lamenting and saying, "He is not come back, he is not come back; perhaps we shall never see him again." The Priest approached them, and beheld a sorrowful sight. On one side, families transported with joy, contemplating all the treasures that the waves had given up to them, and calculating the profit they should get from the sale of the fish at Calmar, at Carlserona, and at Stockholm. On the other side, poor orphans covered with rags and keeping apart, overwhelmed with a dreadful anxiety. Not far off was their mother, bearing her youngest child in her arms, shrinking from the bustling and noisy activity of her neighbours, and longing to fly from the light of day.

"Are there then no clouds in the sky?" said she to the Priest, who approached her with deep commiseration, "why does this sunshine seem to mock my misery?"

"All is not yet lost," said the vicar.

Then he added, speaking to himself, "The sexton must come to the help of this unhappy family." At that moment, he perceived the old man standing in the midst of the crowd, entirely occupied in reckoning and valuing the cargoes of his boats, in giving his orders, and in setting his servants in motion. Every one looked up to him with respect, for he was the richest man in the village, and he was feeling nothing but cold selfishness.

The Priest observed him with concern, for seeing him thus, he began to doubt if he might ever expect from him any act of generosity.

The poor woman, in the meanwhile, had gone with her young family to sit on a rock, and there in her bitter grief, she repeated to her listeners the words of consolation which she had that morning heard in the Church. She repeated them with a warmth and earnestness which forcibly struck the Priest, who heard her without her seeing him. "Let us hope," said she, "God will have pity upon us." Saying these words, she burst into tears, and to hide her emotion, she began to sing one of those harmonious and melancholy fisherman's songs, so sweet in their sad and artless expression. The children repeated the chorus after her, and the pastor listened to them, invoking the blessing of Heaven for these poor forsaken creatures. He then drew near to bid her good bye, for night was coming on, and he must go before the end of the day, to the other part of his parish.

"Take courage, my good woman," said he, "all that I can do for you shall be done."

"Ah, sir," she answered, "to-day the evil is still bearable: new wounds are not so painful as old ones; but to-morrow all will be worse; and then, after to-morrow my tears will cease, and I shall go to my work. Grief will be the daily bread of these poor children. The little birds are not separated from their fathers, and I behold my children deprived of their best support; nothing can supply the place of my Eric. My little Anna cannot yet walk alone, and the others have no clothing. Ah, my poor children, you are more to be pitied than the young birds." Whilst speaking, she leant for support against the trunk of a tree, and her children looked at her in terror, without having the power to utter a word. On a sudden she started up, her countenance shone; her face glowed. "What did I hear?" said she. "It is the song of Eric."

The Priest, who had heard nothing, thought her mind was wandering. However, she sat down on the rock, listened again with her head turned towards the sea, and exclaimed with great agitation "It is he! It is he! It is his song! It is Eric! He is coming nearer and nearer. I shall see him." And pressing her youngest child to her bosom, she placed it on the ground, and ran to the shore, followed by the Priest, who knew not what to think of her agitation. But presently the end of a boat's mast could be perceived; then the boat itself. "Look! look!" cried the poor woman, "it is my Eric's boat, and he is seated at the helm."

The boat came nearer, the sailors were rowing joyously singing their sea songs, and at the moment when the last verse was heard, a man jumped on the shore, took Ellen in his arms, and pressed her to his heart, uttering an exclamation of joy. "Now then, now," said he, "we are rich, my dear Ellen."

"Ah! God be praised! we thought you were lost."

"I fell into the sea, and my boat sunk. But some good people picked me up in their sloop, and now joy be to us! Do you see those three boats which follow me: they belong to me, with all that they contain; and we will build a house as large and as fine as that of the sexton."

"And we will get our grandfather out of prison," said the eldest boy.

"But how," asked Ellen, "are you become so rich, all of a sudden?"

"You know that I am a good pilot. Perhaps there is not my equal in all the place. An English vessel was entangled amongst the shoals, which lie near the isle of Oland. The captain was not acquainted with these shores, his people took me on their sloop, and brought me to him. We had scarcely run some miles, when the ship struck on some sandbanks, and if Eric had not been there, the vessel would have been lost. I succeeded in saving it from this danger, and to reward me, the captain gave me three handfuls of gold. I went immediately to Calmar to change this foreign money. I related the whole story; I became a hero, and I purchased three boats. There they are, with all their tackling, their stores, and some good sailors. Come, my good people, on shore, on shore. This is my wife, a good and pretty wife, and here are our eight children. Next year, moreover, you shall see the great house I am going to build. But who is this gentleman? It must be our new chaplain. Forgive a rough fisherman, sir, for not having at first saluted you." Then, turning towards the gulf, "Ah!" said he, "there is our fourth boat. It is not so swift as the others, but it bears my most precious treasure. I have been to Vernanes to pick up our young daughter, and there she comes." At the same time, the young Lena jumped on shore, threw herself into the arms of her mother, and then ran to embrace by turns her brothers and sisters. I leave you to imagine the happiness of all this family, hitherto weighed down by so much anxiety, and now blessed with the gifts of fortune.

The chaplain went away with a tranquil satisfaction. Some time afterwards the pastor of the village dying, the young Priest replaced him. He made himself loved and venerated in all the country; and, some years afterwards, he entered the large house built by Eric, to celebrate his marriage with the good and gentle Lena.

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 18, 1849.

We ask the attention of the Clergy to the following notice from Bishop Freeman.

SOUTH WESTERN MISSIONS.

The attention of clergymen imbued with the missionary spirit is earnestly solicited to the pressing wants of this portion of the field. Among the numerous stations requiring immediate occupation, the following are most prominent, viz. EL DORADO, BATESVILLE, and HELENA, in Arkansas; and AUSTIN, SAN ANTONIO, VICTORIA with PORT LEBACCA, and MARSHALL, in Texas. MATAGORDA in Texas has also become vacant recently; the late self-denying single-hearted and faithful missionary, the lamented Mr. Ives, having been called home to his rest and his reward.

Bishop F. may be addressed at NEW CASTLE, DELAWARE, until the 10th of September, later at Cincinnati, and after 20th September, at Little Rock, Arkansas.

A STRIKING CONTRAST.

The many pamphlets and documents which accumulated during a five weeks' absence, have received the earliest attention we could bestow upon them. We must crave indulgence if there has been any omission on our part, of a proper notice of these. The many calls of pastoral duty at this season of sickness and affliction, the first to be answered, are no slight interference with the regular discharge of the editorial office.

Among the numerous assemblage of these silent friends which greeted us, our readers will not wonder that we were first attracted by the late CHARGE OF BISHOP WHITTINGHAM "to the Clergy of Maryland." The importance of its subject for these times, the learning and profound thought displayed in the able discussion of this theme, would at once direct attention to this "charge." We began this article not to speak ourselves its praises, but by giving an analysis and extracts, to let the Charge speak for itself. But a second perusal has satisfied us that we can only do justice to the Author and to our readers by extracting the whole. This we shall begin to do in the next number. In the meantime, let us say a word in advance. The subject of the Charge is as follows—"THE DOCTRINE OF THIS CHURCH," AND THAT ALONE, TO BE HELD AND TAUGHT BY THE MINISTRY OF CHRIST, IN THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES:

In the introductory remarks we find the following wise and hopeful reflection upon the opposing views and opinions which distract the Church.

"These signs of the times are evil, it must be owned. But there is one hopeful feature in the case. The tendencies to unrest and outbreak are not all in one direction. They oppose each other. They feed each other, doubtless, for a while, by such opposition, while each charges the errors and extravagancies of the other upon the truth and right that lie between them. But in the end, their counterbalancing and mutually destructive influences must result advantageously for the doctrine, discipline and worship which either of them, unopposed, might weaken and lay waste."

After setting forth the dangerous use which has been made of so called Christian liberty, the Bishop proceeds to show the just rule by which individuals, especially Ministers, should limit their rightful liberty. That Rule is to be found in the Word of God, not, of course, as interpreted by every individual, but by the Standards of the Church. Then the important question occurs, "What is the sense of the Prayer Book, Catechism and articles, in which they exhibit 'the doctrine of this Church?'" The Bishop having rejected those common views that the just meaning of these Rules is to be determined either by "the sense of the generality," or by "the sense of the imposer," adopts the following view.

"There is a sense, fixed in proportion as it is carefully, full as it is successfully, ascertained; the sense of the compiler, or composer; the original, historical sense, that which was in the mind of those who first made and used the formularies, and which they meant that they should always have."

The authority which the Bishop gives to the XXXIX Articles, thus interpreted, will, we trust, satisfy those who think it a part of a certain kind of Churchmanship to depreciate these. Of this our readers may judge when they read the Charge itself, as we earnestly advise all to do who desire clear views upon matters wherein too often counsel is darkened by words. But what has this Charge to do with the title of this article?

It expresses the thought which rose unbidden, in our minds after reading this Charge of an American Bishop, and certain extracts from a late Charge by an English Archbishop. Let our readers peruse the article which follows and they will see what we mean. This "striking contrast" will appear more evident from the following extract, from the Bishop of Maryland's Charge which we present in connection with the extract from the Charge of the English Archbishop. Lest our readers should suppose it a criticism on this strange teaching, we remind them that the American Charge was first delivered.

The outline, then, of the doctrine of the Church concerning sacraments, presented in the Catechism and guarded against error in the Articles, is to be filled up from the Prayer Book. Its express and clear statements concerning the effect of Baptism and the nature of the Eucharist, are the clothing of muscle and integument which gives symmetry, expression and completeness to the well-framed but bare skeleton of generalities in the Catechism and independent particulars in the Articles.

No less than all thus taught by the Church we are bound to teach: nor is any thing more permissible. Positively or negatively, in restraint or in extension, the minister of "this Church" may not add teaching of his own to the sum of what he gathers from the Prayer Book and the Articles concerning the mysteries by which our union with CHRIST is effected and kept up; and that he may not be tempted so to do, or unconsciously transgress, he has been tried and tested as to his own satisfaction with that exhibition of those divine provisions for our spiritual wants.

But this brings us to a difficulty.

Human language is always susceptible, in greater or less degree, of misapprehension and perversion. May we not have misunderstood the Prayer Book and Articles, when we made up our minds as to their view of the sacraments? May we not now be misunderstanding them?

In as far as there are differences of opinion among the ministers of the Church on the subject of the sacraments, some among them must be in misapprehension of the doctrine which they ought to hold and teach. There must have been a failure somewhere to get the true sense of the Prayer Book, or of the Articles, or of both.

Such a supposition implies that there is a true sense, to which all are bound, and which all must be presumed honestly to desire to get, and hold, if they can; if not, to be ready to obey the convictions of their conscience, and abandon a post for which they are not competent.

It is strange and mournful that this should not be at once and universally admitted. But it is not. Men justly in high esteem for intellect and piety, have been found who could somehow satisfy themselves with the persuasion that a sacred formulary of worship, of Christian instruction, or of religious profession, might have two senses, a larger and a narrower, a higher and a lower, a stricter and a looser, a (so called) Catholic, and a (so called) Protestant.

The obvious — the necessary rejoinder to such an assertion is, that for any purpose, human or divine, a Liturgy, a Catechism, or an Article, that has two senses, may as well have two hundred or none at all. It is no standard of truth, no statement of truth, no recognition of truth, no fit offering to Him who is THE TRUTH, nor from those who are required to "worship," as "in spirit," so also "in truth." It cannot be that we go before our God with an equivocation upon our lips, or teach our little ones a phrase of double-meaning to ensnare their souls—that we agree at the altar or the font, in the pulpit, or when we take the solemn vow that admits us to the pulpit, in sounds and syllables, while our hearts and understandings disavow the hollow concord!

It has been said, that as prayers are not intellectual exercises, their precise signification is of less importance! that as articles are subscribed as terms of peace, any sense which the language can with any degree of plausibility be compelled to bear, may be accepted for the purpose!

These things were said a hundred years ago, by those who sought a domicile for the Arian heresy in the Church of England; and (strangely enough!) in a succeeding generation, by those who strove, in a latitudinarian age, to hinder Socinianism, avowed and covert, without and within the Church, from breaking down the barrier which subscription to the Prayer Book and Articles placed between its votaries and the establishment. But the impudent assailants and the weak defenders alike disgraced their respective interests, by resort to the worst subterfuge that has ever stained the corrupt and odious system of Jesuit morality. Their doctrine of diverse senses is Probabilism, in a slightly altered form and application. It is the claim of a license to use language in any sense which it is convenient to give it, for which any warrant can be obtained that it ever has been given, in any circumstances, by any one. It is the annihilation of the distinction between truth and falsehood in utterance between man and man, and between sincerity and hypocrisy in man's approaches to his Maker.

CHARGE OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.

St. Paul taught the Hebrews that "the doctrine of baptisms" was among "the first principles of the doctrine of Christ." Notwithstanding the high praise which some of our cotemporaries are bestowing on this charge of the English Archbishop, we feel deep regret that such a document should come from one holding so high and important an office. In our judgment it contradicts the plain teachings of the Word of God, and makes, with respect to the "first principles of the doctrines of Christ," the Prayers of the baptismal service mere empty sounds. It is a strange thing that they who are so much opposed to the dishonest practice of not receiving the ARTICLES in a literal sense should desire thust to interpret our solemn prayers to God. Surely this makes of our Prayers mere "vain repetitions." Let our readers judge for themselves by the following extracts from the Archbishop's charge.

*See Waterland, case of Arian Subscription considered. Works, Vol. II.

"To this brief remark on one of the Sacraments I would add a few words on the other Sacrament of our Church. As to the effect of adult baptism, there is little or no dispute among rational men. But the question of the effects of infant baptism seems destined to interminable discussion. It has been proved, however, we think, beyond contradiction or doubt, that our Reformers, almost without exception, both in the reign of King Edward VI., and especially in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, held and advocated what are now usually called the peculiar doctrines of Calvin as to Election, and Predestination, and Final Perseverance. Hence they taught that spiritual regeneration in baptism could only result in the case of those who had been from all eternity elected to everlasting life by the free and sovereign grace of God. That all the baptized should be spiritually regenerate was in their view utterly impossible; and, therefore, they could not intend, in the formularies they drew up, to require or to express such a belief, unless we unfairly attribute to them that shameless effrontery, that gross and scandalous dishonesty, which, to the reproach of our times, has been openly avowed by some, that men may teach what they do not believe, and that they may believe what is contrary to their teaching. With the knowledge of this historical fact before us, we cannot insist on it as a ruled doctrine of our Church that all baptized children are, as such, spiritually regenerate. For such was not the doctrine of our Reformers themselves. Nor is such doctrine laid down in the Thirty-nine Articles. And those very expressions in our baptismal service, which have been interpreted in modern times as exclusively admitting the sense of the universal regeneration of infants in baptism, are borrowed from a service in which the known sentiments of the author will not allow such a meaning to be affixed to them. In the articles which the Reformers drew up as the standard of doctrine in our Church, and which still retain their position among us, they stated the doctrine of baptism as, according to their view, they found it in Holy Scripture, and in a spirit of wisdom and charity worthy of all imitation; there they left it, not venturing to abridge or to extend the privileges of baptism, or to define with greater nicety than the Holy Spirit had done, the mysterious workings of Divine grace. In the case of adults they have, without hesitation, confined the benefit, as Scripture has done, to the worthy recipient. The case of infants they have left, as the Holy Scriptures have left it, to be determined by analogy from that of adults, and consequently have left it open, within certain limits, to different shades of view."

No better comment can be made upon the above than the following, which is made by an English Secular Paper.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK'S CHARGE.—We have no desire in our columns to discuss the theological question involved in these remarks; we cannot, however, help observing that looking at the plain sense of the baptismal office, in such expressions as these—"Doubt ye not, therefore, but earnestly believe, that He will likewise favourably receive this present infant,"—"Seeing now, dearly beloved brethren, that this child is regenerate, and grafted into the body of Christ's Church,"—"We yield Thee hearty thanks, most merciful Father, that it hath pleased Thee to regenerate this infant with Thy Holy Spirit, to receive him for thine own child by adoption, and to incorporate him into Thy holy Church"—we entirely fail to perceive confirmation strong as holy writ of the fact which His Grace contends can "hardly be denied," viz., that "those who interpret it in the hypothetical sense approach the nearest to the mind" of those who drew up the office. So far from the service being only "open" to what is generally understood to be the orthodox view of this question, we have a difficulty in perceiving how its language can possibly be "open" to any other interpretation. While we appreciate, as highly as the most Rev. Prelate, the excellency of that charity for which he contends, we hold it to be no less the duty of the christian to "contend earnestly for the faith;" and although we should think it unbecoming in us to charge with "shameless effrontery," with "gross and scandalous dishonesty," those who reject what appears to us the only admissible construction of the language of the Prayer book in the passages before quoted, we must be permitted to say that it is painful in the extreme to hear sentiments delivered ex cathedra which, to the apprehension of all ordinary minds, contradict point blank the tenor of the liturgical offices. To preach one thing and to pray another, is a course which seems to us open to the most serious objections.—John Bull.

MANNER OF PREACHING.

The article, extracted from the Princeton Review, on this subject in another column is worthy of attention. The great and important point, we should think, is that a sermon should be prepared with that care and deliberation which the solemnity of its subject requires. A distinguished Divine being asked how he liked the "extempore preaching of the South," replied—"I like it much better, sir, than the extempore writing of the North."

The danger of what is called extempore preaching, is that it may degenerate into a mere fluency of words which bear no thoughts upon their empty tide. It is much easier to talk than to think. The tongue has generally most of the vis viva in those whose minds are most clogged with the vis inertia. The palsy of laziness seldom falls upon the tongue. Now if it be true, as Cowper says, that "talking is not always to converse," it is much more true that talking is not always preaching. And it is certain that men will be more apt to talk than to write complacently about nothing. A man has to use his hands to write and he is not so willing to use their efforts to no purpose. It is also more difficult to write without consideration. Doubtless therefore written sermons are more likely to secure due preparation, than those which are merely spoken. On the other hand there are many places and situations where great advantages might be gained for the church by this ability to preach without notes. From the more general want of this practice on the part of our clergy, on missionary ground and among uneducated people, the illiterate preacher, who can talk by the hour, has the advantage over the more learned Minister who will consent to preach nothing but well digested discourses. Why then should not our Clergy practise both kinds of preaching? And when they have two services, give their people one part of the day, an expository sermon which may be unwritten, but not unprepared. This certainly was the more primitive style of preaching, and if it deprived Christian hearers of some rhetoric and oratory, it would give them more of the Word of God. If it had no other good result, it would, at least, save young Clergymen from the injurious necessity of writing two sermons in a week. We fully agree with the saying of an eloquent Clergyman: "No man ought to write two sermons in a week, for one will be sure to knock the brains out of the other."

Foreign Intelligence.

BY THE LAST STEAMER.

We find the following in the English Churchman, concerning Mr. Allies. This gentleman published a Journal, giving accounts which seemed to declare that his sympathies were more with the Church of Rome, than with the Church of England. From the extracts we have seen, we agree with the Churchman in thinking that the Author has been treated too leniently.

We have hitherto studiously avoided taking any notice of Mr. Allies' interesting, but, on many accounts, very painful and unsatisfactory Journal of a tour in France: for before we had had time to examine it, very positive rumours were afloat that the volume was to be made the subject of canonical proceedings against its author, on the part of his Diocesan, and therefore we thought it best not to interfere in the matter. We were by no means surprised at these rumours, for there was much in the Journal which had the appearance of being almost written on purpose to provoke the Protestant spirit of Englishmen, while the most Catholic member of the Church of England could not but feel that Mr. Allies seemed to take a delight in placing his own Church in an unfavourable, and, frequently unjust, contrast with the Church in France. But it was evident that a man might do all this, and yet keep to the windward of the Canons and Thirty-nine Articles. In this experiment Mr. Allies has been singularly adroit and successful; not that we mean for a moment to charge him with any deliberate attempt of the kind, for the whole tone of the book is that of a man who honestly and freely puts down what he thinks and feels at the time. We only wonder that in revising the volume in this country it did not strike him that ninety-nine "Protestants" out of a hundred would indignantly denounce him as a traitor to his own Church, and as a Romanist at heart. Such persons will read with some surprise, and it may be suspicion, his acknowledgment and avowal contained in the following letter from the Lord Bishop of Oxford to the Archdeacon of Oxford.

61, Eaton Place, July 3rd, 1849.

My dear Archdeacon.—I think it right that my Clergy should know what has taken place between the Rev. Mr. Allies and myself; and as you are the most proper person by whom I can on this occasion act, I will thank you to communicate this my letter to them.

I felt it my painful duty to censure Mr. Allies's volume as in my judgment contradicting the Thirty-nine Articles. My censure has drawn from Mr. Allies the following letter, which, (there being no copies of the first edition remaining in his publishers' hands) is held by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and myself to be sufficient to allow me not to originate legal proceedings against him. Mr. Allies's letter is as follows:—

"Launton, Bicester, May 15th, 1849.

"My Lord,—I regret that anything in the book that I have published should appear to my Diocesan to be contrary to the Articles of the Church of England, or calculated to depreciate that Church in comparison with the Church of Rome; and I undertake not to publish a second edition of the work.

"I declare my adherence to the Articles, in their plain, literal, and grammatical sense, and will not preach or teach anything contrary to such articles in their plain, literal, and grammatical sense. I have the honour to be, my Lord, your Lordship's dutiful servant in Christ, (Signed)

"The Lord Bishop of Oxford." "Thos. W. ALLIES.

This letter of Mr. Allies, my dear Archdeacon, you will observe applies to two distinct subjects.

1st. As to the publication which I have censured, Mr. Allies regrets my censure, and now proposes not to publish any second edition. Under the circumstances which I have before stated as to the first edition, I treat this as if he had originally showed me his Book, and on my expressing my disapprobation of it, had, in deference to the opinion of his Diocesan, abstained from publishing it. I accept this act of deference to my office on his part.

But 2ndly. I deem it my duty as Bishop, in consequence of this publication having already taken place, to require an assurance that Mr. Allies will not, in his parish, teach contrary to the Doctrines of the Church of England. As to this, I apply the same test which I have applied to other cases before. I ask Mr. Allies whether he, as the rule of his teaching, accepts in conjunction with the Prayer Book, the Articles of the Church in their plain, literal, and grammatical sense. By this letter he assures me that he does so, and I accept this his assurance. Believe me, my dear Archdeacon, yours faithfully,

To the Ven. the Archdeacon of Oxford. (Signed) S. Oxon.

While we desire to abstain from saying anything which could re-open the matter which has thus been closed, we cannot help observing, on general grounds, that it appears to us that an unsatisfactory and dangerous principle is avowed by the Lord Bishop of Oxford, as his rule of action in this case. His Lordship asserts that in dealing with a book of which the author refrains from publishing a second edition, in consequence of his disapprobation, he treats the matter in the same way as he would a case in which the author had shown him the manuscript, and, on his expressing disapprobation, had refrained from publishing it at all. This, we repeat, appears to us a most dangerous principle and precedent. If we recollect right, at the time of the memorable "Hampden" discussion, a good deal of stress was laid upon the fact that he had not published a second (or third edition) of an unsound book: and if this rule is to be laid down, we shall have an inundation of heretical and dangerous publications. Most heretics would be content with a first edition—especially as there is no rule laid down as to the number of copies—and would think their object cheaply gained by the mere nominal punishment of abstaining from the doubtful experiment of a second edition.

If the author of a book has plainly rendered himself liable to ecclesiastical proceedings, or a formal public censure of his Bishop, a distinct acknowledgment of error, and a recantation, should alone restrain his Lordship's hand—the number of copies, or editions, is beside the question. If the author has not incurred either, silence is the only politic, as well as the only just course.

The same paper in publishing President Taylor's Recommendation, says:—

We believe that there is a very strong desire that this example should be followed in this country. We are aware that some persons object to any such proceedings, under any circumstances, as mere superstition. We will not condescend to argue with them, for they "hear not Moses and the Prophets," and therefore will not listen to us: others may perhaps admit the propriety of such public humiliations before God, but urge that the time is not yet come. This is, doubtless, a very difficult and painful question to decide, but it will be admitted that it is far better to be too early than too late in the performance of such a duty. And, apart from the mere religious aspect of the question, such acts have a manifest tendency to remove those exaggerated and morbid fears which are acknowledged, humanly speaking, to render persons far more liable to attacks of cholera

STATE OF EUROPE.

FRANCE is quiet, but there are evident signs that the present state of things cannot last long. Whatever advance may have been made towards a union of the Legitimists and Philippists, it is clear that the Bonapartists have no idea of joining. LOUIS NAPOLEON will be aut Cesar aut Nullus. He is shortly to make a sort of Royal Progress through the departments, for the sake of increasing his popularity, and will no doubt seize the first favourable opportunity of making himself Emperor.

The French still retain possession of Rome. The Neapolitans occupy Frosinore, Veroli, Anagni, and Ferentino. The Spaniards have taken possession of Velletri. GARIBALDI has succeeded in gaining the Neapolitan territory. It is said that the POPE will soon enter Rome, but this we doubt.

The armistice between Denmark and Prussia has been signed. The Government of the Duchies has resolved to withdraw its troops southward of the line between Hemsburg and Tandern. As soon as this is done, the Danish Blockade will cease.

There is no certain news from Hungary. Radstadt still holds out, but may soon be expected to surrender. The Grand Duke of BADEN has disbanded his army.

Peace between Austria and Sardinia has not yet been signed.

Church Robbed.—St. Peter's Church, Berkeley, at Clarksboro', Gloucester Co. N. J., under the pastoral care of the Rev. H. R. Harrold, was robbed some night during the past week (probably Saturday night). The villain or villains effected their entrance by breaking a pane of glass at the side window of the vestry room, and thus raising up the window. They took off a most splendid copy of the Holy Bible, which had been presented by Mr. Bond, merchant of Philadelphia, together with the vestry-room carpet. They forced the lock of the wardrobe and took the beautiful Linen Surplice, which had been presented by the ladies of St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia; also two black silk scarfs, with a light cassock, leaving nothing except the black silk gown and belt; they likewise took a damask table cover that lay on the table of the vestry room. They had, no doubt, intended to take more, but were frustrated in their infamous work, as one of the aisle carpets was drawn across the chancel. Suspensions had been awakened on Saturday night, in two houses in the neighborhood of the Church, that something was wrong, but the precise spot could not be indicated.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, CLEVELAND, BURNED.—We have received the sad intelligence of the burning of this Church. We have not learned all the particulars, but hear that it was the work of an incendiary. The building was not yet quite complete.—Western Episcopalian.

DIOCESE OF MAINE.—We have just received the Journal of the Thirtieth Annual Convention of this Diocese. From the Bishop's Address we learn that sixty-one persons have been confirmed during the year. The Clergy of the Diocese number thirteen, and there are three candidates for Holy Orders. We are pleased to observe, in the Parochial Reports, proofs that the Church in this new Diocese is steadily progressing. How much it has to contend against we may learn from the following extract in the Bishop's Address:

"A singular proof of that absence of information respecting the Church, which will best be counteracted by the circulation of the book of Common Prayer, was afforded soon after the last Convention. The bill for incorporating the Trustees of the Episcopal Fund was rejected by the Senate of this State, after it had passed without opposition through the other branch of the Legislature. At the present session, it may probably prevail, as it is certainly far better understood; but the mere existence of a prejudice, by which a privilege granted to every parochial organization in the State, should be withheld from us as a collective body, could not have been anticipated, and tells us how much the knowledge of our true principles needs to be spread abroad. The privilege itself was of little importance; but it was exceedingly important that it should not be prevented by an obstacle like this."

The liability that similar instances may occur in Cholera, makes it important that cases like the following should be widely circulated.

THE CHOLERA.—One of the most extraordinary cases of cholera that has been heard of in the metropolis occurred at No. 1 Smith's-place, Devonshire-street, Kennington-lane. On Friday afternoon, at 4 o'clock, Mr. Morse, surgeon, of Kennington-lane, was sent for to attend a woman of the name of Roberts, the wife of a bricklayer. He found the woman surrounded by her family, suffering from Asiatic cholera, in its worst form. The usual remedies were prescribed, but she continued to get worse, and about 1 o'clock the next morning Mr. Morse received a message to attend again immediately as Mrs. Roberts was supposed to be dying. Having some other patients to attend he did not reach the house till half an hour after the messenger arrived. He was then told by the mother of the woman that he arrived too late, as her daughter was dead, and had been laid out 25 minutes. Knowing that he would have to give a certificate before the funeral took place, Mr. Morse informed the mother that he would see the body at once. He was conducted to one of the rooms where the woman was laid out, and covered with a sheet. Upon drawing away the sheet and feeling the body he found it quite cold, pulse imperceptible, the fingers blue and so contracted that it was impossible for him to open the hand. The surgeon next applied his ear to the chest, and found that the heart had not entirely ceased to beat. Mr. Morse drew his lancet from his pocket, opened the vein in the arm, from which three or four ounces of blood flowed freely, when to the astonishment of all present the woman cried out, "What are you doing to me?" Other remedies having been applied the poor woman so far recovered as to be able to eat a meat dinner yesterday (Sunday).—Times.

THE CALENDAR of last week has not reached us. A similar accident occurred with the number which contained Dr. Jarvis's letter. We are indebted to the New York Churchman for the following letter of Dr. Haight which was to appear in this week's Calendar. We owe it to Dr. Haight to publish this reply, as he was "a professor" alluded to in the letter of Mr. Coxe published last week.

For the Calendar.

MR. EDITOR:—The course which the Rev. A. C. Coxe has seen fit to pursue in the Calendar for the last month, forces me to the painful necessity of saying that any of the statements of that gentleman, and all of them, with or without his signature, to the effect that the manner of conducting the late examination of the students of the General Theological Seminary, as complained of by him, originated with me, or was the effect of any suggestion made by me, directly or indirectly, publicly or privately, to the Rev. Dr. Jarvis, or to any member of the committee, or to the committee collectively—or that I had any thing to do with it, otherwise than in assenting to, and adopting in common with the other members of the Faculty, the proposal of the committee appointed a year previously to the examination—all such statements are utterly untrue.

Your obedient servant,

BENJ. I. HAIGHT.

Comment is needless.

For the following interesting extract we are indebted to "the Episcopal Recorder."

The Secretary of the Vestry of St. John's Church, St. Louis, has forwarded to us an official copy of the Resolutions of that body "expressive of their feelings at the loss of their beloved Rector." The resolutions will be found in another column. We thank the Secretary for his kind expression in reference to the Banner.

DEATH OF THE REV. WHITING GRISWOLD.

The St. Louis New Era of the 25th ult. says:

"In our issue of yesterday we had barely time to announce the decease of this much esteemed clergyman, and take the earliest opportunity of adding our testimonial to his worth, and to express our deepest sympathies with the bereaved members of his household and those of his shepherdless flock. For a long time he had been in a delicate state of health, yet it was fondly hoped that his valuable life would be preserved for many years, and that he would be spared to witness the realization of his most ardent longings—the permanent establishment of the church which he had been instrumental in planting; to the growth and prosperity of which the active energies of his body and mind were constantly directed until his physical powers were utterly prostrated. He had also been chiefly instrumental in building up the commendable institution of the Orphan's Home, and was extremely solicitous for its welfare. But he had finished the work which had been given him to do, and the command went forth that he should rest from his labors. When Mr. Griswold first came among us, his youthful, ruddy complexion, and dark glossy hair, elicited additional interest from his auditors; but the seven years' arduous labor in which he had been engaged had wrought a change which four times that number does not usually effect. Before he was called hence, a crown of glory (as the good Book hath it) already encircled his head. Called to renewed exertions by the dread visitation of the pestilence, it was his meat and drink to administer consolation to the sick and dying, and he was found in the path of duty until his feeble frame yielded to the imperious calls of death. In the confidence of a sure faith, calmly and peacefully he waited the approach of death, and gave timely attention to the settlement of his temporal affairs. And when the progress of the disease had deprived him of the use of all his faculties save those of memory and speech—a time for the revealing of the heart's inmost secrets—an eye witness describes the scene as awful, yet consoling to hear the unconscious sufferer recite the hallowed services contained in the Book of Common Prayer, as he had been accustomed to perform them in the ministrations of his priestly office. Let it not be said of any of us, 'That righteousness perisheth, and no man layeth it to heart.'"

COLLEGE COMMENCEMENTS.

For the following accounts of the Colleges of St. James, Maryland, and Trinity, Connecticut, we are indebted to the New York Churchman.

COLLEGE OF ST. JAMES, WASHINGTON COUNTY, MARYLAND.—We have received, with pleasure, the "Register" of this institution for the seventh session, 1848-9, which represents it in a very prosperous state. Bishop Whittingham is the official Visitor, and the President of the Board of Trustees, which is composed of five clergymen, and four laymen. The corps of Professors is strong, and the course of instruction very full and thorough. It is conducted strictly in accordance with the doctrine, discipline, and worship of the Church. The number of students in the college was, Seniors 4, Juniors 3, Sophomores 16, Freshmen 25—total 48. In the Grammar School, we find, First Preparatory Class, 25; Second ditto, 12; Third ditto, 12; total 49.

Whole number of students since October, 1842—176. We believe all but six of the present students are from the Southern States.

The following interesting account of the late Commencement is furnished us by a correspondent; and we feel ourselves much indebted to the writer for his kindness:

For the Churchman.

MR. EDITOR:—The College of St. James has now reached the end of the seventh year of its existence, and the closing exercises of the term just past, demand a notice which they can nowhere so well receive, as in the columns of the Churchman. The Third Annual Commencement took place on Thursday, the 26th July last. It was the privilege and joy of your correspondent to be present on that occasion. At an early hour, the College-grounds were well-thronged with ladies and gentlemen from the neighboring towns and country. The Trustees, Faculty, and Students of the institution, and a number of the Clergy present, having formed in procession, in rear of the buildings, proceeded to the lawn in front of the College, where a stage was erected under the shade of the trees, and the audience was assembled. The members of the College, in their gowns and caps, the different Societies, with their various banners and badges, and the sweet music from the band in attendance, altogether formed a very imposing procession.

The Bishop of the diocese was present, and opened the exercises with prayer, after which, testimonials of standing were delivered to a large number of the students who had rendered themselves worthy of this honor. It was by no means the least interesting part of the exercises of the day, to see, out of nearly a hundred pupils, almost one-third receiving the public testimony of their Professors, to their high standing in scholarship and morality.

Then came the orations of the four young gentlemen composing the graduating class. They were as follows:

"The Eloquence of the Bar," by T. H. Perine, of Baltimore, Md.; "American Poetry," by Henry Latrobe, of Baltimore, Md.; "The Rise and Fall of Babylon," by Thomas F. Johnson, of Baltimore, Md.; "Life and its Valedictory," by E. T. Whittingham, of Baltimore, Md.

The brevity of this notice forbids my giving a minute review of the orations—suffice it to say, that each young orator handled his subject in a manner and with a success which did great honor to himself, and to the institution with which he was connected. The valedictory moved many a heart older than that from which it came. The degree of "Bachelor in Arts" was conferred upon the graduating class, and the degree of "Master in Arts" upon George C. Morris, and Cornelius E. Swope, graduates of St. James's, of the year 1846.

The Baccalaureate Address of the Rector of the College followed. His subject was, "My Duties rather than my Rights." The Address, like every thing from its author's pen, displayed great strength and earnestness, and contained more truth than poetry, though quite enough of the latter.

The exercises were closed with a prayer and the Benediction, by the Bishop.

Altogether, the performances were highly interesting, and afforded great gratification to all whose privilege it was to enjoy them. And we would say, that if the Diocese of this institution, in her riper years, be according to the fair promise of her youth, the Church in America may rejoice in that she has such a nursery for her children, and if the present graduating class be but an earnest and first-fruit of those whom the College will send forth in after years, St. James herself may have as good reason to be proud of her sons as they of their Alma Mater.

The above was in type, before we received the following communication, with the particulars of the commencement, from the Baltimore American, which shall appear in our next number. We shall always be ready, in every favorable way to present the claims of this Institution to the notice of the readers of the Banner.

THE COLLEGE OF ST. JAMES, WASHINGTON COUNTY, MARYLAND.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—I see by the advertising columns of the Banner and Churchman, that the eighth session of our Diocesan College is announced, and I beg the favor of saying a few words to your readers in reference to it.

Although unable to attend the recent commencement, I have heard but one expression from those who were present, each speaking in the highest praise of the manner in which the students acquitted themselves in their examination.

From personal knowledge of the Rector, and most of the Professors, I can assure parents who have not, but may feel a desire to patronize the College, that they need not hesitate to do so. Their sons will be as thoroughly taught as they can be in any other institution in the country. They will have the satisfaction also of knowing that there is no danger of their children being weaned from their Church. If parents will do as I did before entering my son there, visit the institution, they will be satisfied of what I have asserted. There is one very important feature in this College giving it an advantage over most others, and that is, the faculty and students reside together, constituting a large Christian family, in which the discipline partakes altogether of a parental character.

The situation is delightful and healthy, removed from scenes of dissipation, with ample opportunities for exercise and innocent amusements, free from the temptations of a town or city residence; there being no village within four to six miles. The College is about eighty miles from Baltimore, and persons leaving here in the morning train of cars arrive at Frederick, there they dine, and from thence proceed in stages over a good turnpike to Boonsboro or Hagerstown, where carriages can always be obtained to convey them to the institution.

It were little to say that our proceedings were all harmonious, and that but one spirit governed us. The services were exceedingly interesting; and our private meetings for business were instructive, and tended to impart fresh vigor to all who were present, in the prosecution of the great work we have all in hand as ministers of the Lord Jesus Christ.

We were cheered with the presence and counsel of the Bishop, and three members of other convocations; and when our proceedings closed, the feeling expressed was one of pleasure, and of belief that God was present with us in our solemn assemblings.

We adjourned to meet in Bloomsburgh on the third Tuesday in October, when we shall be pleased to have the presence of members of other convocations, and of our brethren in the city.

Obituary.

THE LATE REV. WHITING GRISWOLD.

At a special meeting of the Wardens and Vestrymen of St. John's Church, St. Louis, held on St. James' day (July 25th), the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

Forasmuch as it has pleased ALMIGHTY God in His wise providence, to take to himself, by death, our much beloved friend and Pastor, the Rev. Whiting Griswold; and whereas we recognize in him the founder and self-sacrificing shepherd of St. John's Parish during the seven years of its existence,—the Vestry, on the part of our bereaved and afflicted Congregation, do, in much tender love and grateful remembrance, Resolve: 1st. That though in the removal of our "good shepherd" we lament what seems in our eyes an irreparable loss: yet, under this, as ever taught by him in lighter afflictions to do, we pray for grace in the fulness of resignation to say with holy Job, "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the Name of the Lord."

2d. That, though cut off in the midst of his days, his early death is stripped of many regrets by the fact that he died, as it were, from devoted and unwearied ministrations to the poor, in their wants—the dying in their last earthly trials—and the bereaved, under their afflictions—during the pestilence which has been desolating our city, and which has added to us a sad, but to the deceased a most glorious consummation of a faithful and self-sacrificing stewardship.

3d. That as in this extraordinary visitation we recognize a loud call from our Heavenly Father upon us as individuals, for renewed diligence to walk worthy of our vocation as heirs of a better and enduring life; so also do we acknowledge in it a command from the Divine Head of the Church, to devote ourselves as a body more energetically than ever to the furtherance of the object nearest our late Pastor's heart, namely, the advancement and welfare of St. John's Parish.

4th. That we presume not to meddle with the sacredness of the grief of his highly beloved and much esteemed widow, but extend to her the assurance of our honest and heartfelt sympathies; and would, in the bonds of christian hope, point her to that God who will never desert the widow or offspring of one who spent his life in providing for the afflicted, and extending the fostering care of a father to the orphan.

5th. That as a token of respect, the chancel of the Church shall be hung in black for three months.

6th. That attested copies of the above shall be forwarded to the widow and father of the deceased; to our beloved Bishop, with a request to have them spread on the books of the Standing Committee, of which our Pastor was President: and to the "Gospel Messenger" and "Banner of the Cross" and Churchman, as well as the city papers, with request to publish the same.

CHARLES G. MAURO,

Sec'y Board of Vestrymen St. John's Church, St. Louis.

Miscellaneous.

ENTRY OF THE FRENCH INTO ROME.

We take the following interesting account from the last Guardian.

To place our readers in possession of a connected account of the entry of the French into Rome, we give the following details from the Journal des Debats:—

"We have details of the last acts of the Roman Government and of the Assembly. It was, as will be remembered, on the 30th ult. that the French troops carried by assault and by a double attack the bastion of the gate of San Pancrazia. It is necessary to set forth the military importance of this fact in order to point out the discouragement which was suddenly caused among the defenders of Rome. The bastion was fortified to its gorge, and was united by an entrenchment to the old Aurelian wall, which latter was defended in the rear by the fort of Montorio. Seven pieces of cannon, loaded with grape, played on the mouth of the breach, which was besides defended by a deep ditch. In the adjoining gardens, the summer houses, and houses which flanked the inside approaches to the bastion and the entrenchment, were pierced with loopholes for musketry. From 1,200 to 1,500 men occupied this formidable bastion and its accessory defences; and the assailants were exposed to a cross fire on all sides. The Romans were justly proud of their positions, and regarded them as little likely to be carried. Nevertheless, all these obstacles were attacked in front, and were carried at the point of the bayonet with extraordinary rapidity by the two columns of attack, composed each of three companies only, exclusive of the reserve which followed to support them in case of need. The bastions, the cannon, and the entrenchments were attacked and taken at daybreak, the loopholed houses were broken into and taken by a fire of point blank musketry, and the French soldiers, exasperated by the danger and difficulties of the assault, and by the obstinacy of the resistance, struck a blow as terrible as it was decisive. The French musketry was then poured in on the internal defences of the San Pancrazia gate, and, by the capture of the new bastion, the culminating point of the Gianicolo was gained possession of. The French soon after extended themselves on the other side, as far as the Portese gate, on the banks of the lower Tiber. Terrified by the boldness and vigour of the assault, and by the carnage which had taken place in the heat of the combat, the Roman soldiers refused to defend the Gianicolo, fearing a new assault on the following night, and the leaders participated in the apprehensions of their men. At six in the morning that position was therefore abandoned, and the troops removed into the principal street of the Quartier Trastevere, situated at the foot of the Gianicolo, and strongly barricaded. The civic guard had for some days expressed great dissatisfaction at having been indirectly disarmed on the pretence of exchanging their percussion muskets for others with flint locks.

They were also much discontented at the arrogance of the soldiers of the Garibaldi, who stopped them in the streets and compelled them to go and work at the entrenchments and fire from the ramparts; the civic guard being destined particularly for the internal service of the city. Several battalions came to an agreement to openly resist the Garibaldians. In one of the quarters of Rome, the civic guard had interdicted the entrance of the patrols of Garibaldi when they wished to come in search of arms and men. The feelings of animosity at length increased so much as to threaten to degenerate into civil war. It was in the midst of these critical circumstances that the Roman Assembly had to deliberate on the 30th June, the very day of the assault. Some deputies pointed out the dreadful state of affairs, and demanded explanations from the Government. The Triumvir Mazzini admitted that they had experienced a check, and that the reports of the Generals pointed out existing danger, but he did not, he said, think that they should be compelled to capitulate, and demanded that any decision should be postponed at least until the next day. General Bartolucci said the soldiers, decimated by the firing and by the bayonet of the enemy, were exhausted by the excessive fatigue they had gone through, and by the great heat of the weather. He had read the reports of the Generals, and especially those of Garibaldi, and their tenour left no hope of any advantage to be gained by further resistance. It was necessary to save Rome from greater disasters. The Assembly visibly inclined to this opinion, but Mazzini proposed that, before coming to any vote, Garibaldi should be heard as to the means of defence which still remained. He was accordingly sent for to the Assembly. At the expiration of an hour he appeared in the tribune, and pointed out with great clearness and frankness, and in the tone of a man of resolution, the chances which still remained to the defenders of Rome. According to this account, it had been necessary to abandon to the French the whole of Mount Gianicolo, as well the old Aurelian wall, and the position of Montorio; but the Romans still retained possession of all the city beyond the Tiber. It was necessary, he said, for them to retire to the left bank, entrench themselves strongly, blow up all the bridges, arm with cannon the bastions of the Santo Spirito, defend at the same time the Castle of St. Angelo and the ramparts of the Leonine city, that is to say, the quarter of St. Peter's and the Vatican. It was objected to this plan that it would require enormous labour, that there was no time for it, that it would be to bring on the city itself a war which had hitherto been confined to the faubourgs; and that, in fine, no reliance could be placed in barricades, when the more solid bastions had been unable to withstand the French. The new plan of defence proposed by Garibaldi was in reality very sustainable; but to carry it into execution it would have been necessary to sacrifice without regard both the city of Rome and its monuments; it besides required that the whole population should be firmly determined to resist to the death, as the chiefs had always affirmed they would do. Every one, on the contrary, both soldiers and citizens, were almost unanimous in wishing to put an end to the struggle. The Assembly finished, therefore, by voting the capitulation, charging the Triumvirate with the execution of its decree. Mazzini, however, loudly rejected such a mandate:—"My conscience," he said, "will not allow me to communicate your decree to General Oudinot. I was charged by you, as Triumvir, to defend Rome and the Republic. The vote you have come to changes my mandate. I henceforth consider myself free, and resign it into your hands!" His two colleagues, Saffi and Armellini, following his example, immediately gave in their resignations. The Assembly then named a new Triumvirate, composed of Messrs. Salicetti, President of the Assembly, Mariani, and Calandrelli, Commandant of the Artillery. The latter was the officer, who, with much skill, directed the Roman artillery during the course of the siege. The new Government carried on the operations for three days, until the entrance of the French. It put forward pretensions which the French General could not admit. The conditions which it submitted for the surrender of the city were as follow:—"General Oudinot shall not interfere in the policy of the Roman States. The Roman troops of the Line shall do the duty conjointly with the French troops. The civic guard shall be maintained in its primitive state. The free corps shall be established in cantonments pointed out by General Oudinot." It was found to be impossible to come to an understanding with the deputation presided over by M. Sturbinetti, a senator of Rome, a dignity equivalent to that of mayor. In fine, on the evening of the 1st of July, the municipality took on itself to open three gates to the French troops, and the city of Rome was thus occupied unconditionally."

"Rome presents an appearance of the greatest disorder. The streets are crowded with Roman soldiers of all arms, dressed in the most varied uniforms, some belonging to the regular corps, and others to the militia, but all in a state of disorganization. To reduce these masses, still armed and in a state of excitement, to submit to the yoke of order, without having to press on them too heavily with the strong arm, would appear a task as indispensable to undertake as delicate to execute; for an army like ours, victorious it is true, but few in number, is as if lost in the midst of a population of 160,000 souls, where bad passions have alone given proof of courage and energy. The impression which appears to have, in the first place, been made on the French, is the profound terror with which the insurrectional Government has inspired the inhabitants of the city. That Government has now fallen, but the alarm which it had inspired has survived its fall, and the French find themselves in the face of men, who, still terrified, do not believe themselves to be completely delivered. On the 4th, many assassinations took place; and our Generals, not having had time to adopt decisive measures, the poignard still continues to fall on the head of the Moderates. Let us, however, hasten to say, that on the day following, the state of things was no longer the same; although it must be admitted that Rome had not been completely cleared of the band of miscreants who, unfortunately, found in the local habits of the lower classes a sort of excuse for their excesses. However this may be, it must be repeated that our soldiers saw that it was a feeling of extreme terror which acted on the unfortunate inhabitants, who, shut up in their houses, dared not, even our protection, venture into the open air. And it is not only the inactive part of the people who show so much alarm; those attached to public offices, the members of the municipality, also evince the most extreme and the most surprising timidity. They have told our staff that for more than three months they have not left their houses. When they were sent for to go to General Oudinot, who wished to come to an understanding with them for the interest of public order, they at first refused to attend to his invitation. 'We shall be assassinated,' they said. It was, however, necessary to decide, and one of the boldest among them seriously proposed to send for the armed force. The reply of another, was that, 'escorted by gendarmes, we shall look as if we were under restraint.' Independently, however, of this sad want of spirit, the present municipality is in every way unequal to its task; it is not able to provide for any of the wants of the moment. Although composed, of the greater part, of men of moderate opinions, they had for their chief M. Sturbinetti, whose participation in the acts of the Triumvirate is well known, and joined to him was Cicciavachio.—It is thus easy to judge of all the difficulties which the French authority has met with in the re-establishment of material and moral order in this great city, thrown into confusion by the construction of barricades, and delivered up for so long a time to the chaos of the most disorderly revolutionary measures. As to the ravages and devastations of the pretended French bombardment, there are really no traces of it, except from a few stray balls which have here and there struck a public edifice or a private house. Not a single monument, either ancient or modern, has been damaged. The cannonade and the shells were only directed against the walls, against the interior of the bastions, against the San Pancrazia gate, and that part of the Trastevere where the Roman troops were assembled. It was against them, and not against the city, that the guns were directed; and it is to that moderation in the use of such powerful means of destruction that the delay in the siege must be attributed."

THE AGAPEMONE.—The Rev. T. Starkey formerly held the living of Charlidge, and whilst there a gentleman of the name of Prince assisted him as his curate, until his doctrines became so wild, and his manner so eccentric, that his diocesan suspended him from performing service. Mr. S., however, adopted the same views as his curate. Again the bishop interfered, and eventually the vicar and his curate were forbidden to promulgate their new fangled religious notions in this diocese. Religious madness, or most subtle scheming, now marked the career of these men; they went about forming a new sect, announcing themselves as being personifications of the Deity, and inducing many witless men, and far more witless women, to trust their fortunes in their hands, and join them in their new belief. We understand that numbers in Weymouth, Wales, and other parts of the kingdom, as well as from this neighborhood, joined their standard, brought their money into the treasury, and were permitted to join the elect, and if we mistake not, more than once has the law stepped in to preserve the property of some excited and deluded persons from the power of these men. After spending some time in this town and Taunton, and after being the subject of rumors of a strange and extraordinary nature, as to their mode of living and religious tenets, which, if a title only be correct, equally shocks us on moral, social, and religious grounds, they at last purchased some property near Charlidge, and erected their large premises, surrounded with every convenience and luxury, and congregating together in large numbers, gave their establishment the name of "Agapemone, or Abode of Love." Here, with every luxury money can procure, beautiful equipages, splendid horses, and other adjuncts of wealth, these parties under the name of Princites, live together, numbering amongst them four clergymen, an attorney, a civil engineer, a surgeon, and others under the general term of gentlemen, together with a number of the weaker sex, who, whether married or single, maids or mothers, we have no opportunity of ascertaining. Such an establishment in a rural district, necessarily excites great curiosity amongst the gentle and simple. Some are curious to know where the money comes from; others strive to discover what mysterious orgies are carried on within the walls, it being generally admitted that Mr. Prince is regarded as superior to the others, if not the personification of the being whom they worship. This is quite certain, that our Sabbath is not regarded by them, as we regard it, the villagers around noting that more frequently on Sunday than on any other day, does the cavalcade of the Princites, with their splendid horses and dogs, sweep through their villages, as if going to the hunt or the race-field, and this whilst the village bells may be solemnly inviting them to prayer. Such is the establishment now in full fig at New Charlidge.—Sherborn Journal.

LONGING FOR THE HEAVENLY CITY.—Let us advance on the way of life and return to the heavenly city, where we shall be fellow-citizens, and of the household of God. Let us gaze on its glory so far as we can with mortal vision. It stands written of it, that sorrow and sighing shall flee away. There is no age, nor the toil of age, for all have come to the stature of perfect men in Christ. What can be happier than such a life, where there is no poverty to fear, no sickness to suffer, where no one will hurt, none is angry, no impure passion excites, no hunger gnaws, no ambition torments, no devil terrifies, no hell threatens. Evil and strife are far away. Peace and joy evermore reign. The night is far spent, the clouds scatter, an illustrious day is breaking, for that city needs no sun, nor moon, but the glory of the Lord shall enlighten it, and the Lamb is the light of it. Why do we not hasten in faith and love to our native land? A great multitude there awaits us. What joy, what jubilee for them and for us, when we can again see and embrace them! Well, then, let us look unto Christ. He is the Author of salvation, the Prince of light, the source of joy.

Mirth should be the embroidery of the conversation, not the web; and wit the ornament of the mind, not the furniture.

Extracts from Bishop Potter's Annual Addresses to the Convention of the Diocese

To the Convention of 1846.—"It gives me great pleasure to inform the Convention that some important measures have been adopted during the last year, towards securing to our youth the advantages of superior classical instruction, in connection with proper religious training. The classical department of the Protestant Episcopal Academy, which was established in this city more than fifty years since, through the agency of Bishop White and others, has been re-opened under the auspices of the Rev. Dr. Hare, and will afford to parents in this vicinity the means of educating boys in the most approved manner. Its funds have enabled the Trustees to make liberal provision for the sons of Clergymen, and others, on whom the charges of instruction would fall heavily, and it is hoped that the Academy will prove rich in blessing to many families."

To the Convention of 1847.—"I had occasion in my last address to call the attention of the Diocese to the provisions, which had just been made, to secure to the sons of churchmen a superior classical training, in connection with proper religious culture. The Episcopal Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, had then just been opened. The anticipations entertained of its usefulness have been more than realized. Its numbers have increased beyond expectation, and its discipline and course of instruction are worthy of all praise. In its influence generally, and especially in its care of the manners, morals and religious principles of the young, it vindicates its claims to the confidence of all the members of our Church; and having occasion frequently myself to visit the school, I feel the greater assurance in recommending it to general favour."

To the Convention of 1848.—"The Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, has had a career, thus far, of great and uninterrupted prosperity; and it is exerting an influence on the principles and character of our children which will be felt for good long after our own earthly course has terminated. It now numbers nearly one hundred pupils."

To the Convention of 1849.—"The Episcopal Academy in this city has reached, under the wise and efficient administration of Dr. Hare, its maximum number of pupils, as situated at present; and its Trustees are about to erect a large edifice on Locust street near Broad, sufficient for the accommodation of from two to three hundred."

COLLEGE OF ST. JAMES,

Washington county, Maryland.

The eighth session will open on Monday, October 1st, on which day the punctual attendance of all the students is requested. The duties of the classes are promptly recommended, and it is very important that all their members, new or old, should take their places at the opening of the session.

The academical year extends from the 1st of October to the 1st of August; there being but one vacation, August and September.

In the COLLEGE, all the usual classes under a full corps of Professors, have for several years been pursuing the entire course of collegiate studies equal to that prescribed in the older colleges of the north. At the recent Commencement, the third graduating class received their academical degrees.

In the GRAMMAR SCHOOL, which immediately adjoins the college, the preparatory classes are carefully trained by competent instructors under the supervision of the Professors of the College. Thus pupils may enter the Institution at an early age and pursue their entire course of study under the same direction until they graduate. The mercantile department embraces those partial members of any of the collegiate or preparatory classes, who may be preparing for the counting-room or other non-professional life. Such students are admitted to all the privileges and advantages of their several classes, substituting in place of some of the classical studies such as are more necessary as a preparation for business.

French is a regular study without extra charge in all the classes. In addition to the French, the mercantile students will be taught, without charge, German or some other modern language.

The location of the College is perfectly healthful; and there are no towns or villages near to present the temptations so dangerous to the young. Moral and religious education is one chief design of the Institution. The charge, covering all academical and domestic expenses, is $225 per session of ten months. The rules of the college carefully restrict any other expenses of the student.

All the departments are under the immediate supervision of the undersigned, to whom application may be made for copies of the "Register" of the college and for further information, as well as for the admission of pupils.

SHELBY COLLEGE.

The ensuing session of this Institution will be commenced on Wednesday, 5th of September next.

In order to admission into the Freshman Class, the applicant must exhibit satisfactory evidence of good moral character, and he must be well acquainted with the ordinary branches of English Education, and well versed in the grammar of the Greek and Latin languages, and be able to construe Jacob's Greek Reader or its equivalent, Caesar's Commentaries, Virgil, Cicero's Select Oration, and to translate English into Greek and Latin correctly. He must be thoroughly acquainted with Ancient Geography, Plain Geometry, and Algebra (Davies, First Lessons) as far as the Square Root. The College course of studies is as extensive as any in the West, in the Classical and Mathematical departments, and the most extensive, in the branches of History and the Natural Sciences.

Extensive improvements are progressing rapidly to completion, which, when finished will make the College edifice one of the most commodious for literary instruction west of the mountains. Among these improvements, the Observatory is one of great importance to the future prosperity of the Institution. The principal instrument, which will be the fourth in magnitude and power in the United States, will be finished at Munich, Germany, during the ensuing autumn. This Telescope will cost at the manufactory, unpacked, $3,200.00. The additional instruments necessary to complete the apparatus of the Observatory, are a Transit Telescope, Comet Finder, and Sideral Clock, which, aggregated, will cost $1200.00. These instruments are to be paid for by public liberality. The other improvements are provided for out of a fund which is appropriated for that purpose, which is amply sufficient for the demand upon it. My design for stating the above facts is, to engage the liberality of generous minds, to make specific donations for these objects, and also for the purchase of Chemical apparatus, of which we need in addition to our present collection, instruments which will cost $500. A Sideral Clock which cost $300, was recently given to the Cincinnati Observatory by a liberal minded gentleman of that city. Will not some wealthy reader go and do likewise for Shelby College?

The sons of Episcopalians, and those of others, who are willing that their sons shall be trained as such, are received in the subscriber's family, and suitably cared for in all respects. He becomes responsible for the expenditures of all the young men, and boys who are members of his family, since none can retain that position longer than they deserve his confidence.

The expenses including, Board, Washing, Fuel, Lights, and Tuition, are for members of College $165 for a session of ten months, and for those of the Preparatory Department $155 payable half semi-annually, in advance. Accommodations, if desired, can be obtained elsewhere in the village adjoining the College.

Persons who may desire further information can obtain it promptly by addressing the Subscriber.

EDITOR OF THE CHURCHMAN:

Dear Sir:—On Sunday, the 15th instant, the few Churchmen in this part of the State were permitted to listen for the first time to the beautiful prayers of the Church. I say few—we numbered on that day some thirteen or fourteen. Cut off by a distance of twenty miles from the nearest Church, need I say we were happy to hear again those prayers, and to sit under the teachings of that Church which we loved in New England and New York, in this our new home?

Rev. D. S. Miller, Rector of St. Jude's Church, Philadelphia, being on a visit in this vicinity, (although desirous of resting from his duties at home for a season) consented to hold service in the Lorin House, where we have listened each afternoon of the past two Sundays, and will continue during his stay. We trust his providential stay among us will cause us to exert ourselves to build a Church here, and may we not hope to engage the interest of those more favored than we, who enjoy each day that which we have been deprived of so long?

Selections.

A CHARGE TO THE CLERGY OF THE DIOCESE OF MARYLAND.

Read at the Annual Convention in Baltimore, May 31, 1849.

By WILLIAM ROLLINSON WHITTINGHAM,
Bishop of the Diocese.

"THE DOCTRINE OF THIS CHURCH," AND THAT ALONE, TO BE HELD AND TAUGHT BY THE MINISTRY OF CHRIST, IN THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES.

REVEREND AND BELOVED BRETHREN:—

The course of time has again brought round the term at which it becomes my duty to stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance of the things which concern us especially as ministers of CHRIST. From the rich abundance that presents itself, out of which to choose the theme, while thus employed, I have little difficulty in making a selection on this occasion.

Circumstances affecting the present condition of our branch of the Church, require of all a more than usually close attention to the provisions for unity and consistency in doctrine, by which our responsibility to God and man is affected, and our conduct in the ministry must be regulated. There is, in many quarters, an uneasiness, (not, unhappily, without some show of ground,) that requires plain and clear exhibitions of our real condition in respect to the safeguards for purity of doctrine, and uniformity of discipline and worship, by which soundness in faith, and incorruptness in practice, are to be preserved among us. In more than one direction, there have been movements tending to destroy our confidence in each other, and still more, our reliance on the bonds by which we are kept together in concord and united action. Organised associations to effect the teaching and worship of the Church are formed or spoken of, and novel interpretations of the terms of membership and office in her communion are connected with them. Double meanings are propounded for her Catechism and Articles, and loose constructions claimed both for them and for the Prayer Book. Ministers may be found fraternising with one or other of the forms of schism that surround us, and asserting for their appearance in the mass-house or the meeting-house, the plea, so popular and so plausible, of the liberty wherewith CHRIST hath made us free. Contemplated changes may be heard of, directly involved in public declarations about remaining traces of Popery in our Offices, or directly aimed at in secret whisperings against the ultra-protestantism of the reformers, by whom those offices were compiled. For such efforts to undermine or batter down the godly fabric of which God hath made us inheritors and keepers, full allowance is demanded, under loud protests against the intolerance which would rebuke or punish them.

"These signs of the times are evil, it must be owned. But there is one hopeful feature in the case. The tendencies to unrest and outbreak are not all in one direction. They oppose each other. They feed each other, doubtless, for a while, by such opposition, while each charges the errors and extravagancies of the other upon the truth and right that lie between them. But in the end, their counterbalancing and mutually destructive influences must result advantageously for the doctrine, discipline and worship which either of them, unopposed, might weaken and lay waste."

Now their common object of attack is authority and rule. Not that there is an avowed intention to destroy, or even set aside, the authority and rule existing in the Church. A more effectual assault is carried on by demonstrating its incompetence, its uselessness, its inconsistency with the privilege of Churchmanship, or the attainments of spiritually-minded Christians. The Church has no rulers, say they, but its laws. Its laws are too narrow to be Catholic; or they are too formal to be Evangelical. They must admit of extension. To put a strict construction on them, and enforce it, is narrow-minded and intolerant. They must be administered consistently with the largest liberty.

Now it is an old and noted device of men desiring to overthrow established authority and substitute their own, to cry out against intolerance. They are friends of liberty, they say. They seek, they claim, they mean to establish the widest liberty—liberty for all—liberty diffusive, indifferent, equal, universal.

But liberty may be universally diffused, and equal to all, without a difference, and yet not be liberty from every thing, for every thing, to every thing. Such liberty would be anarchy, and wild, chaotic license. Such liberty, the reformers of every age are careful to disavow as not their object. In so doing, they do well; for if they did it not, they might have some followers, truly, but such, in such proportion to the bulk of the community, as would leave their case in hopeless feebleness and contempt.

Yet the disavowal of an effort to establish liberty in its widest sense, reduces the question between reformers and the authorities against which they wage their war, to one of mere degree. There has never existed a human tyranny so complete, as to leave no liberty, in any respect, to its miserable subjects. The nearest approach to a complete tyranny, that which combines pretensions to spiritual power, with the possession of the temporal, has never, even in the dynasties of the mediæval

Popes or of the Caliphs of Islam, attained to such mastery of man, in his social, intellectual and religious being, as to fetter all his movements, or exercise control over every faculty.

At any time, then, in any system, in which change is called for under the name of liberty, there is a certain degree of liberty in possession: and at the same time those who call for more, are not desirous to obtain it—nay, are not willing to suffer it to be claimed—beyond a certain degree. Limits have been fixed, and they are desirous to fix new limits. The question between the agitator and the authority is, whose limit is the right one? not, shall there be a limit? It is not liberty absolutely that is called for, but liberty within a certain line. The struggle is, who shall fix that line?

If the line to be fixed were always a simple boundary in one direction, it would be comparatively easy to settle the question at issue, and proportionably difficult to mystify it with fallacies and cunning tricks of policy. But it is not so. The limits to be ascertained lie all around a circle, or rather on the peripheries of a multitude of more or less coincident circles, of which both centres and circumferences are often difficult of discovery and discernment.

Thus designing men, or men deluded by their vain imaginations of their own rectitude of intention and conduct, but really slaves of prejudice, find their advantage. They call for liberty, that is, new, broader limits of liberty; and so doing, point in one direction, and show the reasons for shifting the limit in that direction: but do they propose to gain that broader limit by widening the whole circle, or series of circles, in every other direction, equally? or by shifting the centre of an unwidened circle in that one direction?

On the answer to this question, which many of them have not asked themselves, and which most of those who have, do not like to have put to them by others, depends the character of their pretensions to be "friends of liberty."

On it, again, depends, in no small degree, the decision of the point at issue, both as right and as expedient. It might be clearly right to move to a certain point in one direction, and as clearly wrong to do it by a motion extending equally in all other directions. It might be perfectly expedient to allow an extension of liberty, around all the periphery of a circle, and utterly inexpedient and unjust to grant it at one point only.

To apply these remarks to our own case. Two classes of brethren among us are striving to obliterate if they can, to change if they may, the limits of the liberty that, as children of the Church, we have been all along enjoying until now.

To say that they are doing so, is no pre-judgment of their cause. They may, for aught that is implied in the statement, be doing a meritorious work, discharging a sacred duty. All that can be required of them, is, honest avowal of their respective purposes, and in order to that, clear conceptions of them for themselves. They should know, and let their brethren know, in what direction, to what extent, the boundary line of fit and lawful, is to be removed; and also, whether its removal is to be effected by a widening of the circle of permissible affinities and actions, or a shifting of its centre. Or if its existence at any given point is denied, they should show whether only that point of our circle of relations and possible expansions is left open, or whether our religious liberty has the property of infinite space, to have its centre every where, its circumference nowhere?

On one hand, the bosom of a brother expands with a large hearted zeal for the extension of the blessings of the Gospel that leads him to ascend the platform in aid of religious efforts not known nor sanctioned by the Church, and tending to the counteraction and destruction of her discipline. He claims to be within the limits of his liberty in doing so. But on the other hand, an equal large-heartedness of zeal, in its longing for catholic communion after its own fancies, is willing to excuse errors stamped with the condemnation of the Church, to seek the fraternity if those who receive and practice them; and even to modify its own tenets and ministrations to the nearest possible conformity with such as have been disallowed by the Church as dangerous or sinful. He, too, claims to be within the limits of his liberty, and to have done no wrong.

Are both these brethren right? If not, which? Why one more than the other?

There is one limit to their liberty, which both at once own. They equally, unfeignedly and unreservedly admit the right of thought, speech and action to be restricted by the will of God.

That will, they both desire to carry out, and aim to do so, in their several courses of action.

How do they know it? And how does it affect them?

They know it directly or indirectly; by revelation to themselves, or by a general revelation, of which they, with others, are sharers.

A revelation to themselves, if they suppose it, by the immediate operation of the SPIRIT, who is the guide to all truth, upon their hearts, is of force for them, and for themselves only. Their thoughts, words and actions it must control, and in following it, they must abide by the consequences of their liability to delusion. But it is for themselves only. The moment it affects their relations to others, in any circle, from the narrowest to the widest, under any responsibilities, from the lowest of social affinity to the highest of official station, their individual persuasions become worthless, without other sanction. Signs and wonders, and the demonstration of the SPIRIT must attest a direction, which is otherwise a mere temptation. The integcity of revelation, and the defence of Society against fanaticism and insanity, depend on the observance of this law.

Of general revelations, we know but one; and among us, thank God, there is little question about the nature and authority of its record. The Scriptures are our common rule, by the contents of which we all admit our obligation to be guided. Their paramount authority is owned; and what they authorise or direct, we will all allow to be sufficiently upheld.

But the Scriptures, to be a rule, must be applied and interpreted; and to be a rule for more than one, must be applied and interpreted by an authority co-extensive with the limits of the company to be ruled. If a believer stood alone before God on earth, his own understanding of God's word would be his sufficient guide. But the moment two or three are joined in mutual relation and common duties, their joint sense of the application of the express directions, and of the interpretation of the implied import, of the common rule, must be the limit of the common liberty, and therefore of that of each. The Church, as a society must have for its rule as such, the Scriptures as understood and applied by the society; and every member must be governed by that rule in every respect in which his actions, words, or even thoughts can affect his relations to any other member of the society, or the society itself.

The rule of a society binds according to its purposes: no further; and no less. Men associated for transient or partial interests and ends, can only be bound by a rule of transient or partial application. Higher and more extensive ends of association bring men under a more extensive rule.

The ends of our association in the Church of CHRIST cover all the concerns of life, in all their infinite variety, and extend through all the duration of our endless being. When enrolled in that association, we gave body, soul and spirit up to CHRIST our LORD, unchangeably, for ever. The rule of the Church, then, covers all human duty throughout the term of our probation. All our conduct comes in its purview. We can do nothing, we can engage in nothing, which it does not more or less affect.

Thus it is evident, that as individuals enjoying membership in the Church of CHRIST, our liberty is limited by the will of God, declared in the Scriptures, as applied and understood by the Church.

For all her members, the Church Catholic has furnished her application and interpretation of the Scriptures, in the "form of sound words," on profession of which they were admitted to their membership by Baptism. Laymen or ministers we all may say, with the divines of Wittenburg, before the Council of Trent, "our faith accepts the guidance of the writings of the prophets and apostles in that natural sense which is expressed in the Creeds—the Apostles', the Nicene and the Athanasian."*

For the Church Catholic, the Creeds are the catholic interpretation and application of Scripture; and by them only should we be bound, if we could be members of that Church without being members of some one branch. But that we cannot. Our membership is through the branch in which we partake of the Word and Sacraments. By the law of its being, we are bound, as the law and condition of our membership of the Church Catholic.

Every branch of the universal Church is, and must be a society in itself. As a society, it must have its terms of membership correlative and coextensive with its end of association. That end, is the glory of God in the salvation of human souls, by their being brought to the knowledge of His grace and faith in Him, to spiritual worship and to holy life. Doctrine, discipline, and a pattern or custom or law of worship, are needful for that end—all controlled by the rule of the universal Church, but having a form and subordinate peculiarity of their own. The society of whose existence they are necessary terms, can exist only as one. Its unity implies unity in the law by which that unity is maintained. As one, it can have but one doctrine, one discipline, one law, or custom, or pattern of worship. These, conjointly, are its interpretation and application of the will of God declared in His revealed word, for the guidance of its members.

The limit of individual liberty, then, for any Christian, is the teaching of Scripture as interpreted and applied for him by the Church, in the catholic creeds and in the provisions for doctrine, discipline, and worship, of that particular branch of the Church in which he enjoys his membership.

At night I again preached after prayers by Rev. Mr. Jansen. Monday 25.—Morning prayer was read by Rev. Mr. Jansen and I preached in the court-house, thus closing the present visitation to the congregation at Brownsville.

Thursday, 28.—Having been kindly brought on my way by Dr. S. Oldham, to Durhamville, I read morning prayer in the court-house, at 11 A. M., and preached to a respectable congregation. This village is situated in the midst of a beautiful, fertile and thriving country. Widow Lee, an aged and respected member of our Church, lives in the place, and several other communicants are scattered through the neighborhood. I doubt not that if a minister would bestow the requisite labor, he might gather a good congregation, and by united efforts among those interested, a church be erected, and the stirring voice of the liturgy be heard weekly, where now it is seldom raised more than once in the course of the year, and that during the hurried visit of the Bishop. It is not wonderful that under such circumstances the love of our members should wax cold, and that the lambs of the flock should stray into strange pastures. The only wonder is that any at all should remain firm and unmoved in their attachment to the Church of their fathers. Of this class there are two or three shining examples, who in the midst of an almost total destitution of Church privileges, still think with yearning hearts of the Zion they love, and long to see her walls raised in strength, and her gates established in beauty. For these examples of devotion to His Church, God's holy name be ever praised!

The recommendation made at the last Convention, upon the subject of weekly offerings has been complied with in at least four parishes. The result so far has been satisfactory—so much so indeed, as not only to warrant me to encourage those who have begun this work to continue it, but to repeat earnestly the recommendation given to every congregation in the diocese. And here I would impress upon the minds of the clergy the importance of rightly instructing their people upon this subject, and guarding them and others who may attend our worship, from mistake and misapprehension. It is not to be supposed for a moment that we can by any offerings, however costly, purchase for ourselves the pardon of sin or propitiate the favor of Heaven. Neither are we to imagine that by any worship which we can offer in the way of prayer and praise we can gain a title to eternal life, and escape the bitter pains of eternal death.—Salvation is the free gift of God in Christ Jesus, limited in its offer to man, by the conditions of faith and repentance. Wherever this offer is embraced, obedience in the exercise of a true repentance and a lively faith is the certain and unvarying fruit. Prayer, praise and all other expressions of devout affections then spring up spontaneously from the over-mastering principle of love,—a principle which will constrain him who feels its sacred fire to consecrate himself and all that he has to Him, "who so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him, should not perish but have everlasting life." If God is honored by our prayers and praises, as we are taught by his holy word to believe, so likewise may we believe that He will accept and bless the oblations which we make of our worldly substance, to uphold his worship and spread his truth in the world. Of his ancient people, the Jews, he required, as you know, a tenth. Of us under the Gospel, He has asked us to give what a willing mind will offer cheerfully of our ability. "If there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath and not according to that a man hath not." Let every one look upon this duty of contributing to the support of religion, as a privilege—in the same way as he regards it a privilege to offer prayer and praise to God; and performing this service with this understanding of its nature and object, let him not doubt that he "shall be blessed in his deed." In no other way would we have any man engage in this work. We would not desire any man to give because he happens to be present, or from constraint, because others about him are contributing. No: if he cannot give from conscientious convictions of duty—duty to God—let him forbear—to his own master he must give account. If he can make a better investment "of the mammon of unrighteousness" to secure his happiness temporal and eternal, certainly it is his right and privilege so to do. But let him be careful at the same time to remember that improvement and increase will be demanded of him, and that nothing short of these will ensure "well-done" of his heavenly Master and righteous Judge.

You will remember, Brethren, that at the last Convention the subject of establishing a school for boys, to be placed under the authority of the Church in this diocese, was brought up to your notice. A Committee was then appointed to take the whole business in charge, and adopt whatever measures might be necessary to carry into effect the recommendation made to the Convention. The Committee since its appointment has had the subject under careful consideration; and have adopted measures as far as practicable with the means at its disposal, to accomplish the proposed object. A very eligible lot of ground has been contracted for, consisting of ten acres, near Columbia, for the sum of one thousand dollars, which sum the committee has agreed to pay out of the donation of $1500 made by Col. A. J. Polk. The deed for this lot of land has already been made to me as Trustee for the Church in this diocese, and thus as far as it can be by legal provision, secured for the purpose above designated. The remainder of Col. Polk's donation has been loaned to Prof. D. Macleod and his note taken for that sum, bearing interest from the date. In addition to the means above-named, and now at the disposal of the committee, I hold the notes of Col. G. W. Polk, gross amount $500, payable in one and two years from the first of last January—of Dr. Wm. J. Polk for $500 on the same terms—of L. J. Polk for $250 on same terms, and of James Walker for $100 on same terms. Thus it will be seen that the disposable means of the committee as things now stand and for the next two years amount to $1850. This sum is not sufficient to erect the necessary buildings for the contemplated school even on a very moderate scale of respectability: while the funds which have been contributed and promised are surely enough to excite the interest of us all, and to encourage us to vigorous effort for the accomplishment of the enterprise. In the name then of the Church as the proper guardian of her children in this diocese, and bound as far as you enable her to provide for their correct, moral, intellectual and religious training, I invoke your aid brethren, the members of this Convention, and through you of every parish and every member of the Church in the diocese. All that we ask for the present is, that you put it in our power to work; that you furnish us the necessary means to erect buildings to accommodate one family and twenty pupils. With this we can make a suitable beginning, and with such a beginning I have no fears but that we shall be able so to do our work in the business of education as to secure a patronage and an amount of public favor that will enable us to enlarge our accommodations and plans to any reasonable and desirable extent. Let no man hesitate to help in this cause upon the plea that the amount given is so small that it will avail nothing. "Every little helps," and if we work vigorously with our small means, it may please God to aid and bless us with abundance. And especially am I desirous that we first of all endeavour to help ourselves before we make any application abroad. An equal amount contributed in the diocese with that raised in the county of Maury will enable the committee to erect such buildings as are indispensable to the successful accomplishment of the object.

In connexion with the foregoing it is proper that I add here, that through an arrangement made by Rev. Dr. Wheat and Prof. D. Macleod, a school was begun in Columbia last September under their joint superintendence and labor, which has continued to increase under their judicious and efficient management, and which promises to be a suitable foundation on which to build the Diocesan School which we contemplate. The patronage which Dr. Wheat and Mr. Macleod have received, has already surpassed the expectations of the friends of the enterprise, while the wise and prudent system of training and government which has been adopted, and the first results of which are exhibited in the report, hereto appended, leave no room to doubt that the number of pupils will steadily increase with the knowledge of its present and prospective advantages. The school is at present conducted in a large and commodious house in the town of Columbia, and regulated as a private household or family. The rent of this property is however onerous in conducting such an enterprise, and constitutes one main reason of the earnest desire expressed for the erection of suitable buildings on our own ground. As soon as these can be constructed a proper compensation will be returned to the Church in the way of education to her beneficiaries, for every dollar which her members may contribute to this object.

In the course of the last year it pleased God in his wise Providence to visit our country with the scourge of pestilence: I deemed it my duty, in accordance with the provisions of the Canon of the General Convention, to set forth forms of prayer to be used in congregations, during the period of apprehended danger: and also prayers recommended to the use of families for the same occasion. These forms with a pastoral letter were printed and sent to each clergyman of the Church in the diocese. I renew the request to our brethren of the clergy and laity to continue the use of these prayers until it please God in his goodness and compassion to remove the plague from our borders.

I deem it my duty here to give notice to those clergymen who shall hereafter neglect to make their reports as directed by the 8th Canon of the General Convention of 1841, that I shall report their names to the Convention. I have had occasion in times past to remind clergymen repeatedly of their duty in this particular, but to little purpose, as the duty in a few cases is still neglected.

Commending you in your present deliberations, and in all your ways, to the grace of Him who is the giver of all good gifts, I remain your faithful friend and affectionate pastor,

JAS. H. OTEY.

WESLEYAN METHODISM.

We said just now that the doctrines which John Wesley maintained, are in the present day forgotten by those who have promised to receive ex animo his interpretation of the New Testament, and his volumes of sermons. Our impression is, that had the "Venerable Founder" of Wesleyanism lived in the present day, the restoration of the truths of the Church of England, in all their fulness and integrity, would have commanded his earnest sympathies, and secured the services of his well-stored mind and able pen. He was, in fact, what men would now call the Tractarian mover of his times. The grounds upon which we come to this conclusion, are neither few nor slight; and, that our readers may form a just opinion for themselves, we will present them with a few extracts from his writings, on what are termed the distinctive features of "Tractarian" teaching. In some of these we meet with language, which, if used by "young Clerics" of the present day, would rouse the Protestant lion from his den, and make him shake his shaggy mane, and afford, in a dearth of other matter, ample materials for an Ecclesiastical paragraph or two, in the pages of our contemporary. We shall for the present confine ourselves to the 105th Sermon, "on Constant Communion," which we should like to see circulated as a tract. We will, however, first quote a few sentences from a sermon preached on laying the foundation stone of the City Road Chapel, April 21, 1777, in which we have a plain statement of Wesley's intentions and desires. In this Sermon, his appeals to the Primitive Church, and the Church of England; his allusions to the writings of Sts. Clement, Ignatius, Polycarp, Tertullian, &c., must appear somewhat strange to modern expositors of Holy Writ, who are so learned that they need no adventitious helps in the study of Divine truth. It is clear, from the whole of this sermon, that Wesley's object and intention were, as far as in him lay, to produce a revival of religion, and so a reformation of the Church of England, which, in his day, was at a very low ebb. The secret why other revivals of religion had failed is thus given:—

"It cannot be denied that there have been several considerable revivals of religion in England since the Reformation. But the generality of the English nation were little profited thereby, because they that were the subjects of those revivals, preachers as well as people, soon separated from the Established Church, and formed themselves into a distinct sect. So did the Presbyterians first, afterwards the Independents, the Anabaptists, and the Quakers. And, after this was done, they did scarce any good, except to their own little body. As they chose to separate from the Church, so the people remaining therein separated from them, and generally contracted a prejudice against them. But these were immensely the greatest number; so that, by that unhappy separation, the hope of a general national reformation was totally cut off.

"But it is not so in the present revival of religion. The Methodists (so termed) know their calling. They weighed the matter at first, and, upon mature deliberation, determined to continue in the Church. Since that time they have not wanted temptations of every kind to alter their resolution. They have heard abundance said upon the subject, perhaps all that can be said. They have read the writings of the most eminent pleaders for separation, both in the last and present century. They have spent several days in a general conference upon this very question. 'Is it expedient (supposing not granting, that it is lawful) to separate from the established Church? But still they could not see sufficient cause to depart from their first resolution. So that their fixed purpose is, let the clergy or laity use them well or ill, by the grace of God, to endure all things, to hold on their even course, and to continue in the Church, mangle men or devils, unless God permits them to be thrust out."

He renounces all connexion with those of the body who separated from the Church. His words are:—

"None of these have any manner of connexion with the original Methodists. They are branches broken off from the tree: if they break from the Church also, we are not accountable for it.

"These, therefore, cannot make our glorying void, that we do not, will not, form any separate sect: but from principles remain, what we always have been—true members of the Church of England."

Now one of the great stumbling-blocks of the present age—one of the most fearful doctrines of so-called "Tractarianism," is that of Sacramental efficacy. Of JOHN WESLEY's views on Holy Baptism we have ample evidence in his Journal, and his Notes on the New Testament, and we may easily believe what he thought of it, when he tells us that he was nine years of age before he sinned away Baptismal grace. His exposition of the Holy Communion in the sermon from which we are going to quote, is plain and beautiful: the production of a reverent mind moulded by the study of antiquity. However much his professed followers may contend that in after-life he modified some of his opinions, they cannot, by any sophistry of reasoning, get rid of this. In 1788, three years before his death, as if to provide against any such contingency, he adds this note:—

"The following discourse was written above five and fifty years ago, for the use of my pupils at Oxford. I have added very little, but retrenched much; as I then used more words than I do now. But, I thank God, I have not yet seen cause to alter my sentiments, in any point which is therein delivered."—1788, J. W.

Amongst the reasons adduced for constant communion, he says:—

"A second reason why every Christian should do this as often as he can, is, because the benefits of doing it are so great, to all that do it in faith and obedience to Him; viz, the forgiveness of our past sins, the present strengthening and refreshing of our souls.

"The grace of God given herein, confirms to us the pardon of our sins, and enables us to leave them. As our bodies are strengthened by bread and wine, so are our souls by these tokens of the body and the blood of Christ. This is the food of our souls; this gives strength to perform our duty, and lead us on to perfection. If, therefore, we have any regard for the plain command of Christ, if we desire the pardon of our sins, if we wish for strength to believe, to love, and obey God, then we should neglect no opportunity of receiving the Lord's Supper. Then we must never turn our backs on the feast which the Lord has prepared for us. We must neglect no occasion which the good providence of God affords us for this purpose. This is the true rule; so often are we to receive as God gives us opportunity."

His advice, therefore, is to the following effect—and here again, we have an appeal to the Primitive Church:—

"Let every one, therefore, who has either any desire to please God, or any love for his own soul, obey God, and consult the good of his own soul, by communicating every time he can; like the first Christians, with whom the Christian sacrifice was a constant part of the service of the Lord's Day. And for several centuries they received it almost every day. Four times a week always, and every Saint's day besides. Accordingly, those that joined in the prayers of the faithful, never failed to partake of the Blessed Sacrament. What opinion they had of any who turned his back upon it, we may learn from that ancient Canon, 'If any believer join in the prayers of the faithful, and go away without receiving the Lord's Supper, let him be excommunicated, as bringing confusion into the Church of God.'"

His answers to the objections against this practice are to our mind as simple as they are conclusive. One or two we select:—

"What has been said on this pretence against constant communion, is applicable to those who say the same thing in other words, 'We dare not do it, because it requires so perfect an obedience afterwards, as we cannot promise to perform.' Nay, it requires neither more nor less perfect obedience than you promised in your Baptism. You then undertook to keep the commandment of God by His help; and you promise no more when you communicate."

But one more extract shall suffice. In replying to those who contend that the Church only enjoins Communion thrice in the year, he remarks:—

"But secondly, we cannot conclude from these words, that the Church excuses him who receives only thrice a year. The plain sense of them is, that he who does not receive thrice at least, shall be cast out of the Church; but they by no means excuse him who communicates no oftener. This never was the judgment of the Church; on the contrary, she takes all possible care that the Sacrament be duly administered, wherever the Common Prayer is read, every Sunday and holiday in the year."

We are somewhat curious to see what reply can be given to the above; and to learn what cause of surprise it is that those who have been so taught in their infancy, and imbibed such sentiments from the writings of Wesley himself, should, when they have come to maturity, and are able to use their own judgment, prove true and faithful Ministers of a Church, whose doctrines he has so clearly understood, and so fully explained.—West of England Conservative.

BURIAL PLACES AMONG BARBAROUS NATIONS.—No. II.

"They are but dust,—

Whether they sleep in marble sepulchres
Or shroudless rot beneath a sod of grass,
They are but dust."

We now turn to the Eastern nations of the world, and find them burying their dead after various fashions. More or less of pageantry almost invariably attends the disposal of the lifeless clay, though we occasionally meet with instances where the barbarian rudely thrusts the body of his friend wherever it will be most easily screened from sight, without show of ceremony or sorrow. Such examples are, however, rare. One of the common characteristics of the savage is his superstitious reverence for the ashes of the dead, and we accordingly find among the oriental nations that the grave is regarded with decent respect, if not with religious awe.

It would be beside our purpose to enter into a description, which, perhaps, could not fail to be tedious, of the gorgeous and glittering pageantry which attends the funeral of a Siamese noble, and we shall, therefore, confine ourselves to a brief account of the obsequies of a man of comparatively humble condition. The wealthy barbarian endeavours to manifest his sorrow or respect by the superb magnificence of a funeral; the humble mourner is content to express his grief by the multiplication of simple ceremonies.

CEREMONY OF A SIAMESE FUNERAL.—The body, wrapped in costly garments and deposited in a coffin decorated with fanciful carvings, is placed upon a lofty bier, under the branches of the sacred fig-tree of Siam. A drapery of white cloth embroidered with gold, and ornamented with garlands of jessamine and other delicate and sweet-smelling flowers, is spread over the whole, while the surrounding crowd, amid the sound of drums and flageolets, await the arrival of the priest. The ceremony is not solemn. The chief mourner, with shaven head and clothed in white garments, sits by the side of the bier, while the officiating priest mutters a few prayers. The fire is then kindled beneath, and the male relatives of the deceased, tying their clothes up in bundles, throw them from one to another, without cessation, across the blazing pile until the whole is consumed. The more humble Siamese does not, however, meet even with this respect after death. His remains, placed on a heap of wood prepared on a low earthen platform, are burnt, and the ashes left to be scattered by the wind, returning, in the most literal sense, to the dust from whence they came. Some of the people of Siam disembowel their dead and preserve them for an extravagantly long period before burning. In Ava this custom is confined to the priesthood.

OBSEQUIES OF AN AVAN PRIEST.—The funeral of an Avan priest is a curious spectacle. An immense train of people issues from the temple and repairs to the appointed spot. The body lies in state upon a huge wooden car, raised upon lofty wheels, and behind this is drawn a cannon or mortar of gigantic dimensions. Arrived at the consecrated ground, the mourners, with their servants and friends, immediately, with great shouts and clamour, drag the body from its resting place, and drive, or rather hammer it down the mouth of the engine, already loaded with a double charge of powder. The match is applied, and the corpse shot forth and blown into atoms, so that a vestige of it is rarely discovered.

This is an original mode of disposing of the dead, and the reason given for it is no less curious. "His soul," says the Avan priest, "has been despatched to heaven on a flash of fire."

OBSEQUIES OF A LAYMAN.—On other occasions the body is carried forth with great solemnity, followed by a procession of diseased persons, to the funeral pile, and with great parade and ceremony placed upon it; the Five Commandments of Buddha are repeated, and, after a mock combat, the fire kindled, amid laughter and loud conversation. A man clothed in red garments, and mounted upon an elephant, is then employed to collect the ashes of the deceased and carry them away into the forest. He is generally a criminal, and the beast upon which he rides, usually a maimed or diseased animal, is considered polluted by the office, and is turned loose for ever in the woods.

BARBARIAN POMP AND SAVAGE SIMPLICITY.—The people of the two nations we have mentioned have possessed themselves of many of the luxuries, if not of the refinements of civilization, and we observe among them a curious illustration of the remark which has been often made, that men hovering, as it were, between barbarism and civilization are often ruder and grosser in their manners than those who have never emerged from the darkness of their primitive existence. We find them, at their funerals, indecent and boisterous, not from irreverence, but because they imagine it pleasing to the departed spirit, and exhibiting little of that deep silent sorrow with which the simple savage consigns his dead relative to the eternity which is utterly unknown to him.

FUNERAL AT TENG'GHAR.—Some curious ceremonies are observed at the funeral of an inhabitant of Teng'ghar, in Java. The body is placed at the bottom of a deep grave, with the head lying towards the south, and is then concealed from sight by a strong roofing of planks, which prevent the earth from pressing on it. The pit is then filled up. Two posts are planted, one at the head, the other at the foot, while a hollow bamboo is thrust into the ground directly above the breast. For seven successive days the relatives come and pour a quantity of pure water into this bamboo, beside which two large dishes of food are placed.

FEAST OF THE DEAD.—The feast of the dead is, at the expiration of this period, announced. Great preparations are made. An image of leaves, representing the human form, and decorated with variegated flowers, is prepared and placed near the grave, half-clothed in the garments of the deceased person. In front of this a garland of young blossoms and a jar of water are placed, and the holy man who officiates repeats a variety of incantations. The assembled company then partake of the feast, the garland is burned, the holy water sprinkled over each individual in turn, and a blessing invoked on all. If at the expiration of a thousand days, the memory of the dead man be still loved and cherished by his friends, these ceremonies are renewed; but if, with his disappearance from the earth, his image has died in the minds of his friends, no further solemnities occur, and the site of the grave is soon lost; either raked by the plough, or covered by the wild vegetation of the jungle.

JAVAN FUNERAL.—The ceremony of a funeral in the neighbourhood of a Javanese town is second only in solemnity to that which takes place at the birth of a new year. An immense procession accompanies the body. Images, representing the relations and friends who have preceded him on the road of death, are borne along, while musical instruments and flags render the pageant one more gay than imposing. The corpse is buried within the walls of a large enclosure, and over each grave is raised a crescent-shaped mound of earth, ornamented with considerable taste. But if there be little sombre pomp in the funerals of the Javanese, nothing can be more striking than the aspect of their solemn though simple burying grounds. These are generally situated on the slope of a hill, or in the bosom of a little green and woody valley, at some distance from the habitations of men. Low mounds mark the several graves, and above each blooms the dark-leaved samboja tree,* the fantastic growth of whose trunk imparts a strange appearance to the silent spot.

FUNERAL AT TANJUNG ALEM.—When Sir Stamford Raffles was at Tanjung Alem, the funeral of an old woman of rank took place. The body, clothed in costly garments, was carried to the hall of audience, and there displayed in state before the whole population. A goat was sacrificed and its blood sprinkled about the house of the deceased, while all the young girls of the village surrounded the place, and uttered in loud, though monotonous, chant the words,—

"Oh, mother, mother, come back, come back!
Oh, mother, come back!
Oh, mother, mother, come back, back!"

And so on, with incessant repetition. This unvarying chant was uttered, day after day, by successive choruses, until the corpse could keep no longer, when it was seized, placed hurriedly upon a rude bier, and borne away swiftly to a distant grave, where, without ceremony of any kind, it was given to the earth. The very site of its resting place was soon cropped over with the rank verdure which clothes every neglected spot.

BALINESE CEREMONIES.—The Balinese not only burn their dead, but also allow the widows and female slaves of the deceased to give themselves as victims and perish on the funeral pile. The rite of suttee is too well known to need description here. It is practised only in this diminutive island, upon which the small remnant of the worshippers of Buddha and Vishnu perform the ceremonies of their faith. The countless temples of Java attest that Hinduism was not always confined to Bali. Other religions, however, have taken its place, and it will soon, probably, cease to rank among the various and multiplied creeds of the Indian islanders. It is common among the poorer classes of these people to cast their dead into the sea.

BORNEAN FUNERALS.—OFFERINGS AT THE TOMB.—The respect paid to the aged and infirm among the native races of Borneo does not cease with death. On the dissolution of a warrior, the Dyaks dress him out in his war habiliments and keep him in his house for ten days. They then convey the body, wrapped in white cloth and placed upon a large litter, to the burial ground, and deposit it, together with a profusion of arms, implements, and provisions, in the grave, over which a large mound is raised and encircled with strong stakes. No warrior can bring an offering more acceptable, as it is supposed, to the spirit of the departed, or more complimentary to the feelings of his friends, than a fresh bleeding head to fix upon one of the stakes. No one ever ventures to pay a visit of condolence to the relatives of the dead unless he has made this grateful offering at the grave. It may readily be imagined, therefore, how the death of one chief or fighting man brings others in its train.

THE ROAD TO PARADISE.—Among many of the tribes the corpse is not permitted to be buried until a fresh head is ready to decorate the tomb. One principal reason assigned by the natives for this practice is, that the way to Paradise lies over a mighty gulf, across which is placed, as a bridge, the trunk of a single tree, and to accomplish this passage it is necessary that the noble spirit should have the assistance of one or more slaves. Of their souls no account is made.

STRANGE BURIAL PLACE.—Some of the Bornean race burn their dead and bury their ashes in an earthen jar, on a spot set apart for the purpose, and strewn with pottery, pikes, implements, provisions, and human bones. It must be a curious sight for the traveller who, emerging on an open glade in the jungle, should find it thus devoted to the rest of the dead, whose presence below is indicated by these strange decorations. A ghastly head is seldom wanted to complete the grimness of the scene. A burial ground among the Dyaks of Sarawak is situated near a river, upon slightly elevated ground: each grave is entirely covered with a huge bundle of wood, piled to the height of a foot and a half or two feet, and kept together by means of a transverse cross. On the graves of the men are placed numerous ornaments, with sword-scabbards and armlets; while the waist-rings they wore in life decorate the resting places of the women. A jar of water and a vessel of food are placed at the head of each, that the spirit may not want; though whether the spirit ever partakes of this provision appears a problem even to the Dyak races.

Affection for Tombs.—The Javan venerates the tomb of his forefathers, and if seized with a mortal illness at a distance from his native place, his last request generally is, that his ashes may lie near those of his ancestors. It sometimes occurs that the humble peasant is forced to leave the lands he has been accustomed to cultivate, to till a distant farm, and his chief regret always is that he shall be away from his father's tomb. An annual festival takes place in honour of the dead; men, women, and children, attired in decent though sober apparel, repair to the burial grounds, and there pass the day in devotion, strewing over the graves abundant showers of the delicate white blossoms of the salasia, a plant cultivated for no other purpose.†

* From the peculiar growth of this tree, it has always the appearance of being aged.

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 25, 1849.

The proposed plan, unofficially announced in a brief editorial of this Paper, in reference to the temporary residence and support of the Bishop elect of Indiana, has been generally discussed in the Church Papers. The prevailing judgment seems to be against any such arrangement. Three standing committees have expressed their opposition by withholding their official signatures on this account. We suppose that now this obstacle has been removed, they will at once sign the Testimonials of the Rev. Dr. Upfold. Upon the question of the propriety of any such arrangement, there is no need of entering. We are quite sure, from evidence in our possession, that such a plan cannot secure the necessary official approval. We are not among its advocates.

At the same time, as the announcement was made in our columns, which has brought this matter before the public, we feel bound to say a few words in defence of the parties concerned. We do not think full justice has been done to their motives, and words have been used which do not rightly belong to this case.

The term "non-resident Bishop," has been a favourite title of articles on this subject. Now this phrase carries with it a very offensive significance in general, but it has not the same force in this particular case. The Rev. Dr. Upfold expected to perform all the duties appertaining to his Episcopal office, in his own person, and, therefore, as Bishop, he would be resident.

The idea which has excited so much feeling on this subject, is the opinion that it bore some resemblance to the pluralities which have become such an evil in the Church of England. God forbid that we should make any approach to such an evil system. We rejoice to think that there is no danger of its being tolerated in our Church. But those pluralities involve only an increase of income, without any additional work. Here, the only increase was to be an addition of double work. A Bishop living for a time on the income of a Parish Rector, while he performed the work of both.

Even supposing the plan had its origin in a mistake of judgment, the motive which suggested it, was honorable to the Bishop elect, and his Parish. It declared that he did not shrink from labor, and it also proved that his Parish had such attachment to him, and zeal for the Church, that they were willing to take a portion of his services, and allow the rest to Indiana. Much has been said about the supposed ambition of Parishes, to have Bishops for their Rectors. A reproach is here implied, which Trinity Church, Pittsburg, surely does not deserve. And we are sorry to say that "the ambition" of Parishes, is too seldom exhibited in magnifying the Episcopal office.

As to the Diocese of Indiana, the letter appended to this article, from one of its clergy, copied from the Protestant Churchman, must speak in her behalf.

But we had no idea that there was so much connected with this movement, until it was seen through by two of our cotemporaries. It is darkly hinted, that there is in this plan, some mysterious connection with "Romanizing."

Those who made this discovery must be particularly good at seeing through millstones! The following are the remarks of a cotemporary upon the announcement in the Banner of August 11th.

"It gives us pleasure to insert the above from our cotemporary, and we are not sorry that the principle involved in the arrangement, as set forth in the Banner of the 21st ult., has been subjected to a practical ecclesiastical test. Had the question at issue been in the hands of Pío Nono, it could have been settled without difficulty, but it has to go before the three hundred members who constitute the Standing Committees of the Dioceses, as well as before all the Bishops.

It will be seen by the following extract from a foreign journal, that the Pope permits absence from a Diocese on a ground which might be easily occupied by every Bishop in Christendom.

† "There is also another flower, the Salasi (Ocimum), with a strong aromatic odour, which is gathered in large quantities to strew over the graves of great and famous men."—Horticultural Magazine, June 1848.

"The Bishop of Langres having again been elected a member of the National Assembly of France, has consulted the Pope on the propriety of absenting himself for so long a time from his Diocese. Pius IX. has given him a full absolution for his continued absence, under a full conviction that, though absent in body, he will be present in spirit with his flock. This brief of the Pope, the Bishop has circulated in a pastoral address by him to the clergy and laity of his Diocese."

A correspondent in another paper has the following:

4thly. This proposition for Indiana, reminds us of the long discussion which took place at the Council of Trent, between the Bishops of Spain—then the best in Christendom—and the Pope's legates, on the very subject of the residence of Bishops in their dioceses. The Bishops of Spain advocated it as a divine right—that is, according to God's will. The legates, instructed by their master, opposed it with all their might, and successfully. There were various reasons why the Pope wished to have many of the Bishops, his creatures, near at hand, in Rome or Italy, instead of in their dioceses, though some of the dioceses were in distant provinces of the east or west, which could only be visited at very long intervals, perhaps never; for some of them knew their Bishops only as our forefathers knew the Bishop of London as Bishop of the colonies. Amongst the arguments used against the residence of Bishops in their dioceses, was the following: "Namely, that it was not well for the Bishops to be too much with their people, as experience proved; that the See of Rome had its Bishop, as well as others, always there; and it was a well-known fact that Rome was the corruptest place in Christendom." It is hoped that no such reason will ever again be urged in favor of Episcopal non-residence. On the contrary, we are persuaded that if the practice should be introduced, the most mischievous consequences would ensue."

The following letter will show that Indiana has not only long had a non-resident Bishop, but one to whom the Church has committed a plurality of Dioceses.

For the Protestant Churchman.

MADISON, IND., August 4th, 1849.

MR. EDITOR.—News is apt to travel slowly towards the west, so that it was only last evening that I received your paper of the 28th ult.; and permit me to say, I was sorry to see the article headed "A Non-Resident Bishop." Allow me a few words in explanation, rather than in reply to that article.

The arrangement proposed by the vestry of Trinity Church, Pittsburg, was thought of only as a temporary measure, and adopted, in view of what was attainable, rather than what was desirable.

The Church, in Indiana, has been organized in a diocese, now, for eleven years. During that time, it has been under the care of the Missionary Bishop of the Northwest, and he has done for it all that could be expected of one whose diocesan charge has been large enough and difficult enough to give full employment to three Bishops, instead of one. During all that time, it has therefore been under a non-resident Bishop. Five times has it endeavored, in vain, to obtain a Bishop of its own. Its growth has, through many hindrances, been very slow. Five years ago, it had about five hundred communicants. Now, it has about six hundred and fifty. It has not a single parish able to give a full support to its own minister. It has but two that are attempting to do so without aid from the General Missionary Society.

In such circumstances, how can our apostolic system be carried out? How can the diocese obtain Episcopal services? Will our Board of Missions supply us with a Bishop, and support him for us! Must our choice be limited to those presbyters who are rich and able to support themselves? Or must our Bishop-elect choose any parish that may happen to be vacant, and whatever his family relations, or the claims which, in his present position, he can meet with comfort, must he apply to the Domestic Committee for a stipend of $100 a year, to eke out the scanty allowance his parish can furnish him?

It was a generous provision, Mr. Editor—honorable alike to themselves, and to him for whom it was proposed—that the vestry of Trinity Church, Pittsburg, consented to make. My own belief is, that if no hindrance be interposed to the consecration of the presbyter in whom the choice of the diocese has fallen, and who has accepted the election at much sacrifice, the Church in Indiana will soon, by God's blessing, be relieved from her present humiliating position.

It is not of choice, but of necessity, that we acquiesce in an arrangement which is to continue to us for two or three years longer, what the diocese has had to content itself with for eleven years, "a non-resident Bishop." If the Church in New York will guarantee a reasonable support, to enable our Bishop to resign his pastoral charge in Pennsylvania and to give all his time to Indiana, I doubt not that both the diocese and its diocesan will acquiesce. But if no better way can be pointed out, I do trust that those who know little of the wants of Indiana at this juncture, will not now put any obstacle in the way of the consummation of the wishes of the diocese. R. B. C.

NEW YORK.

We copy with pleasure, the following from the New York Churchman. We rejoice to find that the awful disease, with which our sister city has been desolated, is now abating.

HEALTH OF THE CITY.—The returns for the week ending the 4th inst., shew a gratifying diminution of mortality. The whole number of deaths was 1011, and by Cholera 423, being less in the sum total, 262; and in the deaths by Cholera, 255. Whatever the unbeliever and the profane may say, the Christian will rejoice in the persuasion that the Lord hath heard the prayers of His people, and is turning away from them the destroying pestilence.

NEW BISHOPRICS IN INDIA.—It is intended, as soon as circumstances will admit, to subdivide the present enormous Diocese of Calcutta, and to erect a Bishopric of Agra, stretching over the conquered Punjab. A large number of additional Clergymen will be sent out, and will be maintained by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. It is stated that the first Bishop of the new Diocese will be the Venerable Thomas Dealtry, B. C. L., the officiating minister of St. John's Chapel, Bedford-row. Mr. Dealtry held for many years the Episcopal Archdeaconry of Calcutta. A second new Bishopric will be erected in Tinnivelly, which is at present under the episcopal jurisdiction of the Bishop of Madras. Within the last three years there have been built in one single district of the Tinnivelly mission (Edeyenkoody), four large and seven small Churches with accommodation for 2,940 worshippers, four central and ten village schools, calculated to hold 680 boys and girls. There are about 14,000 native converts under instruction in the Propagation Society's missions in the province of Tinnivelly, and nearly 12,000 in the new missions in the Diocese of Madras. The Church Missionary has also a large clerical and lay staff in those districts of Southern India. It is expected that the Bishopric of Tinnivelly will be conferred on the Venerable Archdeacon Shortland, B. D., who, in addition to his episcopal duties, will have the supervision of the collegiate grammar-schools at VEDIARPOORAM and SAWYERPOORAM, with a view to train up a body of native Clergy and catechists. To these institutions several foundation scholarships are attached. At VEDIARPOORAM there are at present upwards of 50 native students, SAWYERPOORAM 140 boys and young men.

CHARITY CONQUERING EVIL.

Our readers have been informed of the violent opposition and hostile feeling manifested against Miss Sellon and the Sisters of Mercy in Devonport. A correspondent, tells us in a private letter, that a friend, who has lately made this place his residence and not at all predisposed to be favorable, writing to his family says:—

"Since the cholera broke out there, the Sisters of Mercy have been so unwearied in their efforts, sparing neither themselves nor their money in charitable acts, that their bitterest enemies have changed their opinions of them, and all are praising and admiring them. They have erected a tent at their own expense, and one of them attends constantly, (the Sisters taking it in turns,) to see the sick properly cared for, and they go to the very worst cases of cholera." Calumny can never withstand the arguments of love, expressed by deeds of mercy, as long as those words are on record—"by their fruits shall ye know them."

Having copied the original statement from the New York Herald, we feel bound to give the following correction for which we are indebted to the Calendar.

THE LATE MR. POLK'S BAPTISM.—There having been some errors in the account of Mr. Polk's last hours, which originally appeared in the New York Herald, the Rev. J. B. McFerran, from whom Mr. Polk received the rite of Baptism, has published certain corrections, the most material of which are, that the ex-President did not express any wish that the Rev. Dr. Edgar should baptise him, or make any suggestion of the kind to him; that he had years since determined from solemn conviction, to unite with the Methodist Church; that no such promise as alleged ever was made to Mr. McFerran, and that no conversation on the subject ever took place between him and Mr. Polk. Mr. McFerran baptised Mr. Polk in the presence of the Rev. Dr. Edgar, and the Rev. Mr. Mack, another Presbyterian clergyman, who were both present at the request of Mr. Polk and the family, and administered to him the Lord's Supper, Dr. E. and Mr. Mack both partaking of the emblems, with several other pious friends. Mr. McFerran says that Mrs. Polk, Sen., knowing her son's preference for the Methodists gave her hearty approval to the step which he took.

AN EXAMPLE.

We think the following is an example worthy of imitation. AMERICAN BOARD.—The receipts of this Board of Missions for the fiscal year ending with August 1st, amount to about $290,000. The current expenses for the same time have been about $260,000, thus leaving something like $30,000 towards the liquidation of the debt of about $60,000, which stood against the Board at their meeting in September last.

FOLLY OF ROBBING A CLERGYMAN.—A clergyman of New England, while intently observing Father Mathew administering the pledge to some hundreds, in Fanueil Hall, Boston, had his pocketbook abstracted. The thief decamped with his prize, and no doubt felt queer when examining its contents, to find nothing but some skeletons of sermons, literally "of no use to any one but the owner."—Calendar.

We should rather say that this exhibited the folly of a clergyman being in such a crowd, especially if he had nothing better to put in his pocket than the fleshless bones of dry sermons.

PRAYERS ANSWERED.

Speaking of the late fast-day and its observance the Watchman and Observer says:—In relation to the special object for which this day was set apart—so far as this city and Petersburg are concerned, such is the abatement of the scourge, if we cannot positively say it is entirely removed, the promise in Isaiah, 65; 24, seems almost literally fulfilled, "That before they call, I will answer, and while they are yet speaking, I will hear;" and we hope that it may be also true of every other place, where the pestilence has raged.

We copy the above from "the Southern Presbyterian," and we think no true Christian can refuse to connect the happy effect with the Great First Cause, to Whom a nation's prayers have been addressed. We are told, in the Gospel history, of "a certain nobleman" of Capernaum who approached the Saviour of the world in behalf of his son lying at the point of death. Returning with hope at the Saviour's promise he heard of his son's marvellous recovery. But his faith was not complete until he had enquired the hour when he began to amend. And when this was found to agree with the time of the Saviour's promise, the record is, "and himself believed and all his house." Is it too much to ask now of christian faith to connect the rapid decrease of the Pestilence with the agency of Him who has promised to hear and answer all the prayers of His faithful people? Perhaps it may be said that this can be accounted for on natural causes. But what are so called natural causes? Are they not the effects wrought by the great FIRST CAUSE of all?

From the same paper we copy the following. Over such a subject we are unwilling to enter into any dispute. But we think our Presbyterian brother, if he will look among the occasional Prayers in our Prayer Book for one headed "in time of great sickness and mortality," will find that there would be no want of an appropriate prayer on the part of those satisfied with that ancient form. We certainly must admit that "the unity" spoken of would be more consistently observed by the whole Church uniting in one Prayer. As to the vagueness of the Prayers set forth by our Bishops, we think the charge cannot be sustained. As to their brevity, we would remind our friend of the saying on record—"we are not heard for our much speaking."

NEW PRAYERS.—The Episcopal newspapers, from all parts of the country, bring us the prayers which were prepared by the different bishops to be used in their respective dioceses at the national fast. Some of these are appropriate to the occasion; others are quite too vague and brief. Viewed as a whole, in fitness of expression, comprehensiveness and fervor, they do not compare favorably with such prayers as may be heard at an ordinary conference meeting in an intelligent New Church. But if each bishop may put forth a prayer for a special occasion, why not each clergyman? why not each Christian? Where was the unity of "the Church" on the fast day, if each diocese had a separate form of prayer? If so much diversity can be tolerated, why not more? In fact, in this diocese, there was no bishop to make the prayer, and either the composition of some other bishop must have been selected, or a prayer must have been prepared and sanctioned by a "standing committee" of clergymen and laymen. For once we should like to have had the experiment tried, of leaving each clergyman to pray in public on that occasion, in his own language. Some might have been embarrassed by the novelty of the attempt, but prayers could have been offered in all the churches, which as a means of edification would need no bishop's endorsement. We have never joined in prayers more fervent, spiritual, appropriate, and edifying, than those which have come fresh from the lips and the heart of one of our esteemed brethren of the Episcopal Recorder, or have been offered without book or wrote by the brethren of his Church in the Saturday evening prayer-meetings.—Independent.

ST. MARK'S CHURCH.

Washington County, Md.

On the Festival of St. James' (July 25th, 1849,) St. Mark's Church, Washington County, Md., was consecrated by Bishop Whittingham to the service of the Most High. The building is a neat stone edifice, in the painted style, and cost about fourteen hundred dollars. It is in the midst of a populous neighborhood, two miles from the College of St. James. The first effort to collect a congregation was made by the Rev. R. N. Clarkson, now of Chicago; who was succeeded, in May, by the Rev. J. C. Passmore, the present Rector. The Corner Stone was laid on Easter Monday; and it speaks well for the zeal of the builders, that, in a little more than three months from that time, a durable edifice was completed and paid for.

The Bishop preached an excellent sermon on the occasion, and also administered Baptism and the Holy Communion.—Besides the Bishop, seven Presbyters of one Diocese were present, and assisted in the services.

Foreign Intelligence.

BY THE LAST STEAMER.

We learn, from a Postscript in the English Churchman, that the vexed question between the Bishop of Exeter and Mr. Gorham has been decided by the Court. This question involves a point of general interest, as will be seen from the following. To us it may seem strange to refer such questions to Lay Judges, but with many minds the decision of a lawyer in such a case would carry with it more weight than that of a Theologian. We have now, therefore, a learned judge giving a legal opinion on the Baptismal service in direct opposition to the charge of the Archbishop of York.

ARCHES COURT.

GORHAM versus THE BISHOP OF EXETER.

SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST this morning gave judgment in this case. This week we have room for little more than the result of the judgment. Next week we shall give a full and carefully-revised report.

The learned Judge gave the usual formal details of the case and repeated his former opinion, that the mode of proceeding should have been, not by petition, but by plea and proof, so as to have allowed of more precise definition of the Church's doctrine, and of Mr. Gorham's alleged errors, and of the examination of witnesses.

After remarking that a good deal of extraneous matter had been introduced, he said that the real question was the unconditional efficacy of the Sacrament of Baptism in the case of Infants. The cases of Adult and Infant Baptism had been so mixed up in the examination before the Bishop that it was difficult to separate the argument. Mr. Gorham says that the two cannot be separated.

The Court, at the outset, would distinctly disclaim any intention of examining as to whether the Doctrine of the Church was Scriptural or not. The Doctrine of the Church is the law of this Court. In order to ascertain this Doctrine, we must go first to the Articles of the Church. Where they are silent, or fall short, we must refer to the Services of the Church. The Judge read the extract from Bishop Burnet's Pastoral care (cited by Dr. Addams) setting forth that the Doctrines of the Church were most plainly laid down in her Public Offices.

The Court then proceeded to examine, in detail, the Baptismal and Confirmation Offices, and the Church Catechism. There was a material difference between the Offices for Adult and Infant Baptism: they are substantially distinct. The Spiritual Regeneration of Infants, in and through the means of Baptism, was distinctly declared by the Church in these Formularies. There was no charitable hope, hypothetical sense, nor "preventive act of grace," as Mr. Gorham alleged, in the Formularies of the Church.

Where Formularies were plain and unambiguous, there was no occasion to inquire into the private opinions of those who framed or sanctioned them. Whatever Calvinistic opinions the Reformers might have held, it was evident that they had not introduced them into the Offices or Articles of the Church. Predestination strikes at the very root of all the Services of the Church: if it were her doctrine, of what use would Prayers be?

The questions were—1. Was the Spiritual Regeneration of Infants the Doctrine of the Church?—The Court had no doubt whatever that it was. 2. Does Mr. Gorham hold this doctrine?—It was quite evident that he did not; consequently the Court must decide that the Bishop had shown sufficient cause why he had not instituted Mr. Gorham to the Living of Bramford Speke, and therefore his Lordship must be dismissed with his costs.

In the Archbishop of York's recent charge he referred in a note to "the learned and masterly work of the Rev. William Goode," i. e., his recent work on Baptism. From his Grace of Canterbury, Mr. Goode has just received the still more emphatic token of approval, of preferment to the Rectory of Allhallows the Great, London, vacated a few days since by the death of the late incumbent.—Record.

The English Churchman has the following remarks on the Queen's speech.

"Few persons will read this speech without regret at the entire omission of any reference to the prevailing and fatal sickness which has afflicted so many families among all, but especially the poorer classes. Surely Her Majesty's Ministers must feel that this subject is as important as Irish distress, and that in this matter we stand equally in need of the mercy of 'the Almighty Disposer of Events.'"

To-morrow our brethren of the United States will, as a nation, and as individuals, publicly humble themselves under the mighty hand of God, with Prayer and Fasting, beseeching Him to stay the plague of sickness wherewith He has afflicted them. And although our rulers in Church and State have not publicly called upon us to join our American brethren on this occasion, yet our necessities as well as theirs render it most seemly that we should do so, and thus both may give a practical illustration of our belief in "the Communion of Saints," as well as "the Forgiveness of sins"—national and individual.

ROME.

JULY 21.—(From the Times Correspondent.)—I am compelled by the inconvenient postal communications to send you a very short letter to-day, but I cannot allow the courier to start without informing you that I have received authentic intelligence from Gaeta of an unfavourable nature to the true interest of the Pope, and the future repose of his dominions. Pio Nono, in words, is all that can be desired, but he is surrounded by persons who do not comprehend the true difficulties of the case, and who have no other remedy to offer than the old ones—the dungeon and banishment. It will be necessary for France and Austria, if they are sincere in restoring a good government in the Papal States, to speak in a decided manner to the Supreme Pontiff, for otherwise I see clearly that there is no hope for Rome. I know that the diplomatic and military representatives of France are doing all in their power to place the true situation of the country before the eyes of the sovereign, and that in this respect they are acting in a manner worthy of the high mission with which they are charged; but I know, at the same time, that no attention is paid to what they say, and, though fair words are always given, the promise is never fairly or fully realized. I believe that the French agents have pressed the Pope in the most earnest manner to issue a manifesto, firm and temperate, calculated at the same time to assure the friends of public order, and to convince the people that no re-action is intended; but, instead of giving a proclamation of the nature required, the Pope to-day has sent the following piece of vapid declaration. I assure you I look upon the matter as most serious, and unless good government, on apparently liberal principles, be established in the centre of Italy, the Socialist faction will again raise its head, and France be exposed to another revolution. The proclamation I speak of is as follows:—

"PIUS P. P. IX. TO HIS BELOVED SUBJECTS.

"The Almighty has raised his hand and commanded the tempestuous waters of anarchy and impiety to stop. He has guided Catholic armies in sustaining the rights—unanimously agreed on—of the common faith, of the Holy See, and of our sovereignty. Eternal praises be given to Him who, in the midst of His ire, has not forgotten clemency.

"Beloved subjects, in the whirlwind of such disastrous vicissitudes, our heart has deplored the evils which have fallen on the Church, on religion, and on you; but it has never forgotten the love which it has borne to you, and which it will ever bear. We hail with satisfaction the day when we are to return amongst you. We will return with the most lively desire to bear to you comfort and consolation, and with the intention of occupying ourselves, with all our strength, for your good—applying serious remedies to grave evils, consoling our good subjects, who, whilst they expect from us such institutions as will satisfy their wants, desire, as we desire, sufficient guarantees to be established for the independence of the High Pontificate, so necessary for the repose of the Catholic world.

"Without delay, for the re-organization of public affairs we are about to name a commission, which, furnished with full powers, and aided by a Ministry, will regulate the Government of the State.

"May the blessing of God, which we have ever implored, even when distant from you, and which to-day with greater fervour we implore, light upon you; and for the greater comfort of our soul, we hope that all those who at present are unable to enjoy the fruits of their treason may be convinced of their errors, and be also entitled to consideration and mercy, by a speedy and sincere repentance.

"PIUS P. P. IX."

GENERAL STATE OF EUROPE.

From the English Churchman.

In France, the bill for proroguing the Legislative Assembly, from August 13th to September 30th was adopted on Saturday last by a majority of 294 to 247. On Sunday, the President departed from Paris on a provincial tour. At starting, the axle-tree of his carriage broke, and shortly afterwards the horse of one of the cuirassiers fell down, which are considered ominous events by the multitude. The Emperor of Russia has written a very friendly letter to Louis Napoleon, and consequently two hundred Polish refugees have been ordered to quit Paris. This, coupled with the evident understanding between France and Austria in Italy, is not likely to add to the President's popularity.

The French army is still at Rome, but, in spite of all that is said to the contrary, the Romans evidently do not like the presence of their Gallic friends. The Pope is still at Gaeta, and shows no desire to return to Rome. It is said that he means to pay the French a return visit; most likely for the purpose of crowning Louis Napoleon. At the request of General Oudinot, the Austrians have sent some troops in pursuit of Garibaldi, who is said to be at Surrito on the way to Arezzo.

The German troops are leaving Jutland and Schleswig, except the Prussians, who are to occupy the south of that Duchy. Two thousand Swedes are to occupy the northern part. The blockade is expected to be raised on the 4th or 5th of August. The Danish flag is flying at Aarhus.

The Grand Duchy of Baden is to be occupied for five years by a body of 30,000 Prussians, and the Baden troops are to be transferred to two of the Prussian provinces. Radstadt surrendered on the 23d inst.

The Swiss Confederation have ordered a levy of 28,000 men to be placed under the command of General Dufour in consequence of some Hessian troops having crossed the Swiss frontier, and a considerable body of Prussian troops having approached very near to it.

The cholera is raging in Bohemia and Moravia. The Emperor of Russia has arrived at Warsaw.

The mist has at length cleared away from the affairs of Hungary. On the 14th inst. Jellachich was completely defeated at St. Thomas' by General Guyon, and Peterwardein relieved. Bem is between Bistritz and Klausenberg. The Hungarians have taken Arad, and the Debritzen Junta, with Kossuth at its head, have repaired thither. The Russians have occupied Hermannstadt, but have been compelled to evacuate Debritzen. The Hungarian General Aulich has taken the offensive against General Nugent, who is occupied in covering the Austrian frontier behind the Lake Balaton. On the 16th inst. the Russians were defeated at Waitzen, and obliged to retreat to Duna Kees. They were only saved from total destruction by the arrival of the Austrian General Ramberg to their assistance. The Hungarians were commanded by Dembinski, Georgey, and Nagy-Saudor; the Russians by Paskewitch. The Hungarians completely broke through the Russian lines, and have marched to the north of the Theiss.

GENEVA COLLEGE COMMENCEMENT.

The annual commencement of Geneva College was held in Trinity Church, Geneva, on the 14th inst. A large number of clergy and laity were present, some from distant parts of the Union. Notwithstanding the rain which made the walking quite uncomfortable, a goodly number of the citizens of Geneva assembled, and the church was well filled. The following was the order of exercises:—

Music.—Prayer.—Salutatory Oration, The Pride of Reason, Henry Adams Neely, Chicago, Ill.—Oration, Every-day Battles, George Nathan Cheney, Canandaigua.—Oration, Manifest Destiny, Jonathan Henry Child, Rochester.—Music.—Oration, Half Truths, David Lewis Clark, Gorham.—Oration, Plurality of Worlds, Albert Levant Cotes, Batavia.—Philosophic Oration, The Insanity of States, Samuel Wilder Salisbury, Phelps.—Music.—Oration, The Poetry of Religion, Charles Wells Hayes, Canandaigua.—Oration, God in History, John Wicks Heywood, Buffalo.—Oration, The Two Futures, Arthur Breeze Johnson, Utica.—Valedictory Oration, The Bequest of the Scholar, William Paret, New York.—Music.—Degrees conferred.—Master's Oration, Charles Stebbins, M. A., Cazenovia.—Gloria in Excelsis.—Prayer and Benediction.

It will be seen by the above order of exercises that the subjects were well selected. They were handled in a manner which showed a maturity of thought, a discipline of mind, together with a clearness and beauty of expression highly creditable to the young gentlemen and their instructors.

We have no desire to single out any particular portion of the exercises as a subject of comment. We can only say that we never attended a college commencement more highly gratifying. We have heard but one opinion upon the subject:—all seemed delighted. The young gentlemen have won laurels for themselves and for their Alma Mater.

The degree of B. A. was conferred in course, upon the members of the graduating class. The degree of M. A., in course, upon Charles Stebbins, Isaac Tripp, and Charles C. Clarke. The honorary degree of M. A. was conferred upon Alfred B. Street, Marvin M. Baldwin, Joseph V. H. Clark, Douglass Boardman, Isaac L. Cushman, Daniel McCarty, Rev. Samuel H. Norton, Rev. Charles Tomes, Rev. Caleb B. Ellsworth, and Rev. Malcolm Douglas.

The degree of LL.D. was conferred upon Henry R. Schoolcraft, and Hiram Denio.

The degree of D. D. was conferred upon the Rev. William D. Wilson, and Rev. John F. McLaren.

The Rev. Dr. Kip, who was to have delivered an address before the Hermean Society was prevented from attending.

The friends of Geneva College, and the Church at large, will be gratified to learn that the sum necessary to complete the endowment of the Hobart Professorship, ($30,000,) was subscribed on Monday, the 13th inst.—Gospel Mess.

REV. RICHARD SALMON.

We copy, with regret, the following from the Gospel Messenger.

ANOTHER LABORER GONE.—We have received a letter informing us that the Rev. Richard Salmon died of cholera on a steamboat near Baton Rouge, in the latter part of July. Mr. S. had removed to Texas, where his family now are. He was formerly a missionary at Geneseo, at Geddes, and in some other portions of Western New York. He was canonically connected with the diocese of New York. Having suffered much from sickness he was at the time of his death extremely poor, and it is believed that his family are now entirely destitute. We shall endeavor to obtain more particulars than the letter before us contains, and hope to be able to give a more extended notice of the deceased.

DISCOURSE AT THE FUNERAL OF THE HON. GEORGE TIBBITS.—This sermon, preached by the Rev. R. B. Van Kleeck, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Troy, we have read with great pleasure and profit. Its excellence is derived from the fact, that its author aims more to instruct the living than to eulogize the dead. Mr. Tibbits was the oldest member of the Vestry, a companion and kindred spirit of STEPHEN WARREN, one who had not only faithfully served the State and City in public offices, but who had well fulfilled all the duties of a private citizen. He had been highly prosperous in life, and nothing speaks more honorably for him than the following brief extract from his faithful Pastor's eloquent tribute. Such testimony is worth preserving.

"Our venerable friend has often told me that he knew not why nor how he had been so greatly prospered, and that there had been turning points in his life on which large results depended, when he knew not of himself what course to take. He has often said of late, he knew not why he had been so much blessed of God, except as a reward of the virtues of his mother. I never saw so high a veneration for a mother's memory, as he cherished, even to the end of life, speaking of her honored name, on the very morning when in pain and weakness, he was ready 'to give up the ghost.' A beautiful example of filial duty and devotion, cherished even to old age, and strong and vigorous in death. I know not how it may appear to others, but it seems to me, a striking instance of God's faithfulness to his first command, with promise, 'Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land, which the Lord thy God giveth thee.' LONG LIFE AND HAPPINESS were this old man's portion. Let all the young then who desire the promise, love too, and cherish the command."

DEATH OF THE REV. JOHN CROES.

We have just received the following from a New York Paper. We have only time, as our paper is going to press, to copy the brief record, and to express our sympathy with the bereaved.

DEATH OF A CLERGYMAN.—The Rev. John Croes, son of the late Bishop Croes, of New Jersey, expired yesterday in this city, aged sixty-two years. He was much beloved by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance, and was truly a good man. He had no church or congregation at the time of his death. His remains were taken to Shrewsbury, N. J., for interment.

The attention of our readers is called to the commencement of the Fall session of the Young Ladies School, known as the Retreat, on Tuesday, the 4th of September. For particulars see advertisement.

THE WITNESS WITHIN—ONCE MORE.

MR. EDITOR—

When I wrote my first article on this subject, in review of the article of your very able correspondent, "O." I had no intention, or expectation, of troubling you with another on the same topic. But, as I think that O.'s reply neither fairly meets, nor completely overturns my positions, while yet he leaves my argument in a disadvantageous light, I must beg your indulgence once more. I shall endeavor, however, to be more brief. My object, from the first, was not victory, but truth. If the former had been my aim, I should have chosen a different antagonist.

My first remark is, that O. doubtless, through inadvertency, assumes that "the Spirit itself" is a "witness within;" whereas this is the affirmation of his own heeding, not of Holy Scripture. The effect of this mistake, is to make it appear that my opinion that the testimony of the Holy Spirit is given through the medium of the written word, is untenable, that evidence existing without. It is not stated in Scripture, either that the witness himself is within, or that his testimony is delivered from within. The tribunal, which is our own mind, or judgment, is, of course, within; and the testimony of the Spirit, contained in Holy Scripture, is delivered into the mind, and there meets, and concurs with, the testimony of our own spirit, which comes through the medium of our own consciousness as to our own states, affections, sincerity, &c. When this consciousness of good things, the fruits of the Spirit, agrees with what the Spirit itself bears witness in the written word to be the state, affections, &c., of a child of God, then the proof is complete, and the conclusion warranted. O.'s remarks, therefore, founded upon this inadvertency, must go for nothing.

Again, the remarks founded upon the distinction which O. makes between "the Spirit," and "the Spirit itself," are based upon unstable ground. O. seems to regard the expression "the Spirit itself" as equivalent to the expression, "the Spirit by himself," or "with himself," or in person, as distinguished from mediate, or indirect testimony; and as conveying the idea of an immediate, direct, or physical impression of the Holy Ghost upon our spirit, as if the human and the Divine Spirit came into naked and physical contact. If this were the case, we could know it only by consciousness—the medium through which the witness of our own spirit is given; and, therefore, as I still insist, the two testimonies would not be distinguishable; unless, as O. seems to think, and as I deny, there be something so peculiar and convincing in the consciousness of this Divine "impression" as to make it distinguishable in itself. If this were so, it would supersede the necessity of any other testimony; while it could itself hardly be called testimony.

But in the designation "the Spirit itself," the word "itself," is intended merely to denote the Holy Spirit as contradistinguished from both "the Spirit of adoption," and "our spirit." Surely "the Spirit," wherever the article is used, and the Holy Ghost is intended, is the same as "the Spirit itself," on himself. The pronoun, then, is used, not to denote physical and direct contact, but to distinguish the Holy Spirit from all other Spirits. This being the case, the text may be "satisfied" with an interpretation different from that of O.—one equally spiritual, and incomparably more safe.

Further, all that is said in the paragraph next to the last, designed to prove that the word, "record," may mean several other things beside a written account, fails of overthrowing my interpretation of John v. 6—14; for the express words of St. John himself are, "These things have I WRITTEN unto you that believe in the name of the Son of God, that ye may know that ye have eternal life." This knowledge will be admitted to be equivalent with the knowledge that we are sons of God, and this knowledge is derived from the written word; and the written word is the witness of the Spirit itself. Therefore, if this knowledge be attainable by means of the written word, recorded for this express purpose by an Apostle, moved by the Holy Ghost to do so for this purpose, it seems incredible that, after all, another Apostle should refer us to another, a different, and according to O. a more irresistible evidence—a kind of evidence, however, which I must persist in regarding as less tangible, or ascertainable; and for which enthusiasts, fanatics, and ignorant persons are very liable to mistake their own novel and peculiar feelings.

I am at a loss to see why the testimony of the Spirit itself, as given through the medium of Holy Scripture, should not be considered of equal value with his testimony given in any other way, provided it be equally clear, and as directly to the point. Nay, is it not necessary, in the end, to bring all other evidence to this infallible test? How am I to know so certainly as to be enabled safely to rely upon them, that my peculiar "impressions" are produced by the contact of the Holy Spirit, and not mere natural effects arising from novel circumstances and views, or produced by some deluding spirit seeking my destruction? How else than by bringing them to the test of the witness of the Spirit itself as recorded in the Bible? I do not deny the natural possibility of such "impressions" as O. contends for; I even admit that they may be experienced, and so become part of the testimony of "our spirit." But I affirm that they must themselves be authenticated by the concurrent testimony of the word of God. As for that inferior inspiration of which O. writes, and which has for its object to bear testimony with the spirit of each believer that he is a child of God, I respect the opinion of O.; but I regard the notion as untenable. It is the prolific source of much of the delusion in the world.

I am a little surprised that O. should think that the fact, that the Holy Spirit, through the medium of Scripture, "testifies to many other things besides the Divine sonship," is in conflict with my position. It is true that he does: but that does not make it less true that he thus bears witness with our spirit that we are sons of God. It is the thing testified to, and not the manner of giving the testimony, which is peculiar. The fact established is unspeakably important; the mode of testifying is of but little moment. The fact of this testimony is affirmed by the Apostle, but the manner, is altogether a different thing. Thus O.'s fifth paragraph is irrelevant; and the intended logical reductio ad absurdum, turns out to be a specimen of the ignoratio. Sonship is a peculiar fact. The Spirit testifies to other things beside sonship in Holy Scripture. Therefore it is not by Scripture that the Spirit testifies to sonship. Not very conclusive.

I do not know exactly what my venerable friend, O. means when he excuses himself from making any observations on my "unremarkable speculative argumentation." Walker, guided by Johnson, defines the word "unremarkable," "not capable of being observed; not worthy of notice." If the former be his meaning, I am sorry my reasoning was so obscure, impalpable, or transcendental; if the latter, I regret that it was so insignificant, or contemptible. Richardson, however, gives a somewhat different definition, he defines the word "unremarkable," "That may not be noted, heeded, or regarded." Now, I am disappointed that O. so viewed my "speculative argumentation;" for if I succeeded in clearly conveying my ideas, I flatter myself that if he had "heeded, noted or regarded" that portion of my article, he must have seen in it insuperable difficulties in the way of his theory of the witness of the spirit itself. Let me ask him to read the article once more, and imagine precisely by what marks, cogensible by the common mind, he would discriminate between the witness of the Spirit itself, and the witness of our own spirit. At what point, and with what simplicity, does the testimony of our spirit end; and at what "degree" and with what "variations," does the direct witness of the Spirit itself begin—both being given through the medium of our own consciousness? Further, as they are "akin," and "generically" the same, how are we to distinguish the different species? "Holy men of old" knew to a certainty when they were under the influence of the Divine afflatus. This was inspiration proper. Is the "inspiration" of which O. speaks equally ascertainable? If not, in what respect is it more valuable than the testimony of the Holy Ghost through the written word? If it be, is it testimony at all; and if so, does it admit of corroboration from the testimony of our spirit? It is a miracle; and miracles prove themselves by their nature.

It is not sufficient, in answer to these questions, to say that the whole is "above physics and above metaphysics;" for we are now in the region of "Divine Philosophy;" and whoever philosophises here, must be prepared to answer all reasonable questions. A position positively laid down ought to be sustained by more than either assertion, or a private interpretation of a passage of Scripture.

The inspired penmen wrote as they were "moved by the Holy Ghost." Whatever, consequently, they say respecting the evidences of sonship, is clearly the witness of the Holy Ghost on this point. Written testimony is as truly testimony, as that which is oral, or direct. When St. Paul says, "The Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me," he alludes to the warnings of certain prophets. See Acts 21: 4; 11: 21; 21: 10. Evidently the "witness" which is spoken of in 1 John, v 6-9, is given otherwise than as O. contends. And when in v. 10 it is said, "He that believeth in the Son of God hath the witness in himself," this relates to the evidence as existing in the mind itself—the testimony of our own spirit, concurring with that of the written word. It is before the tribunal of the mind; part of it furnished by our own consciousness, and part of it in those things which are "written" that we may "know that we have eternal life." The "witness within" is not the Spirit, or the testifier, within, but the evidence within, from what source soever it comes. Part of it, in fact, comes from within, even from our own consciousness; and part of it from without, even from the written word, borne in and applied by the Spirit itself.

As regards the distinction between conscience and consciousness, it is very obvious, and very important. The words spring from the same root; but their significations are widely different. Conscience is generic, and relates to all the operations of the mind, and all the affections of the heart. By it alone we become sensible of the workings of conscience. Conscience, although a constitutional faculty, or sense, and a natural and essential endowment of a moral agent, is, so far, as we feel it, but a mode of consciousness. It is not, I beg leave to say, a "fundamental moral endowment of the Holy Ghost," any more than reason, or judgment, or consciousness. With a "good conscience," or an "evil conscience," we become acquainted only by consciousness. Yet the presence of a good conscience, is not, by any means, the only gracious affection to the existence of which our consciousness bears witness. It is, indeed, one item of the testimony of consciousness, but only one item. It testifies to much more than "goodness in the conscience." St. Paul, when a Jew, lived in "all good conscience before God,"* and at that time he lacked many things of which a good Christian is conscious, and which are essential items in the evidence of affiliation.

"Consciousness," says Locke, "is the perception of what passes in a man's own mind." According to Bishop Jeremy Taylor, God "hath given us conscience to be in God's stead to us, to give us laws, and to exact obedience of those laws, to punish them that prevaricate, and to reward the obedient." By the former alone, we become acquainted with the latter, as well as with our present state, and all that passes within us. Conscience is quickened and sanctified, but not created, by the Holy Spirit. This fully satisfies the XIII Article of Religion.

The way to avoid giving "a perpetual advantage to the mistaken persons," is not to adopt and defend their mistakes, but to give "the whole counsel of God" in the case. And to occupy tenable ground, is not to ascend to "the whole upper flight," when that upper flight transcends the clear intimations of Revelation, and has to be attained by imagination. "Altitudes" thus attained, are not necessarily warranted by sound exposition; and often times instead of affording exhortations, and expanded views, suggested by Holy Scripture, give occasion to wild reveries and fanatical delusions. The highest flights, and the loftiest altitudes, while they may "startle half-thinkers," and appear transcendently spiritual, and "truth so exalted" as to be above ordinary comprehension, are frequently not only unwarranted, but exceedingly dangerous when they relate to matters of personal experience.

I was fully aware, as I intimated, that the passage which I quoted from Hebrews x. 15, &c., did not relate directly to the witness of the Spirit as regards sonship; but it was sufficient to prove that the Spirit sometimes gives his testimony through the written word.

By reference to my first article, it will be seen that I do not limit the operations of the Holy Spirit to testimony with our spirit that we are sons of God. In regard to these Divine and internal operations, I laid down no limits. This is a theme full of mystery, and one which affords room not only for high flights, lofty altitudes, and expanded views, and ethereal cogitations, but also for the deepest researches and the widest ranges. What I contended against was the making the testimony of "the Spirit itself" a matter of consciousness, and thus undistinguishable from the testimony of our own spirit, which is given through our consciousness. My objection to this view is valid in itself, as any one who will take the pains to peruse my "unremarkable speculative argumentation," will see; and, if I am not mistaken, "well-informed minds, not pre-occupied, will largely sustain me." But my reason for endeavoring to point out the inaccuracy of O.'s views, is the danger attending a theory which calls upon enthusiasts, fanatics, and weak minded persons to decide a question of the utmost moment merely by their own consciousness—a test no where laid down in Holy Scripture—a test which must itself be tested by the written word and obedience.

The difficulty is not relieved by alleging that part of the consciousness gives the testimony of our own spirit, and another part of it, that of the Holy Ghost, the distinction being ascertained by the degrees and kind of consciousness; for nothing could be more difficult and uncertain than such discrimination, especially to the classes of persons most likely to be deceived.

The danger is increased by making this witness of the Spirit itself an inferior kind of inspiration, and sanctioning the prevailing notions about miraculous "impressions" of the Holy Ghost on the soul. This is one of the most prolific sources of delusion among fanatics and enthusiasts, and ought not to be encouraged, without Scriptural support stronger than, as I think, O. can find. I am far enough, however, from charging O. himself with fanaticism, enthusiasm, or weak-mindedness. My concern is not for him, but for others whom his opinions may influence.

I must here enter my protest against making extreme views in theology, in interpretation, or in relation to experience and spiritual operations, evidences of either superior knowledge, or superior piety. The Church and the world have had too many lessons on this subject already, to be any longer deluded in this way. They have led some into pantheism, others into Quakerism, others into Methodism, others into transcendentalism, and others into Swedenborgianism. The "Spirit" must go with the "wheels;" but the Spirit must not go beyond the wheels. I suppose that, if we can find the wheels at all in this discussion, we shall find them in the sacred scrolls of the written word, which are instinct with the Spirit itself; and with those sacred, and living, and eye-bestudded wheels, our spirit must go. But I do not see what bearing this text has upon the subject. A doubtful interpretation of such a passage as that which O. quotes from Ezekiel, cannot be allowed to have the force of an argument.

But, Mr. Editor, I have written much more than I intended when I began. But I give you this consolation, that I do not think it probable that I shall again trouble you or your readers on this subject. If O. should think worth while once more to draw his sharp, glittering and trenchant "steel," I shall endeavor to dodge it as well as I can; but it would require a very unfair, or malicious stroke, or thrust, to tempt me to strike back; and this kind of stroke an opponent so magnanimous as O. will not be likely to give. Inasmuch, however, as I believe I have the right side of the question, if I thought I could slay Goliath, and wrest from him his sword, I should fight valiantly for the prize, for "there is none like that."

August 8, 1849.

J. W. M.

P. S. O. says that certain objections to his views "are naturally immortal." My opinion is that the fact of their natural immortality, is evidence of their natural indestructibility, and, therefore, of their truth.

O. in his note, is surprised at my objecting to identity of origin as proving generic sameness; while yet I insist that identity of the channel (consciousness) makes the witness of the Spirit (as he defines it) one and confounded with the witness of "our spirit." On the other hand, as if to balance this, O. himself makes the items of both testimonies, not merely generically alike, and "akin" to each other, but identical—"degrees and variations" of the very same things!—the breeze, become a strong wind; the tune, diversified by "variations." What I mean is that on O.'s own theory, consciousness being the common channel of testimony, the true testimonies, however related, or at variance, could not be distinguished. The more closely related they were, the more difficult would be the discrimination; and when they become identical—the diversity consisting only in "degrees and variations," and the lower degrees and simple forms gradually and insensibly rising to the higher degrees and more complete forms—the distinction becomes absolutely impossible.

That identity of origin does not prove generic sameness—as O. seems to contend, is very evident, for a thousand different genera of animals and vegetables were created by the same God. God, in some sense, creates both good and evil; yet they are not generically the same.

STAUNTON'S CHURCH CHANT BOOK.

MR. EDITOR:—The excellence of this collection of Chants recommends it to the attention of all those who have a solicitude for the proper performance of the choral service of the Church. Without designing disparagement to other publications of like character, I have no hesitancy in saying that it is one of the most superior works of its class. The style of the music is massive and ecclesiastical; the appearance of the pure Gregorian Tones—whose grandeur and simplicity have won the hearts of generations through ages past, is an excellent evidence of the taste and good sense of the author. Many of the Chants are from the Service of our Mother Church, whose music is the most ecclesiastical and imposing in Christendom. Some of the Editor's own compositions are every way worthy of rivalry with the very best in the Book, and bespeak a thorough knowledge of musical grammar. This work is free from the common fault of crowding too many words or syllables in the Cadence of a Chant. The manner in which the Gloria Patri's are to be accented when sung is admirable. They differ from those of most other music books, but in my opinion are decidedly superior as to their arrangements. This publication is an acquisition to the Church, and if it receives that support which it so eminently deserves, will improve the music of the Church wherever it is introduced.

Miscellaneous.

From the Churchman's Companion.

HAPPINESS IN LOVE OF GOD AND OUR NEIGHBOUR.

A very little compass of thought will suffice to convince any man of the difference between time and eternity; nor can any one so mistake in his judgment, as to think that this poor pitance of happiness to be found here can be anything comparable to the joys of heaven and eternal glories. The contrary is so plain, that even the dullest man alive can easily apprehend it; and many who have no extraordinary quickness, nor reach above other men, but are of much inferior understanding and abilities, readily receive it. Why is it, then, that men of parts and wit do not see what lies so open and visible to common understandings? The case is this: they are constantly taken up with other things, and so never attend to it. Their thoughts are employed another way; the world has taken early possession of them, and has laid such a train of pursuits in their way, that they are entangled with them ever after. This is really the case of all those who, mistaking the true happiness of man, pursue a shadow and a phantom to their own destruction. It is for want of thinking in a right way that men fall into this fatal misconduct; and nothing but serious and sober thought can bring them out of it. I shall suggest two or three useful considerations.

1. We should endeavour to fix in our minds this great and plain truth, that there can be no such thing as true happiness separate from the love of God, and the love of our neighbour. It is a firm and unalterable maxim, riveted in the very frame and constitution of things. To seek for happiness in any other way, is as absurd as to expect grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles. What happiness can any thinking man propose separate from God, the centre of all happiness? And if man be made a sociable creature, it is as vain for him to propose any separate independent happiness from the rest of the kind. Men are designed to live in consort, and to be happy, if so at all, in the mutual friendship and enjoyment of each other. It is the law of their creation, the condition of their being. And therefore, any pretended happiness, separate from the common good of mankind, is a mere dream and delusion, a contradiction to the reason and nature of things.

A second consideration proper to be hinted at, is, that man is made for eternity, and not for this life only. No happiness can be true and solid, which is not lasting and durable as ourselves. And what if the self-lover could secure the greatest worldly felicity? still it is confined within the circle of a few years, may die before him, and must, however, with him, and leave him empty, and destitute to all eternity. Is this all that his extreme love and goodness for himself amounts to? Is it not like feasting for a day, to starve ever after? or rejoicing for an hour, only to mourn and lament for endless ages? Is this the kindness they pretend to have for their own selves? The bitterest enemies could not hurt them worse, or be really more severe and cruel than they are to themselves.

To conclude: the way to arrive at true happiness, is to take into consideration the whole extent and compass of our being; to enlarge our views beyond our little selves to the whole creation around us, whereof we are but a slender part; and to extend our prospect beyond this life to remote and distant glories. Make things future appear as if they were now present, and things distant as if they were near and sensible. This, with the help of God's grace, may cure us of our narrow thoughts, and show us the necessity of enlarging our hearts and affections. As to self-lovers, they are not advised to love themselves at all the less, but only to love themselves more judiciously, and to better purpose: not to lay aside their concern for happiness, for that is impossible, but to mix something more of discretion and judgment with it; that instead of pretending to be in any degree happy in opposition both to God and man (a thing utterly impossible,) they may study and endeavour constantly to love God, and to love their neighbours,—i. e., all mankind,—and then they will the most wisely and most effectually love their own selves.

JOHN ROGERS AND HIS CHILDREN.

A new question has come up,—or rather an old question newly propounded, is seeking solution. It is, how many children had John Rogers, the martyr, or rather, Mrs. Rogers, his wife? The question was once deemed settled, and the verdict had long since passed into a proverb. "Nine small children, and one at the breast," has always been regarded as entirely conclusive; but a worse than a Virginia abstraction has interposed to unsettle the matter, to the great discomfort and distraction of the rising generation, and particularly to the prejudice of "Fox's Book of Martyrs!" The Cincinnati Gazette, with malicious meddlesomeness, has thrown a doubt over the whole matter by remarking that it may be gravely questioned "whether the child 'at the breast' was one of the nine small ones, or a tenth child." So here we are "at sea" with a "glorious uncertainty." Authorities are consulted in vain, the more you search the more you get mixed up with the children, and there is no way of telling whether there were nine, ten or a dozen; for there is evidence going to show that the interesting off springs came nearer the latter than former number.

The old New England Primer, good authority and highly respected in its way, gave a circumstantial account of the tragic fate of that truly good and heroic man, John Rogers, accompanied with a wood cut. A reference to the picture involves the whole subject in still deeper mystery. The artist himself seems to have been in doubt, for he mixed the children of the martyr with the surrounding crowd in such a way that it was impossible to distinguish the one from the other.

A writer in the Cambridge (Mass.) Chronicle takes up the subject and throws a flood of light on it. Speaking of the authority mentioned above, he asserts that in a recent edition of this narrative, "with a historical introduction by H. Humphrey, D. D., President of Amherst College," of which, over 100,000 copies have been circulated by the Massachusetts Sabbath School Society, an attempt is made to settle the dispute by a new and more "distinct picture, in which the spectators are left out, and the wife and nine small children, besides the one at the breast, are plainly represented."

But this malicious Chronicle writer seems unwilling to allow the question to stay thus settled, and quotes the following authorities, as bearing upon it, that is to say:

Foxe's Acts and Movements of these bitter and perilous days, the earliest publication after the Martyrdom, published in London in 1562, only seven years after Rogers was burned at the stake at Smythfield, and whilst his numerous family were still living, states that "his wife and children, being XI in number, X able to go out, and one sucking on her breast, met him on the way as he went towards Smythfield."

In Middleton's Evangelical Biography, vol. 1, p. 302, it is written—"His wife and ten children by her side, with one at her breast, met him by the way."

In "The Annals of the English Bible, by Christopher Anderson, London, 1845, vol. 2, p. 286," the following passage may be found:

"The people were giving thanks for his constancy, but there among the crowd, there met him the wife, whom neither Gardiner nor Bonner would permit him to see. His wife, the foreigner, with all her children * * * the eldest now nearly seventeen years of age; the youngest, or the eleventh child, an unconscious babe, now hanging at the mother's breast."

This Chronicle writer is not content with this array of authorities, to upturn the long cherished opinion that the number of Mrs. Rogers' children did not, at most, exceed ten, as also the well authenticated picture in Dr. Humphrey's tract, but he insists upon it, that it has thus "been shown from the highest English authority—the earliest and the latest—that the number of Mrs. Rogers' children was neither nine, nor ten, but eleven. The error may at first have been mere typographical—arising from the transposition of the numerical letters XI, as originally printed in Foxe. Later historians, copying at second hand, have helped to perpetuate the error."

G. EMLEN HARE, Principal.

Extracts from Bishop Potter's Annual Addresses to the Convention of 1846.—"It gives me great pleasure to inform the Convention that some important measures have been adopted during the last year, towards securing to our youth the advantages of superior classical instruction, in connection with proper religious training. The classical department of the Protestant Episcopal Academy, which was established in this city more than fifty years since, through the agency of Bishop White and others, has been re-opened under the auspices of the Rev. Dr. Hare, and will afford to parents in this vicinity the means of educating boys in the most approved manner. Its funds have enabled the Trustees to make liberal provision for the sons of Clergymen, and others, on whom the charges of instruction would fall heavily, and it is hoped that the Academy will prove rich in blessing to many families."

To the Convention of 1847.—"I had occasion in my last address to call the attention of the Diocese to the provisions, which had just been made, to secure to the sons of churchmen a superior classical training, in connection with proper religious culture. The Episcopal Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, had then just been opened. The anticipations entertained of its usefulness have been more than realized. Its numbers have increased beyond expectation, and its discipline and course of instruction are worthy of all praise. In its influence generally, and especially in its care of the manners, morals and religious principles of the young, it vindicates its claims to the confidence of all the members of our Church; and having occasion frequently myself to visit the school, I feel the greater assurance in recommending it to general favour."

To the Convention of 1848.—"The Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, has had a career, thus far, of great and uninterrupted prosperity; and it is exerting an influence on the principles and character of our children which will be felt for good long after our own earthly course has terminated. It now numbers nearly one hundred pupils."

To the Convention of 1849.—"The Episcopal Academy in this city has reached, under the wise and efficient administration of Dr. Hare, its maximum number of pupils, as situated at present; and its Trustees are about to erect a large edifice on Locust street near Broad, sufficient for the accommodation of from two to three hundred."

Extract from the address of the Bishop of Pennsylvania, in the Convention of 1848.

"The female school, known as the Retreat, in School-house Lane, near Germantown, has been signally favored, not only by the smiles of Divine Providence, but also with the influence of the Divine Spirit. Considerably more than a third of all the resident or boarding pupils have within the last two months been confirmed, and have also become communicants, under circumstances which have inspired me with the most lively hopes in respect to their future character and influence as Christian women. The order and spirit prevailing throughout the school have been excellent; the discipline is quiet, effective, and eminently domestic; the position of the buildings and grounds is alike beautiful and healthy; and the patronage bestowed upon it most encouraging."

The year consists of two terms, of 144 and 29 weeks, commencing April 10th and September 4th.

SHELBY COLLEGE.

The ensuing session of this Institution will be commenced on Wednesday, 5th of September next.

In order to admission into the Freshman Class, the applicant must exhibit satisfactory evidence of good moral character, and he must be well acquainted with the ordinary branches of English Education, and well versed in the grammar of the Greek and Latin languages, and be able to construe Jacob's Greek Reader or its equivalent, Caesar's Commentaries, Virgil, Cicero's Select Orationes, and to translate English into Greek and Latin correctly. He must be thoroughly acquainted with Ancient Geography, Plain Geometry, and Algebra (Davies, First Lessons) as far as the Square Root. The College course of studies is as extensive as any in the West, in the Classical and Mathematical departments, and the most extensive, in the branches of History and the Natural Sciences.

Extensive improvements are progressing rapidly to completion, which, when finished will make the College edifice one of the most commodious for literary instruction west of the mountains. Among these improvements, the Observatory is one of great importance to the future prosperity of the Institution. The principal instrument, which will be the fourth in magnitude and power in the United States, will be finished at Munich, Germany, during the ensuing autumn. This Telescope will cost at the manufactory, unpacked, $3,200.00. The additional instruments necessary to complete the apparatus of the Observatory, are a Transit Telescope, Comet Finder, and Sidereal Clock, which, aggregated, will cost $1200.00. These instruments are to be paid for by public liberality. The other improvements are provided for out of a fund which is appropriated for that purpose, which is amply sufficient for the demand upon it. My design for stating the above facts is, to engage the liberality of generous minds, to make specific donations for these objects, and also for the purchase of Chemical apparatus, of which we need in addition to our present collection, instruments which will cost $500. A Sidereal Clock which cost $300, was recently given to the Cincinnati Observatory by a liberal minded gentleman of that city. Will not some wealthy reader go and do likewise for Shelby College?

The sons of Episcopalians, and those of others, who are willing that their sons shall be trained as such, are received in the subscriber's family, and suitably cared for in all respects. He becomes responsible for the expenditures of all the young men, and boys who are members of his family, since none can retain that position longer than they deserve his confidence.

The expenses including, Board, Washing, Fuel, Lights, and Tuition, are for members of College $165 for a session of ten months, and for those of the Preparatory Department $155 payable half semi-annually, in advance. Accommodations, if desired, can be obtained elsewhere in the village adjoining the College.

Persons who may desire further information can obtain it promptly by addressing the Subscriber.

WM. J. WALLER, President.

QUARTERLY REPORT.

For the quarter ending July 29th, 1849, the Rev. Edward C. Jones would respectfully present to his Bishop the following statement of services rendered in his Missionary capacity, at Blockley Alms-house:

He has officiated every Sunday morning in the Children's Asylum, (service and sermon,) and has just concluded a series of simple, practical, discourses on the Lord's prayer. The pupils when catechised each Sunday morning on the sermon of the preceeding week, evince a remarkable readiness in answering the questions propounded. The Missionary proposes entering upon a series of sermons, on the Creed in this department, in due season. Every Sunday afternoon he officiates (service and sermon) in the Lunatic department; good order prevails, and many take part in the singing and some in the responses. On Thursday afternoon from 3 to 4 he meets a class of convalescing insane and instructs them in the Prayer Book, intermixing the exercises with singing. The harmonious effect of Psalmody upon their minds is truly remarkable. This class once numbered 25 or thereabouts, but by the ravages of the recent epidemic has been reduced to 14.

The missionary has devoted a considerable portion of his time, often three additional afternoons in the week, to visitations of the sick wards. From over fatigue during the recent illness he has superinduced much physical weakness, but is happy to report himself as getting much better. This aforementioned debility would for a short space compel him somewhat to intermit his labors, but still he has been able he hopes to cheer the dying bed of many a poor sufferer, and lead them to "embrace and hold fast, the blessed hope of everlasting life."

Some cases have been very encouraging. In the consumptive ward a man by the name of Scott after giving good evidence of unfeigned sorrow for sin and faith in our dear Redeemer, died in the enjoyment of a "religious and holy hope;" and in the female surgical ward the Lord followed my feeble efforts in the conviction and I do believe, sincere change of one poor woman laboring under a cancerous affection.

I have distributed about two thousand pages of Tracts—English, French and German—among the inmates, kindly furnished by the American Tract Society. On the recent National Fast-day I preached three times, at 9 o'clock, A. M. to the children, at 11 to the females, at 3 P. M. in the Lunatic Asylum, and to prepare the minds of the inmates for the solemn services. I have distributed about a thousand copies of a little tract composed by myself for the occasion, which I hear from sundry sources, was attentively read. Thus I have humbly endeavored to do something in my Master's vineyard. Would that I could labor with unembarrassed mind, but God in his providence may ultimately lead the friends of Missions to contribute more freely to my support.

I remain, very truly,

Your servant in the Gospel,

(Signed)

EDWARD C. JONES.

CONNECTICUT.

ST. THOMAS'S CHURCH—NEW HAVEN.

The Chapel just erected by this Parish, in Elm street, was opened for services on Sunday, 12th inst., and the Rector officiated in both parts of the day, and preached to large and attentive audiences.

The Chapel is a neat structure, built of brick, 40 feet by 80, exclusive of the vestibules, and the Vestry-room in the rear. The interior is plain and chaste, showing a single arch and perfectly white walls. The seats, which are exceedingly comfortable, are constructed in the sofa style, without doors, and they will accommodate a congregation of about five hundred people. A platform is raised to a proper height and neatly enclosed for the Choir and the organ, and the arrangements of the Chancel are Church-like and convenient. The colour of the painting is a light drab, with mahogany graining for the tops and scrolls of the seats. It is provided with gas-fixtures, and is pronounced the best audience room of the size in New Haven. The location is unsurpassed by that of any house of worship in that city, unless it be those standing upon the public green.

The Rector's morning Discourse was from the text, "But the tabernacle of the upright shall flourish."—Prov. xiv. ch., 11 v. After suitable introductory remarks, he began to apply his subject, and spoke of the modest building which had been reared, as being to the worshipers little more than what the tabernacle was to the Hebrews, a moveable, shifting sanctuary. Though it was not intended, he said, to give to the edifice a special consecration in the form and manner prescribed by the Ritual of the Church, there was still a way to separate it from all unhallowed and unbecoming uses, and thus virtually dedicating it to the glory of God, and to the voice of His praise, and that was by the holy hearts, and the holy service of the worshipers.

SHORT ESSAYS ON CHRISTIAN DUTY. No. XII.

"Can faith save him?"

The weakness and perversity of our nature too frequently lead us to dwell chiefly on some one divine truth, to the obscuration, if not entire neglect, of others equally important; and without which that one truth to which we have sacrificed them itself loses its significance and true value in the Divine economy for the salvation of men.

In times that are past, it may be that the fruits of righteousness were insisted upon without sufficient care to plant and cherish that only root whence they can issue, a pure and living faith. Men looked for "sweet waters" while the fountain was still unhealed of its "bitterness." Now we are suffering the usual effects of re-action; and having once exalted man's doings above that "righteousness which is by faith of JESUS CHRIST, unto all and upon all them that believe," we are seeking to amend our error, unconsciously perhaps, by making our faith an excuse for our disobedience to that moral law, which CHRIST came, not to abolish, but rather to "establish." Faith, whether we regard it as a body of doctrine, or as the reliance of the individual soul upon the merits and passions of our SAVIOUR for the forgiveness of sin, is in danger, at least, of filling up our minds, so as to hide from us the absolute necessity of a holy life.

This is a fearful and most dangerous error; one concerning which even iteration of warning may well be permitted, seeing the melancholy fact is obvious, that with all our blessings of the abundant promulgation of pure and sound doctrine, we do not in our lives exhibit a corresponding morality.

Perhaps none would be found among us now so grossly ignorant as to believe that a man's own works would save him. We have thoroughly unlearned that error. But if we are not equally convinced that, without works, neither can our faith save us, we have but exchanged one error for another, and are as far from the truth—the saving truth, as ever. "What doth it profit though a man say he hath faith, and have not works? Can faith save him?" "Faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone." Most excellent, most essential, is a right faith; but "by works" it is made "perfect;" and thus alone does it become effectual to our salvation. God has so joined faith and obedience, that they cannot be separated without destroying the vitality of both. Earnestly and repeatedly does the Apostle urge upon us, that "faith without works is dead;" while, on the other hand, we are taught that works which "spring not of faith in JESUS CHRIST," forasmuch as they are not "done as God hath willed and commanded them to be done," can never be acceptable in His sight.

Awful is that saying, "the devils also believe!" They even, overshadowed by the Divine power, tremblingly acknowledge one God, and His "Holy One, Whom He hath sent."

The orthodoxy of our creed will not avail us, unless it transforms our hearts and lives, and leads us continually to copy that Divine example set before us; looking to Whom we are not only taught the way of perfectness, but graciously strengthened, to run therein with all diligence. True it is that God has wrought out salvation for us; but we shall indeed have received His grace in vain, if we count that our reliance upon His finished work, in and by CHRIST, exempts us from the practice of holiness, "without which no man shall see the LORD!" There is also a salvation to be wrought in us; and in vain shall we call Him, Whose name we bear, "Master and LORD," if we keep not His sayings. Christian men surely forget that we shall be judged according to our works: and that they only who do His commandments shall have "right to the tree of life." Our LORD has deigned to open to us some part of that dread process which shall, at the last day, pass upon every one of us; and there we see, that it is not by the working of our minds or feelings that our eternal doom will be adjudged, but by very deeds! It is these that will admit us to eternal life, or condemn us to everlasting banishment from Him, in "Whose Presence is life!"

O, to keep these things continually in mind! It is not that with our lips we deny the necessity of good works; but that our hearts, as manifested by our lives, are not alive to God's truth in this matter. Well may we pray that He would "make clean our hearts within us," that our lives, as well as our lips, might "show forth His praise!"

"Who shall ascend into the hill of the LORD, and who shall rise up in His holy place?"

"Even he that hath clean hands and a pure heart, and that hath not lifted up his mind unto vanity, nor sworn to deceive his neighbour."

"Offer the sacrifice of righteousness, and put your trust in the LORD."

WINFRED; OR, THE STUDENT OF SCRIPTURE.

A CHURCH BALLAD.

BY THE REV. EDWARD C. JONES.

"I pray you to send me the book of the Prophets, which the abbot Winbert, formerly my Master, left me when dying, in which six Prophets are comprised in the same volume, written in very distinct letters. You cannot send me a greater consolation in my old age." Epistle of Winfred, or Boniface to Daniel, Bp. of Winchester, A. D. 826. Palmer's Ch. History, Page 89.

He sits beneath some spreading tree,
An aged, reverend man,
With book of God upon his knee;
Its open page to scan.

Thuringia's forest-leaves are stirred,
As the pure gale goes by,
But sweeter incense fans his heart,*
"The Spirit from on high."

The Prophets! ah! they speak of Him;
To whom he long has clung,
Whose praises, now his eye is dim,
Still linger on his tongue.

The Prophets! ah! with glowing strain,
They picture latter days,
When green-clad Earth, and distant main,
Shall bask in Gospel rays.

Isaiah rolls the tide of song,
Unveils the distant years,
Till Jacob's Star—that beacon blest,
In blazing pomp appears.

And Jeremy forgets to weep,
While musing of the hour:—
When Christ, the righteous Branch, shall reign,†
And kingdoms own his power.

And he who sat by Chebar's flood,
In famed Chaldea's clime,
And saw the visions of his God,
In retinue sublime;—

Ezekiel—the priestly bard,
Describes the streams of grace,
Which issue in a healing tide,
From out the holy place.‡

Thus, as the Prophets all unfold,
The visions bright they see,
And robe in garniture of gold,
A Kingdom yet to be:—

That aged man—that Priest of God,
As gushing tear-drops start,
Shuts up the Book his Master gave,
And folds it to his heart.

Long has he toiled and plead with men,
The sacred Three to own,
And oft Bavaria's wilds have thrilled,
To that impassioned tone.

And even yet, in frosty age,
The standard still he rears,
And spreads abroad the seed of truth,
And waters it with tears.

* * * * *

Another scene—a river's bank,
A crowd with passions high,
And gleaming swords, and halberds keen,
Flash 'neath the ruddy sky.

He falls—with prayer upon his lips,
That Priest with locks so white,
And all that Prophets wrote of bliss,
Comes bursting on his sight.

He falls—that Martyr of his Lord,
Faithful in youth and age,
Who oft amid Thuringia's wilds,
Had scanned the sacred page.

And now, amid the worthies high,
Who passed to Heaven in blood,
We trace, in living lines, the name,
Of Boniface the Good.

Selections.

A CHARGE TO THE CLERGY OF THE DIOCESE OF MARYLAND.

For the restraint of his conduct within that limit, in all his relations as a private member of the Church—in other words, for the application of the rule to his private conduct—his private judgment, that is, his understanding enlightened and quickened by his conscience, is the administrative or executive authority. As he will answer to God, he must satisfy that, from the first inquiry. What is the particular rule of doctrine, discipline or worship, concerned in the particular case in question? up to the last, What is the will of God in its primal fount and highest form? If his private judgment should dissent from the particular rule under which he lives, he would have most cogent reason for doubting his own sincerity, vigilance or fidelity to himself—most urgent motive for renewing his examination and appealing from his own decision. But once settled, that decision would be imperative. Were it to rebel against his rule, he must do it, with all the fearful risks. To the Searcher of Hearts he must commit himself. There is nought else for him.

But this is true of private conduct only. The individual conscience governs only the individual. The moment the line of his individuality is outpassed, another jurisdiction holds. The rule under which he lives must be applied by an authority commensurate with that rule, in everything concerning others, together with himself. The effect of his words and actions upon others comes under the cognizance of the society of which they and he form a part, and the rule of that society must govern him, with reference to their interests and the relations between them and him, as fellow-members. The rule in theory, becomes discipline in practice, and settles for the individual what, if it concerned him alone, must be settled by his conscience only. The alternative then, becomes obedience or punishment; submission or separation from the society. He still has the alternative of periling all upon his private judgment: but it is no longer before God alone. It now affects his position here, as well as his hopes hereafter. His risk is double; censure or expulsion in the present, and if at last he be not found to be able to stand before his Master, condemnation in the future judgment.

Discipline, thus taking hold of the Christian in all relations, affects him most directly and notably in those of a public, official nature.

A society must have officers. The Church has them, and under conditions which are necessary, because they are involved in the very notion of office. Office implies trust; and trust, responsibility; and responsibility, a guiding rule commensurate with the trust. To the same extent, limitations of individual liberty result. What the man might do, the officer may not. What the individual might eschew, the officer may not decline. His office imposes duty which must be discharged: it brings on him new degrees of accountability, which must be provided for. For duty, he is a light in a candlestick, which must be burning for example, he is a city set on a hill, which cannot be hid. The conduct of the man must be regulated, and therefore his liberty limited and restricted, by the nature and duties of the office he is allowed to bear. Does he serve? His service must be of that kind, and to those persons, pointed out by the tenor of his appointment. As a man, he may think other service needful, and its extension to others than those for whom he ministers expedient. As an officer, he has no right to think so; still less, to act upon his private views. He has a service. Faithfulness to the society in which he is an officer, consists as much in not going beyond his office, as in not falling short. For if the foot take the office of the hand, or the smelling of the taste, were not the body injured as much as by lameness or defective smell?—Does he rule? His rule must be not by his own judgment and for ends of his own selection; but by the law and for the ends of the society in which he rules. He has no rule beside that law, and those ends. In and for them it is that his power to rule exists. They are its essence and necessary limits. As a man, he may think those limits narrow, and see ends beyond those set him, when his office was assigned him. As a ruler, he can know nothing of such ends; he has no right to look beyond his limits.

Does he teach? The regulation of his action by the nature of his office becomes still more important; for teaching in a society is the life of all its action, on which service and government both depend. He is a teacher, not for himself, of his own opinion; but for a society, and the doctrine of that society. He is to teach, not what he believes, because it is what he believes, but what the society teaches. He is the society, for teaching. The society teaches by him. His teaching is its teaching: therefore it must be its teaching, and nothing else. There must be no admixture (or as little as human frailty and fallibility will allow) of his own in what he teaches. Such admixture would be treachery to his office, falsehood to his trust.

If, as an individual, he should find his belief varying from the norm of the society in which he is an officer, he can no longer continue to bear office. He must regain his liberty by laying down the office which is its restriction. His bearing office depends on his private conscience: but while he bears it, not his conscience, but his office, is the limit of his liberty. As a man, he cannot teach what he does not believe. In office, he must teach the belief of the society in which he is an officer. If it is not his belief, his conscience must be obeyed: but its dictate is, not that he shall violate his office, but that he shall lay it down. He must escape the limits imposed by office, by falling back upon his larger liberty as a private individual. While he remains an officer, the society of which he is the voice, controls its own voice. Its rule of teaching is his law. He teaches what that rule directs, and nothing else.

The Church of CHRIST, teaches, and can teach, nothing but what it finds in the Holy Scriptures,—the fixed, unalterable deposit of all revealed truth, of which it has been made the witness and keeper, with which it is sent into the world, to proclaim, expound, and enforce its contents. But the Church teaches Scriptural truth, not in the letter only. It is the spirit that giveth life, as well in the new law, as in the old; and to enable its members to find and enjoy the spirit in the letter, has, from the first, been a principle office of the Church. The sense and force of Scripture, it has always been the province of the Church, to keep before the minds of believers; and in order to that, to indoctrinate them in its meaning, and in the first principles and essential outlines of its doctrine. "THE doctrine" to which Timothy was to "take heed;" "THE faith once delivered to the saints" for which St. Jude requires us to "contend;" "THE doctrine according to godliness," to which, "if any man consent not, and teach otherwise," the man of God is to "withdraw himself from such;"—is the doctrine and faith of the Church, established in it by the Apostles, and kept in it, by the watchful care of its Divine Head, in fulfilment of His promise, from their day until now. In "the form of doctrine" which was "delivered" to those in Rome, of whom St. Paul testified that they obeyed it from the heart—"the form of sound words" Timothy "heard of" the Apostle, and was charged to "hold fast"—the members of the Church have, from the beginning, received a notion of revealed truth as a whole, and of its great constituent items, at the outset of their membership, as the object and law of their belief. Starting from the point attained in the Creed, as expounded and illustrated in the catechetical teaching by which, every where and at all times, the Church has labored to put its members in full possession of the substance of its creed, they are led onward, in their progress toward perfection, by the hand of faith, in the worship of the Church; receiving, in its prayers, its psalms, the order and objects of its offices, its round of holy festivals and solemn fasts, and its selections of Scripture, as they are connected with each other, and with the forms and offices in which they occur, at once a training for understanding the Scriptures, and a continued commentary on their meaning. As from time to time they meet with error in various forms, or it arises in some new shape, they are assisted to detect it, and to put it down, by the definitions of the Church in Articles of Religion, or express enactments, in the form of Constitutions, Rules, or Canons.

These are all subservient to the wants of every member. They make up the common corporate teaching of the Church. But in aid and application of that general instruction, the work of the ministry is to teach and premonish, to instruct, exhort, and reprove. By those who hold that office the provision which subserve the wants of the rest, are to be made subservient to those wants. Creeds, Catechism, Liturgy and Articles are to be doubly their rule, as the guide and objects of their own belief, as their instruments for guiding and forming that of others.

Their own belief is, in the very nature of the case, a necessary discipline, must be palsied by no misgivings, as to its right, or the pre-requisite to their guidance of others. The man who doubts or hesitates, is unfit to lead. The hand that administers dis-fitness of its action. The tongue that offers worship must not stammer forth in broken accents a heartless service. The doctrine that is dispensed must be qualified by no reservations or forced constructions. Honest, hearty persuasion that we are right, is indispensable to faithful labor. Our heart must be in our work, to do it well: and he who is not fit to do it well, is unfit for it at all.

Therefore it is, that every branch of the Church, before admission to its ministry, ascertains and receives a pledge of the individual belief of the candidate for office. It is a necessary mode of qualification for the office. Not only because right faith and sound judgment are integral parts of that personal character which must belong to every one advanced to the high trust of ministerial responsibility, but because their exercise in the adoption and maintenance of the faith and judgment of the Church are pre-requisites for appointment to ministerial office in order to its discharge, as preparatives for it, or as elements without which the individual is incapable of its due performance. Hearing, sight, and speech are less necessary; for their absence may, in some way or other, in more or less degree, be supplied; but there is no substitute for an absent acquiescence and interest in the belief and practice, which the minister is to implant and cherish in those for whom he ministers.

Of such acquiescence and interest in the belief and practice of the Church in which we minister, we, my brethren, have given our pledge in ordination and in the previous examination. It was the security taken by the Church that we were fit as well as ready for the ministry—able to discharge its duties faithfully and zealously, because true and hearty in our own allegiance. At the solemn moment when we received the irrevocable trust of our sacred office, we deliberately made the promise by which we all are bound, "always so to minister the Doctrine and Sacraments, and the Discipline of CHRIST, as the Lord hath commanded, as this Church hath received the same, according to the commandments of God; so that we may teach the people committed to our care and charge, with all diligence to keep and observe the same."

The Church knows only of CHRIST's doctrine, sacraments and discipline; and knows of all, equally, as commanded by CHRIST, and to be kept and observed by His people; implying not choice, but duty—a duty, when faithfully rendered, becoming choice; but choice, because it is duty,—not due in so far only as it is chosen.

But whatever might be the condition of a man, free from ties and obligations, in view only of the absolute facts of the existence of the Gospel and its institutions, and of his own contact with them in a state of probation under the responsibility of eternal consequences—ours is no such condition. We are under a most sacred pledge—voluntarily given, but given under the profession of a belief that we were divinely called to do so, and that we gave it according to the will of our Lord JESUS CHRIST—to hold and teach a certain doctrine—not our doctrine, or a doctrine; and to minister certain sacraments and discipline—not of our invention or device, but "as received by the Church, of the command of CHRIST." Having recognized the Scriptures as the only fountain of our doctrine, and promised to teach nothing but what we honestly and truly find there, we then pledged ourselves to draw from them that doctrine, and establish by them that practice, which we had already satisfied ourselves they warranted the Church in upholding as CHRIST's command.

Before that pledge was given, was the time for us to settle the momentous questions, whether the Christian teacher can bind himself by anything more stringent than the naked letter, or narrower than the whole text of Scripture? and whether the doctrine, sacraments and discipline, that "this Church hath received as commanded by CHRIST," exhausts the fundamental verities, and comprise the necessary requirements of the Christian faith and life, as taught in Scripture?

In ordination, we affirmed for ourselves, before God, that we believe they do; and that because they do, we might, and ought to bind ourselves to them as the substance and limit of our teaching, and the rule and pattern of our ministration.

For our course and conduct in the ministry, no other pledge or declaration beside that (solemn and stringent as it is) which it made in ordination, would seem to be necessary. But to assure all concerned that it was made in full recognition of its nature and effect, a previous written declaration was required, as a condition of admission to ordination, in the form of a "solemn engagement to conform to the doctrines and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States."

By that declaration the verbal pledge in ordination was interpreted in its application to the branch of the Church of God in which our ministry is cast. "The doctrine" of CHRIST which we were "always so to minister as to teach the people with all diligence to keep and observe the same," was explained to be "the doctrine of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States,"—the sacraments and discipline which we were so to minister, were defined as "the worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States." "This Church," according to whose receiving we are all to minister, was specified by name, as the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. —Not our gatherings for the word of God, or our inventions for His worship, but a certain doctrine, and a certain worship, of a certain body, having standards and formularies, by which its doctrine and worship, were already known to us and to all, were voluntarily, but most solemnly, in the written declaration, and in the public promise, assumed at our admission to the ministry, as thenceforth to be the object of that ministry. It was to consist in teaching the doctrine and ministering the sacraments and discipline, which the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States has received, as according to the command of God; and in striving with all diligence, to bring the people, for and among whom we minister, to keep, and observe that same doctrine, sacraments, and discipline.

* The Spirit is symbolized by the wind, St. John, 3: 8.

That this cannot be done by ministrations among other bodies of Christians, needs little argument to prove. Either there are no grounds of difference between us and them, and then they and we are alike condemnable for wicked alienation and disorganization of the Body of CHRIST, in holding separate communions, without,—it need not be said, sufficient, but—any cause: or, if there be any grounds of difference, then those grounds must be forsaken when we go among them, and to that extent we become unfaithful to our pledge of giving all our diligence to the ministry of "the doctrine, sacraments, and discipline" of "this Church."

But for the government of our due and proper ministry, where only, as ministers of CHRIST in this branch of His Church, we have any right or commission to minister within, and for the Church itself, it is of great importance that we should clearly understand where, and by what, "the doctrine" of "this Church," its sacraments and discipline, are fixed and determined.

After what has been said, it is unnecessary to speak of the Bible and the Catholic Creeds. "This Church" would be no Church, if it did not acknowledge them as the fountain and pattern of its doctrine—the Bible as its only and all-sufficient source, the Creeds as its irrefragable and necessary form. From them our doctrine, sacraments, and discipline are drawn by them are limited. But what is the substantive form in which that doctrine, sacraments, and discipline, are exhibited? Where did we find them, when we prepared ourselves intelligently and deliberately to profess our reception of them, and determination to adhere to them?

I have spoken of the practical teaching of a particular Church, as consisting in its worship, catechism, articles and canons. The provisions for that practical teaching are its norm or standard, in which it is to be sought, recognized, professed and carried out, by those to whom the duty is entrusted.

The provisions of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States for worship are all embodied in its Book of Common Prayer. Beside that it has provided for the instruction of the young, its Catechism; for the guidance of its ministry, the Articles of Religion; and for the government of all, a body of Constitutions and Canons general for the whole confederation of dioceses, and diocesan for each several diocese.

The Constitutions and Canons, general and diocesan, and many of the rubrics of the Prayer Book, make up the standard of our discipline. I leave it, to pass to that of sacraments and doctrine.

It will not be disputed, that what "this Church" holds concerning the number, nature, effects and ministration of the sacraments is to be found in the Book of Common Prayer and Articles of Religion, conjointly taken. Whatever is enjoined, declared, asserted, or by necessary inference, affirmed in either, is part of the law, or doctrine of the Church. Neither, therefore, can be taken as a standard independently of the other, on any subject. On that of the sacraments, the offices for their administration, must necessarily contain the most abundant and minute information and illustration. Prayer, of all human productions, needs to be the most elaborate and best considered. Prayer offered, and doctrine propounded, in the celebration of a sacrament, must have a claim, if any thing human can, to be regarded as duly weighed and accurately expressed, and to be taken, in all strictness, in the precise, native sense of language.

We make the following interesting extracts from an article in the COLONIAL CHURCH CHRONICLE.

Most remarkable is the tenacity with which the Copts as a body have maintained their faith: and the more so when we consider how completely isolated they have been, not only from Catholic communion, but from any intercourse of a friendly kind with other Christian communities. Certainly, if to them belongs, as it seems impossible to doubt, the heavy responsibility of having smoothed the way for the Mahometan invader, and having attached themselves to his cause on the condition that he should support their rights against the orthodox Greek Melchites with whom they were at deadly feud, they have in many ways nobly redeemed their original fault by the firmness with which, as a body, they have adhered to the faith which they have had every temporal inducement to desert. Not that there have not been very extensive defections, especially in times of persecution; or that even now apostasy to Islamism is by any means an unknown offence; but still it must be acknowledged by any one who has read the sickening tale of the domination of Mahometan fanaticism and misrule in Egypt for so many ages, as a very remarkable fact, that so large a remnant as a Church of 150,000 native Christians, (about one-tenth of the present estimated population of Egypt,) should have been left in the land; and that, as I have said, without any support, and indeed without any communication, political or religious, on the part of Christians in other countries.

The churches of the Copts are in melancholy keeping with their moral and spiritual condition. Almost without exception they are in a state of extreme filth and neglect, and in most cases they are mere mud buildings. They are uniformly built on one model. There are, in general, three or five small chancels, or divisions of the chancel, surmounted by domes, and with no windows in them. These have all a screen separating them from the next division, which runs across the Church, and in the part immediately outside of the principal chancel, in which is the altar, is the lectern at which the Priest reads the non-liturgical parts of the service. This division is also appropriated to the male part of the congregation. In some of their churches there is also a second division beyond, for the less honorable part of the male congregation. Behind all, and sometimes at the side, is the part appropriated to the women, whom in the Patriarch's Church at Cairo I have also seen accommodated in galleries above, to which the sacred elements *are carried when there is communion. In addition to the fonts, in which they practise the trine immersion, most of their churches have large depositories for water, in which they practise their singular custom of annually bathing, in commemoration of our Lord's baptism in the Jordan. This is a ceremony to which the Copts ascribe great importance. In many of their Churches I saw hardly any traces of pictures, and though I was told they treat their sacred pictures with extreme devotion, I cannot say I saw much of this, at least in comparison with other Eastern Christians. In one of the largest and best of their Churches which I visited, that at Thebes, on the edge of the great Eastern desert, there were no pictures at all. Sadly, however, is this squalid mud-built temple of the true God contrasted, in its low estate, with the gorgeous fanes of the old Egyptian idolatry, whose magnificent remains astonish the traveller who is fortunate enough to visit the site of the great city of Egypt—"populous No." Their vestments and holy books, as well as the sacred vessels, are every where in the most painfully dirty and neglected condition; and I cannot think that, in general, the plea of poverty, which they offer in excuse, is a valid one.

It were much to be wished that we had a full and minute account of the ecclesiastical customs, as well as of the liturgies and offices of the Copts; as I cannot doubt, from the extreme tenacity with which they have ever clung to their old traditions, as well as the isolation from all other Christian communities in which they have lived, that they have retained much of what is most primitive, and that much serviceable light might be thrown upon many of the practices and rites of the Christian worship in its earliest form, from the Coptic sources. I should much wish, too, to see stated—what I could not satisfactorily make out in Egypt—how far the Monophysite heresy is embodied in any of their symbols or liturgies. Certainly, on questioning a Latin Coptic priest closely on this subject, I could not learn from him what were the passages in which his Coptic liturgy, which was of course sanctioned at Rome, differed from that of the native Coptic Church. I was informed by a Clergyman of the highest authority on such a subject, that in conversation, the present Patriarch had rejected with horror, the ordinary statements of the Monophysite heresy; and that, on his asking what the doctrine of the English Church was, he had expressed his agreement in the statements he quoted from her standards.

I have mentioned some painful features in the Coptic character; but I should be unwilling not to bring forward some others, which I think are to be viewed with respect, and even admiration. The very exclusiveness to which I have alluded, and their rigid nationality, have their bright side. They adhere most strictly to their own peculiar ecclesiastical rites and ordinances. Though the Coptic has long since ceased to be spoken, and cannot even be read by many of the laity, they have never abandoned the use of their old Coptic liturgy, offices, and homilies. They have rendered their services into Arabic; but they employ this language only in addition, not to the prejudice of the Coptic. I attended the ordinary morning service at the Patriarch's church one Sunday. It lasted nearly four hours, from 6 A. M., and its extreme length was occasionally by this use of the two languages, each part being read both in Coptic, (the portion which was for the most part read by the Patriarch) and in Arabic. The demeanour of the congregation, all either seated on the ground or standing, was on the whole devout; and in the chanting of the Psalms to the music of cymbals, they joined very generally. Portions of homilies were also read in both languages. The aged Patriarch, who sat on his humble throne, was treated with the utmost reverence. Indeed, the prostrations made before him in the house of God were startling, to say the least, to an occidental eye.

Nor can one avoid respecting the rigid adherence of the Copts to their fasts, which I believe are more numerous and severe than those of any other Christian community now existing. I fear the report given by those best acquainted with their condition cannot be gainsaid, and that the Judaical rigidity of fasts is often abused, as by the Pharisees of old, to the covering their neglect of the weightier matters of the law. But, however much one might desire that there were more of spirituality in the principle upon which their fasts are observed, it is impossible not to acknowledge the great amount of self-denial which, in this particular at least, must be practised by the whole body of the Coptic Christians, with hardly any exceptions. And it is impossible not to believe that it must have been the effect of such strongly marked disciplinary institutions as those, which has materially helped this community to retain its Christian character during so many ages of Mahometan persecution and oppression.

The Copts have had Christian institutions as well as a creed; and we cannot tell how much the preservation of their creed may have been owing to the discipline of such institutions.

Another pleasing and encouraging feature in the religious character of the Copts is their reverence for, and attachment to, the sacred Scriptures. I am not aware that there is any hindrance placed in the way of the study of the Bible by all classes, on the part of the Bishops and Priests. Their chief impediment to such a study is a practical one—the difficulty of obtaining copies of the Scriptures in the Arabic, which is the colloquial language both of Mahometans and Copts in Egypt. Many of the latter can read the Coptic; but, as a spoken language, it is now, I believe, completely dead; a fate which has befallen this, the last remains of the old tongue of the Pharaohs, within the last hundred years. The Copts are always eager to receive either portions of the Bible (the Psalms they are specially fond of, and, I am told, they are very generally committed to memory) or entire copies: and a proof of their sincerity, amid all their professions of poverty, is to be found in their willingness to become purchasers. This desire for books is the chief, I fear I may add, the only encouragement to the Missionaries of our Church resident in Cairo to continue their periodical voyages up the Nile. These have now been made during several years past; but I imagine that, except as regards the distribution of Scriptures, and the exchange of friendly communications, there has been no visible result of a satisfactory character. This is the more to be regretted, as the Mission maintained by the Church Missionary Society has always most wisely pursued the system of endeavouring to raise the Coptic Church through itself, and has abstained from all attempts at proselytism. The Missionaries, the Rev. Messrs. Kruse and Lieder, have been many years resident at Cairo, and are both well acquainted with the Coptic character and literature. Mrs. Lieder too has had the superintendence of a female institution, which still exists, and which has doubtless done great good in the way of female education. This still continues to be maintained; but, as you are probably aware, the Society has found it necessary to abandon the institution which Mr. Lieder had established, under the sanction of the Patriarch, for the education of candidates for the Coptic priesthood. The reasons which compelled Mr. L. to recommend this painful step sadly confirm the truth of the impressions which I have been obliged to convey of the lowered and debased tone of the Coptic Church. I believe that he both found himself provided with very indifferent materials upon which to work; and the result of the education which he did give them, which was necessarily in part English, was, that the most promising youths were immediately tempted to take to some lucrative secular calling, especially that of servants and dragomen to Europeans, and to give up all idea of becoming despised and ill-paid Coptic priests. We know too well that this is no temptation peculiar to the Coptic Church; the very same difficulty presents itself in our colleges in India, not to speak of nearer home: but it gives a melancholy prospect as to any hopes which might have been formed of the gradual elevation and quickening of the venerable Coptic Church through the education of its Clergy and the indirect influence of English Christianity.

Indeed, I confess that all I have heard, and the little I have seen, of this and the other Christian communities in the East, lead me to the sorrowful conclusion, that unless it should please God to work upon them through his life-giving Spirit, in some remarkable and extraordinary mode, we must defer our hopes of their spiritual resuscitation, till the period when a great change shall have been made in their political and social condition.* Certainly, as regards the Copts, the vices and faults prevailing amongst them, the general torpor and deadness which seems to have settled down upon them, may but too clearly be traced to the consequence of long ages of political and social degradation, oppression and outrage. Duplicity and craft, and the practice of secret hoarding, are the last, too often the only refuge of the oppressed; suspicion, mistrust, and incredulity as to the possibility of an indifferent wish on the part of others to do them good, are among not the least bitter fruits of the tyrant's rule. I believe, therefore, that not till a great temporal and social deliverance has been wrought for our brethren in Egypt, can we expect to see much spiritual progress. And I fear that under the present regime, we must expect Egypt rather to retrograde than advance. That indifference to his own creed which led Mahomet Ali to extend an equal protection to the long-despised Copt as to his Mahometan subjects, does not appear to actuate Abbas Pasha, the present ruler of Egypt; and I fear we must rather look for a reaction in favor of Mussulman bigotry, than for an advance in good government and religious liberty.

There are, I believe, twelve Coptic Bishops—eight in Upper, and four in Lower Egypt. The most remote Christian Church in which worship is now offered to the true God, is to be found at Assouan (the ancient Syene.) It forms a somewhat prominent feature in that picturesque part of the Nile scenery. The first cataract, which separates the sacred isle of Philoe from Assouan, is the northern boundary of Nubia; and upward from that point, all along the banks of the river, till you reach the Abyssinian branch, the voice of praise to the honour of the Saviour has been hushed these many centuries. Nubia was once a Christian land—as much so as Egypt. Now there is not a Christian to be found in the whole land; and, although there are not more than three mosques to be found throughout the whole length of that thinly peopled strip of green land, the Nubians are said to be bitter enemies to the name of Christianity. It is indeed a melancholy thing to traverse a land from which Christianity has fairly died out. For such has been the process in Nubia. A traveller, not three centuries ago, records that he found the congregations mourning over the lack of priests. There was then a people, but no priests. Now there are neither a Christian people nor priests, and the only traces left of either are the ruined churches of God. Of these, I believe, there are several still to be found in Nubia. I myself saw three; two of them were of the Coptic character; in one, at Phares, the chancel was of stone—built out of the remains of an ancient idol temple—and now used as a granary. The third was also a rock temple, which had plainly been used as a church; and on the walls of which are the remains of Christian paintings.

I was told by a traveller who had spent several years in Abyssinia, that he believed that some of the wild tribes to the north and north-west of that kingdom had once been Christian, and had only ceased so to be by slow degrees. He had met the members of one such tribe, who called themselves "the followers of the Prophet of the Palm Branch," but could give little further account of their faith. Nothing is more likely; for we know that through the early labours of the Church of Egypt, Ethiopia, "stretched forth her hands to God;" and in Abyssinia, at least, the faith still abides, and the national Church continues in connexion with their spiritual mother—the Abyssinian Abuna being always a Copt, sent by the Patriarch from Egypt.

* Or rather, I believe, the bread dipped in the wine.

*The improving religious prospects of the Church in the kingdom of Greece seem to confirm this view.

I should be glad to give you some information about the position of our own Church in Egypt, and other topics which might be of interest to you, but I will not trespass further upon you at present.

Believe me, dear Sir, faithfully yours,

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1849.

OLD FACTS BECOMING NEW.

We were so much struck with an article copied by "The English Churchman" from "The West of England Conservative," on Wesleyan Methodism, that we transferred it to our columns. Another article, from the same source, conveys equally interesting information in relation to the opinions of Wesley. We have always been persuaded that justice was not done to the memory of this remarkable man. And the greatest injustice is committed by those who honor him with verbal adulation, and who are even fond of naming themselves after him, and yet in action forsake the principles which he has asserted, with a strong and clear voice, to be the truth.

We recur to this matter, not for the sake of giving pain or exciting bitter feeling on the part of those who call themselves Wesleyans, nor are we about to enter upon the task of setting forth the height of Wesley's Church principles. But we know very well that the peculiar claims of the church are often held up as the extreme of arrogant pretension, by those who call themselves followers of Wesley. Our Missionaries in the distant fields, where they are brought into immediate collision with this zealous and active sect, are often thus opposed. They may find it useful to have Wesley's own words as an answer.

We have heard, on good authority, that a Clergyman of a certain denomination, paying a friendly visit to one of our Clergy, said to him—"I have often heard about this Puseyism in your church. From what I hear it appears to be something very bad, but I never could find out exactly what it is. Will you do me the favor to tell me?"

The other replied—"I do not think I can present it in a stronger light than by reading one or two extracts from a work I have."

After reading some statements respecting the Sacraments, the interrogator stopped him, saying "Oh, I don't want to hear any more—it is far worse than I supposed—may I ask what book you were reading from?"

"Certainly, sir," was the reply "I have been reading from your own 'Confession of Faith!'"

In the same manner, we doubt not that if some of Wesley's writings should be bound up with the Oxford Tracts, they would pass muster in this strange society, and their author would be set down as a rank "Puseyite." In proof that this is no mere random assertion, we quote from the article referred to, the following extract from "Wesley's earnest appeal to men of reason and religion."

"Others object that we do not observe the laws of the Church, and thereby undermine it. What laws! the Rubrics or Canons? In every parish where I have been a curate yet, I have observed the Rubrics with a scrupulous exactness, not for wrath, but for conscience sake. And this, so far as belongs to an unbeneficed Minister, or to a private member of the Church, I do now. I will just mention a few of them, and leave you to consider which of us has observed, or does observe, them most.

"1. Days of fasting or abstinence to be observed:—

The forty days of Lent.

The Ember days at the four seasons.

The three Rogation days.

All Fridays in the year, except Christmas Day.

"(2.) 'So many as intend to be partakers of the Holy Communion shall signify their names to the Curate, at least, some time the day before:

"And if any of these be an open and notorious evil liver, the Curate shall advertise him, that in anywise he presume not to come to the Lord's table until he hath openly declared himself to have truly repented.

"(3.) 'Then (after the Nicene Creed) the Curate shall declare unto the people what holidays or fasting-days are in the week following to be observed.

"(4.) 'The Minister shall first receive the Communion in both kinds himself, and then proceed to deliver the same to the Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, in like manner, if any be present, and after that to the people.

"(5.) 'In Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, and Colleges, where there are many Priests and Deacons, they shall all receive the communion with the Priest every Sunday at the least.

"(6.) 'The Children to be baptized must be ready at the font immediately after the Last Lesson.

"(7.) 'The Curates of every parish shall warn the people, that without great necessity they procure not their children to be baptized at home in their houses.

"(8.) 'The Curate of every parish shall diligently upon Sundays and holidays, after the Second Lesson at Evening Prayer, openly in the Church, instruct and examine so many children as he shall think convenient in some part of the Catechism.

"(9.) 'Whosoever the Bishop shall give notice for children to be brought unto him for their Confirmation, the Curate of every parish shall either bring or send in writing, with his name subscribed thereunto, the names of all such persons within his parish, as he shall think fit to be presented to the Bishop.'

"Now, the question is not whether these Rubrics ought to be observed (you take this for granted in making the objection), but whether in fact they have been observed by you, or me, most. Many can witness I have observed them punctually, yea, sometimes at the hazard of my life; and as many, I fear, you have not observed them at all, and that several of them you never pretended to observe. And is it you that are accusing me for not observing the Rubrics of the Church? What grimace is this! 'O tell it not in Gath! Publish it not in the streets of Askalon!'"

That Wesley never intended to be the Founder of a Sect none can deny, who are acquainted with his often expressed views, and give him credit for honesty. It would be well if his followers would study more attentively his writings, and if their reverence for him were not strong enough to lead them back to the principles which he so strongly inculcated, surely it would have the effect of exciting a kindlier and more charitable feeling towards the church, for which Wesley, up to the latest hours of his life professed such unutterable devotion and love.

The following is a passage from his sermon on Hebrews, chap. v., 4, which was published in the Arminian Magazine, in May, 1790, just ten months before his death:—

"Not long after, a young man, Thomas Maxfield, offered himself to serve them as a son in the gospel; and then another, Thomas Richards; and a little after, Thomas Westell. Let it be well observed, on what terms we receive these, viz., as prophets (preachers), not as Priests. We received them wholly and solely to preach; not to administer Sacraments. And those who imagine these offices to be inseparably joined, are totally ignorant of the constitution of the whole Jewish as well as Christian Church. Neither the Romish, nor the English, nor the Presbyterian Churches ever accounted them so. Otherwise we should never have accepted the service either of Mr. Maxfield, Richards, or Westell. In 1744, all the Methodist preachers had their first conference. But none of them dreamed that the being called to preach, gave them any right to administer Sacraments. And when that question was proposed, 'In what light are we to consider ourselves?' it was answered, 'As extraordinary messengers, raised up to provoke the ordinary ones to jealousy.' In order hereto, one of our first rules was given to each preacher, 'You are to do that part of the work which we appoint. But what work was this? Did we ever appoint you to administer Sacraments, to exercise the priestly office? SUCH A DESIGN NEVER ENTERED INTO OUR MIND; IT WAS THE FARTHEST FROM OUR THOUGHTS. And if any preacher had taken such a step, we should have looked upon it as a palpable breach of this rule, and consequently as a recantation of our connexion. For, supposing (what I utterly deny) that the receiving you as a preacher at the same time gave an authority to administer the Sacraments; yet it gave you no other authority than to do it, or anything else, where I appoint. BUT WHERE DID I APPOINT YOU TO DO THIS? NOWHERE AT ALL. Therefore by this very rule you are excluded from doing it. And in doing it you renounce the first PRINCIPLE of Methodism, which was wholly and solely to preach the Gospel. It was several years after our Society was formed, before any attempt of this kind was made. The first was, I apprehend, at Norwich. One of our preachers there yielded to the importunity of a few of the people, and baptized their children. But, as soon as it was known, he was informed it must not be, unless he designed to leave our connexion. He promised to do it no more; and I suppose he has kept his promise."

"Now, as long as the Methodists keep to this plan, they cannot separate from the Church. And this is our peculiar glory. It is new upon the earth. Revolve all the histories of the Church, from the earliest ages, and you will find, whenever there was a great work of God in any particular city or nation, the subjects of that work soon said to their neighbours, 'stand by yourselves, for we are holier than you!' As soon as ever they separated themselves, either they retired into deserts, or they built religious houses; or at least formed parties, into which none were admitted, but such as subscribed both to their judgment and practice. But with the Methodists it is quite different. THEY ARE NOT A SECT OR PARTY. THEY DO NOT SEPARATE FROM THE RELIGIOUS COMMUNITY TO WHICH THEY AT FIRST BELONGED. THEY ARE STILL MEMBERS OF THE CHURCH: SUCH THEY DESIRE TO LIVE AND TO DIE. AND I BELIEVE ONE REASON WHY GOD IS PLEASED TO CONTINUE MY LIFE SO LONG, IS TO CONFIRM THEM IN THEIR PRESENT PURPOSE, NOT TO SEPARATE FROM THE CHURCH.

"I wish all of you who are vulgarly termed Methodists would seriously consider what has been said; and particularly you whom God hath commissioned to call sinners to repentance. It does by no means follow from hence, that you are commissioned to baptize, or administer the Lord's Supper. Ye never dreamed of this, for ten or twenty years after ye began to preach. Ye did not then, like Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, seek the Priesthood also. Ye knew, 'no man taketh this honour unto himself but he that is called of God, as was Aaron.' Oh, contain yourselves within your own bounds. Ye yourselves were at first called in the Church of England; and though ye have, and will have a thousand temptations to leave it, and set up for yourselves, regard them not. Be Church of England men still."

HUME'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

We publish, most willingly, the communication of A. F. F. in relation to our editorial notice of Hume, although the writer somewhat misapprehends the intention, at least, if not the apparent sense of our remarks.

We quite agree with A. F. F. in thinking that there is no part of an editor's duty more responsible than the office of noticing books. Of course it is impossible, when a paper is conducted by one editor, that he should read every publication sent to him. We have always endeavoured to exercise the office honestly, and never to speak of a work except from our own knowledge, and, in all opinions expressed, to give the result to which our best judgment leads us. We do not agree with A. F. F. in thinking that an editorial opinion of a work goes so far to settle its character.

As to the opinion expressed of Hume's history, it was intended to be comparative rather than positive. To write an unexceptionable history seems only to be within the reach of those who are guided by inspiration. We know of no perfect histories save those to be found in the Bible. It is much to be regretted that most of the ablest writers of history have been either avowed enemies of Christianity, or under the partial influence of religious error. We take it for granted, that every one who has sense enough to understand a history can make allowance for such an influence, when he knows what the peculiar bias of the historian is. No one, we presume, would seek religious instruction either from Hume or Gibbon, or even trust them for the fair statement of facts which bear upon the interests of Christianity. Still, what student of history can refuse the aid to be derived from these able though infidel writers? Gibbon stands almost alone upon the broad ground which his masterly work covers. Hume, on the other hand, while he has many competitors, has few equals. Lingard is, by many, placed beside him: still this able writer is under the partial control of religious error. For our own part, we esteem a writer less dangerous when his character is known, than one who, under a deceitful profession, is ever lying in wait to attack the truth. With a full understanding, then, that Hume writes as an infidel, we must honestly avow, that, in our judgment, he is as safe a guide as Macaulay. We must say, in all candour, that we think the true interests of Christianity, as the Church holds its truth, are likely to suffer as much from the partial statements of the latter, as they have suffered from the insinuations of the former. Of the two, we think Hume is much more careful about his facts. Indeed, we can show whole pages of Macaulay which are nothing but fiction; and we challenge A. F. F. to do the same with Hume.

We beg, therefore, that our readers will consider our judgment of Hume as expressing a comparative estimate of his merits as a historian. Further, in contrasting him with Macaulay, we referred more to the style of these historians than to their views of truth. We regard it as a choice of evils; and, in choosing between these two, when we prefer Hume to Macaulay, we consider our selection guided by that safe rule, "Of two evils choose the least."

HUME'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

There is no part of an editor's office, which, in this age particularly, involves greater responsibility, than the reviewing of Books. Many subscribers to his paper receive his imprimaturs with implicit confidence, and in purchasing or reading a book yield entirely to his judgment. It seems to me, therefore, that in his notices of "New Publications," an editor should exercise great caution, and in stating the excellencies of a work should not forget wherein it is objectionable.

I must confess my surprise at the unqualified approbation you give to Hume's History of England, in the last number of the Banner.

Is David Hume a safe guide in History? Let archbishop Magee answer the query.

"It is but fair to confess, that Mr. Hume has not confined altogether to religious subjects his talent of disingenuous representation. His unfaithfulness and gross partiality as an historian, have been long pretty generally acknowledged; and it has been pronounced by judicious and candid writers, upon the subject of English History, that the history which Mr. Hume has given to the world, is a most injurious work to put into the hands of British youth, in order to give them just ideas of the history or constitution of England. Dr. Towers, in his Observations on Hume's History, says, that 'fidelity, accuracy, and impartiality, are requisite in a historian: and that in these Mr. Hume is greatly deficient.' Dr. Gilbert Stuart also points out, in his View of Society in Europe, many gross and wilful errors in the Historian; and at p. 327, he fully demonstrates how unfit Mr. Hume was for the task which he undertook. Mr. Hume (he says) struck with the talents of Dr. Brady, deceived by his ability, disposed to pay adulation to government, or willing to profit by a system, formed with art and ready for adoption, has executed his history upon the tenets of this writer. Yet of Dr. Brady it ought to be remembered that he was the slave of a faction, and that he meanly prostituted an excellent understanding to vindicate Tyranny, and to destroy the rights of his nation. With no less pertinacity, but with an air of greater candor, Mr. Hume has applied himself to the same purposes; and his history from its beginning to its conclusion, is chiefly to be regarded as a plausible defence of prerogative. No friend to humanity, and to the freedom of this kingdom, will consider his constitutional enquiries, with their effect upon his narrative, and compare them with the antient and venerable monuments of our story, without feeling a lively surprise and a patriot indignation. Mr. Fox also, in his late celebrated work, speaks of the continual display, in Hume's history 'of his partiality to kings and princes as intolerable. Nay, (he adds) it is, in my opinion, quite ridiculous; and is more like the foolish admiration which women and children sometimes have for kings, than the opinion, right or wrong, of a philosopher.' . . . The man who labored to traduce Scripture would not fail to falsify history. He who could be blind to the grandeur and glory of the Christian Dispensation could not easily discover the beauty and sublimity of the British constitution. And we need not be surprised to find the same man a renegade in religion, and a slave in politics.

The mischievous and dishonest uses, also, to which Hume perverts his History should not pass without observation. Mere historic falsehood had lost much of its interest in the breast of this writer, had it been made subservient to his favorite object, the subversion of moral and religious truth. The picture which has already been drawn of the historian in this light, is sketched with such justice and good taste by the masterly pencil of Mrs. H. Moore, that I cannot do better than present it to the reader's view as it has come from the hand of that admirable woman.

"There is a sedateness in his manner, which imposes; a sly gravity in his scepticism which puts the reader more off his guard, than the vehemence of censure or the levity of wit; for we are always less disposed to suspect a man who is too wise to appear angry. That same wisdom makes him too correct to invent calumnies, but it does not preserve him from doing what is scarcely less disingenuous. He implicitly adopts the injurious relations of those annalists who were most hostile to the reformed faith; though he must have known their accounts to be aggravated and discoloured, if not absolutely invented. He thus makes others responsible for the worst things he asserts, and spreads the mischief without avowing the malignity. When he speaks from himself, the sneer is so cold, the irony so sober, the contempt so discreet, the moderation so insidious, the difference between Popish bigotry and Protestant firmness, between the fury of the persecutor and the resolution of the martyr, so little marked; the distinctions between intolerant frenzy and heroic zeal so melted into each other; that though he contrives to make the reader feel some indignation at the tyrant, he never leaves him to feel any reverence for the sufferer. He ascribes such a slender superiority to one religious system above another, that the young reader, who does not come to the perusal with his principles formed, will be in danger of thinking that the reformation was really not worth contending for. But in nothing is the skill of this accomplished sophist more apparent, than in the artful way in which he piques his readers into a conformity with his own views concerning religion. Human pride, he knew, naturally likes to range itself on the side of ability. He therefore skillfully works on this passion, and by treating with a sort of contemptuous superiority, as weak credulous men, all whom he represents as being under the religious delusion. To the shameful practice of confounding fanaticism with real religion, he adds the disingenuous habit of accounting for the best actions of the best men, by referring them to some low motive, and affects to confound the designs of the religious and the corrupt, so artfully, as if no difference existed between them." Thus does this elegant writer describe the pernicious tendencies of Hume's History, which, as possessing at the same time many of the beauties of style, she happily characterises in a word, as a 'serpent under a bed of roses.' And thus we see that in no occupation of Mr. Hume, whether exercising himself as the light Essayist, the deep Philosopher or the grave Historian, does he ever lose sight of the one great warfare, in which he had enlisted himself against truth, virtue and religion.

I think, therefore, Mr. Editor, that you were in error in saying that Mr. Hume had an anxious desire, even comparatively, to present "the plain, simple truth of History."

A. F. F.

The Editor of the Banner has received the missing numbers of the Calendar. The last number of the Calendar speaks our mind exactly in the following words:—"We think when our friend, the Editor, sees the Calendar of the 11th, he will be inclined to regard "his ignorance as bliss"—As we are sure our readers would be of the same opinion, we cannot now consent to disturb their blissful ignorance by re-publishing the letters referred to. To this determination we are also brought by a sincere desire not to do an act of needless unkindness towards the writer of these letters.

We copy the following from "the Calendar," and we do so because it is right that our Clergy, as well as those Laymen who take upon them to act in their stead, should feel that such things cannot be done in a corner so remote, or in a Parish so secluded, that their sin will not be found out. We call it "sin" because it is a violation of Law. We are quite sure if such a fact did really occur, that, upon a due presentation of the case to the proper tribunal, it would be promptly dealt with. Every well informed Presbyterian Minister must know that our Clergy are governed in these matters not by their own will merely, but by the 'Laws of the Church.' And the estimation we have of them leads us to think that few among their Clergy would be found to take advantage of such an opportunity as the following:

DESECRATION.

The "New York Observer" contains the following paragraphs apparently from the pen of a Presbyterian minister, and dated, "Beverly, N. J., Aug. 7, 1849."

"There being no Presbyterian place of worship near, I went in the morning to a Methodist Church. The Pastor complained of bodily indisposition, and begged that I would preach for him. I willingly complied with his request. This was natural. I only repaid in part what I had received more than once from the clergy of that excellent branch of the Church Catholic. In the afternoon I went to the Episcopal Church. I had not been long seated, when a gentleman approached me with a request that I would officiate for them. After learning that their Pastor was confined at home by sickness; and after being assured that he would approve of the course pursued by those inviting me, and regard my compliance as an act of Christian courtesy, I consented.

"I declined both the robe and the liturgy, not because I regarded them as in themselves wrong, but because neither would fit me. I endeavored by the grace of God to promote the Christian edification of the people by reading a portion of the sacred Scriptures, offering prayer suited to their condition, and preaching a plain gospel sermon. The people gathered around me after the service, and expressed many thanks.

"This is the first time during a ministry of twenty-three years that I was ever invited to preach in an Episcopal pulpit, though I have often given my own pulpit to Clergymen of that denomination."

The italics are ours.

Of the Presbyterian minister we make no complaint. We doubt not he is a good man, who supposed he was doing his duty. But of the "parish of B—," whatever it is, we simply say that if there is discipline in the Church, we hope they will be made to feel it. They have violated the Canons of the Church, and that is the least of it. If ordination means anything; if consecrated Churches mean anything; if our Church has any warrant for her existence—then they have been guilty of little less than a sacrilege, in our conscientious judgment.

The persons inviting the Presbyterian minister to officiate, were either correct in representing their rector as one who would "approve of their course," or they were not. If they were not, they sadly slandered their sick pastor; if they were, the whole blame of this scandal rests entirely upon the clergyman.

WESTERN NEW YORK.—We are indebted to "The Churchman," for the following extract from a letter, giving an account of the late Convention of this diocese:

"August 17th, 1849.

"I have just returned from our Convention at Geneva, as well as the Commencement of Geneva College; both one and the other were of a very gratifying character.

"The college is destined to live and flourish, and be a blessing to the church and country. The exercises were of a very high order, thoroughly church, without mawkishness and sickly sentimentalism, but manly, open, fearless and decided.

"The convention was harmonious to an unusual degree, even for us. The — party is so small that it is not to be named. All the elections were so near unanimous, that it would be within the bounds of truth to say so, because only four votes were for an opposing ticket, or rather persons, for ticket there was not.

"The charge of the Bishop, of one hour and three quarters' length, was upon the subject of "Religious Training," in opposition to hot-bed excitements, and forced, unnatural, and unscriptural commotions—all exceedingly well, and eminently calculated for the promotion of truth.

"A more prosperous, harmonious, and hopeful diocese does not show itself in our confederation.

"Hoping and trusting that yours may, before long, put on her wonted garments of praise, is the hearty wish of your old friend,

ANTI-JAIL AND PENITENTIARY PUNISHMENT.—The opponents of capital punishment are beginning to avow their hostility to punishment in any form. At a recent anti-capital punishment meeting in Boston, one of the speakers remarked: "For thirty years the subject of the reformation of crime has had many half-way measures proposed, and with but little success. But it appears that the time has fully arrived when this assembly should proclaim the doctrine of total abstinence from punishment by pains and penalties. They have been long tried, and have been found to be useless. High ground must be taken against imprisonment or coercion of any description."

CASE OF GORHAM v. THE BISHOP OF EXETER.

THE ENGLISH CHURCHMAN prints in extenso the decision in this case, and comments upon it as follows:

"In expressing our satisfaction and thankfulness at the recent decision of the ECCLESIASTICAL COURT, in the case of Mr. GORHAM's heresy on the subject of Holy Baptism, it may be well, although it can scarcely be necessary, for us to explain that our satisfaction does not arise from our having previously felt any doubt whatever as to what the Church of England holds and teaches on this important doctrine—for, as a branch of the Holy Catholic Church she could not consistently give just cause for doubt as to her teaching upon any portion of Catholic Truth—but we do feel most sincerely thankful that our Church has been mercifully preserved from the scandal which would have been caused had the Judge of our chief Ecclesiastical Court decided that her Ministers had the option of holding directly opposite, and utterly inconsistent doctrines on the nature and efficacy of one of the Holy Sacraments. May He who has thus preserved us from this scandal graciously continue His Protection, and allow this righteous Judgment to stand.

"It will be observed that—with the exception of a brief glance at the alleged Calvinism of the Reformers, which was almost necessary as a matter of courtesy, although not of justice, to those who laid so much stress upon this point—Sir HERBERT JENNER FUST very properly confined himself strictly to the Book of Common Prayer. This was the Book to which both parties in the case were pledged: and it was the meaning of the language of that Book which was at issue in the matter; consequently, justice, reason, and common sense, alike required that the Judge should confine his attention and inquiries to that single volume, unless its language were so hopelessly obscure and ambiguous as positively to require extraneous illustration and explanation. As might have been expected, Sir HERBERT FUST deliberately declares that its language is so plain, so intelligible, and so consistent, that there is no room whatever for doubt—no necessity to search elsewhere for illustration or confirmation; its meaning and intention are plain and obvious, on the surface; and however deep we may go, there is nothing to alter, modify or contradict our first impressions.

"We earnestly hope and trust that the Judicial Committee of Privy Council will follow Sir HERBERT's example, and confine themselves within the same just limits; and that they may be induced to do so, we would humbly venture strongly to urge upon the Counsel for the bishop the propriety of entering upon the case, armed simply with the Book of Common Prayer, and Mr. GORHAM's published report of his examination. There would be a dignity, simplicity, and brevity, in this course, which could not but contrast most favourably with the elaborate arguments, and extraneous matter, which must necessarily be had recourse to in order to make out any case for Mr. GORHAM's heretical sophistries and private fancies. If Acts of Parliament are to be construed by what is contained "within their four corners," surely we may claim the same strict interpretation for the Book of Common Prayer, deliberately revised and set forth by the Church in Convocation, and as deliberately sanctioned by the Sovereign and the Parliament. If we recollect right, Lord BROUGHAM (and we believe other high legal authorities have acknowledged the justice of the rule) has distinctly laid it down, that the opinions and intentions of those who frame, bring forward, or pass Acts of Parliament, have no claim upon our attention in interpreting those Acts—that we are to look at what they say, and at what their language obviously means, not at what they were intended to say or mean. Now, as Sir HERBERT FUST said, the Reformers may have been Calvinists, and they may have intended to introduce their Calvinism into the Articles and Formularies of the Church; but, as a fact, he says, and says truly, they have assuredly not done so. Consequently, Mr. Goode may write five hundred more "masterly and learned works" to prove that the Reformers were Calvinists, and therefore could not mean that any others than the elect are regenerated, and yet be no nearer his object—he will be no nearer proving that we must hold plain anti-Calvinistic formularies in a forced Calvinistic non-natural sense. Whether the Reformers were Calvinists or Bhuddists, is nothing to the purpose. Moreover, even if we were obliged to regard the private opinions of those from whom we received our Formularies, we must have recourse—not to the opinions of "the Reformers," but of those who revised and set forth our existing Book of Common Prayer, which dates from 1662. It is all very well, and consistent, for a sect such as the Wesleyans, for instance, to bind themselves down perpetually to hold and to teach as JOHN WESLEY held and taught, but, the Church binds herself to no man, or set of men: her doctrine is not of men."

SUMMARY OF EUROPEAN NEWS.

The arrival of the Canada brings us a week's later news. The following summary is from the ENGLISH CHURCHMAN of August 9th.

LOUIS NAPOLEON has returned from his Provincial tour, which has not answered so well as he expected. The fact is, the French are not satisfied with the doings of his Ministers. The press is not free; the capital is in a state of siege; the finances are in a desperate state; and France is in league with Austria. Affairs were not in a worse state in the time of Louis PHILIPPE. It is a remarkable fact, that no French Monarch has prospered, who has been on good terms with Austria. Louis XVI., who married an Austrian, was beheaded; NAPOLEON, who married an Austrian, was dethroned; CHARLES X. and Louis PHILIPPE, who joined Austria and the re-actionary party, were both dethroned. Let Louis NAPOLEON take care that he is not sent on his travels. M. PASSY, the Minister of Finance, estimates the deficiency on the first of next January at the enormous sum of 22,000,000 sterling, resulting from a repeal of taxes and the extraordinary expenditure since February 24th, 1848. He demands a loan of 200,000,000 of francs.

The POPE has not returned to Rome, and shows no desire to do so. He suspects the French diplomatists, who have begun to quarrel among themselves, in consequence of which M. d'HARCOURT has returned to Paris, while M. DE COURCELLES and M. DE RAYNEVAL remain in Italy. General OUDINOT no doubt considers himself to be a clever man for getting the French into Rome; but it will require a much more clever man to get them out of Rome again.

GARIBALDI has defeated an Austrian detachment at Montecchi, and proceeded in the direction of Rimini. His destination is supposed to be either Venice, which still holds out, or Fiume, where he hopes to join the Hungarians.

The GRAND DUKE entered Florence on the 27th ult. He was received with acclamations.

Peace between Austria and Sardinia has not yet been signed. CHARLES ALBERT died at Oporto on the 28th ult.

The Swiss, distrusting the French and Prussians, have raised a force of 200,000 men to watch the frontiers. General DUBOUR has been appointed to the command.

The Government of Schleswig Holstein has acceded, with a bad grace, to the terms of the armistice concluded between Prussia and Denmark. It is said that the Blockade will be raised on the 10th instant.

The Prussians have occupied Frankfurt on the Maine with troops, a measure which is giving great umbrage to the Austrians. Bavaria and Wurtemberg lean to Austria, while the rest of the German States seem inclined to join the Prussians. Germany, in all probability, will be divided into two large Empires, the Austrian and Prussian.

GEORGEY entered Kaschan on the 22nd ult., after defeating General SASS. GEORGEY then united his forces with those of DEMBINSKI. PASKIEWICH has been defeated at Gijongijos and forced to retire. Temesvar has surrendered to the Hungarians, who have also entered Semlin, which gives them the command of the Danube from Esseg to Orsova, and facilitates their communications with Turkey. The cholera has been very fatal among the Russians and Austrians. The Russians have been defeated by General BEM at Fogarash. The Russian General FREITAG having attempted to enter Transylvania, has been driven back into Moldavia by the Hungarians. The Turks are watching the contest with intense anxiety.

A "Postscript" gives the following additional items—

The French Government has received a telegraphic despatch announcing that the Sardinian Plenipotentiaries at Milan have received instructions from Turin to sign the treaty of peace with Austria, the Austrian Government having agreed to grant the required amnesty to the Lombards, with a few exceptions.

Letters from Rome, of the 30th ult., state that the Government Committee would be formed of the three Cardinals, Vannicelli, Altieri, and Della Genga. The ministry was not yet constituted.

Prince Odescalchi was to leave for Gaeta, with a deputation, to invite the Pope to return to Rome.

We are gratified to learn that a new parish has just been organized in the flourishing village of RISING SUN, situated at the junction of the Old York and Germantown roads; a neighbourhood which is so rapidly improving that it will very soon be included within the north-western limits of Philadelphia. The nearest Protestant places of worship at present are two and a half miles distant; viz. St. Luke's, Germantown, on the north; St. Mark's, Frankford, on the east; St. James the Less, on the west; and the city, on the south. What renders this new enterprise the more interesting is, that it has been commenced by gentlemen not of our Communion, but who prefer the Church, and desire to see its Ministry, Discipline, Doctrines, and Worship established in their neighbourhood, for the benefit of themselves and families. We understand that a similar preference is entertained by a large majority of the population. A valuable lot has been liberally presented by a generous individual for the erection of a church edifice; another will gratuitously furnish and deliver all the stone; $1000 in money have also been subscribed, and the Vestry have determined to commence building as soon as the whole of the necessary sum is obtained.

Our esteemed friend and brother, the Rev. Thomas J. Davis, has been elected Rector of this new parish. For several months past he has been actively labouring there, the congregation temporarily worshipping in a school-house; and the facts above stated are gratifying evidence of the acceptableness and success of his services.

THE BISHOP ELECT OF INDIANA.

At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Church in the Diocese of Indiana, held at Indianapolis, August 21st, 1849, the following Resolution was adopted, and the Secretary was directed to send a copy of the same for publication to "the Episcopal Recorder" and "the Banner of the Cross," with a request that it might be copied by other Church papers.

"Resolved, That the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Indiana deeply regret that, in consequence of a Newspaper statement, some misapprehension has arisen respecting the position and plans of the Bishop elect of this Diocese; and they therefore feel it to be their duty to announce to the Church, and especially to the Right Rev. the Bishops, and to the Standing Committees of the several Dioceses, that immediately upon his consecration the Bishop elect of Indiana will cease to be the Rector of his present Parish, and that he purposes, as soon as suitable arrangements can be made, to take up his residence in Indiana. A true copy.

Lieutenant Maury, superintendent of the National Observatory at Washington, says in a late address:—"It may be that there is now at this very time, in the firmament above, a world on fire. Argus, a well-known star of the second or third magnitude, now glares with the brilliancy of a first."

HOLY SENSIBILITY.—NO. I.

THE RULE.

MR. EDITOR—You and our readers will agree with me that no topic pertaining to life and godliness should be approached with greater caution than the FEELINGS connected with a sense of religion. We may say of them as we occasionally do of philosophical attempts,—they are to be decried, yet they are to be commended: when philosophy would stray from the wisdom of God, we repel it, waiting for its true action; when it becomes the handmaid of revelation, we give it welcome. So of the feelings mentioned. When the enthusiast bears away truth and order on the pinions of excitement, we admonish him of the peril of a trackless course, where the landmarks of prudence and discipline are left far below. But when calm piety would inspect its tender emotions, seeking a right and sound view of the mysterious natural currents within, and of the more highly mysterious currents set in motion by the Sanctifier—then, we hail the anxious thoughtfulness as a working of the spiritual mind. The religion that cometh "from above is pure, peaceable, gentle;" like the flame seen by Moses at the bush, it is heavenly light and warmth to the soul it dwells in, but never grossly vehement; the fire that consumes is of the earth.

On the subject before us, David and the Psalms are the great standard provided for us by Him who knoweth our frame: from them chiefly, we gather and arrange the particulars and the laws of the sacred emotions named in the gospel. And their broad division (a brief essay can offer little more) is into the comfort of true godliness, sound moral regeneration, and the pain of sin. Largely do the Psalms dwell on both; and David records the combined doctrine of the two, when he entreats, "restore to me the joy of thy salvation," intimating the mournful loss, the blissful recovery; and again, "make me to hear joy and gladness, that the bones which Thou hast broken may rejoice," disclosing the torture of iniquity, and the soothing and hallowed felicity of pardon. The royal melodist had been eminently favoured with the light and countenance of the Spirit within; but, in an evil moment, sinful passion got the mastery, leading to yet fouler wickedness; and when Nathan, with a commission of terror, told him "thou art the man," his peace vanished, his hope was darkened, consolation forsook him, and the heart of the sweet singer was whelmed with melancholy. The heinous crimes made him fear that he had fallen beyond recovery; and he passionately entreats not to be cast away from the divine Presence, and that the Holy Spirit be not taken from him. In another effusion, the misery of guilt, "kept silent," unacknowledged to God, is described as the "bones waxing old," "roaring all the day long," "moisture turned into drought," "God's hand heavy upon" the soul; while penitence brought the sense of "forgiveness," God as the "hiding place," and being by Him "compassed about with songs of deliverance." Elsewhere we have, "return unto thy rest, O my soul." Vastly might the proofs be multiplied, that feelings are embodied in religion, and that they vary with our practical deadness or life, with our disobedience or obedience, with our rise or fall in the scale of morals and of holy, heart-governing faith.

Such then is the GENERAL RULE,—at present I speak not of exceptions. Emotions, more or less powerful, more or less calm, attend our religious thoughts and self-scrutiny, and our religious progress,—as they link themselves with every reflection and every proceeding in which we have a deep concern. We question the attachment of a man to the world, if he move and go through it with apathy; and why may not apathy render dubious our affection for the things above? If any one avow repentance for acknowledged sin, yet, while he reforms outwardly, feel no misgiving, he must judge himself defective in that holy grace. Repentance consists of sorrow for sin, of shame for its domination, of alarm at its danger, of hatred of its every stain, besides amendment. Feelings and conduct unite; and when we would encourage the practically good man who appears to be without the due emotions, it is on the principle, either that sensibility is acting in latency, or that his condition is anomalous. Without amendment, sorrow and shame, and alarm and hatred of evil are not contrition. And without the divine conviction and disturbance of spirit, the sinner may fear that his reformation is more worldly than heavenly; the passions may have cooled, or public opinion demands a better character, or gross enormity has been commuted for wickedness less visible or less revolting. When piety is the motive of improved behaviour, the feelings of repentance may be expected, interwoven with its practice.

Let these truths be maintained with well guarded wisdom; but let them not be surrendered, lest the enthusiast reproach our timidity with the letter of Scripture, and give an advantage to his error which our more vigorous judgment might retain for the accurate doctrine. Do we admire the penitent apostle when bathed in tears for thrice denying his Lord? and ought we to regard superciliously the penitent of lower spiritual rank (simulation being improbable) who fears that himself may, by obstinate indifference or obstinate vice, have rejected the Blood of the agony and the cross! Do we behold the contrite woman at the feet of Christ, weeping out her soul, and our Lord Himself commending her grief? and, when we look off the heavenly book into the world, shall we, for the overflow of other broken spirits, turn the Saviour's approval and acceptance into suspicion! Do we mark the Ethiopian proselyte,—who, when Philip preached unto him, Jesus, and ratified in baptism his devotion to the Son of God, "went on his way rejoicing?" and shall we frown on the humble yet hopeful exultation of any soul acquiring more of the 'wisdom unto salvation,' or conscious of the improvement within and the purer conduct which attest the growth in grace, the advancing conformity to the image of Christ! In short: Where find we, in the holy volume, a delineation of penitence from which sadness is excluded, or a description of godliness and justification unapprehensive of the joy of pardon?

The objection, or prohibitory argument, drawn from the abuse of religious feelings, need not be largely examined. The ample reference to them in the Bible entitles them to our deep consideration. And the frank objection to their study and nurture involves, more really and more respectably than anything else, the motive of the objector,—he means honestly,—he has witnessed enough of the mischief of the various kinds of religious riot and emeute, perhaps likewise of the small affairs which would vie with them if they durst,—he sees, or imagines he sees, an intensely vehement practical inexpedience in dwelling or even touching upon the operations of Holy Sensibility. Here couches the argument that invests his motive, which we unservedly allow to be pure and irreproachable: yet the meaning of the argument is, however latent and unperceived, that the Bible, in this matter, wants rectifying. This alone is but too unfortunate. Yet he must further recollect, that, as the support of motive by argument indicates an inconvenient burden of proof lying on the motive; so the support of argument by motive may betray the palpable inconvenience of the burden of proof lying on his argument.

While therefore we disclaim the violence of fanaticism, and debar its false triumph in viewing the opposite mistake of a frigid slighting of the truth, and defend only the unartificial movings of the soul recognised in the word of God, we make our stand on these, and consider the general rule as demonstrated,—personal religion, the new birth within, is not only manifested in the life, in effective good principles, but is perceived likewise within the heart by corresponding religious feelings.

Some of these emotions we may briefly note. Those belonging to repentance are, as already intimated, shame and sorrow and alarm for what is past,—with hatred of evil, whether in thought, in desire, or in act, including the abhorrence of temptation, whether it be outward allurements or depravity within: nay, in the more bitter acts of self-condemnation, we "abhor ourselves," for unworthiness, for "vileness," for ingratitude to God. When however renewing and reforming faith predominates, the reliance on pardon through Christ, these agitations are calmed, and the emotion is that of peace, which, in tempers not cold, swells into actual rejoicing. In every disposition, however, stable piety is "joy," compared with the sadness of penitential conviction,—is "peace," compared with the harassing inquietude of a careless or wicked life.

Besides peace and joy, "hope" is enumerated by the apostle. Hope is the expectation of happiness, surmounting the expectation of evil, and producing tranquillity. When the conscience, from its very depth, declares a thorough repentance and amendment, yet without arrogating aught whatever of merit, ascribing that to the worth and the cross of the Redeemer exclusively,—then, hope, the "hope that maketh not ashamed," is the appropriate and the secure, (though never infallible) consolation of the sanctified heart. And so, upon realizing the due practical requirements, are the higher gifts of holy confidence, and the assuring testimony of the Witness Within of the maturing moral divine sonship.

Often, indeed, may the heart veil itself anew and return to its former sorrows: but this is exactly as it should be; for we are to be penitents until we leave this world,—our recurring sins and infirmities of soul requiring new bitterness and constantly new reformation. But, unless we have again sinned deeply, when this revived mourning hath done its purifying work, the current of happy emotion will swell anew, and swell higher than before. Hence, although feelings adhere to religion, their pain or pleasure cannot be relied on as indicating, at any given moment, the exact degree of piety we have attained. The godly may retreat, from their hallowed enjoyment, to contrition, its grief, its pain, yet be more precious with God,—brighter jewels, though veiling themselves in dust. Solikewise may the incautious believer love the sacred happiness too much,—refusing to lament when the Spirit warns him that his soul would swerve from duty. But if he examine within, he will find that his joy is losing its peace. We estimate not, therefore, the advance or the decay of piety by the mere rise or ebb of emotion. We look to our conduct, towards God and towards men, as the final test. And, if all be well there, we accept gladly and use faithfully our joy and peace and hope, and the higher "pleasantness," as encouragements and noble incitements to greater effort and earnestness in our sanctified progress.

Further: No heart is an exact standard for another. In ordinary emotions, "no man knoweth either love or hatred by all that is before them," there is all variety both of natural and habitual temper. One person cannot look upon distress but the tear of pity immediately flows; another leaves a generous pittance, and without ostentation, and yet no eye or sagacity can detect aught of sympathy. One person is vehemently moved by an insult, and perhaps readily calmed; another will retain placidness under whatever provocation, yet may pursue the offender with unappeasable retaliation. So with the sons of God in their holy feelings. There may be a natural bluntness of sensibility, or a discipline of it, divesting pious emotion, perhaps completely, of outward features,—while yet, it does exist, a deep and powerful sentiment, in some degrees, (however obscurely) perceptible to the individual himself, and broadly manifested in the principles and the conduct. Neither great obtuseness of feeling, nor the entire suppression of it outwardly, is common: but they may occur in less degrees; and this will so vary the hallowed affection, that no individual mind can be a standard for any other.

Once more: There are obedient children of the Spirit who have become such from the very opening of their faculties, so early willing to be led by Him that they know little of the unresisted dominion of sin: they never sank into vice or utter neglect. Of course, their repentance will be an easier labour, and their emotions of gentler impress. The ease of being truly pious from actual infancy, without stimulated precocity, is rare. But as piety often approaches this early date, we expect the feelings to vary in some proportion to the degree in which worldly and sinful affections have once had the ascendant.

Though feelings are a veritable part of religion, they are altogether inferior to conduct as a test. "Blindness of heart" may lull for a season, yea, for too long a season, the pain of sin. David, for no short period, surrendered virtuous grief, for insensibility,—perceiving not the terrors of guilt,—his heart at ease, though in false quiet; and if stillness were the index of his relation to God, he then was not a sinner! When however he became sorrowful, his heart broken, his spirit utterly overthrown, then he began again to be religious; the anguish indicated his recovery of pardon, as false security had marked his loss of it. And such, alas for our instability at the best!—such is generally the more certain condition. Sorrow is, with many, a surer piety than exultation; he who thinketh he standeth must perpetually take heed lest he fall; and the heavenly begotten soul which is never careless of that danger will hold, with unrelaxed firmness, on the support of grace. But we are straying to the exceptions to the Rule of Holy Sensibility,—the subject to be considered in the remaining division of this article.

Difficult it is, when we have cleared our way to a truth, to assign that truth its exact place and just bearing. There are emotions in religion; it is a pleasure to argue the fact,—exquisitely gratifying to be experimentally conscious of it: and hence we often give it disproportionate importance. But, one office of religion is to strengthen and guard our minds against extremes. If we have peace and joy, and our life refutes not our hearts, all thanks be to Him who gives light and animation in our pilgrimage. If we are in spiritual dejection, and if misdeeds make no part of the burden,—to Him still be thanks, for carrying us into the innermost purification of the Refiner's flame, where, while we correct infirmity after infirmity, ever endures the unextinguished affiance of self-forgetting love,—the "gladness" too profound to be spoken, too deep in the heart for any search but that of the Spirit Himself with our spirit,—the affiance which FEELS "though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him."

Pottsville, August 5th, 1849.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

Please allow me to acknowledge through the Banner the reception of "a Widow's Mite." It is encouraging, at this time when the world is gaining so rapidly upon the Church, and the means to "lengthen the chords and strengthen the stakes" of our beloved Zion are so reluctantly given, to meet with instances like the above of true primitive charity. A voluntary gift from a widow, bestowed for the love of the Church, cannot fail to remind us of her who cast into the Lord's Sanctuary all the living she had, and received from the Saviour the high encomium of having "cast in more than all." The widow's mite is in very deed a rich gift to receive, for it always brings with it love, and faith, and prayer, and a spirit of self-sacrifice which alone can call down the Divine blessing upon us. And hence, however small the amount in money, the real value in a spiritual sense is great. May many "go and do likewise," until our churches shall cease to languish for adequate support; and the fields, white for the harvest, shall be furnished with faithful reapers.

Obituary.

For the Banner of the Cross.

DIED, at his residence, near Newark, Del., on Friday, the 17th instant, THOMAS BLANDY, in the 61st year of his age.

At a special meeting of the vestry of St. Thomas Church, held at the Church on Saturday afternoon, the 18th August, 1849. Present—the Rector, Benj. Caulk, Thomas B. Wilson, James S. Martin, George B. Curtis, and Edward Garrigues.

The following resolutions, having been read by the Secretary, were unanimously adopted—

Resolved, That this vestry has heard with sorrow, the death of their late Senior Warden, Thomas Blandy, Esq. That we cherish with satisfaction, the recollection of his virtues, his stern integrity, his upright example, and his pious devotion, to the cause of Christ, especially as manifested in his zeal for the welfare of their Parish, of which he was a principal founder and supporter.

That while we sorrow at our loss and sympathise with those whom family ties render especially sensible of the greatness of the bereavement, we are cheered by the hope, that our departed friend has exchanged the sufferings of the present life, for the more immediate presence of the Saviour.

Resolved, That the Chancel of this Church be put in mourning for the space of Three Months.

Resolved, That the Secretary send a copy of the foregoing to the widow of our lamented friend.

Resolved, That the foregoing resolutions be inserted in the "Banner of the Cross" and "Episcopal Recorder." On motion adjourned.

EDWARD GARRIGUES, Secretary.

BURIAL PLACES AMONG BARBAROUS NATIONS.

Sumatran Funeral.—Peculiar arrangement of the grave.—The funeral of a Sumatran villager is not unattended with solemnity. In many villages it is the custom to preserve, generation after generation, a broad slab of costly wood, called the burial plank, on which the dead are carried forth to their graves. It is deposited in a safe receptacle, and constantly rubbed over with lime, to keep it pure and preserve it from decay. No coffin is made use of, the corpse being wrapped in white cloth of a peculiar texture. In forming the grave, after digging to a convenient depth, they make an excavation in the side, which, after receiving the body, is roofed and walled with stout planks. Thus the object is gained which is considered so important by many of the Indian islanders—the earth lies lightly upon the corpse. A white flower, planted at the head of the grave, is allowed to flourish for one year, when it dies and is never renewed. When its last blossom has withered, the tribe assembles, the relations place a few long elliptical stones about the spot, killing a buffalo in honour of the deceased, and leaving its head as a suitable propitiation to the attendant spirits, which are supposed to hover about the burial grounds, to perform for the remains of the dead the guardianship which other beings held over them during life. The desecration of these abodes of death is regarded as a crime almost inexpiable. It is looked upon not only as an act of irreverence to the departed, but as a heinous offence to the presiding deities.

Burial Forest.—Funeral Ceremonies.—The appearances presented by a burial forest among the people of Pari in the Kayan territory of Borneo is extraordinary to the last degree. Huge and rudely constructed coffins hang around the branches of the trees, in every direction. Only visited for the purpose of adding to the number of the decaying tenants of these strange depositories of death, the burial forest is as silent as it is curious in appearance. And no less remarkable are the ceremonies which precede the disposal of the body amid the branches of the selected tree; as soon as the Kayan dies his friends and relatives assemble in his house and take their seats around the room. The dead man is then brought in, clothed in his best attire, with a cigar placed in his mouth and a betel-box at his side. The friends then, in turns, offer him certain advice regarding his future welfare; and, having partaken of a feast, go away, when the body is placed in a coffin of large dimensions, and allowed to lie in the house for several months. Another assemblage then takes place; the coffin is borne forth, followed by a long procession, and carried to the appointed spot in the wood, where it is hoisted up amid the topmost branches of some lofty tree, and secured to prevent it from falling, and then left for ever. During the passage from the village to the burial forest the deceased is constantly cautioned not to lose his way. "Follow the road," he is told, "till it branches in three directions; be careful in selecting the centre path, for this will conduct you to your own country, whilst that to the right leads to Borneo, and that to the left to the sea."

Picturesque Burial Grounds.—The burial grounds which at intervals dot the banks of the Mambakut river are exceedingly picturesque and beautiful. They can scarcely be designated as burial grounds, for the tombs generally lie in detached groups, here and there, on elevated spots selected for the beauty of their verdure, and the luxuriance of the flowers which bloom around. Erected on posts ten or twelve feet high, they are clothed with blossomed creepers, surrounded with flowers, and ornamented with curiously painted strips of bark. They form the chief ornaments of the villagers, and are regarded with the utmost respect and veneration. The tombs of great chiefs are even more elaborately ornamented, and are situated on the summits of high hillocks, decorated with gay streamers, with one or two grim skulls, denoting the rank and honour of the deceased.

Ancient Chinese Burial Grounds.—There exist, scattered at wide intervals over the eastern provinces of Borneo, numerous ancient Chinese burial grounds; a fact which Mr. Dalton cites to prove that the country was formerly occupied by a colony from the Celestial Empire. These abodes of the dead appear to have been neatly arranged, though time has nearly obliterated all vestiges of their former beauty. The jungle, with its rank and rich growth of vegetation, is supreme in the wild districts, and these burial grounds, once abandoned by their original possessors, soon yield themselves to its power, and are now only to be discovered by searching around the thickets, where you may at every step meet a tomb, wrapped in a mass of creeping plants. On the summits of several of the mountains, once inhabited by Dyak tribes, who have deserted their former homes and selected more secluded residences in the woods, may be found the ruins of small villages, which, built of light and fragile materials, soon crumble into decay and sink upon the ground. But the narrow houses of the dead, less exposed to the violence of the elements, last long; and when a new tribe comes to take possession of the deserted site, the low mounds, ornamented with arms and implements of husbandry, are often discovered and levelled. Every trace of the burial ground is thus obliterated, and a village, peopled with an industrious and busy tribe, rises upon the spot beneath which the earth is crowded with the mouldering remains of the dead.

The Dyaks often change the site of their abodes, and journey from place to place in the forest or jungle, to allow the soil to lie fallow, and seek a richer for their crops. The villages are generally destroyed, and all that is left is the lonely little burial ground, which in the wood, as on the mountain, is soon concealed with vegetation. The jungle thickens over it, and it is seldom or never disturbed again, save when the rhinoceros turns up the ground with his armed snout, or the lapse of years brings another tribe to settle on the spot.

Wild Tribes of the Koti.—Disposal of the Dead.—On the wild banks of the Koti, on the eastern coast of Borneo, there exist tribes of men so savage, so utterly ignorant of all the arts and charities of civilization that they know neither how to erect for themselves villages, nor to manufacture clothing even of the simplest kind, nor indeed to elevate themselves above the condition of the beast. When any one of them dies his body is burned, and the ashes are deposited in the trunk of a tree hollowed by decay. Other tribes inhabiting the banks of this river bury their dead and allow them to remain under the ground until all but the bones is mouldered away. These are then taken up and placed in a hollow piece of timber, which is deposited in a particular building called by them the Chamber of Bones.

Having thus rambled over a few of the Bornean provinces and marked the most curious of the ceremonies which attend the disposal of the dead among the native races, we naturally step over to Celebes, and find the mode of burial practised there by no means less worthy of attention. Little, however, is known of the island. It has seldom been visited, and still less frequently described; we are enabled, therefore, to select but one or two among the various customs which, without doubt, prevail in an island peopled by so strange a race, divided into so many communities.

Funeral Rites in Celebes.—Cemeteries.—At Tesora, in the Boni territory, it is customary when a person dies to interdict the family and followers of the deceased from partaking of any amusement for the space of one hundred days. They are also enjoined to wear plain clothes; but their abstinence from hilarity and rejoicing is not shared by the other members of the tribe. The poor especially are feasted, in proportion to the means of the deceased, with buffalo and goat's flesh, fowls and sweetmeats. The expense of this entertainment is sometimes lightened by contributions from the friends. Mr. Brooke, during his visit to this place, gained more friendship among the natives by a small present made by him on the occasion of a funeral than he would have acquired by almost any other means. The dead are carried forth to a species of cemetery at some distance from the town, where they are buried. A thatched tomb is erected on the spot, which is enclosed by the foliage of two trees, one planted on either side. Otherwise, few ceremonies mark the event.

Minkoka Funerals.—Among the Minkokas of Celebes few ceremonies attend a funeral, save that a band of fighting men, the friends of the deceased, sally forth with strips of white cloth bound about their foreheads, in search of heads to solemnise the occasion. From twenty to forty are procured, and the body is not allowed to be buried until the required number has been brought in. The graves are situated in picturesque spots, shadowed over by trees, and distinguished by the richness and variety of the vegetation which flourishes around.

Funeral Salutes.—On the western coast of Celebes an immense quantity of gunpowder is expended on the occasion of the death of a petty rajah. For the space of one month after the day of his death as many guns are fired as he was years old; and when the great rajah dies this daily ceremony is expected for a whole year. This is good for the gunpowder trade, but for little else except to make the people idle and boisterous, for this infinite shooting of guns, if we may be allowed to use Pepys's quaint words, attracts a crowd which continually disperses and is as continually renewed.

Aspect of the Burial Ground.—If the scene of his life continues to be startled by the echoes of artillery, however, the repose of the chieftain after death is silent and undisturbed. His ashes generally lie in some sequestered spot, at the bottom of a deep green valley, or on the slope of a woody hill. A few delicate and fragrant flowers bloom near at hand, and the shade of graceful trees is thrown over the spot consecrated to the repose of the dead. An occasional visitant hovers about the burial ground, but this is seldom.

If eternal life consists in the knowledge and love of God and of His Son JESUS CHRIST (see St. John xviii. 3), then none are happy in this world but those who make it their business to know and love God. All other knowledge is but vanity and vexation of spirit, when it is not ultimately referred to that knowledge in which our whole felicity ought to be placed. They are much to be pitied, who know almost everything except the Gospel, who make many discoveries in arts and sciences, but are utterly unacquainted with themselves, and the science of salvation.—Quesnel.

CLOWNISHNESS.—We observe that the Freeman's Journal, under this head, has been lecturing to one of the secular papers. It seems that the Journal recently applied to Bishop Hughes the title of "His Lordship," to which the Tribune objected, under the heading of "Fulsome Adulation." The Journal ranks such as object to this title, among "progressive and Protestant Democrats," thinks that the simple name of "Bishop sounds certainly less respectful and polite," and communicates the following information as to what is expected from the Roman Catholic "faithful," if they be not clowns:—

"The Bishops of the Catholic Church, we would then have the Tribune to know, are the masters and 'Lords' of all the faithful in Christ. In token hereof, the Catholic, if he be not a clown, takes the blessing of a Bishop, by bending his knee and kissing the Episcopal ring on his hand. The Bishop of a Diocese is set over it by a higher authority, and not commissioned by a democratic election. The faithful have no more to do with the appointment of their Bishop than they have with the falling of the showers of heaven."—Protestant Churchman.

THE VILLAGE CHURCH.—Blessings on those old grey fabrics, that stand on many a hill, and in many a lowly hollow, all over this beloved country. I am of Sir Walter Scott's opinion, that no places are so congenial to the holy simplicity of Christian worship as they are. They have an air of antiquity about them,—a shaded sanctity, and stand so venerably amid the most English scenes, and the tombs of generations of the dead, that we cannot enter them without having our imaginations and our hearts powerfully impressed with every feeling and thought that can make us love our country, and yet feel that it is not our abiding-place.—Howitt's Rural Life in England.

THE RETREAT, A Boarding and Day School for Young Ladies,

Under the supervision of the Bishop of Pennsylvania, on School-house Lane, five miles from Philadelphia.
Miss M. A. SPAFARD, Principal, Mrs. E. SPAFARD, Vice Principal, M. FELIX DROUIN, late Professor University of France, Teacher of French and Latin, Mr. WM. H. FENNY, late of Worcester Cathedral, Professor of Music, with a number of Assistants.

Extract from the address of the Bishop of Pennsylvania, in the Convention of 1848.

"The female school, known as the Retreat, in School-house Lane, near Germantown, has been signally favored, not only by the smiles of Divine Providence, but also with the influence of the Divine Spirit. Considerably more than a third of all the resident or boarding pupils have within the last two months been confirmed, and have also become communicants, under circumstances which have inspired me with the most lively hopes in respect to their future character and influence as Christian women. The order and spirit prevailing throughout the school have been excellent: the discipline is quiet, effective, and eminently domestic: the position of the buildings and grounds is alike beautiful and healthy; and the patronage bestowed upon it most encouraging."

The year consists of two terms, of 14½ and 29 weeks, commencing April 10th and September 4th.

Extracts from Bishop Potter's Annual Addresses to the Convention of the Diocese.

To the Convention of 1848.—"It gives me great pleasure to inform the Convention that some important measures have been adopted during the last year, towards securing to our youth the advantages of superior classical instruction, in connection with proper religious training. The classical department of the Protestant Episcopal Academy, which was established in this city more than fifty years since, through the agency of Bishop White and others, has been re-opened under the auspices of the Rev. Dr. Hare, and will afford to parents in this vicinity the means of educating boys in the most approved manner. Its funds have enabled the Trustees to make liberal provision for the sons of Clergymen, and others, on whom the charges of instruction would fall heavily, and it is hoped that the Academy will prove rich in blessing to many families."

To the Convention of 1847.—"I had occasion in my last address to call the attention of the Diocese to the provisions, which had just been made, to secure to the sons of churchmen a superior classical training, in connection with proper religious culture. The Episcopal Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, had then just been opened. The anticipations entertained of its usefulness have been more than realized. Its numbers have increased beyond expectation, and its discipline and course of instruction are worthy of all praise. In its influence generally, and especially in its care of the manners, morals and religious principles of the young, it vindicates its claims to the confidence of all the members of our Church; and having occasion frequently myself to visit the school, I feel the greater assurance in recommending it to general favour."

To the Convention of 1848.—"The Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, has had a career, thus far, of great and uninterrupted prosperity; and it is exerting an influence on the principles and character of our children which will be felt for good long after our own earthly course has terminated. It now numbers nearly one hundred pupils."

To the Convention of 1849.—"The Episcopal Academy in this city has reached, under the wise and efficient administration of Dr. Hare, its maximum number of pupils, as situated at present; and its Trustees are about to erect a large edifice on Locust street near Broad, sufficient for the accommodation of from two to three hundred."

SCHUYLKILL CONVOCATION.

The 4th quarterly meeting of the Schuylkill Convocation will be held at St. James's Church, Perkiomen, on Monday afternoon, September 10th, 1849.

others' houses about their neighbours, we shall see that the time lost in uncharitable speeches, in idle gossip and scandal, is more than enough for the service in God's house. Or, if we watch the life especially of the women of lower rank, and take their afternoons, and out of their afternoons take the time they spend in running into a neighbour's house, and in sitting down to talk over others of their neighbours, we shall find that they also have plenty of time for church did they tie their tongues. Thus in this way also we see the sin and the loss of judging one another, and talking over one another.

O that we would but keep within our own bounds instead of trespassing upon the affairs of others! O that we would be more careful not to judge any but ourselves! O that we had more fervent charity, more real love for our neighbour! "Above all things," says the Apostle, "have fervent charity among yourselves;" this is the "more excellent way" of which he speaks, this the true royal grace, this the most divine possession, this "the bond of peace and of all virtues, this is the fulfilling of the Gospel law, this the way more truly to know the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost. If we speak no evil of our neighbour, and bear with him and are kind; if we are always ready to look on his brighter side, and to say, "perhaps he has

BISHOP DE LANCEY'S VISITATION.

On Tuesday evening, the 14th instant, in Trinity Church, Geneva, Bishop DeLancey confirmed one person. Prayers were read by the Rev. Mr. Hull, the lessons by the Rev. Mr. Stone, the Confirmation Preface by the Rev. Mr. Bissell, the Rector of the parish, and the Rev. Mr. Rogers preached.

From the Gospel Messenger.

CONVENTION OF THE DIOCESE OF WESTERN NEW YORK.

On Wednesday, the 15th inst., a large number of the clergy and laity assembled in Trinity Church, Geneva. Morning prayer was read by the Rev. Mr. Clark, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Proal, Rev. Mr. Renouf, Rev. Mr. Lee, and Rev. Ernest Hawkins, B. D., agent of the venerable society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. The Bishop read the ante communion service and delivered a Charge. The alms at the offertory were appropriated to the Christmas Fund for disabled Clergymen. The Bishop administered the holy communion, assisted in the distribution of the elements by the Rev. Dr. Proal, Rev. Mr. Bissell, Rev. Mr. Ernst, and Rev. Mr. Eastman.

The subject of the Charge was Religious Training. The Bishop observed that there were two systems: Excitement and Training. After some remarks upon the first system, he proceeded to show that the second was supported by common sense, by analogy, by the Church, and by the Holy Scriptures. The system of Religious Training is to be applied, in the Church in which we are appointed to minister, to the children, the youth and the adults. The means of applying it to the children are the Sunday School, Catechizing, Personal Intercourse, and Parochial Schools. The means of applying it to the youth and adults, are the Pulpit, the Lecture and the Press. The Bishop dwelt on these several points with great clearness and force, closing with an exhortation to zeal and faithfulness in the discharge of these duties.

After morning service, the Convention having been called to order, 52 of the clergy entitled to seats were found to be present, 32 absent. The Rev. Dr. Gregory and the Rev. W. H. Hill were appointed a committee to examine the certificates of Lay Deputies. The Convention then took a recess until 4 P. M.

WEDNESDAY, 4 P. M.

The roll was called and 41 parishes were found to be represented.

A motion was made to dispense with the vote by ballot, and proceed to the election of Secretary, viva voce. The Rev. Dr. Proal was nominated. Whereupon Dr. Proal offered his resignation of the office which he had held for ten years, and declined a re-election. But on motion of the Rev. Dr. Shelton he was unanimously re-elected and consented to serve. He appointed the Rev. Mr. Millett his assistant.

On motion, the Rules of Order of the last Convention were adopted to regulate the proceedings of the present Convention.

On motion, Resolved, That Clergymen belonging to this diocese but not entitled to seats in this Convention; Clergymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church not belonging to this diocese; and Professors and Students of Theology in the Protestant Episcopal Church, shall be admitted to the sittings of this Convention. Also,

That Clergymen of the Church of England as by law established in Great Britain and its dependencies, who may be present, shall be admitted to the sittings of the Convention.

The following Churches applied for admission into union with this Convention, viz:—St. John's Church, Clayville, Grace, Factoryville, St. Paul's, Utica, St. Paul's, Port Byron, and Emmanuel Church, Adams. The applications were referred to the committee.

The House then proceeded to the election of a Treasurer of the Convention, and a Treasurer of the Christmas Fund for disabled Clergymen. The vote by ballot being in both cases dispensed with, Charles Seymour, Esq., was unanimously re-elected Treasurer of the Convention, and Major James Rees was unanimously re-elected Treasurer of the Christmas Fund for Disabled Clergymen.

The Bishop then delivered his Annual Address from which we copy the following abstract:—

The aggregate of services in both Dioceses (New York and Western New York) is as follows:—officiated in 119 congregations; baptized 2 adults and 15 children; administered the Holy Communion 28 times; ordained 5 priests and 12 deacons; consecrated 8 new Churches; married 2 couple; preached 152 times; confirmed 847 persons, of which 234 were in the Diocese of New York, and 613 in the Diocese of Western New York.

In the Diocese of Western New York, officiated in 79 organized parishes, and 6 other places, total 85 places; baptized 9 infants, 2 adults, total 11; ordained 3 priests and 10 deacons; admitted 9 new candidates for orders; received by transfer 2 candidates; transferred 10 clergymen; received 6; instituted 2 Rectors; consecrated 3 new Churches; married 2 couple; administered the Holy Communion 20 times; preached 122 times; confirmed 613 persons in 63 parishes.

The Bishop having informed the Convention in the course of his address of a liberal gift to the diocese from the heirs of the late Mr. Van Wagener, it was on motion

Resolved, That this Convention accept with grateful acknowledgments the liberal proposal of the heirs of the late Gerritt H. Van Wagener, Esq., on the terms named.

And that the documents with so much of the Bishop's Address as relates to the subject be referred to the Education and Missionary Board, with powers.

The Convention then adjourned to meet on Thursday morning, at 9 o'clock.

Divine service was held in the evening: the Rev. Almon Gregory read prayers assisted by the Rev. Mr. Matson, and the Rev. Mr. Walker preached.

THURSDAY, 9 A. M.

Morning prayer was read by the Rev. Mr. Reed, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Beach. The Bishop pronounced the absolution and benediction.

The Convention having been called to order, the roll was called and the minutes were read and approved.

The Rev. Dr. Gregory read the report of the Committee on the Admission of Churches, which declared that the papers of all the churches applying were correct, except those of Grace Church, Factoryville. The question on admission was taken separately, whereupon the following churches were admitted into union with this convention, viz:—St. John's, Clayville, St. Paul's, Utica, St. Paul's, Port Byron, and Emmanuel, Adams. On motion, the papers of Grace Church, Factoryville, were recorded defective, and referred back to the Vestry for amendment.

Reports were then presented from the committee on the accounts of the Treasurer of the Christmas Fund, and from the committee on the accounts of the Treasurer of the Convention. The committee on the Report of the Trustees of the funds for the support of the Episcopate reported a deficiency in the payment of a portion of the Bishop's salary, owing to a failure in the payment of the interest on a bond and mortgage in which part of the funds had been invested. The committee on Unfinished Business reported that the only business left by the last convention was the report of the committee in relation to the Geneva College. The Bishop read the report of the Education and Missionary Board of the Diocese.

On motion, Resolved that the Trustees of the funds for the support of the Episcopate be authorized and required to appropriate so much as has not been invested in Bond and Mortgage, from the accumulating fund, to the payment of arrearages in the Bishop's salary; and to repay the amount so appropriated to the accumulating fund from the first moneys which shall be realized on the sale of the property of N. Brown.

The report of the committee on Geneva College was read by the Rev. Dr. Van Ingen, who made some appropriate remarks in relation to College Education and the duty of the clergy and laity of the Diocese to this Institution.

The reading of the Parochial Reports was dispensed with. The Rev. Dr. Gregory, from the committee on the admission of Churches, having stated that there existed a doubt as to the legality of having the required acknowledgement made before a Justice of the Peace, on motion the question was referred to a committee of legal gentlemen, to report at the next Convention. Messrs. Mumford, Pringle and Warren T. Worden were appointed that committee.

On motion of the Rev. Dr. Proal, Resolved, that this Convention have heard with edification and pleasure the learned and eloquent Charge delivered by the Bishop of this Diocese to the clergy, at the opening of the same, and that he be respectfully requested to furnish a copy for publication. Also,

Resolved, That in the event of the consent of the Bishop to the publication of said Charge, 3,000 copies be printed at the expense of this Convention.

On motion of the Rev. Mr. Leeds, a resolution was adopted requesting the clergy to procure subscribers for Dr. Jarvis' forthcoming work on the History of the Church, and transmit the names to the Secretary.

The hour having arrived the House proceeded to the election of the Standing Committee of the Diocese and the Deputies to the General Convention. The Rev. Dr. Gregory and Mr. D. S. Hall were appointed to receive the votes of the clergy, and Rev. Mr. Wheeler and Benjamin Pringle, Esq., to receive the votes of the laity.

On counting the votes the following persons were declared duly elected:—

STANDING COMMITTEE.—Rev. Benjamin Hale, D. D., Rev. William Shelton, D. D., Rev. George Leeds, Rev. W. H. A. Bissell, Messrs. James Rees, W. C. Pierrepont, T. D. Burrall, and David Hudson.

DEPUTIES TO THE GENERAL CONVENTION.—Rev. P. A. Proal, D. D., Rev. H. Gregory, D. D., Rev. J. V. Van Ingen, D. D., Rev. Edward Ingersoll, Messrs. W. C. Pierrepont, Horatio Seymour, George B. Webster, and C. H. Carroll.

On motion, Resolved, That it be earnestly recommended to the clergy of this Diocese, in view of the urgent want of funds to increase the number and efficiency of our Diocesan Missions, to make special appeals to their congregations in behalf of such missions on the 2d Sunday in the months of September, December, March and June.

On motion, Resolved, That 1600 copies of the Journal of the Convention be printed and distributed, as usual, under the direction of the Secretary.

On motion, Resolved, That the thanks of this convention be presented to the congregation of Trinity Church, Geneva, for the hospitality so generously extended to its members during the present session, and that the Rector of said Church be requested to give publicity to this resolution in such a way as he may deem expedient.

The minutes having been read and approved, the House on motion resolved to adjourn after the usual exercises.

After a short but impressive address from the Bishop, the Convention united in chanting the Gloria in Excelsis, and in appropriate prayers from the Liturgy, and the Bishop having pronounced the benediction, the House adjourned sine die.

DIOCESE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

At an ordination, held in St. Peter's Church, Drewsville, on the 15th day of August, Mr. Ezra Jones was admitted to the Holy Order of Deacons, by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Chase.

The Standing Committee of the Diocese had a meeting on the 20th instant, at which the testimonials of the Bishop elect of Mississippi, and the Bishop elect of Indiana, were duly signed; the Committee being satisfied, that there now exists no just impediment to the consecration of either candidate. HOLY SCRIPTURE.—A crowned head may teach us how useful the word is when preached to his own soul. "I have arrived at the conviction," writes the late Emperor Alexander to the Archbishop of Moscow, "that the doctrines contained in the Holy Scriptures abound in blessings. Experience has taught me that it is only by the cultivation of piety and godly living, that it is by that alone the true happiness of individuals or nations can be secured."

The outline then, of the doctrine of the Church concerning sacraments, presented in the Catechism and guarded against error in the Articles, is to be filled up from the Prayer Book. Its express and clear statements concerning the effect of Baptism and the nature of the Eucharist, are the clothing of muscle and integument which gives symmetry, expression and completeness to the well-framed but bare skeleton of generalities in the Catechism and independent particulars in the Articles.

No less than all thus taught by the Church we are bound to teach: nor is any thing more permissible. Positively or negatively, in restraint or in extension, the minister of "this Church" may not add teaching of his own to the sum of what he gathers from the Prayer Book and the Articles concerning the mysteries by which our union with Christ is effected and kept up; and that he may not be tempted so to do, or unconsciously transgress, he has been tried and tested as to his own satisfaction with that exhibition of those divine provisions for our spiritual wants.

But this brings us to a difficulty.

Human language is always susceptible, in greater or less degree, of misapprehension and perversion. May we not have misunderstood the Prayer Book and Articles, when we made up our minds as to their view of the sacraments? May we not now be misunderstanding them?

In as far as there are differences of opinion among the ministers of the Church on the subject of the sacraments, some among them must be in misapprehension of the doctrine which they ought to hold and teach. There must have been a failure somewhere to get the true sense of the Prayer Book, or of the Articles, or of both.

Such a supposition implies that there is a true sense, to which all are bound, and which all must be presumed honestly to desire to get, and hold, if they can; if not, to be ready to obey the convictions of their conscience, and abandon a post for which they are not competent.

It is strange and mournful that this should not be at once and universally admitted. But it is not. Men justly in high esteem for intellect and piety, have been found who could somehow satisfy themselves with the persuasion that a sacred formulary of worship, of Christian instruction, or of religious profession, might have two senses, a larger and a narrower, a higher and a lower, a stricter and a looser, a (so called) Catholic, and a (so called) Protestant.

The obvious — the necessary rejoinder to such an assertion is, that for any purpose, human or divine, a Liturgy, a Catechism, or an Article, that has two senses, may as well have two hundred or none at all. It is no standard of truth, no statement of truth, no recognition of truth, no fit offering to Him who is the TRUTH, nor from those who are required to "worship," as "in spirit," so also "in truth." It cannot be that we go before our God with an equivocation upon our lips, or teach our little ones a phrase of double-meaning to ensnare their souls—that we agree at the altar or the font, in the pulpit, or when we take the solemn vow that admits us to the pulpit, in sounds and syllables, while our hearts and understandings disavow the hollow concord!

It has been said, that as prayers are not intellectual exercises, their precise signification is of less importance! that as Articles are subscribed as terms of peace, any sense which the language can with any degree of plausibility be compelled to bear, may be accepted for the purpose!

These things were said a hundred years ago, by those who sought a domicile for the Arian heresy in the Church of England;* and (strangely enough!) in a succeeding generation, by those who strove, in a latitudinarian age,† to hinder Socinianism, avowed and covert, without and within the Church, from breaking down the barrier which subscription to the Prayer Book and Articles placed between its votaries and the Establishment. But the impudent assailants and the weak defenders alike disgraced their respective interests, by resort to the worst subterfuge that has ever stained the corrupt and odious system of Jesuit morality. Their doctrine of diverse senses is Probabilism, in a slightly altered form and application. It is the claim of a license to use language in any sense which it is convenient to give it, for which any warrant can be obtained that it ever has been given, in any circumstances, by any one. It is the annihilation of the distinction between truth and falsehood in utterance between man and man, and between sincerity and hypocrisy in man's approaches to his Maker.

I will detain you with no attempt at a refutation of this hypothesis of a double sense, my brethren. It is enough to have stated it, and to have called your attention to its true character.

What, then, is the sense of the Prayer Book, Catechism and Articles, in which they exhibit "the doctrine of this Church?"

It has been formally maintained, (and a confused notion of the kind seems to be not uncommon,) that it is that sense in which they are generally understood—the currently received meaning of the day.

The difficulty in presenting objections to this view, consists mainly in their number and variety. It is utterly untenable. By whom must the meaning be currently received? Not by all: because if all agreed in it, there could be no occasion for inquiry; and that is presupposed. By the learned, it has been said. But who shall determine the limits of that class? who collect its suffrages? who report its decision? And suppose a general agreement of a class, or of all men, in this age; shall that conclude the next? and shut out all further doubt, all room for reconsideration? In one respect it were well it did:

* See Waterland, case of Arian Subscription considered. Works. Vol. II.

for most certainly the interpretation given such writings as those in question by general suffrage, would be increasingly erroneous from age to age. In proportion as a document is open to all, and all claim interest in its meaning and interpretation, there is danger of its being gradually lowered in the current acceptance. This is the tendency of all language. It loses sharpness, clearness, depth in time. It is like a gem cut in facets, exposed to long friction, by which with its change of form and bulk, it also loses polish and translucence. The language of the many is always less clear and significant than that of the cultivated few. The same words convey different notions to the intellectual thinker, and to the uneducated man of the world. A formulary of faith, therefore, can never be safely interpreted by the generally prevalent notion of its meaning. In proportion to its age, its language will have lost precision and significance; and the more general its use, the more that process will have been accelerated. It must be tested by an unchanging, not a fluctuating standard; an adequate, not an incompetent criterion: it is not the required sense that will serve our purpose; we want that which is fixed and full.

Most of these reasons apply in refutation of another opinion—that the sense of our formularies,—of any formularies to which assent is required as a test of belief—is the sense put upon them by the imposer.

Who is the imposer? The immediate agent—the examiner, ordainer, ordinary or judge? Then each such agent may have his own sense, and there may be as many varieties of sense as there are individual imposers. And those varieties continually shifting; and certain to deteriorate for the reasons already given.

If not the immediate agent, the Church collective must be the imposer. But is it the Church of this age only, or of all ages back to the date of the formularies themselves? In either case, who is to collect, and who to report, the voices that make up the collective sense? The question becomes again—What is the sense of the Church? and so resolves itself into the original inquiry. We sought to learn that sense from the formularies; and, to settle doubts about their meaning, we are referred back to the thing of which we were in search.

These two views are untenable. The sense of the generality is indeterminable; and worthless if it were not, unless the spirit of the age, in its determination to make the majority omnipotent, has also invested it with infallibility! The sense of the imposer is uncertain; unless the Church be the imposer; and this is the very thing in question.

There is a sense, fixed in proportion as it is carefully, full as it is successfully, ascertained, the sense of the compiler, or composer; the original, historical sense, that which was in the mind of those who first made and used the formularies, and which they meant that they should always have.

Our Liturgy, Catechism and Articles, have all been most deliberately prepared at the time of their first compilation, and most carefully revised at several periods since, both in the mother Church and in our own. Their deliberate preparation insures us that they had originally a well determined sense: their repeated revision, that that sense has been retained wherever its expression has not been modified. What Cranmer and Ridley meant, when they offered our forms of prayer, is the sense of those forms still, where they remain unaltered. The Articles upon which, after many years of continued and intense discussion, they and their associates agreed, as the true and safe expressions of the teaching of the Church in contradistinction from the forms of error that lay around her, retain the significance which they had to them, wherever it has not been changed by an alteration of the text. Who has ever had the right or power to take away the first meaning and substitute another? How could it be done without formal, authorised action, and solemn public notification?

In this matter we must distinguish between use and right, between commonness and truth. A prayer or an article may acquire in use a meaning that is not rightful may be commonly taken in a sense that is not true. The word "health" in our General Confession may be used by a large proportion of those who offer it, in the sense of freedom from disease, soundness of condition; but its right meaning in that form, the only sense in which it can be cited as an illustration of the doctrine of the Church, is that which it had in the mind of the framers of the prayer, who by "health" understood recuperative or restorative energy or power, and were wont to speak of our Saviour's sufferings as his "healthsome passion." The necessity of this conclusion will be evident on the supposition that the deterioration of sense in this word had become complete, and that it had quite (as it has almost) been narrowed down to mean the sound condition of the body merely. Would the doctrine of the Church have changed in the same degree? It must, if the change of meaning of a word, a phrase, a paragraph in use, could change its rightful sense in a formulary of the Church. To avoid the absurdity of making those formularies a miserable nose of wax, their language must be received in a stationary sense, and no where can that sense be found, except in the mind and meaning of its original employers.

To assure ourselves of that mind and meaning, we have but to use with diligence and candour the ordinary rules of interpretation, so thoroughly discussed and clearly laid down both by the teachers of scriptural exegesis, and in the schools of human law.

By those rules the original sense of our Prayer Book and Articles are to be fixed by an examination of the modes of speech and thought of their compilers—of the occasion of their compilation—of the aim and intent with which it was undertaken—and, in order to the knowledge of that, of the circumstances in which it was carried through.

Long as I have already occupied your attention, my brethren, I cannot enter into details on these interesting points: but even at the risk of becoming wearisome, I must not leave the subject without making a few additional remarks concerning the use and bearing of our Articles of Religion, as a standard of "the doctrine" of "this Church."

It is a mere cavil, to say that regarding them as such a standard, is making them a Creed. They make no pretension to that character. They were put forth for an end entirely different from that of Creeds. They belong to a distinct, well known and very ancient class of formularies, partaking of the nature partly of a declaration, partly of a canon. Two hundred and fifty years before the archiepiscopate of Cranmer, one of his predecessors had in such a formulary, put forth "Fourteen Articles of the Catholic Faith, which all the ministers of the Church are bound to know and teach;"* and whoever will compare them with the first formulary of the English Reformation, the Articles of 1536, and with its enlargement in the second, "The Institution of a Christian Man," will be satisfied that the compilers of the later documents had that of the thirteenth century distinctly in their view. Of all three compilations, the express, avowed, only object was one and the same, the furnishing to ministers of a sketch or outline of the doctrine they were to teach. Archbishop Peckham professed to be moved to furnish his by the prevailing ignorance of both priests and people. Archbishop Cranmer and his royal master put on theirs, induced by "the diversity of opinions grown and sprung" around them, and "the outward unquietness thence ensuing." The same inducement continuing to operate, led to the subsequent effort to further peace, in our present Articles, as is shown by the almost perfect sameness of their title with that of the Articles of 1536.† There is not the least reason to suppose the later production to have been expected to bring about peace in any other way than the earlier; and of that its contents leave no room for doubt, that it was expected to operate as a declaration and pattern of doctrine, and no otherwise. This destroys the figment that the Articles are a compromise—a shuffling subterfuge to conceal permitted discrepancy in teaching.

So far, indeed, from concealment of such discrepancy was the aim of their compilers, that one of the ends they had in view in 1552, was to distinguish the true from false teachers, both in the Church and before the world; by the severance of the sound from the unsound among the clergy and exclusion of the latter from the office of teaching; and by the manifestation of the soundness of those approved, to each other, to the Church at large, and to the numerous enemies disposed to take occasion against them, by their subscriptions, indeed, that of Peckham's Articles, "ne ignorantia sacerdotis populum precipitavit in foveam."

SHELBY COLLEGE.

The ensuing session of this Institution will be commenced on Wednesday, 5th of September next.

In order to admission into the Freshman Class, the applicant must exhibit satisfactory evidence of good moral character, and he must be well acquainted with the ordinary branches of English Education, and well versed in the grammar of the Greek and Latin languages, and able to construe Jacob's Greek Reader or its equivalent Caesar's Commentaries, Virgil, Cicero's Select Orations, and to translate English into Greek and Latin correctly. He must be thoroughly acquainted with Ancient Geography, and the other. Only look at those who let go themselves and are busy in talking over their neighbours, are they not most faulty persons themselves? Though they may often amuse us for the time by their wit and the sharp things they say, do we honour them or respect them all the while? do we not often feel ashamed of ourselves for listening to their keen piercing words, and wish that more of the milk of charity ran in their veins, and gave sweetness and softness to their speech?

I have said that this sin of judging others is widely spread. Are not my words strictly true? It is not the poor alone, nor the rich alone, who yield to it; but rich and poor, high and low, cottagers and nobles, gentry and tradespeople, are alike on this point. What are we to say of all the scandal, the gossip, the news, which go on in every neighbourhood, in great houses and in small, in country villages, and fashionable streets and squares? This love of scandal and gossip may take a more refined or coarser form, but there it is; it matters little whether the talking be at the washing-tub or in the fine drawing-room; the sin is the same; and at both places we shall find the sin. There is a great deal of gossip; and though the gossip at first may seem to be of a harmless and good-natured sort, it soon degenerates; in a young brier the thorns may be soft at first, but they quickly harden and get strength to prick. Watch in any case the discussion of your neighbour's doings and of your neighbour's character, and you will find that five minutes will scarcely pass before something harsh and uncharitable has been said. Our only safety lies in avoiding discussions about our neighbours, in avoiding "tittle-tattle," as it is called, in checking the love of news. It is a wholesome and Christian self-denial to tie our tongue when our neighbours are talked of, or instantly to put our soul into a watchful and anxious attitude; there is danger coming, we may be sure; we may remember how often we have been led on, for want of anxious watchfulness, to say things that we would now wish unsaid. Words in the heat of the moment have gone abroad; they have slipped unadvisedly from our lips and have made sore wounds; they have passed on from mouth to mouth; they have gone out of our power and have done hurt that we repent of. How fearful an amount of uncharitable words have we been guilty of! how little we have thought of the responsibility of words spoken of others! how much of our conversation has been stained by unkind or thoughtless sayings about our neighbours! We have run on sometimes thoughtlessly, sometimes bitterly, and sometimes thoughtless words have turned to bitter ones. Once begin to talk about our brother, and we know not where it will stop; it is commonly a down-hill course; faster and faster we hasten into uncharitableness.

Articles agreed on by the Bishoppes, and other learned menne, in the Synode at London, in the yere of our Lord Godde, M. D. LII. for the avoiding of Controversie in opinions, and the establishment of a goodlie Concorde, in certeine matiers of Religion.

There is need then for greater watchfulness over our tongue; it is "an unruly member;" it must be strictly watched; it will hurry us into sin, unless, being convinced of its unruliness we are at pains to control and tame it. The very fact of giving vent to our opinions of our neighbours, often ends in deepening and fixing that opinion if it is a bad one; and the fact of restraining our tongue from saying what we feel, often ends in softening our feeling. The habit of discussing the conduct of others increases the quickness of our perception of their faults; we may say we cannot help seeing their faults, and therefore cannot help judging them or having our judgment; but only curb your tongue, only break off the habit of canvassing and criticising them, and you will find that by degrees you will not be so sharp in detecting faults; "the mote in thy brother's eye" will seem to be less; the habit of gazing outwards makes all things outward the more distinct; the habit of gazing inwards makes all things inward the more distinct. I pray you therefore to use your powers of judging where there are no words required—I mean upon yourselves; look to the beam in your own heart, to the favourite failing, the darling sin which is eating into your very soul; be not afraid of being too strict with yourselves; there is enough to do at home and with yourself.

In places where there is the privilege of daily prayer in church, you may often hear persons excusing themselves from attending it for want of time. And yet if we watch the life of the higher orders, and take for instance their afternoons, and out of the afternoons take all the time they spend in conversation at each others' houses about their neighbours, we shall see that the time lost in uncharitable speeches, in idle gossip and scandal, is more than enough for the service in God's house. Or, if we watch the life especially of the women of lower rank, and take their afternoons, and out of their afternoons take the time they spend in running into a neighbour's house, and in sitting down to talk over others of their neighbours, we shall find that they also have plenty of time for church did they tie their tongues. Thus in this way also we see the sin and the loss of judging one another, and talking over one another.

O that we would but keep within our own bounds instead of trespassing upon the affairs of others! O that we would be more careful not to judge any but ourselves! O that we had more fervent charity, more real love for our neighbour! "Above all things," says the Apostle, "have fervent charity among yourselves;" this is the "more excellent way" of which he speaks, this the true royal grace, this the most divine possession, this "the bond of peace and of all virtues, this is the fulfilling of the Gospel law, this the way more truly to know the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost. If we speak no evil of our neighbour, and bear with him and are kind; if we are always ready to look on his brighter side, and to say, "perhaps he has not done it," or, if he has done it, "perhaps he will not do it again," or, if he does it again, "perhaps we have faults as great, and may God have mercy on him and turn him;" if we do this, then, I say, we are indeed walking after the Spirit, and learning as apt scholars the mind of Christ, and bringing forth the fruits of a lively faith.

We shall always find that the best men are the most merciful, the holiest men the least severe upon their neighbours; they who are ever wrestling with their own sins and seeking to prepare themselves for their Saviour's coming; who set before themselves their own need of mercy, and see the beam that is in their own eye, are in haste to be merciful to their brother, and are not prying into his eye to discover whether he has a mote therein. May we have grace to become more merciful, more pitiful, more kind, more fearful of judging; we shall never repent of merciful words when others around us were censorious and severe; but when we come to be judged, how shall we dare to lift up our voice and cry for mercy, as one after the other our own unmerciful condemnations of our brother stand before us to shame us and to silence us in that hour.

A LADY WHO HAS SEEN THE WORLD.

READER, did you ever chance to hear of the famous Maria of Mont Blanc, a peasant woman of Chamouni, the only one of her sex who ever ascended to the summit of the monarch of mountains; or of our own countrywoman, Mrs. Campbell, who with her daughters, traversed the frightful Mer de Glace, in all its extent, and crossed over to the valley of Cormayeur? These were remarkable instances of female nerve and intrepidity; but what think you of a woman who has actually gone round the globe by herself, not comfortably ensconced on shipboard and touching here and there in its four quarters, but exploring many of its most interesting countries? Can you believe in the existence of such a prodigy? if not, such an one I must not less declare myself to have seen, and talked, and travelled with.

It was at Constantinople, in the summer of 1841, that I went on board the Austrian steamer plying from that city to Beirut, and, as it happened, found myself the only passenger in the best cabin. I was not long, however, in making acquaintances on deck. Among the crowd of Turks and Levantines I was struck with the appearance of a lady, whose singular costume—a tight gown of plain grey serge, of a somewhat antiquated fashion, and a Florentine straw hat, with a very wide brim—curiously contrasted with the flowing oriental garments around. There was, however, nothing even to excite a smile in her appearance. Her person was slight, her countenance grave, and her manners remarkably simple and unaffected. She was travelling entirely alone, but had found a temporary protector in the person of a venerable-looking monk, who was going to his convent in Syria. I found that our object was the same,—a pilgrimage to the Holy City; nor was I long in discovering that my new companion was no ordinary pilgrim, and that the thirst for romantic excitement and the desire for information were motives at least as powerful with her as the indulgence of a feeling of piety. Our conversation turned upon the difficulties of the way. The country was reputed to be in a very unsettled state, the roads said to be beset with robbers. I soon became so interested in the calm and resolute character of my new friend, that I resolved to assist her to the utmost of my power. On reaching Beirut, no time was lost in repairing to an English merchant to whom I had an introduction, whose active kindness procured me a travelling servant, named Achmet, a native of Beirut, who was directed to lay in a stock of provisions for a two or three days' cruise, and to take our places in a boat sailing that evening for Jaffa. My lady pilgrim, of whom I had lost sight during the confusion of landing, was now sought out; nor was it long before she made her appearance at the merchant's. At first my friend was rather shy of this part of the business, but the mature age, grave appearance, and simple manners of my new acquaintance, soon set at rest any ungenerous suspicions.

The evening came, and we repaired on board. The boat proved to be an undecked Arab craft, of the very rudest description, with two masts, and huge latine or triangular sails. A small cabin, about six feet square, into which it was necessary to creep on all fours, was contrived at the stern, but it was so foul that to take refuge there except in case of a storm was impossible. The rest of the boat had a flooring of sand and shingle, and its rough ribs served for couches, and sofas, and berths, at once. The places of honour, including the aforesaid cabin, had been reserved for ourselves—the rest of the vessel was crowded with a motley collection of passengers.

Having myself roughed it before in this way, I was prepared for what I met with, but nothing surprised me more than the passive indifference of my companion. Though certainly not "cabined," we were "cribbled and confined" with a vengeance. Wilkie, when putting up for the night in the one room of a Spanish posada with a party of ladies and gentlemen, talks of curtains and other contrivances for decorum. I thought of the fastidious delicacy of Hood's "Schoolmistress" under such alarming circumstances. But there was no remedy. "Misery acquaints a man with strange bedfellows." All distinctions were literally brought to one level, and, when night came on, and we were forced to lie down in the sand which formed the sheeting of the general bed, with the canopy of heaven for a curtain, we made so tight a fit of it, that, as Stephens somewhere says, "if the bottom of the boat had fallen out, we could hardly have tumbled through."

On awaking the next morning, we were already dressed. The sun was rising in glory behind Mount Lebanon. Our picturesque old bark, with her huge latine sails, flew steadily along under the pressure of the light breeze, and the fresh odours from the sea, with our prosperous progress, contributed to put us all into excellent spirits. After our ablutions, Achmet was soon ready with a breakfast of coffee, bread, eggs, and fruit. We sat in the pleasant shadow of the sail: maps and guide-books were pulled out, and every point of that memorable coast successively made out and commented on. I was perfectly delighted with the intelligence of my companion, and never, surely, did any traveller, male or female, give so little trouble, and enter into every thing with such a spirit of quiet, heartfelt enjoyment. And thus we sailed along, past Sidon, and past Tyre, till, as the sun dropped his fiery ball into the western waters, we reached the promontory of Mount Carmel and its white convent, looking out over the lonely, wide-spread sea. As night came on, all dropped asleep again, huddled together in the general receptacle.

On reaching Jaffa the next afternoon, a tribe of half-naked Arabs rushed shouting into the water, and bore us, lady and all, triumphantly into the town. The notion of a woman wandering about by herself was so unintelligible to the crew and Arabs, that I was, of course, looked upon as her lawful proprietor and protector; and it was rather embarrassing how to get rid of this honour, and, at the same time, to provide comfortably for my companion. Fortunately, there proved to be an Austrian consul in the place, and to his custody, as a German, I desired Achmet to consign her for the night.

Jaffa is but thirty miles from Jerusalem, and, by starting very early in the morning, I intended to get there that evening. Accordingly, long before sunrise I had ordered horses to be ready, and sent Achmet to fetch Madame from the Austrian consul's, where she had been very kindly treated by the ladies of his family. It was one of the hottest days of a Syrian summer; the half-cultivated plains, parched up by the summer heat, were destitute of shade and verdure, and haunted by myriad swarms of insects; our supply of water was soon exhausted, and had it not been for the peasant girls of the villages, who brought forth pitchers to gain a few paras from a passing traveller, we should have suffered cruelly. But not a single murmur, not even an indication of impatience, ever escaped the lips of my surprising feminine companion during the whole of this burning day. After a most blessed halt at a well, and an hour's repose under the shadow of a solitary fig-tree, we pushed into the wild defiles of the hill country of Judea, so narrow in places that but one at a time can pass, famous of old besides for their insecurity, and as the scene of many an outrage and many a murder perpetrated upon the pilgrims to Jerusalem. Our progress through these ravines was so much slower than we anticipated, that we were benighted at a village in the mountains. We halted in the court of a ruinous mosque, and established our quarters under its vaulted cloisters. The village sheik, who had sent us a huge pilau for supper, came down for a while to visit us. At length we betook ourselves to our respective dormitories on the ground; but sleep refused to visit our eyes: we had reached, we found, to within three hours of Jerusalem. Restless and excited, about midnight, I desired Achmet to prepare for departure—our companion, I found, had been as wakeful as myself. At midnight, the camels sleeping around us in groups, we stumbled forth by starlight from the court of the mosque, and picked our uncertain way among the olive groves surrounding the village.

The road was a mere horse-path down slippery slabs of rock into the hollow of a precipitous ravine: in the dark, it was one succession of slides and stumbles from top to bottom. I soon lost sight of Madame, who had forged ahead of me, but hailed her from time to time with loud shouts, to which she responded in a minor key. At the bottom of the valley I overtook her, and we hastened onwards towards the bourne of our journey. My own excitement was beyond anything I ever experienced—the mind of my companion was no less absorbed, and thus we paced on side by side in the dim starlight, without exchanging more than an occasional syllable. At length, the light broke gradually in faint red bars behind a dark wavy summit—it was the Mount of Olives! A long line of walls, with here and there a tower and dome, loomed up and began to redden with the increasing light; and as the crimson streaks became more and more intensely vivid, with a feeling more like dreaming than waking, we found ourselves at the gate of Jerusalem. While the sentinel within was unbarring it, we held a brief consultation, when it was decided that I should remit the pilgrim-lady to her legitimate protectors, the monks of the Roman Catholic convent, while I sought out for myself the abode of a friend who was then locum tenens for the absent consul.

During my stay at Jerusalem I saw but little of my companion, but on joining some travellers who were about to go down to the Jordan and the Dead Sea,—an excursion which, though short, is both fatiguing and perilous, Madame proved to be one of the party. At nightfall we reached the extraordinary convent of St. Saba, among the wild deserts of the Jordan, and here I found that, lest the sanctity of the brethren should be compromised, women are never admitted within the walls, a solitary tower without being appointed as their receptacle. Thither I repaired with a lay servant, whose office it was to attend to the wants of the female pilgrims. Stumbling in the dark over the rocky ground, we reached at length the base of the tower, standing, quite isolated, upon the brink of a tremendous precipice. Here the lay brother, handing me the supper-basket, planted a ladder so as to form a communication with the portal, which was elevated some twenty feet above the ground, and then, ascending, drew forth a key and unlocked the small heavy door which gave access to this female asylum, or rather prison. The room we entered was empty, and, by another ladder, we ascended to the upper story, which was furnished with some little attention to the bodily, but also to what was more consulted, the ghostly comforts of its gentle inmates. Pictures and images of saints adorned the walls of a small oratory, which was niched into the side of the apartment, over which a few lamps cast a dim uncertain gleam, leaving its extremities in gloomy obscurity. Upon a low divan sat the object of our search, with her usual expression of calm and fearless tranquillity. Her simple supper was brought forth, and while she was engaged with it, I asked her whether she did not feel timid at being left in utter solitude. In fact, the dim, dreary-looking chamber above, the total darkness of the lower story, the horrible stillness of the place, were all calculated to act upon a nervous imagination, and to awaken a train of dismal and superstitious fancies. When Captain Basil Hall and his daughters visited the place, the ladies had refused to be thus incarcerated, and stormed away till allowed to enter the convent walls. Not so, however, the German pilgrim; she declared that she never was more comfortable, and refused my offer to remain on guard in the lower story of the tower. Accordingly, we departed, and locked her up snug for the night.

Long before sunrise next morning, we were all mustered, including Madame, before the gate of the convent, and wended our way to the awful shores of the Dead Sea and the valley of the Jordan. Not to dwell upon these well-known scenes, suffice it to say, that the powers of endurance of the whole party were never more severely tried. That night we bivouacked under a tree, and, rising by starlight, returned to Jerusalem, most thoroughly knocked up.

Here I lost sight of my interesting and intrepid friend. On returning to Europe I often reverted to our adventures, and wondered what would be the end of her strange passion for rambling, which "seemed to grow by what it fed on." Conceive my surprise at finding last autumn the following notice of her in the "New York Literary World," under the head of "What is talked about:"—

"Madame Ida Pfeiffer, of Vienna, has arrived in this city, furnished with letters from our Missionaries. She formerly visited the East, and has written her travels. She has since carried away bricks from Nineveh, passed through Persia, and looked in upon Gutzlaff in China. On her way hither through the Brazils, she was attacked by robbers, against whom she defended herself bravely—cutting off the fingers of one of her antagonists, and being herself wounded in the struggle. After remaining with us awhile, she will return to her native city, from which she departed on her adventurous expedition."

OLD AGE NEAR.—Certainly, long life is like an evening mist, and seems far greater to us at a distance than when we are in it. It is strange how the different situating of ourselves will mightily alter the prospect of our years. While we look forward upon them from youth, they are all represented to us long and happy; but, when we look back upon them from age, they then appear to have been short and troublesome: a day to come shows far longer to us than a year that is gone. It is high time for us to mend our accounts, and to estimate the years that are to come by those that are already past. Those thirty or forty years which were judged by thee in thy childhood an unattainable age, how short do they seem now, when thou hast outlived them! What remains of them all, but that thou art grown bigger than thou wast, and hast the remembrance of some inconsiderable actions which were done in that time? Why then should we think thirty or forty years yet to come such a huge gulf as can never be waded through? Remembrance can with one glance review what is past; and why should hope and expectation look upon what is to come as boundless and infinite? Are all our winter days spent, and none but our summer ones in reserve? Are none remaining for us but the fairest and the longest? Surely both hemispheres of our lives have equal horizons, and we shall find that our past and future years have but the same measure. Be persuaded instantly to break off all delays, and from this very moment to provide in earnest for your souls; lest, as the blandishments of the flesh and the world make you now think it too soon, so the sudden surprise of death and the dreadful sight of a boundless eternity rushing in upon you make you hereafter cry out, "It is too late, too late!"—Church Sunday School Magazine.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

Bishop Freeman acknowledges the reception of Five Dollars, accompanied by the following note:

"For Missions in Texas, from a family Missionary Box—with the prayer that He who has said 'the silver and the gold are mine,' will supply all that is needful, and will 'send forth labourers into his harvest.'"

NEWARK, August 22nd, 1849.

The undersigned returns his most grateful acknowledgements to those many friends who have enabled the Rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, Indiana, to complete the building which was begun ten years since in faith, and which is now, being out of debt, ready to be consecrated to the worship of Almighty God. They are known and honoured by those who are most deeply interested, and who will often remember them at the throne of Grace. Their reward is on high.

JACKSON KEMPER, Missionary Bishop, and

23rd August, 1849.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT.—The Editor of the Banner has received by the hands of Rev. W. F. Halsey, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Sing Sing, eight dollars, contributed by the Sunday School of this Parish, towards the erection of the Swedish and Norwegian Church in Chicago, Ill. under the care of the Rev. Mr. Unonius; also, from a Parishioner of St. Paul's Church, $1, for the Church in Asheville, Buncombe Co. N. C.

In addition to the above the Editor of the Banner has received "$10 for the Swedes' Church in Chicago, under the charge of the Rev. Mr. Unonius," from the Missionary Association of Deer-Park Hall, Newark, Delaware, by the hands of the Rev. Walter E. Franklin. For the same Church, from Mrs. Kohne, ten dollars.

The above sums have all been forwarded to their destination.

We place the above acknowledgements in a conspicuous place, because of the deep interest excited by the effort for which they provide. Those of our readers who bear in mind the account of the formation of this "Scandinavian Parish in Chicago" in the Banner of May 5th, and their address to the Bishop of Illinois in the next paper, and the communication of a Western Churchman in the Banner of August 4th, must agree with us in thinking this no ordinary case. This Parish, composed of Swedes and Norwegians, numbered one hundred communicants, when it had been established only three months, with a large congregation. This result was effected before they had a consecrated Church to worship in. It shows the readiness of this people to receive the services of the Church. They are for the most part poor emigrants, and their spiritual wants must be provided for by the charity of others.

There are also peculiar circumstances, in their present situation, which demand our help. The Pestilence has been among them; and in the touching words of their Pastor, "not a little portion of my congregation consists of fatherless children and widows."

We subjoin a brief extract of a letter lately received from the Rev. Mr. Unonius, just recovering himself from a severe illness:

"With deep gratitude to God, and to those who, in His hands, are the means of extending to us an assistance so desirable, in this sympathy for our wants, I and my poor flock do also find comfort and encouragement during the severe trials which have been the will of Providence now to let us suffer. Great sickness and mortality have prevailed, and do yet prevail, among us. There is scarcely a family which has not been bereaved of one or more of its members. There are several of which fathers, mothers, children, one after the other have within a few days been committed to the earth: not a little portion of my congregation consists now of fatherless children and widows."

Let those who have been spared by the mercy of God, in their thank offerings, remember this appropriate object. Surely all who do will secure this promise—"Blessed be the man that provideth for the sick and needy: the Lord shall deliver him in the time of trouble."

OMENS.

The ancient Roman Republicans were influenced in their actions by omens. Although we may not, in these wiser days, govern our course by the flight of birds or similar trivial incidents, yet there are signs in our times which Modern Republicans may justly regard. Straws, it is said, show which way the wind blows, and surely then the following indicate pretty clearly the direction of a wind which sets from Rome.

We copy the following article from the Christian Witness:
ROMISH TITLES.

We are glad to see that the Romanists, in this country, are hastening to bring out, conspicuously, the features and foppes of their system. The sooner the people see the whole that belongs to that corrupt scheme, by which so many have been seduced from the true faith, the sooner will the days of its prevailing power be numbered. The following item sufficiently indicates the development of the spirit of true Romanism, which, in the face of our plain republican institutions and habits, is quite in advance upon what has been customary, with even the strictest of the sect in this country:

'The New York Freeman's Journal gives an account of the distribution of premiums at the convent of the Sacred Heart, and says, among other things: "The Right Rev. Dr. Hughes and many of the clergy were present, among whom, seated at the right hand of his lordship, on the chair of honor, I distinguished with pleasure the venerated Father Matthew. The exercises opened with a piece of instrumental music, greeting the entrance of his lordship and the Rev. Clergy. His lordship then made a short address, observing that he could not prevail upon himself to disturb, by any remarks of his, the pleasing impressions which the entertainments of the day must have produced in every heart."

In England, where the Church is connected with the State, and where the Bishops have a seat in the House of Lords, they receive the title of 'Lordship,' but for any Bishop to receive such a title here, shows but too plainly, that they who confer it, and he who receives it, recognize a power foreign to that to which, as citizens of the United States, they owe allegiance. The Romanists recognize the Pope as a prince, as well as a pontiff; and to him, first of all, and highest of all on earth, they owe allegiance. Hence, his servants, the Bishops, have a claim to that title, which expresses this right to rule, derived from their sovereign at Rome.

The Freeman's Journal, the Romanists organ in New York, in replying to the comments of the Tribune, in this article, makes the following statement, as to what is to be expected of the 'faithful':

'The Bishops of the Catholic Church, we would then have the Tribune to know, are the masters and "lords" of all the faithful in Christ. In token hereof, the Catholic, if he be not a clown, takes the blessing of a Bishop, by bending his knee and kissing the Episcopal ring on his hand. The Bishop of a Diocese is set over it by a higher authority, and not commissioned by a democratic election. The faithful have no more to do with the appointment of their Bishop, than they have with the falling of the showers of heaven.'

It will be well for all Romanizers, and such as take pleasure in excusing the follies of that communion, to ponder this expression of servility, which the Romish Church claim from all who put themselves in their power. We care not how extravagant these claims, nor how soon they are put forth, with unflinching boldness.

In addition to the above, we find the following article going the rounds of the New York papers. We know nothing about the character of the "New York Nation," the title of the Newspaper referred to. There may be much highly objectionable in it. But its character and object have nothing to do with the point we regard. The question is, whether such a method of silencing the Press will be tolerated here. The following is the statement of the editor, Thomas D'Arcy McGhee.

To the American Public:

NATION OFFICE, 121 Fulton street,
New York, August 28, 1849.

In Paris, the press is persecuted in the name of "law and order;" in Petersburg, it is excluded as an open enemy; in Rome it is silenced in the name of religion; in Dublin, it is suspended for "the security of the crown." Where can freedom of speech and writing find a refuge, if not in these United States?

But even here it is sometimes subject to one species of interference—the interference of a selfish combination, a corporate conspiracy, which, if less summary, is not less successful in its attempts to stifle opinion and punish independence. An instance of this method of violating the liberty of the press is now submitted to the American public; in whose power it is to make it the last, as it is probably the worst experiment of the kind, hitherto attempted here.

A short statement of the facts in this case will enable all men to judge whether it does not call for a prompt verdict of public condemnation.

On the 28th of October, 1848, I commenced the publication of a weekly newspaper in New York, called The Nation, "to be devoted to Ireland and her emigrants, and the European Democracies." From the first number, it had to deal with the causes of the degeneracy and destruction of the Irish in Ireland, with the intellectual and social condition of the emigrant Irish in America, and with European questions, such as have arisen in France and Germany, and of late, especially with the Roman business.

In relation to Ireland, The Nation was the first journal, owned and edited by a Catholic, which charged the horrors endured by human nature in that island equally on its clerical politicians and its foreign rulers.

To the emigrants in this country we devoted a fixed department, explained by its motto—"Educate, that you may be free." We told them their faults in the plainest language. We showed that they were "tools" in society, "units" in political influence, and "the dung" instead of "the seed" of the American Catholic Church. We preached to them a "wise selfishness," "temperance, cleanliness and frugality;" we exhorted each man to own his own house and his own opinions.

In relation to Rome, we advocated the Republic, vindicated the Triumvirs, opposed the collection of Peter's Pence, and urged the total separation of the temporal from the spiritual powers.

These were new ideas in our Irish community, but many were prepared for their reception. We have the satisfaction to know, that in each town, State and territory, throughout North America, some Irishmen have received, advanced, and manfully upheld them.

But it cannot, ought not to be concealed, that a wide spread and powerful influence has been organized to stifle these opinions in their infancy, and to crush The Nation, their organ. For half a year we have been informed of the workings of this influence in several States and cities, and have endeavored, by remonstrance, and every honest mitigation of language, to conciliate or remove it. It was implacable, and continues so.

In the dioceses of Boston, Hartford, New York, Albany, Buffalo, Pittsburg, and Toronto, special measures have been taken by many Catholic clergymen, to arrest the circulation of the New York Nation. Our subscribers or ourselves have been denounced, by name or description, from the altars, and in other ways by the Clergymen of South Boston, Mass., Pawtucket, R. I., Springfield, Mass., Cohoes, N. Y., Lockport, N. Y., in some of the Churches of this city, in St. Patrick's Cathedral, and in Richmond, and other parts of the diocese of Philadelphia. In one instance, (that of Mr. O'Grady, of Cohoes,) the rite of confession was refused by the Clergyman, Mr. Van Reeh, to a subscriber for The Nation. In other towns our travelling agents have been denounced by Clergymen as soon as they arrived, and literally "hunted out." This has been going on since the beginning of the year.

BISHOP KEMPER.

The following Resolution was unanimously passed by the Convention of Indiana, in acknowledgment of the important services rendered to this Diocese by its late acting Bishop. Wide indeed has been the field to which the labors of this devoted Bishop have been given, and extensive as it has been, his activity and energy have enabled him faithfully to discharge his duties in the care of so many Churches.

RESOLUTION OF THE CONVENTION OF INDIANA.

"Whereas, the relation subsisting between the Rt. Rev. Jackson Kemper, D. D., and this Diocese, will terminate on the consecration of the Bishop Elect: in view of that event, it is hereby unanimously

"Resolved, That we feel ourselves and the Diocese to be under the deepest obligation to Bishop Kemper for the many demonstrations of that paternal care and kindness which he has shown to us and this Diocese, and for that unwearied perseverance in the midst of difficulties and discouragements which he has manifested, in fulfilling with so much faithfulness and ability the duties of his office as Bishop in charge of this Diocese."

We copy the following from the Calendar. In addition to this testimony, we are happy to learn from a lay gentleman of St. Louis, one who suffered in his own family by the Pestilence, that the devotion of our Clergy in this trying time had done much to commend the Church to the people of St. Louis. Bishop Hawks was especially distinguished by his unwearied and faithful labors. He shrank from no fatigue, from no exposure, but gave himself up to the calls of high and holy duty in that spirit of self-sacrifice which our Most Holy Faith prompts. We hope the suggestion of the Calendar will be acted upon.

BISHOP HAWKS.

The zeal and fidelity with which the Bishop of Missouri has devoted himself to all sorts and conditions of men in St. Louis during the pestilence, are widely spoken of, as exemplary. To use a stronger word might wrong the charity, which we doubt not has looked only for a record on high: but we mention it in order to propose one kind of reward from those who having been graciously spared his peculiar trials, are willing to help him bear his ordinary burthens. Let him be assured of our sympathy by contributions, and by clerical recruits. In his bereavement of Mr. Griswold, he has lost as it were a right hand. If he was in want of helpers before, he needs them more than ever at present. If, slightly altering the couplet of Pope, we ask the question—

"Why drew Missouri's bishop purer breath

When nature sickened, and each gale was death?"

We hope the answer is that God has spared him for eminent service in the West. But he must have men; and we hope there are not wanting those who will be ready to join a Bishop who has proved himself worthy of their confidence and love. But he also wants means. His successful experiment at Palmyra, is already exerting the happiest influence, but a little pecuniary aid, just now, would enable Trinity School and its Missionaries to do much more for the diocese, and for the spread of the Church. About one quarter of its scholars are supported by the school itself, and its devoted teachers, Messrs. Corbyn and Cuming, derive no other emoluments from their labors, than their bare subsistence. The school is now filled, so far as present accommodations will allow, and is so deservedly popular, that even dissenters of the strongest prejudices are willing to leave their children in its care, for the sake of its moral influ-

HUME'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND. We have received from the publishers the second volume of this History, and have only to refer our readers to the notice already given of this publication.

From late English Papers.

We find the following statement of Mr. Gorham's case in the last English Churchman. We give also the conclusion of the article published in part last week:

As some misunderstanding may have arisen in the minds of certain persons as to the precise bearing of the decision of the Court of Arches on Mr. GORHAM's case, we think it right to state what the exact meaning of Sir HERBERT JENNER FUST's judgment really was. The Court was only called upon to decide whether the Bishop of Exeter had shown sufficient cause for refusing institution to Mr. GORHAM; or, in other words, whether Mr. GORHAM had not, in the book by him published, and admitted by his counsel to be evidence, held notions contrary to the Doctrine of the Church of England on the subject of Baptism of Infants.

Now, in truth, the Court had only to decide this one point; viz., whether or not the Articles of the Church of England alone are to be considered as sufficient exponents of her Doctrine; it having been so argued for Mr. GORHAM. While, on the other side, it was submitted that the Articles alone were not sufficient; but that the Liturgy and offices of the Church must be referred to for maintaining the true intent and meaning of the Articles and Doctrines of the Church.

The Judgment then expressed the opinion, that the Liturgy and offices of the Church of England were to be taken as exponents of the Articles; and, if so, it was clear that Mr. GORHAM held notions opposite to the very language of the Office of Baptism; thus laying a sufficient ground for the Bishop's objection. As for the majority of the Authorities quoted, the Court said in effect, that, however much they might be entitled to respect, they were private opinions.

Just as Mr. BAPTIST NOEL, and Mr. BAPTIST NOEL's ambitious volume, had sunk into quiet oblivion, he has adopted an unexpected method of bringing himself once more before the "religious world." He had taken it into his head that he had never been baptised—"only sprinkled in infancy"—and therefore, on Thursday last, after preaching and reading a prayer of his own composing, which he, "an unbaptised person," recommended to Christians in general, he descended into a "pool" of water, and was "baptised" by a Dissenting teacher!

ROME.

Gen. Oudinot having resigned in Rome civil power, a commission, composed of three Cardinals, Altieri, Vannicelli, and Della Genga, have been empowered by the Pope to form a ministry and restore the temporal authority of the supreme Pontiff, and have arrived at Rome.

"The first acts of the commission were to annul all the laws made since the 16th of November, to reconstitute the tribunals, and to reinstate the functionaries who had been dismissed. Great dissatisfaction was created in Rome by a measure, by which all the paper money put in circulation during the existence of the provisional government, was lowered in value to the extent of 35 per cent., or, in other words, the 100 piastre note was brought down to 65 piastres. This measure gave the greater annoyance because it fell principally on the middle classes and on the retail storekeepers, who, for several months past, have had no other money for the carrying on of their ordinary business. The Government has also cried down the base coin issued by the republican authorities."

The other acts of the Pontifical Commission are equally ominous. They comprise the reestablishment of the ecclesiastical courts; the abolition of all laws enacted since the 6th of November, 1848; the dismissal of all persons who served under the Republic, and other measures so absolute and despotic, that nothing but the presence of French troops prevents a general convulsion. In short, the French Republic has "liberated the Romans with a vengeance."

It was reported that the Pontifical troops would be disbanded, and that the garrison of Rome would be formed of French, Spanish, Austrian, and Neapolitan soldiers.

Beverly, Sept. 3, 1849.

The undersigned, having had his attention directed to an article in a recent number of the Banner, under the head "Desecration," deems it a duty to the Church of which he is a member, to make the following statement:

The circumstances which led to the matter of which complaint is made, were as stated in the article; the indisposition of the Pastor, and the deficiency of a supply. In reference, however, to the course pursued, he has simply to say, without the least reflection upon any of the parties concerned, it had not his approval, because he is too much the friend of good order to wantonly break through any regulations to which he has made himself responsible. And it is hardly necessary to add, it would have been as little approved by his Diocesan.

HOLY SENSIBILITY.—NO. II. EXCEPTIONS.

MR. EDITOR:—Not in the Psalms only are the emotions of piety acknowledged; the doctrine is amply ratified in the New Testament,—to which indeed, equally with the Old, the Psalms belong. The Redeemer came to "bind up the broken hearted," and he blessed those "who mourn," those who "weep now," the grief being eminently for sin; and invited the "weary and heavy laden" to His "rest." There are "things whereof men are ashamed," and, on the other hand, the "hope that maketh not ashamed." There are the "godly sorrow unto repentance," and the "righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost,"—"rejoicing in hope of the glory of God,"—"believing, and rejoicing with joy, unspeakable." The upright are "begotten again to a lively hope," and "rejoice that their names are written in heaven." Among the "fruits of the Spirit" are "love, joy, peace;" and "hope is the anchor of the soul," and "entereth within the veil" to the High Priest there, and to the very Presence there enthroned.

Indubitably then there are feelings in religion; happiness is with piety, unhappiness with the want of it. As the general Rule, some correspondence obtains between our emotions and our religious standing; the soul hath confidence towards God when morally regenerate, when full of grace, when effectually prompting us to "walk worthy of our vocation;" and a sorrowful heart implies the need of a scrutiny and an amendment of our spirit and our life. To this Rule, however, there are exceptions, which we now consider. Delusions may have the mastery; and some of these are transient, some more lasting.

There are transient delusions of feeling. When the conscience of a religious man is for a time lulled through inveterate deceitfulness of heart, he may yield to infirmity, fall into sin, into great sin, while his feelings, as too long with David, give no warning; yet conscience, the striving Spirit within, shall at length burst the fetter, throw off the delusion, and bitter, most bitter emotions overwhelm his soul. The anomaly comes of grace being a warfare, and its victory not being final till death. But if it endure and be long protracted, the delusion turns to wilful obstinacy and a fall from grace—Again: The inner man, renewed and sanctified, may sink into gloom; though not aware of any new transgression, or of greater infirmity than it daily struggles with and masters, it may find cheerfulness give way, and spiritual sadness close around. This comes, not through inconstancy of the Spirit, but (when not chargeable to the body alone) through the mental fluctuations of the "vessel" in which His "treasure" is preserved. There has probably been a glance at former sins, and their image is retained in the eye of consciousness, with little attention to that process, while over attention is fastened on the result, the burden of heaviness. The erring emotion is seldom perdurably continued in the upright soul: it enhances the purification of the heart; and then the regular tranquil currents resume their course.

Other deviations from the general Rule are more lasting, worse in inveteracy and in discouragement. The conscience of the wicked, or of the renewed man who has again multiplied iniquity, may, for years, for life, remain in false quiet, without a thought of conversion or reconversion. Or, on the other hand, the righteous, even the humble, cautious, and persevering upright, well advanced in the new birth, may have clouds overhang their spirit so perpetually that they doubt their whole interest in the beatitude hereafter. These are the two leading errors unjustly obtruded upon the frank and clear doctrine of religious emotions,—false tranquillity in the bad,—incongruous dejection in the godly.

False Tranquillity.

It is chiefly found among those wicked who have never given devout attention to their souls. They persevere in sin, heedless of what may follow, deriding or not regarding expostulation from without, and with no acknowledged reprimand within. Sometimes, however, they allege that, having no misgivings, they care not for reformation or a wholesome judgment of their case. Only a few of them profess atheism; and none are ignorant of better movings, which they strangle immediately; but there is "blindness of heart" which they love, and "hardness of heart" which they prefer. When they do reason at all on this matter, their poor argument is—that now is the time for gratification, and conversion may wait till some "convenient season,"—that men may continue while they list in worldliness and sin, and leave them when the desires change; or, some may plead that the moment ordained has not arrived, and that when it shall come the compunction will be irresistible. By delusions of this kind their feelings are drugged, and they will think themselves as free to sin as to reform. But let them count their oft scruple and perplexity at their conduct and principles, and the repeated silence they have forced upon that voice of alarm. Did such a doubt ever attend a purpose that agreed with the laws of God or man? And what is the scruple and hesitation, but a Power within, condemning evil actions and the whole choice of evil? habit, wrong habit, confirms their natural predilection, and blunts their sensibility to the virtuous impulses of that Power. What then does the tranquillity amount to? to the ease of a wound not healed, but callous; to the dullness of an appetite allayed with poison instead of food: it is a lightness of heart as from intoxication on the death bed. Properly speaking, the most reckless have religious emotions,—but unsteady and unwelcome. Holy Sensibility obeys its laws. There are periods when the violent contest of the Spirit within is painful, torturing; and in those periods they may learn the true character, the entire aspect, of their feelings. Their hearts, honestly searched out, will bear faithful testimony to their danger.

Another case of false tranquillity is that of the pious, the once pious, who sin and continue in sin without accusing emotions. Shall we say they are tranquil because God appoints or permits their fall, in order that His grace may exalt them higher? Not so,—no such appointment whatever,—no permission beyond the permission of free, yet responsible choice in all probationary creatures: and He who declared, "their damnation is just who say let us do evil that good may come," will not lighten their "damnation" who deliberately impute such inderirection to Him. We therefore regard the once upright, after a deep and continued fall, as wicked, wicked as they who never would "taste the good gift,"—worse, it may be, and in greater peril. And they must ascribe their imperturbation to the prevalence of other feelings over those of religion. The delights of sin, the morbid gratification of obstinacy, rule their mind,—while the importunity of conscience is daily scattered to the winds, like perfume on the blast of pestilence. They also, like the unconverted, have a testimony of the Spirit within their souls, and the testimony is right and faithful, that they have lapsed from their divine sonship: but they shut the spiritual ear, and refuse to "hear the voice of the Charmer, charm He never so wisely," never so earnestly. The clear "light in them has become darkness,"—and "how great that darkness!"

In terming these cases of false tranquillity exceptions to the Rule of Holy Sensibility, we take their superficial aspect. A deeper search finds the Rule itself acting in secret. Whether the infatuated sinner hath formerly obeyed the Spirit, or hath "always resisted,"—the "still, small voice" is with him, and is consciously and wilfully disregarded.

Incongruous Dejection.

Those who cannot acquire calm feelings in religion should examine thoroughly their conscience, lest there be a secret sin; for the involuntary gloom and unrest may be faithful monitors; and the only means of changing them into peace and gladness is to search unsparingly for the hidden defection. This will not be a gross iniquity; for if such misdoings are not utterly forsaken, piety is yet far off, and the dejection is readily accounted for. We rather seek among our infirmities and omissions for the cause of trouble. Are not our devotions languid, and holy meditation reluctantly prosecuted? and this, whether in private, or in God's house? and is not the Eucharist neglected? Are we not over earnest for business, pleasure, advancement? Are temper and passion duly regulated? Such errors, (and there are more of them,) though accounted too slight for a burden, may disturb the hallowed feelings. And they should be broadly inspected and completely reformed, if we would "know the way of peace." There is a yet more deceitful class of infirmities. The thoughts, the desires, may sometimes be in willing bondage; so that, while outward temptation and actual sin are avoided, the imagination may stubbornly as well as inconsiderately roam; roam, perhaps with hesitation, yet with mute satisfaction, to forbidden joys, whether of renown or gain, whether of pride or grossness. The remedy is diligent prayer, diligence in all duty, and in wholesome occupation of the intellect diligent watchfulness, and drawing the mind to other things. But, when frailty of this kind mingles with religion, who can wonder that sad emotions warn the heart of the villainess and the peril of such indulgence? The Rule, though somewhat latently, holds in both these examples: neither is a perfect exception.

Not unfrequently, however, involuntary fears un hinge the soul in whose renovation there is no such canker; the holy in thought, in conduct, in devoutness, may have unaccountable agitation and misgiving concerning their everlasting welfare. One cause is constitutional infirmity, whether of body or mind, a natural or habitual tendency to dwell on the gloomy aspect—and that can generally be found or imagined. This anomalous defect both violates the Law of due sensibility and proves it. And Wise Providence may allow the radical defect as a serviceable probation. When therefore a well established holy life and humble temper, evincing the heavenly filiation, find not their glad tranquillity, let the soul bow meekly to the deprivation. Yet, while conceding the emotional privilege, it may find intellectual comfort in remembering that works, not feelings, follow the saint to the tribunal above,—works, including faith, faith in the merits alone of the Redeemer. And, in full acceptance of this truth, the mourning soul can be thankful that the Spirit hath conferred substantial graces, and can freely acquiesce in any trial, even that of want of comfort in religion, ordered by Him who, though "a God that hideth Himself," is "not willing that any should perish." With others, the gloomy tinge of piety is not so much inherent, but more the result of incidental grief or disappointment, a misfortune, a calamity, a bereavement, a melancholy sympathy, extending its shadow over the eternal prospects of the soul. Instead of making religion the solace, the contagion of earthly sorrow is allowed to poison the very current of celestial happiness. Why is it thus? Why is the Comforter entangled in griefs, not of His producing? The understanding bows to the will of Providence; but the heart repines, and, with the "deceitfulness" belonging to it, crowds its repinings upon religion; and so the dejection is rather discontent than religious disconsolation. And in proportion as the discontent is to be faulted, the Rule of pious feeling obtains; it is the silent murmur that repels tranquillity, though men see this but faintly, and though the mistake ought scarcely to be rebuked by men. Vanquish the lurking discontent; and the cloud will rapidly dissolve. A third cause of unreasonable apprehension, in the truly pious, is a slavish regard to the feelings which others of the godly have experienced,—granting that neither simulation nor dissimulation are presumable. A friend narrates, or a book describes, the terrors, agitations, rejoicings, raptures, of some of the converted,—too frequently tinted by an undisciplined imagination, wild religious dreams being made part of the emotions coming from the Holy Spirit. The unfortified hearer regards doubtfully the practical graces he has acquired, and turns from them with grief, because they want the high colouring which only a vivid fancy can impart. Here is defect enough to bring his inquiet within the Rule. Where is "the liberty with which Christ hath made him free," that the son of God becomes the slave of a fanaticism! that he does not recoil from the dishonour to the Paraclete of "calling any man on earth his master" in the paraclete privilege! And why long more for glowing enthusiasm than for larger wealth, since neither the one nor the other can be "taken out of this world!" Not in emotions, but only in good example, hath God set man for the copy of his fellow man; deeds are visible, and may be imitated; feelings are invisible, and, beyond the inspired delineation, cannot be compared with accuracy.

The exceptions, or apparent exceptions, to the Rule of Holy Sensibility, its corresponding to our godliness or ungodliness, forbid absolute reliance on the current of pious feeling, and warn us to spare no prudence in whatever we think or say on so delicate a matter. Yet emotions there are, and the proper ones have the authority of the revealed word. And it is a great happiness that most of their irregularities, if impartially probed, are not veritable deviations from their agreement with our standing in religion. Cautiously examined, and humbly estimated, they are a wholesome warning, or a wholesome comfort and encouragement, indicating, with a probability not to be disregarded, the "accusing or else the excusing of the conscience."

Abuse of what is good is no argument against its use. No further reply need be given to the objection—that enthusiasm often makes wild work, and sometimes vile work, with the operation or with the counterfeit of Holy Sensibility. Human distortion and corruption cannot vacate a gift of God, or abolish the channels of grace. Be gentle, not rash; be wise, not urgent; and the hallowed current is safe and propitious. O.

*Three articles were promised in the Banner of May 12; they have become six,—written mainly about thirty years ago, and treating doctrinally, rather than hortatively, points intimately connected with personal religion, with moral regeneration, with the moral and intellectual (not sensuous,) feelings of grace. MR. EDITOR:—If you think the following remarks worthy of insertion, they are at your disposal.

Bronchitis, I am thankful to say, is no ailment of mine. But there are sufferers; and there will probably be many more. As one who, not unemployed nor only partially engaged, has been officiating fifteen years in the Ministry of the Church, without even the incipient symptoms of the much dreaded clerical complaint, it may be allowed me to state some particulars in regard to certain things which I have observed. Perhaps my remarks may serve as useful hints.*

It has been the observation of others, that the greater amount of preaching, either in frequency, or in the effort made, does not seem to be attended with greater liability to this disease. Some have said the use of water in the course of preaching should be avoided, as tending to induce the disorder. Facts do not appear to support this opinion. Indeed our clergy, who, upon other considerations, require no caution on this head, are found to be much more liable to the disease than the Methodist preachers, who drink liberally of water during their whole exercise. Last Fall, on an occasion when I was abroad, and was waiting alone in a Physician's office, I read an article, in a Medical Journal, which so exactly agreed with my previous experience, that I was inclined to regard some suggestions extending farther than my observations had gone. And I can now state that they are very valuable. Not having the article at hand, nor even remembering the title of the Periodical in which it appeared, I cannot directly avail myself of it.

It is an old, and I think a good rule, to commence the exercise of the voice in a speech, sermon, &c., with the lungs inflated. This however, is apt to lead to the injurious practice of keeping them in that state. And such a practice must inevitably result in some form of disease. It requires the professional gentleman to determine its nature; whether, for instance, it is likely to be bronchitis. My observation is that preachers of written sermons or readers, suffer oftener than those who speak extemporaneously. A Methodist who, from camp-meeting to camp-meeting is employed at the height of his voice, escapes with impunity; while a minister, with a written discourse, delivered at a moderate elevation, may become a sufferer. Is there not a connexion between this fact, and the different manner in which these speakers perform their breathing? The one, who has the written discourse, has better measured sentences. And in the delivery, he knows where they begin and where they are to end. As a consequence of what is, in one sense, an advantage, he commences his sentences, well charged by a full inflation of his lungs: and then without regard to carefully exhausting them, he inhales again, and so continues. The extemporaneous speaker, in sentences of various lengths, which are not previously determined, and for the delivery of which, therefore, he cannot make the express inhalations adapted to them, is often exhausted of breath in a long period with a half-dozen parenthesis. It is painful to hear him, and he is a momentary sufferer. But may not this very circumstance guard him against serious consequences? For my own part, in the solution of this question, I consider the fact, that the air once inhaled and altered in the lungs, unless entirely exhaled, remains occupying the place, which, in the natural process of respiration, would be emptied to receive another portion of air containing the oxygen necessary to wholesome breathing. Many persons know of a very disagreeable sensation, which it is difficult to define. I speak of it as a disability to draw what we commonly term a long breath. I have found it very apt to follow long and uninterrupted writing. And to my great comfort I have found perfect relief, by carefully (even with an effort) exhaling the last portion of air from the lungs. By thus removing the carbonic acid, there is capacity for the reception of unaltered air. It seems to be nature's desire after that which causes the repeated efforts to "get a long breath." For in reality we get more breath than we ordinarily do with less effort. But still there remains behind that vitiated air, which, after the chemical changes by contact with the blood, is unfit to meet the craving for pure air. These observations of mine confirm, in my own mind, the importance of due regard to expiration, as well as inspiration; a point insisted on in the article mentioned at the beginning of this communication.

Obituary.

DIED, in Newark, Del., on Friday, Aug. 17, Thomas Blandy, Esq., in the 61st year of his age. Mr. Blandy was one of the originators of St. Thomas's Church, Newark, and during the few years of its existence has been one of its principal supporters. As its senior warden he watched over its concerns with interest, and while in the enjoyment of health was active in the promotion of its welfare. He was a man of upright character, and a useful citizen. An habitual attendant on the ordinances of the house of God, he evinced in his daily life the influence of his religion. He had but a few days before returned from a voyage to Europe, undertaken for the benefit of his health, when, after once more enjoying the caresses of domestic affection, he quietly sunk into the arms of death. His death is a severe loss to his family and the parish of which he was a member, but our grief is tempered by the promises of Christ, and the recollection of the blessedness of those who die in the Lord. BRITISH SOVEREIGNS.

The following will be convenient for those who wish to fix in their minds the succession of sovereigns on the British throne:

First William the Norman;
Then William his son,
Henry, Stephen and Henry;
Then Richard and John.
Next Henry the Third;
Edwards, one, two and three;
And again after Richard,
Three Henrys we see.
Two Edwards, third Richard,
If rightly I guess;
Two Henrys, sixth Edward,
Queen Mary, Queen Bess;
Then Jamie, the Scotsman,
Then Charles, whom they slew,
Yet received after Cromwell
Another Charles too;
Next James the Second
Ascended the throne;
Then good William and Mary Together came on,
Till Anne, Georges four,
And fourth William, all past,
God sent us Victoria,
May she long be the last!

THE VATICAN.—The Vatican, which crowns one of the seven hills of Rome, is an assemblage or group of buildings, covering a space of 1200 feet in length, and 1,000 feet in breadth. It is built upon the spot which was occupied by the gardens of Nero. It owes its original to the Bishops of Rome, who erected an humble residence on its site in the early part of the sixth century. Pope Eugenius III. rebuilt it on a magnificent scale, about the year 1150. A few years afterwards Innocent II. gave it up as a lodging to Peter II., king of Arragon. In 1405, Clement V., at the instigation of the king of France, removed the Papal See from Rome to Avignon, when the Vatican remained in a condition of obscurity and neglect for more than seventy years. But soon after the return of the Pontifical court at Rome, an event which had been so earnestly prayed for by the poor Patriarch, and which finally took place in 1736, the Vatican was put in a state of repair, again enlarged, and thenceforward considered as the regular palace and residence of the Popes, who, one after another, added buildings to it, and gradually enriched it with antiquities, statues, pictures, and books, until it became the richest repository in the world.

Its library was commenced fourteen years ago. It contains 40,000 manuscripts, among which are some by Pliny, St. Thomas, St. Charles Borromeo, and many Hebrew, Syriac, Arabian, and Armenian Bibles. The whole of the immense buildings forming the Vatican are filled with statues, found beneath the ruins of ancient Rome, with paintings by the masters, and with curious medals, and antiques of almost every description. When it is known that there have been exhumed more than 70,000 statues from the ruined temples and palaces of Rome, the reader can form some idea of the riches of the Vatican.

The Vatican will ever be held in veneration by the student, the artist, and the scholar. Raffaele and Michael Angelo are enthroned here, and their throne will be as durable as the love of beauty and genius in the hearts of their worshippers.—Christian Advocate.

ONE SIN.—Many afflictions will not cloud and obstruct peace of mind so much as one sin: therefore, if ye would walk cheerfully, be most careful to walk holily. All the winds about the earth make not an earthquake, but only that within.—Archbishop Leighton.

PROTESTANT DEACONESSSES.

The Rev. Thos. Fliedner, of Kaiserswerth, in Rhenish Prussia, arrived recently in this country with four deaconesses for an establishment at Pittsburgh, under the direction of the Rev. Wm. Passavant. The plan embraces a hospital and a school for the training of deaconesses. The institution founded by Mr. Fliedner at Kaiserswerth has attracted much attention abroad and in this country. Mr. Passavant, on a visit to Germany a few years since, became much interested in the establishment, and has since been making constant efforts to introduce the plan into our country. It is said to be a reviving of the ancient order of deaconesses alluded to in the epistles of Paul.

The plan adopted at Mr. Fliedner's institution may be a very useful one in some respects. The rules of the establishment are the following:

"The candidates must not be under eighteen years of age, and serve from six months to two years for probation. After this probationary time, those among them who have been found fit individuals for the work of Christ, receive, during divine service, a solemn Christian blessing, and then enter upon their duties as deaconesses of the infirmary, which contains from 100 to 110 beds. They engage themselves to serve at least five years, after which time they are allowed to leave, or may renew their engagement. It is understood, that if nearer, personal, or family duties should make them wish for a change of situation during that period, every reasonable facility is granted to them for that purpose, by the direction vested in a committee. They receive no salary; a very moderate annual sum is paid by the institution or family they serve to the institution at Kaiserswerth, which defrays their personal wants, enables them to keep themselves decent and respectable, and entirely provides for those whose health has suffered in consequence of their hard service."

Since the origination of this establishment, much good has been done. This is undeniable. For twelve years it has been in operation, and nearly two hundred deaconesses are now laboring in different parts of Germany.—The hospital at Kaiserswerth has received during that time about 2000 patients. The plan contemplates a hospital, a seminary for educating young female teachers of infant and day schools, and an establishment to train deaconesses for the nursing and moral improvement of female prisoners. In the various departments that it embraces it has been very successful, and a prospect of continued usefulness is opened before it.—Christian Chronicle.

MOTHERS AND CHILDREN SHOULD ALWAYS BE AT HOME IN THE EVENING.

In a tract recently published by the Maryland Tract Society, the following passage occurs. It contains truths that will be responded to at once by every one.

"One of the grossest neglects of youth, producing incalculable mischief and ruin, is the improper spending of the evenings. Darkness was created for quiet; home is the place of quiet. Darkness is temptation to misconduct; suffering the young to be out when the light of day does not restrain them from misconduct, is training them to it. We have already an abundant harvest of this seeding. Riots, mobs, crimes giving fearful forebodings, are the result of youth becoming fit agents of outrage by running uncared for on evenings."

"What we see in these respects, is deplorable enough; but what is this, compared with what we do not see—multitudes making themselves miserable and noxious in this world:—and what in that to come?"

"Parents should look at the truth, that evening pleasures and recreations are often dearly purchased:—the price, their own impaired comfort, and the blighted prospects of their offspring. It must be obvious, that in this matter there can be no prescribed rule. There can be no interdict of all evening recreations and employments, yet there is an evil not only destructive to youth, but planting thorns in many paths, and covering many lives with desolation. The reformation demanded must proceed from judgment and conscience, and for this purpose judgment and conscience must be enlightened. Heads of families must learn, that the place on earth best adapted to be a blessing is—home; and by example and wholesome restraint they must teach this truth to all under them. Especially should home during Sabbath hours be consecrated. Sabbath mornings and evenings are blessed indeed, when they gather the family into the circle of converse and instruction; and parents and children, masters and apprentices and servants, in the presence and by the grace of God who has made them and placed them in their respective stations, raise themselves to the exalted level of the truth, and they are invested with capacity and obligations in their respective conditions, assigned them by an all-wise Providence, to help each other onward to honor, glory and immortality, eternal life. Souls perish in everlasting death; they perish through neglect. Who would stand at the judgment of the great day under the imputation of that neglect! Do you say, 'Not I!'—then think of these things."

HEART SEARCHINGS.

Inquire well what is thy hope, what thy heart readiest turns to and cleaves to, to comfort itself in any distress; yes, in the times of the greatest ease, what are thy thoughts most biased and turned to with ofttest and deepest delight? Canst thou say it is to God?—that thy heart has got that retreat, and is inured to that—is frequently there throughout the day—turns by and passes over husband, or wife, or children, or riches, or delights, or anything that would stand in thy way, and stays not till it befat Him;—and there rejoices in His love, sits down under His shadow, content and happy that others should share and rule the world as they please; that thou dost not envy them, with all their gay hopes and gay prospects; yea, possibly, scarce at any time, feel that sensible presence of God and shining of His clear-discovered love upon thee, yet still He is thy hope, thou art at a point with all the world, hast given up all to wait on Him, and hope for Him, dost account thyself richer in thy simple hope than the richest man on earth in his possessions. Then art thou truly so; for the hope of God is heaven begun, and heaven complete is the possessing of Him.—Archbishop Leighton.

COLLEGE OF ST. JAMES,

Washington county, Maryland.

The eighth session will open on Monday, October 1st, on which day the punctual attendance of all the students is requested. The duties of the classes are promptly recommended, and it is very important that all their members, new or old, should take their places at the opening of the session.

The academical year extends from the 1st of October to the 1st of August; there being but one vacation, August and September.

In the COLLEGE, all the usual classes under a full corps of Professors, have for several years been pursuing the entire course of collegiate studies equal to that prescribed in the older colleges of the north. At the recent Commencement, the third graduating class received their academical degrees.

In the GRAMMAR SCHOOL, which immediately adjoins the college, the preparatory classes are carefully trained by competent instructors under the supervision of the Professors of the College. Thus pupils may enter the Institution at an early age and pursue their entire course of study under the same direction until they graduate. The mercantile department embraces those partial members of any of the collegiate or preparatory classes, who may be preparing for the counting-room or other non-professional life. Such students are admitted to all the privileges and advantages of their several classes, substituting in place of some of the classical studies, such as are more necessary as a preparation for business.

French is a regular study without extra charge in all the classes. In addition to the French, the mercantile students will be taught, without charge, German or some other modern language.

The location of the College is perfectly healthful; and there are no towns or villages near to present the temptations so dangerous to the young. Moral and religious education is one chief design of the Institution. The charge, covering all academical and domestic expenses, is $225 per session of ten months. The rules of the college carefully restrict any other expenses of the student.

All the departments are under the immediate supervision of the undersigned, to whom application may be made for copies of the "Register" of the college and for further information, as well as for the admission of pupils.

Extract from the address of the Bishop of Pennsylvania, in the Convention of 1848.

"The female school, known as the Retreat, in School-house Lane, near Germantown, has been signally favored, not only by the smiles of Divine Providence, but also with the influence of the Divine Spirit. Considerably more than a third of all the resident or boarding pupils have within the last two months been confirmed, and have also become communicants, under circumstances which have inspired me with the most lively hopes in respect to their future character and influence as Christian women. The order and spirit prevailing throughout the school have been excellent; the discipline is quiet, effective, and eminently domestic; the position of the buildings and grounds is alike beautiful and healthy; and the patronage bestowed upon it most encouraging."

The year consists of two terms, of 14½ and 29 weeks, commencing April 10th and September 4th.

Extracts from Bishop Potter's Annual Addresses to the Convention of the Diocese

To the Convention of 1846.—"It gives me great pleasure to inform the Convention that some important measures have been adopted during the last year, towards securing to our youth the advantages of superior classical instruction, in connection with proper religious training. The classical department of the Protestant Episcopal Academy, which was established in this city more than fifty years since, through the agency of Bishop White and others, has been re-opened under the auspices of the Rev. Dr. Hare, and will afford to parents in this vicinity the means of educating boys in the most approved manner. Its funds have enabled the Trustees to make liberal provision for the sons of Clergymen, and others, on whom the charges of instruction would fall heavily, and it is hoped that the Academy will prove rich in blessing to many families."

To the Convention of 1847.—"I had occasion in my last address to call the attention of the Diocese to the provisions, which had just been made, to secure to the sons of churchmen a superior classical training, in connection with proper religious culture. The Episcopal Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, had then just been opened. The anticipations entertained of its usefulness have been more than realized. Its numbers have increased beyond expectation, and its discipline and course of instruction are worthy of all praise. In its influence generally, and especially in its care of the manners, morals and religious principles of the young, it vindicates its claims to the confidence of all the members of our Church; and having occasion frequently myself to visit the school, I feel the greater assurance in recommending it to general favour."

To the Convention of 1848.—"The Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, has had a career, thus far, of great and uninterrupted prosperity; and it is exerting an influence on the principles and character of our children which will be felt for good long after our own earthly course has terminated. It now numbers nearly one hundred pupils."

To the Convention of 1849.—"The Episcopal Academy in this city has reached, under the wise and efficient administration of Dr. Hare, its maximum number of pupils, as situated at present; and its Trustees are about to erect a large edifice on Locust street near Broad, sufficient for the accommodation of from two to three hundred."

Church Intelligence.

NORTH CAROLINA.

The Bishop was sufficiently restored to health to enable him to enter upon his official duty the 2d Sunday after Trinity, when, in St. John's Church, Rutherfordton, he admitted the Rev. Jarvis Buxton to the Holy Order of Priests. The Rev. Messrs. Shepherd, Watson and Huske were present, and assisted in the services. In the evening, after prayers said by the Rev. Mr. Buxton, the Bishop confirmed eight persons. The attendance upon the services and the manifest earnestness of the people, evinced a strong and growing church feeling. The church is nearly ready for consecration.

The following Sunday, (3d after Trinity,) he officiated in "St. John's in the Wilderness," Flat Rock. As the clergyman remains here only during the summer, and had just arrived from the low country, no persons were prepared for confirmation. On Tuesday, (June 26th,) he officiated at Asheville, Buncombe Co. A strong effort is being made to build a church in this place.

On St. Peter's day, (June 28th,) he officiated in Grace Church, Morgantown, and confirmed six persons. The attendance was such as to indicate a lively interest in the services of the Church. The interest of the occasion was increased by the unexpected confirmation of a preacher of the Methodist connexion.

The next Sunday, (4th after Trinity,) he consecrated to Almighty God, St. Paul's Church, in Wilkesboro. This is the first church building of any description erected in one of the oldest towns in the mountain district of this state. It is built of brick, in the "First Pointed Style," and consists of a chancel 14 by 18 feet, nave 44 by 22 feet, porch on south side of the nave, and a vestry 12 by 14 feet on the north of the chancel. The east window is composed of three narrow lancets, (the middle one being the largest,) separated by brick mullions. In the west end is a couplet, and above it, in the point of the gable, is a small triangular window. The windows show no wood except a narrow strip into which the sash closes, the brick being moulded to form a flare of the walls from it to the inside and outside. They are filled (temporarily it is hoped) with common glass, the light being toned down by oiled muslin, stretched tightly on the inside of the sash. That on the east windows is coloured. The rafters, braces, and sheeting of the roof are of pine, oiled; the doors and furniture of the nave, chancel and vestry, are of black walnut. The pulpit stands in the north-east corner of the nave; the font in the intersection of the passage from the door with the one running the length of the nave. The sacristy is raised three steps above the rest of the floor of the chancel, (which is two steps higher than that of the nave,) and is separated from it by a light railing, painted with ultramarine. The credence is a bracket on the north of the altar. The plastering of the inside of the walls has the appearance of yellow sandstone, the natural colour of the "rough finish" or "second coat" below the windows; they are hard finished and painted a dark brown. The belfry is framed upon the rafters of the west end of the nave, and contains a small but excellent bell cast by Dyer, of Philadelphia. Mr. J. M. Gries, a young architect of Philadelphia, furnished the congregation with a plan and aided them in carrying it out. The entire cost of the building, including furniture, bell, carpeting, Bible, vestments, and service book, cost about $1400, showing that a church, in church style and completely furnished, costs no more (if as much) than the monsters, with the head of a Grecian temple and the body of a meeting-house, so often erected for the sake of economy. The fact that this sum has been already paid (almost entirely without aid) by the congregation, which but two years ago was composed of three ladies, and now numbers but ten communicants of moderate means, proves the truth of the old adage, "where there's a will there's a way." Although the day was stormy the concourse of people was large; many were prevented from coming to the town by the water-courses having been swollen by the rain the night before, and which continued all the morning. The Bishop, with the Rev. Messrs. Mott, Parker, French, Prout, and the missionary in charge, went in procession to the church, which is situated on a commanding eminence. The services, with the sermon of the Bishop on the text, "We preach Christ crucified," in the course of which he explained how the arrangement of the building preached the same great truth, served in a great degree to remove the prejudice which had existed against the doctrines of the Gospel, as taught by the Church, in the surrounding country.

In the evening the Bishop baptized three adults, (three others had been baptized the evening before,) and at night he confirmed twelve persons. St. Paul's Church is open every day at sunrise and sunset for prayers, and on Sundays and Holy-days at 11 A. M., for the ante-communion service and sermon or lecture. It may be interesting to those churchmen who know what an effect the prejudice excited against the church by designing persons had on the elections in this county last year, to learn that, though a much more violent and unprincipled effort was made this year to prevent the election of a member of St. Paul's on the ground of his religious opinions, it has entirely failed. The very opposition has excited, in every part of this county, that earnest spirit of inquiry which the Church always courts. None but she can so excite the malice of the evil one, or gain by his attacks. A short time ago the "Prayer Book" lay uncalled for upon the shelves of the merchants, while now the supply does not meet the demand. Tracts on the Church, but especially the Prayer Book, are eagerly sought for. Prayer Books which remained unheeded and almost unknown in the houses of descendants of Churchmen, who scarcely knew that the Church of their fathers still existed, are now carefully and it is to be hoped prayerfully read. The spirit of inquiry spreads with the report of the opposition to distant places, where the service of the Church has never yet been heard. The greatest desire prevails to hear the Bishop; and the congregations, whenever he has officiated, have been unusually large and deeply attentive. Not only he, but all the clergy in the mountain district, receive applications for services in every direction. On the 6th, 7th and 8th Sundays after Trinity, the Bishop officiated to large congregations at the different stations of the Watega missions.

The 9th Sunday after Trinity he officiated in the Chapel of the Holy Cross—Valle Crucis—when, after fifteen baptisms, he confirmed thirteen persons. The congregation was very large. This chapel, which, but two years ago, was attended by but few besides the members of the mission family, is now filled every Sunday with earnest worshippers. The seed which appeared lost when sown is now producing an abundant harvest.

On the 10th Sunday after Trinity, the Bishop officiated twice in Lenoir, Caldwell Co., and confirmed four persons. One of those confirmed in Wilkesboro belonged to this parish. The previous day he had officiated in the valley of the Yadkin. He returned to Valle Crucis to hold an ordination on the 11th Sunday after Trinity, but the necessary papers not having arrived, it was postponed to be held at Morgantown.

On Wednesday, (Aug. 22d,) he officiated on the Yadkin river, in Caldwell Co., between Lenoir and Wilkesboro, and confirmed three persons. After service he went to a private house and confirmed a coloured man about 99 years old, but in the full possession of his faculties. He had been baptized in the Church in his infancy, and although for many years a pious man, he had not before been blest with an opportunity for confirmation. The Rev. Mr. French, while on a tour of duty, found him and prepared him for confirmation. He had been for years a member of the Methodist connexion, but, as he expressed himself, "he had got among his own people again." This is one of many instances which are continually occurring in this section. Old persons who had been baptized before they removed to this country, where, until within a few years past, the Church has not been known, hear their mother's voice, and find that the bodies they had thought were her are not the body of Christ. A very old man, who had probably not seen or heard the Prayer Book for upwards of sixty years, exclaimed, on hearing a portion of the catechism read, "Why that's the old catechism, the one my mother used to teach me." He did not even recollect that he had been baptized until the words of the catechism awakened the memory of the days of his childhood.

On St. Bartholomew's Day the Bishop officiated twice in St. Philip's Church, Moxville. On the morning of the next day he officiated in St. Andrew's Church, Rowan Co. The next day, (12th Sunday after Trinity,) he confirmed four persons in Christ Church, Rowan Co., and in the evening he officiated in St. Luke's Church, Salisbury.

On Tuesday, (Aug. 28th,) he went to a private house on the Yadkin river, in Wilkes Co., and confirmed and administered the Holy Communion to an infirm member of St. Paul's Church. The next day he administered the Holy Communion in St. Paul's Church, Wilkesboro.

The Bishop seems almost entirely restored to health; and though he has been travelling and officiating almost incessantly, he appears to enjoy better health and spirits than he has done for several years. G.

NEW JERSEY.

The service, in St. Mary's Church, on the eighth Sunday after Trinity, when fourteen pupils of the Schools were confirmed, was of peculiar interest. The parish in Burlington has been closely connected with the Church of England, and deeply indebted to it. The first project for an American Episcopate, proposed one Bishop for the Islands, and one for the Continent; the See of the latter to be at Burlington. The scheme was then enlarged: two for the Islands, and two for the Continent; one at Burlington, and one at Williamsburg, Virginia. In 1714, a convenient mansion house and lands for the episcopal residence, was purchased at the cost of £600 sterling, "situate at Burlington, within the Jerseys." The project was arrested by the death of Queen Anne. The "convenient mansion house" was burnt down. In 1805, the lands were conveyed by the Venerable Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, to the Corporation of St. Mary's Church; and are now its property. The first Minister was one of the first Missionaries of the Society, the Rev. Mr. Talbot.

In the providence of God, the Rev. Ernest Hawkins, since 1839, the Secretary of the Society, making a tour through the country, was the Bishop's guest, at the time of the Confirmation, and took part in the service. In the course of his address, before the Confirmation, the Bishop said: "The present service is a departure from the long established practice of this parish, to have an annual Confirmation at the close of Lent; and it has been occasioned, as you know, by the severe illness, which, for five months, withdrew me from you, and from my work. It has been appointed in immediate reference to the two Christian Schools: which, for so many years, have found a shelter in this parish; the earliest, and the most favoured nursling of that venerable society, to which the Church in America has been indebted for so much. And it is of a strange ordering, that the excellent person, who, for ten years, has been the Secretary of the Society, and within that period has been greatly instrumental in laying the foundation of thirteen Colonial Bishops—New Zealand, Antigua, Guiana, Tasmania, Gibraltar, Fredericton, Colombo, Capetown, Adelaide, Newcastle, Melbourne, (these three in Australia,) Rupert's Land, and Victoria, (Hong Kong)—is here to-day to be partaker of our humble joy."

CONSECRATION AT CLAYVILLE.

On Thursday, the 23d ultimo, the Right Rev. the Bishop of the Diocese, consecrated to the service of Almighty God, St. John's Church, Clayville, Oneida Co. Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, a goodly number of the Clergy and a large congregation assembled upon the occasion. The Bishop and Clergy were received at the door of the Church by the Wardens and Vestrymen, who proceeded with them to the chancel, joining in the responses of the 24th Psalm; after which the Bishop and the Clergy took seats within the chancel-rails.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

BISHOP DE LANCEY'S VISITATION.

On Sunday, August 5th, Bishop DeLancey visited St. John's Church, Clyde, and officiated morning and afternoon. In the morning he preached and confirmed four persons and administered the Holy Communion, and in the afternoon he preached again, the Rev. Mr. Acly, the Missionary of the Station, reading prayers and the confirmation preface, and assisting in the Holy Communion. This Church has been much enlarged and beautified, and will accommodate nearly twice as many attendants as before. The improvement is highly creditable to the congregation.

On Sunday the 12th, the Bishop preached in the morning in Trinity Church, Geneva, and in the evening he held a confirmation in the Chapel of Geneva College, and confirmed two persons. The Rev. Dr. Hale read prayers and preached on the occasion his sermon to the graduating class of the college.

On Sunday, the 19th, Bishop DeLancey visited St. John's Church, Sodus, where he preached both morning and afternoon—at the former service confirming one person on both occasions.

On the 21st, the Bishop consecrated Zion Church, McLean, Tompkins county, to the service of Almighty God, and preached on the occasion. The request to consecrate was presented by Samuel Starr, Senior Warden. The sentence of consecration was read by the Rev. Mr. Foote, the Missionary of the station. Six persons were confirmed, the preface being read by the Rev. Mr. Foote. This is a small, neat and handsome church, erected on a lot of some ten acres, on which there is a Parsonage, at a cost of from eight hundred to a thousand dollars; and it is highly creditable to the small body of zealous, firm, intelligent and pious Churchmen of that village, and particularly to the liberal donor of the lot.

In the afternoon of the same day, the Bishop preached in the Presbyterian house of worship in Cortlandville. A subscription of a thousand dollars has been made in this village, and an excellent lot very liberally offered for the purpose of erecting a Church.—Gospel Messenger.

A CHARGE TO THE CLERGY OF THE DIOCESE OF MARYLAND.

Sound teaching, as distinguished generally from all error; but most especially from those forms and kinds of error which were then most rife.

From the prevalence of these among the clergy it was most necessary to secure the Church: in order to which, provision must be made that they should not be held nor taught.

From the imputation of them it was greatly desirable to secure both the Church herself against the calumnious charges of her adversaries, and the individual members of the clergy against the evil surmises and jealousies to which the troubles of the times made them peculiarly liable. They must be enabled to trust each other; they must be put in a position to claim to be trusted by their brethren of other Churches and by the world.

It is therefore necessary to put forth, not a mere statement of views entertained with relation to this or the other controverted point, but a body of doctrine comprising the whole scheme of their teaching, so far as it was liable to be affected by prevalent errors of any class.

Such was the origin of the many formularies to which the Reformation, in its first stages, gave occasion. None of them was designed—none, certainly, professed—to embody in itself all Christian truth, nor even all saving truth. Still less was it in the contemplation of the framers of any to claim for their contents, as such, the character of matters of faith, in the old well known and settled sense of that expression. They were, at most, Confessions, not Creeds. It was one of the many disgraceful artifices, to which the dissensions of the times furnished temptation, to confound those perfectly distinct characters, and charge the reformers, of various names and shades, with substituting new terms of faith for those of old recognized by the Church of CHRIST. They did no such thing. They proclaimed their acceptance of the old, and adherence to them.

The three Creeds, and the four General Councils were revered and clung to by them all. In their articles and definitions they sought and found "THE faith once delivered to the saints," as it had been drawn from its living source in the Word of God by its Witness and Keeper in all ages. The new articles and definitions were to be as hedges and guards around the sacred unchanged deposit, prepared with reference to present needs and specially adapted to those needs. It was reserved for Rome to commit the sin of attempting to add to the Catholic Faith, by a new creed put forth under pretence of warrant from a packed assembly of Italian Bishops, as a term of admission to communion.

This general reference to the practice of the reformers has been made, because our own Articles of Religion unquestionably had their origin in that practice. The Articles of Torgau, the Confession of Augsburg, the Tetrapolitan Confession, that of Taussan at Copenhagen, the Articles of Smalcald and the First Helvetic Confession, had all preceded the earliest emission of the English Articles, and were more or less in view of their compilers. With but one of these documents, indeed, have our Articles any close relation: but with that one their connexion is of a nature the most intimate and direct, substantiated by superabundant evidence, both internal and circumstantial. In more than one respect the Confession of Augsburg is the source of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Churches of England and America—their prototype in form, their model in doctrine, and the very fountain of many of their expressions, while others are drawn from its derivative expositions and repetitions.

The germ of our Articles is discoverable in a paper prepared by the joint labours of Melancthon and the other divines of Wit-temberg, and of Cranmer, Barnes, Heath and Fox on the part of England, in a negotiation of more than two years duration. More or less of the language of sixteen of the Articles is discoverable in that document, and several of them almost exactly in the form they now bear. This carries nearly one-third of the formulary back to the year 1538, and requires us to look to the circumstances and writings of the English and German divines at that precise period for the illustration of the language then employed. It requires also that no sense be put on those portions of the Articles, as published in 1552, inconsistent with the deliberate and full expressions of views entertained by Cranmer at any time subsequent to the earlier date. When at the later period, he used the same language that he had agreed upon at first, in treating with great deliberation upon those most important topics, the Trinity, the Incarnation, Original Sin, Justification, Good Works, Sin after Baptism, and the One Oblation of CHRIST, it is impossible to doubt that he employed them to express the sense which they had at first conveyed, and in which they had received the sanction of the Lutheran divines.

So again, of seven of the Articles as they now stand, portions are copied verbally from the Confession prepared by the divines of Wittenberg, to be offered to the Council of Trent in 1551. These, however, are all additions made in 1562: and it is observable that they constitute almost all the additions that then were made.

I state these particulars to illustrate the connexion between our Articles and the formulary of Augsburg, and the necessity of watching closely the process of their formation, if we would accurately conceive of their scope and meaning.

It has been rashly supposed that in their preparation there was little or no reference to the differences of opinion among the Reformed, at that time already existing and daily assuming more and more formidable distinctness.

On the contrary, there is sufficient evidence that these were but too plainly in the view of the compilers, and were urged on their attention, both from without, by parties concerned in the continental disputes, and from among themselves, by friends and disciples of the leaders of those parties. It is as true that the articles contain positive doctrine in its negative bearing on opposing error, with relation to the puritanic form of Zuinglian doctrine and discipline, and to some of the Lutheran tenets, as that they do so with reference to Romish corruptions of faith and practice. Neither of those antagonistic forms of heresy was fully matured when the Articles were drawn up. But both existed, not only in the contemplation of the English reformers, but in contact with them, and in garbs and attitudes demanding notice. Of Romanism this will not be questioned, seeing that all acknowledge the articles to be the embodiment of the Reformation as understood and carried out in England. But it is too little noted that, from its earliest stages, the Reformation, as well in England as on the continent, had to struggle with principles and aims claiming to be more thorough than itself, and certainly going beyond it in the remove from the old position. Not a move in the long slow work of forty years* was made without reference to the danger of being dragged forward over an irrecoverable precipice in the effort to get clear of the slough behind. Not a step taken can be understood unless in view of that alternative. Not a document, a formulary, an article, an injunction, an office, a homily, but must be estimated, if truly estimated, as much by the consideration of what it does not contain as of what it does. With reference to Lutheranism, the admirable lectures of Archbishop Laurence have proved this, beyond denial. With reference to Zuinglian and Calvinistic tenets, in addition to the strong proof he has furnished, much may be derived from Calvin's own epistles, and much more of the most striking kind, has been lately made accessible by the publication of the Zurich correspondence.†

In the outset, the leader of the English reformation did dream of the preparation of a formula in which the true reformers of all Europe might unite; and he sought the aid of some of the most eminent in the work. On Melancthon he principally depended, and with reason; for if it could have been effected, that clear head and honest, humble heart were competent to the task. But it soon appeared to be impracticable: and after two years occupied in the publication of the Prayer Book and First Book of Homilies, two more were spent in the adaptation of existing materials afforded by the earlier fruitless negotiations with Germany, to the more matured state of the Reformation, and in moulding the Articles by slow degrees into this near approximation to their present shape which they attained at their first appearance in 1553. The wants of the Church in England were alone in view in this latter process; and it was carried on during the ineffectual struggle of the half-learned Hooper to obtrude his crude Zuinglianism upon the Church of which secular influence had made him a governor. It is only by comparing his two sets of articles with those put out by authority, that we can fully understand how thoroughly his views were rejected and barred out by the adoption of our formulary.

It is, then, my brethren, by no superficial study of our Articles of Religion that we can assure ourselves of an intelligent perception of their true use and bearing; for that no mere parrot-like acquaintance with the letter of their text will qualify us. They must have been studied in their history and sources, in the constant reference not only to the direct intention of their framers, but to the conflicting influences which they had to encounter in the progress of their work, and against which its negative protests are tantamount to positive inculcation of the truth which those erroneous influences were distorting and perverting.

Thus studied—and only when thus studied—they will be truly appreciated as a standard of "the doctrine" of "this Church."

To exhibit that doctrine in its fulness and entireness they make no pretence.* In order to such an exhibition of the teaching of the Church, the Prayer Book, Catechism and Homilies must be employed in connexion with the Articles. But for limitation of doctrine, for its discrimination from error, for protest against perversions and corruptions, they are not only an integral, but an essential portion of the provisions by which continued adherence to the truth in its purity and completeness is secured among us.

As such, they were directly and necessarily comprised in the solemn ordination-vow, "always so to minister the doctrines of CHRIST, as this Church, hath received the same;" and by that vow we are bound to conform our teaching to the pattern and limits furnished in the Articles, more effectually than we could be by any mere subscription of the document.

Much might be said, in illustration of the proportions in which "the doctrine" of "this Church" is contained in the Prayer Book and Catechism, and in the Articles; of the relations between the several formularies in point of necessary priority and ultimate authority; and of the mode and occasion of their use, positively, to ascertain what must be, and negatively, to determine what may not be set forth in our authoritative teaching, as ministers of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. But the great length to which I have already protracted my observations, compels me to conclude.

I do so, then, brethren, in the firm persuasion that whatever failure there may have been in the manner of conveying, the substance of what you have been hearing will have had your assent; and that in my endeavour to state the grounds and extent of our obligation, "with one mind and one mouth to glorify God," in the profession and inculcation of the truth as it is in Jesus, I have only been formally expressing the principles and rule by which it is my happiness to know, that, as a body, the clergy of the diocese of Maryland are governing their course in ministerial duty.

The times seemed to me, to call for an explicit recognition, on our part, of our rule and our responsibilities as teachers. I have hoped that in making it, as I could, I might be regarded as in some degree acting, by privilege of my office, in your name and as our mouth-piece: and that what has been said might in that way acquire a seasonable value and importance which could on no other account belong to it.

BAPTISMAL REGENERATION.

The Bishop followed up this with another question—"Does the Church hold, and do you hold, that infants so baptized are regenerated, independently of the stipulations made by their representatives, or by any others for them?"

Mr. Gorham answered,—"If such infants die before they commit 'actual sin,' the Church holds, and I hold, that they are undoubtedly saved and therefore they must have been regenerated by an act of grace preventive to their baptism, in order to make them worthy recipients of that sacrament. This case is ruled by the Church. But if the infant lives to a period in which it can commit actual sin, the declaration of regeneration must be construed according to the hypothetical principle which I have stated in my replies to questions 5, 6, and 7."

Now, it was not for the Court to deny or controvert the three suppositions to which Mr. Gorham resorted; but his position was that it was not through baptism that grace was conferred. And here the authorities must be looked into upon which the Court was to rely,—and the first was, the public office of baptism of infants. The Church directed that the people were to be admonished that it was most convenient that baptism should not be administered but on Sundays and other holy days, when the most number of people came together, as well for that the congregation there present might testify the receiving of them that were newly baptized into the number of Christ's Church, as also, because in the baptism of infants, every man present might be put in remembrance of his own profession made to God in his baptism.

The first thing that suggested itself in this service was the encouragement which was given to persons to have their children baptized, and the great importance attached by the Church to the early administration of this rite. The congregation were then instructed to pray that God would grant to the child that thing which by nature he could not have; that he might be baptized with water and the Holy Ghost—and the Holy Ghost, not water only,—and received into Christ's Holy Church, and be made a lively member of the same. Then followed a prayer upon this exhortation, beseeching Almighty God to wash and sanctify the Child with the Holy Ghost, that he, being delivered from God's wrath, might be received into the ark of Christ's Church. Another prayer followed, in which the congregation called upon God for the infant, that he, coming to God's holy baptism, might receive remission of his sins by spiritual regeneration—not regeneration simply, nor sacramental regeneration, but spiritual regeneration. After the Gospel was read, the Minister was required to make an exhortation to the people, in which they were told not to doubt that Christ would receive the infant and embrace him with the arms of His mercy. Then came an address to the godfathers and godmothers, after which the Priest offered up a prayer to God that he would sanctify the water to the mystical washing away of sin—an expression to which Mr. Gorham's counsel had expressly drawn the attention of the Court, as meaning a sacramental and not a spiritual washing. The Court confessed that it did not exactly follow that distinction, and the mystical washing away of sin appeared to the Court to mean sanctification by water and the Holy Spirit.

* This appears in the Articles themselves, in their entire want of systematic arrangement; in the form of many of the articles, and the style of title of almost all; and in the absence of all mention of some doctrines fundamentally important, except as they are involved or stated in the Creeds.

It appears from their history. In the accounts of their inception, in their titles at their several emissions, in the terms with which they were subscribed, in the language of the canon directing their subscription, they are always spoken of as "certain articles," "articles on which it is agreed," "articles received, professed and approved as true and orthodox," "articles without doubt selected out of Scripture, and conform to its heavenly doctrine in all respects;" but nothing of their comprising a system, constituting a confession, being complete or sufficient—much less exclusive. On the contrary, in the canon (of 1571) prescribing subscription, they are joined with the Common Prayer and Ordinal. This is a formal and express notification of their character and use by their compilers and first imposers.

All this took place before the child was baptized. After the administration of the rite, the officiating Priest addressed the congregation in these terms:—

"Seeing now, dearly beloved brethren, that this child is regenerate, and grafted into the body of Christ's Church, let us give thanks unto Almighty God for these benefits."

And then followed a prayer in which the congregation yielded hearty thanks to God that it had pleased Him to regenerate the infant with His Holy Spirit.

It was said that all this was hypothetical, and founded upon the implied future fulfilment by the Child of all that his godfathers had promised on his behalf. Now, he confessed that this did not appear to him to be the true construction. There was a positive declaration by the Church that the child was a member of Christ, a child of God, and an inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven. It was admitted on all hands that, in the case of adults, the beneficial effect of baptism depended upon the sincerity of their declarations of faith and repentance, and of their intending to do what they had engaged to perform. But the declaration of the Church in this public baptism of infants was clear and positive, that the child had been, by baptism, regenerated, and thanks were returned to God for the same. So again, in the office for the private baptism of children, there was a declaration that, by regeneration in baptism, the infant had been received as a child of God by adoption. This form of private baptism also showed that neither godfathers nor godmothers were essential in baptism, and that only water and the words of baptism were essential. The Church told the parties not to doubt that the child so baptized is sufficiently baptized. It is sufficiently baptized directly it is baptized with water, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Otherwise, as the counsel for the Bishop had observed, it would surely have to be baptized again in order to obtain the benefits annexed to the due administration of the sacrament of baptism.

With regard to the private baptism of infants, it was contended that it was for cases of exigence, and that therefore nothing in respect to the effect of baptism was to be drawn from it; but surely, if it were for cases of exigence, the Church intended to declare that the child thus baptized was entitled to all the benefits which an infant baptized in full health, and with the performance of the full service, would be entitled to upon his baptism; otherwise, why did the Church declare that as many of the prayers as the exigence of the case would suffer were to be used? And here, also, after baptism, thanks were to be given to God that it had pleased Him to regenerate the infant with His Holy Spirit, to receive him as His own child by adoption, and to incorporate him into His Holy Church. It was clearly the intention of the Church, therefore, that the child who was privately baptized should receive the same benefits as if the godfathers and godmothers had made promises on their behalf, and the rite had been performed in public. What room was there, then, for stating that the baptism of infants was founded upon an hypothesis?

It was true that if the child so privately baptized should fall into sin hereafter, he might lose the benefits of his baptism, and require faith and repentance—but not to regenerate him, because that was already done, according to the declaration of the Church. There was an express declaration of the Church that children who were baptized, dying before they committed actual sin, were undoubtedly saved. He could not understand how anything like a "charitable hope" could be engrafted on such a declaration.

But there was another service, which originally did not belong to the baptismal services, that for adults. And here it might be asked, if one form out of three was hypothetical, why should not all be so? But there was a marked distinction made by the Church in the baptism of those who were of riper years. Not only were they persons who had committed actual sin, but the Rubric required that they should be instructed in the principles of the Christian religion before they were permitted to come and partake of the holy sacrament of baptism. They were only entitled to the benefits of Baptism on the supposition that they were sincere in their promises of faith and repentance. The Church could not know from their outward professions whether they were sincere or not, and it appeared to the Court, therefore, that no argument could be drawn from the charitable judgment of the Church in the case of adults, so far as regarded the baptism of infants. The two services—for infants and adults—are substantially and essentially distinct.

The learned judge then referred to the Church Catechism. At the very beginning the child was taught to say that his name was given to him in his baptism, "wherein I was made a member of Christ, a child of God, and an inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven." And the child was also taught to say, "I heartily thank our Heavenly Father that He hath called me to this state of salvation"—that is, the state of salvation in which he was placed by baptism. In other words, the child might say—I was by nature born in sin, and a child of wrath, but now, by baptism, I am a child of grace. The child further was taught to say, "I pray unto God to give me His grace that I may continue in the same (state of salvation) unto my life's end." There was no doubt—nothing hypothetical: grace was prayed for that he might not fall away, nor lose the grace, whatever it was, that had been conferred in baptism. All this was in entire conformity with the Baptismal Service. Then, in that part of the Catechism relating to the Sacraments, which was added at the Restoration, in answer to the question "What meanest thou by this word Sacrament?" the child replies, "I mean an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace given unto us, ordained by Christ Himself as a means whereby we receive the same." And when asked, "What is the inward and spiritual grace of baptism?" he replies, "A death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness,"—that is, by the Holy Spirit in baptism; "prevenient grace," is not the cause of this.

Some remark had been made by Mr. Gorham's counsel, on the fact that Dean Nowell's Catechism had not been cited on the other side. The learned judge then referred to that work, and quoted some passages, which he said appeared to him to be in strict conformity with the Church Catechism on the doctrine of baptism.

He next dwelt on the Office for Confirmation. In a prayer which the Bishop offered up, it was said, "Almighty and ever-living God, Who hast vouchsafed to regenerate these Thy servants by water and the Holy Ghost." That they are regenerate by water and the Holy Ghost is positively declared. It appears to the Court, then, that the doctrine of the Church is not a mere "charitable hope" that these things are so, but that it is positively declared that they are so.

The fact of regeneration, therefore, taking place in the baptism of infants, supposing the words were to be received in their natural and literal sense, was sufficiently made out and established. But the difficulty was to ascertain what was meant by the word "regeneration." Did it imply an absolute change of nature, character, and feeling, or did it imply a change of state and of relation—a change from a state of wrath to one of grace? That was sufficiently explained by the terms made use of—by the words added to the term "regeneration,"—regeneration by water and by the Holy Ghost; for remission of sins was given by means of the administration of water and the Holy Ghost accompanying it. It was nothing to say that there might be cases in which the sign might be received without the thing signified. That might be so in the case of adults, and, indeed, must necessarily be so; and the Church could only express a charitable hope that the parties were sincere in their promises of faith and repentance. It appeared to him that regeneration, as held by the Primitive Church, and as expressed in the Baptismal Service, did not imply such a total and extensive change as would almost amount to entire justification, from which the person so regenerated could never fall; but it meant a change of state and character, putting the party in a new situation, in which he was converted from a child of wrath to a child of grace, and made "a member of Christ, the child of God, and inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven." Now, Mr. Gorham, and others, say that regeneration is not connected with baptism.

The Judge then quoted from Waterland and from Bishop Van Mildert, on this subject, and added that, on this part of the case, then, the Court has no doubt that children are regenerated in and through the means of baptism.

With regard to an observation which had been made that the Burial Service was to be interpreted hypothetically, the Court did not see that any argument could be drawn from that. A charitable hope was (as we understood) necessarily connected with such an Office. As respects a remark that "assent and consent" are given merely to the "use" of the Prayer Book by the Clergy—and that the Articles are not to be construed by the Formularies—the Court considered that "assent and consent to use" implied an acknowledgment of its truth.

Another argument upon which Mr. Gorham's counsel had dwelt at great length was, that the Reformers held the opinions of Calvin, and that, consequently, they could not intend that the Formularies which they drew up should be so strictly interpreted as to convey the notion that all children are regenerated in baptism. The assertion that Cranmer had never changed his opinions on baptism had been successfully replied to by Mr. Gorham's counsel. Having been brought up a Roman Catholic he must necessarily (?) have changed his opinions on that subject. That the Reformers embraced all the doctrines of Calvin might be doubted, although it could not be denied that Calvinism made great progress in this country at that time. Did the Reformers hold the doctrines of predestination, election, reprobation and final perseverance, as Calvin did? As a proof of their Calvinism, counsel had adduced the opinions of their associates—Peter Martyr and Martin Bucer. The learned counsel said that, so far as predestination and election were concerned, the 17th Article of the Church determined the question. Now, that Article recited that—

"Predestination to life is the everlasting purpose of God, whereby, before the foundations of the world were laid, He hath constantly decreed by His counsel, secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation those whom He hath chosen in Christ out of mankind, and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation as vessels made to honour."

But instead of going on to say that this was an Article of Faith, it stated that—

"As the godly consideration of predestination and our election in Christ is full of sweet, pleasant, and unspeakable comfort to godly persons, and such as feel in themselves the working of the Spirit of Christ, &c., so for curious and carnal persons, lacking the Spirit of Christ, to have continually before their eyes the sentence of God's predestination is a most dangerous downfall, whereby the devil doth thrust them either into desperation, or into wretchedness of most unclean living, no less perilous than desperation. Furthermore, we must receive God's promises in such wise as they be generally set forth to us in Holy Scripture; and, in our doings, that will of God is to be followed which we have expressly declared unto us in the Word of God."

So that, we see, they assert nothing with regard to the doctrine of predestination and election. The question here is left open; the Reformers declare nothing; they do not declare it to be an Article of Faith, but leave the matter undecided. I think, if they had intended to settle the matter, they would have expressed themselves in terms in which there could have been no doubt. They could not, I apprehend, have been ignorant of words to express their meaning. To what extent, then, were the doctrines of Calvin taken? Were they taken to the extent that they were held by Bishop Hopkins? [or Hooper?] He says:—

"God promises pardon and remission of sins to all that believe and repent, but he promises grace to believe and repent only to those whom by his absolute covenant, he is engaged to lead to grace and repentance."

Did Ridley, and Latimer, and Cranmer, go so far as this? Or did they go to the same extent as the Synod of Dort? In the 6th Article of the Synod of Dort is this statement:—

"Secundum quod decretum electorum corda, quantumvis dura, gratiose emollit, et ad credendum inflectit, non-electos ante justo iudicio suae malitiae, et duritiae relinquit." "There are certain persons of the elect, whose hearts are to be softened and turned to the true faith, but those who are not among the number of the elect are to be left to their own wickedness and hardness of heart."

Was that the doctrine of Cranmer, or Latimer, or Ridley? Then, again, in the 7th Article of the Synod of Dort:—

"Est autem electio immutabile Dei propositum, quo ante facta mundi fundamenta e universo genere humano, ex primæva integritate in peccatum et exitum sua culpa prolapsa, secundum liberrimum voluntatis suae beneplacitum ex mera gratia, certam quorundam hominum multitudinem, aliis nec meliorum, nec digniorum, sed in communi miseria cum aliis jacentum, ad salutem, elegit in Christo," &c.

These are the doctrines of Calvin, as set forth in his "Institutes."

Could Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, have held these sentiments, and yet draw up Services which declare that all children are to be baptized, and that if they die before they commit actual sin, it is certain by God's Word that they are undoubtedly saved?

But with regard to the position of the learned counsel, that the Reformers were Calvinists, and that, therefore, their declarations must be taken in a Calvinistic sense—that you must not give the words their general meaning, but must consider that they were speaking only of those who were the elect, to whom alone the grace of repentance and faith could be extended: I apprehend that this is not only applicable to the baptismal service, but it strikes at the root of all the services; for, if the doctrines of election, and predestination, and reprobation, are the faith of the Church, what necessity is there for prayer? What encouragement is there for a person to learn the will of God if he is assured that long before his birth his fate was determined, by the irrevocable decree of God, either for eternal happiness or eternal misery? Again, when it is said that God has promised forgiveness of sins to all who truly repent, is that statement to be limited to those who are among the number of elect, who alone are to have grace and repentance? This appears to me to be a contradiction to the whole structure of our Common Prayer, the whole drift of which is to encourage faith and repentance, with the hope of forgiveness of sins. "If the wicked man turn away from his wickedness which he hath committed, and doeth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive." And yet, according to this doctrine of predestination, the wicked man cannot turn away from his sins—cannot repent of what he has done, because he is not of the number of the elect! Then, in the absolution, at the commencement of the service, it is said—"He pardoneth and absolveth all them that truly repent, and unfeignedly believe His Holy Gospel." And so in all the other services, which are of universal application to all who truly repent; not confining its privileges to those who are among the number of the elect, whose fate was fixed and determined, and that long before they came into existence.

The Reformers may have privately held some of the doctrines of Calvin; but the question is, have they put his peculiar doctrine into our public services? I answer, most decidedly not.

As to the 17th Article, it is admitted on all hands not to have determined the question; so that if persons do persist in alleging that election, predestination, and reprobation were held by the Reformers, it is certain that they have not connectedly, as a body, expressed their decided opinions upon it. So that their evidence is to be regarded merely as that of private individuals, no doubt most eminent men—men eminent for their learning, their piety, and their knowledge of the Scriptures; and if the Court were now to set about erecting a new standard of faith for itself and for the Church, undoubtedly the opinion of these persons would weigh most solemnly with the Court, and the Court would pay most decided attention to all that has been said by all those persons whose writings were cited by the learned counsel. It is, however, admitted, on the other hand, that there are persons of great weight, learning, and authority, who differ in opinion from those learned and pious writers to whom the learned counsel adverted. What, then, is to determine the question? The method is, not to enter on a question as to the comparative weight of these persons, not to examine their writings in order to find out certain passages which may not entirely agree with those quoted by the learned counsel. I believe the learned counsel did candidly acknowledge that there were several instances in which various passages in the same person's writings could not be made to agree with each other, and every one must be aware of this. The Court would be left in the greatest difficulty in the world if it were left to determine upon isolated passages, selected from these various authors, in order to establish the doctrine of election and predestination as the doctrines of the Church. There are, undoubtedly, very high authorities which go to express their opinions on this subject. I do not think, however, that Cranmer can be held responsible for all that Martyr and Bucer chose to say and publish. I think there is too much laid on the shoulders of the Archbishop; but generally he concurred in their sentiments, and he called them in to assist him in the compilation of the Book of Common Prayer. That Book is nearly the same as the second book of Edward VI., prepared by Convocation, and established by Act of Parliament of Queen Elizabeth. How could these persons have done this, if they believed in the doctrines of predestination and election, which doctrines are not contained in the Book of Common Prayer? Up to a certain time it was the opinion of the German Reformers; but Bishop Burnet says, in his "History of the Reformation," speaking of the doctrine of Calvin, which was said to have been the doctrine of the early Reformers:—

"The Germans soon saw the ill effects of this doctrine. Luther changed his mind about it, and Melancthon openly wrote against it. And since that time the whole stream of the Lutheran Churches has run the other way. But both Calvin and Bucer were still for maintaining the doctrine of these decrees; only they warned the people not to think much of them, since they were secrets which men could not penetrate into."

claim the doctrine as a rule of faith for the Church of England, but left the subject entirely open. It may, also, be admitted, that in the latter part of the reign of Elizabeth, the doctrines of Calvin had obtained a much stronger hold upon the minds of the people of this country than they had done previously, and that many eminent persons might be referred to, who had embraced this doctrine of predestination and election; but then it must be recollected, that the Articles of 1562 were the same in fact and substance, though with some verbal alterations, as the Articles of 1552. Upon this doctrine of baptism, I apprehend, there is nothing upon which they disagree. Afterwards there was an alteration made, for in one of the Articles there was a declaration of the Church, with respect to the salvation of infants who are baptized, and who die before they have committed actual sin. That was afterwards inserted at the conclusion of the service for the Public Baptism of Infants; but what I wish more particularly to allude to is this, that at the end of the clause to which I have referred, the words "and not else" were added in 1536. The interpretation was, that if children were baptized, and died without committing actual sin, they were saved, but not else. However, the damnatory clause (if so it may be termed) was left out, and it is consequently not now the doctrine of the Church of England, that baptism is absolutely necessary to salvation. The opinions of many of the authorities to which the learned counsel referred went to show, that it was not the want of the sacrament that would deprive the person of its benefit, but the neglect and contempt of it: where it could be had it ought to be had, it must be had.

It has been argued that the Reformers being Calvinists, the doctrines of the Church, as drawn up and sanctioned by them, must be Calvinistical. Then let it be shown how far Calvinism is embodied in the public acts of the Church. The private opinions of the Reformers cannot be examined and decided by the Court. The Court must see what they say in the Public Services of the Church. The Court must look at the public acts of the body, not at the private opinions of individuals.

Now, I have said that in the latter part of Queen Elizabeth's reign Calvinistic doctrines had taken strong possession of the minds of the people of this country. We know that between the reign of Edward VI. and the accession of Queen Elizabeth, in the reign of Queen Mary, a large multitude of Protestants went into Germany and came into communication with the German Reformers, and imbibed their principles to a certain degree during their residence there, and undoubtedly they did thus obtain very strong impressions in favour of the doctrines of Calvin. But still, these doctrines were not received here generally in 1562, and I think there is quite evidence enough to show, that even though it was true that at the University of Oxford, Calvin's Institutes were put into the hands of the students, yet serious disputes arose at Oxford and Cambridge, in the course of which the writings of Calvin and Beza were not only attacked, but they were the objects of personal invective by a member of the University of Oxford. The University called on him to retract what he had said, but his retraction not being deemed satisfactory, they called on Archbishop Whitgift to interfere, which he did, and a retraction was made which the Archbishop thought went too far. Subsequently the Lambeth Articles, which were Calvinistic, were drawn up, but they were rejected at the Universities, and were soon repressed by command of the Queen; and so little were they known, that King James, on one occasion, inquired what was meant by the Lambeth Articles, evidently having never heard of them. Then a good deal had been said about Rogers, a Calvinist, being Chaplain to Archbishop Bancroft, but from an extract (which the learned Judge read) it appeared that the Archbishop did not hold the opinions of his Chaplain.

Upon this part of the case, however, I am of opinion that the private opinions of these parties are not to be taken; they have no public bearing, and can have no public effect; they can throw no light upon the subject. If the words to be considered were doubtful and ambiguous, and could not be construed by reference to any other of the services of the Church, or by any other of the public acts of the Church, then, indeed, it would be right and proper to advert to the opinions of those persons; but so long as the Articles and services of the Church are reconcilable, and not only reconcilable, but necessarily consistent with the literal interpretation of the words, we are not at liberty to put any private interpretation upon them.

Now, this will, I think, as far as the Court is concerned, dispose of this part of the question. I protest against going through all the authorities which have been, I admit, very properly cited by the learned counsel; I have not the means of doing so, and I do not see the necessity for it. I contend on the general principle, that even though those learned persons did embrace Calvinistic principles to the extent alleged, those Calvinistic principles embraced by them cannot go to the interpretation of the Articles and services, which speak for themselves, and require no such assistance, their language being precise and determined.

I am not aware that it is necessary for me to occupy much more time upon the questions which have been raised in this case. The points which have to be decided are—

"1. Does the Church of England hold the Doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration in the case of infants?"

"2. Does Mr. Gorham hold this doctrine?"

It is quite clear from the Formularies of the Church, that children do receive spiritual regeneration in baptism. It is also evident, from the whole tenor of his examination, and from his counsel's argument, that Mr. Gorham does not hold this doctrine. He asserts that children must receive a "preventive act of grace" to make them worthy recipients of baptism, otherwise they receive no benefit at their baptism.

"The Bishop of Exeter has, consequently, shown sufficient cause for refusing to institute Mr. Gorham to the living of Bramford Speke; and therefore his lordship must be dismissed, and with his costs."

MR. BOWDLER (Proctor to Mr. Gorham).—"I beg to give notice that an appeal will be immediately entered against the decision of the Court."

Sir H. J. Fust.—"Of course I expected that there would be an appeal, or I should have called to my assistance the Chancellor of the Diocese (Dr. Lushington) to have acted as my Assessor; for I feel that so important a case is too much for the decision of a single individual, seeing the bearing that it may have upon the interests and welfare of the Church."

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1849.

CONFIDENCE AMONG BRETHREN.

A mutual confidence must be the basis of all friendly intercourse. The world, in its low standard of right, exiles from honourable society those who would betray the confidence of friendship. We are told that even among the lowest and most vicious such a law prevails; and, what is called "honour among thieves" inspires them with a confidence in each other.

Surely then, Christian Brethren, and Christian Ministers, should be allowed to feel no less reliance upon each other in their social intercourse. Unless it be so, that free interchange of thought and opinion which helps to make men of one mind, will be at an end. Men will lock up their thoughts as they do their treasures, for fear of those who may take advantage of their confidence. As we sometimes see at places of resort the caution, "Beware of Pickpockets," so it would be necessary to put up in places where friends meet, the salutary warning, "Beware of Reporters."

These remarks are called forth by some facts which have come to our knowledge lately; and we write this as a word in season. A few friends meet around a hospitable board, and of course, subjects of interest are discussed, the subjects which lie near their hearts. In the animation and freedom of private converse among brethren, thoughts may find utterance, opinions may be expressed, and words spoken, which in a calmer moment would not be justified. In a few days the whole matter appears in a religious newspaper, in an exaggerated form. Will any thing justify such a breach of confidence? A case like this occurred not long ago, and we have in mind other cases not now to be referred to. And we must say, that we know very little difference between those who would use and those who would give information thus obtained.

The effect of such things is to make men suspicious, and surely there is enough of this suspicion abroad now. This truth is well brought out in the following pointed and significant article from "the Western Episcopalian." We trust it may do good, and that Christian brethren will see the folly of regarding with suspicion every act and movement of all who differ from them. The title of the following article well describes all such, and unfortunately designates a large class in the Church.

CONSPIRACY HUNTERS.

Under this appellation we would call attention to a certain class of individuals, or perhaps portions of a class, which, found at all times amongst men, seem to be specially prominent and noticeable in these times, both in church and state. As religious journalists, indeed, it does not come within our province to comment on the devices of mere politicians, whether to cast odium on more fortunate rivals, or to cover the disgrace of their own defeat, or removal from places of trust and emolument. By men of this description, doubtless, the cry of persecution and conspiracy has been most frequently raised. But instances are not wanting of a similar mode of self-justification in ecclesiastical matters, and adopted too by Christian men high in station and influence. The expedients which have sometimes been employed by these for this end are justly subjects of comment, and within our proper province. In every such case, whether an inordinate ambition has been disappointed of its object, or the abuse of delegated power or property has occasioned the loss of either, or still more when men are brought to account for the violation of solemn duties and responsibilities—what is the plea, which self-love has commonly set up, and sympathizing friends have been ever ready to echo? Is it not the cry—"I am the victim of conspiracy? I have become obnoxious to some clique or party, and they have conspired together for my ruin." In this way impunity is sought for, from the effects of misconduct. The Press is diligently employed to make good the charge; and he must be a poor adept in "making out a case," who cannot succeed by the unscrupulous use of private letters, of confidential remarks, and the free and unsuspecting intercourse of years of friendship which is often resorted to for the purpose. We have long felt that too much tolerance has been granted by the Christian community to such a method of self-justification, and especially in relation to the decisions of constituted authorities, and the discipline of the Church. So far as it is successful, it weakens the force of well-considered judgments, subverts discipline, and encourages the hope of impunity to the wrong doer, and justice and right are in danger of being sacrificed to screen individual misconduct. No matter how high and sacred the tribunal may be which renders the judgment, it is not too exalted to escape the imputations or direct charges of the conspiracy hunter. Against even "Episcopal Acts," and those of the highest functionaries of our public institutions, the charge of party motives and malicious conspiracy has been openly alleged. Now we protest against this mode of self-defence, as one in all ordinary cases to be regarded with distrust and suspicion. We believe it is commonly set up by those who are exposed to just reprehension, and have no hope of escape but in creating a groundless sympathy, and casting unjust imputations on the motives and conduct of others.

The following is from "the Western Episcopalian and Gambier Observer." We certainly thought the authorized and explicit statement made in the Banner, would have cleared up the matter. We rejoice, however, that our Ohio friends not only see clearly the right, but act as if they did. We trust others will do likewise.

THE EPISCOPATE OF INDIANA.—Having waited some weeks, and seen two unsuccessful attempts to clear up the matter of the Indiana Episcopate, we felt bound by a sense of duty to express the views published last week. Since then, however, we have seen a very satisfactory letter; one written in a very good spirit, from Dr. Upfold himself, explaining the whole matter. Though we have not the Dr.'s permission to publish that letter, yet as it is done with the best intentions we think he will readily excuse us for inserting the following extract. Whatever proposition may have been made and plan suggested, for the support of the Indiana Bishop, we are satisfied that nothing but good was intended in any quarter, and that there is no disposition to take any course that will cause trouble in the Church.

Dr. U. says, in a letter dated the 20th ult.—

"The arrangement between my vestry and myself is simply this. In the event of my consecration, I cease of course to be the rector of my present parish, and take up my abode in Indiana, having decided on Madison as the place, because of its apparently superior eligibility and convenience. But inasmuch as the diocese of Indiana has made no provision for my support, I cannot attempt any thing of the kind until the next Convention; and to enable me to enter at once, and without pecuniary embarrassment on the duties of the Episcopate, my vestry, in consideration of eighteen years uninterrupted service on my part, and regarding Indiana as eminently missionary ground, propose not to appoint a successor in the rectorship immediately, but to continue my salary until such a time as the necessary preparations for the removal of my family to Indiana (including the building of a dwelling-house,) can be completed—probably within the year. The parish is to be served by an assistant minister, except when my duties in Indiana will permit me to spend a few weeks with my family, when I shall be expected to occupy my pulpit. This is the generous offer of my vestry."

This puts a different face on the matter.

In another column will be found the conclusion of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust's judgment on the subject of Baptismal Regeneration. We have received the report of this in full, published in pamphlet form, from some friend in England.

In this connection, we cannot withhold the following article taken from the last "Christian Chronicle," the Baptist organ of this city. Our readers will see how the edge of this Baptist logicians. They would disprove Infant Baptism by the consequence it involves, viz. that "Baptismal Regeneration is inseparably linked with Infant Baptism." So that, in their view, to prove that Infant Baptism is right, (and this is an easy task,) is to prove the same for Baptismal Regeneration. We readily admit that unless this doctrine be connected with it, we cannot see the use or propriety of Infant Baptism. It becomes an empty and unmeaning rite.

BAPTISMAL REGENERATION.

We have already noticed in previous numbers, the vital connection between infant baptism and the doctrine of baptismal regeneration. We may elucidate it still farther by a reference to the opinions of Dr. Bushnell, an eminent divine of the Congregationalist persuasion. In 1847, two discourses from his pen, on "Christian Nurture," were published by the Massachusetts S. S. Society. They excited much attention from the novelty of the views presented, and speedily drew on the author numerous bulls and anathemas from the self-appointed "defenders of orthodoxy." The Society, in alarm at the gathering storm, suppressed the sale of the obnoxious volume, and probably consigned the relics of the edition to the purgation of a solemn Auto de Fa. The book could no longer be obtained, and his opponents slumbered on their laurels, exulting at the ease and completeness of their triumph.

But Dr. Bushnell was not the man to be silenced by the aspersions of heterodoxy. Quietly and manfully he labored in his study, taking little note of the storm without. He reviewed his own opinions. He explored the whole domain of patristic and scholastic theology, the ponderous works of the fathers of the Reformation, and of the fathers of N. E. theology, and in due season confounded his adversaries by an array of authorities, a citation of revered names, proving incontestably that his opinions were in perfect harmony with the acknowledged standards of his church. His triumph was complete. The tables were fully turned. His orthodoxy was proven beyond a doubt; while the brand of heresy was stamped on the brow of his accusers.

But what was the doctrine which caused such intense commotion in the Congregationalist churches of New England? None other than baptismal regeneration, as underlying all Christian nurture. It differs slightly in its presentation from the dogma of the high church party. The latter invests the ordinance or the administrator with a kind of magical power, by virtue of which a change is immediately wrought in the soul of the subject. The former ascribes the efficacy chiefly to parental faith and piety; and these acting through the appointed ordinance, beget a regenerative germ in the heart, which has not a self-vitality, but lives or dies according as it receives subsequent nurture or neglect. Dr. Bushnell proves conclusively, by citations from their writings, that the most eminent advocates of infant baptism, both in earlier and later times, have contended for a regenerative efficacy contained in the ordinance when properly administered. He boldly maintains that, without this, infant baptism is a nullity, and cannot stand before the defenders of adult baptism: and those who practice it have not even the shadow of consistency. With such an expositor of pedobaptist views, strengthened by a formidable array of standard authorities, we scarcely need search for farther proof of our position that baptismal regeneration is inseparably linked with infant baptism, and a consistent logician who receives the latter cannot deny the former.—Christian Chronicle.

EDITOR OF THE GOSPEL MESSENGER.

From the following announcement, it will be seen that the Rev. Wm. A. Matson, is the Editor of this Church Paper. He has our kindest wishes to attend his editorial course, in which he has already advanced far enough to make its direction plain.

The new Editor says he was a pupil of the late Dr. Rudd. All we have to say, is, that if he was faithful, as we doubt not he was, he had a good schooling. We trust the spirit which ruled his Master may accompany the editorial mantle.

Upon the decease of the late Rev. Dr. Rudd, a worthy presbyter of this diocese assumed the charge of the Gospel Messenger, and for a few months conducted it with much ability. Finding, however, the labors of the editorial department, in addition to the care of a large and growing parish, too great a tax upon his health and strength, he relinquished the paper, and the undersigned was reluctantly induced to take it. As the reasons which at first caused us to withhold our name no longer exist, we yield to the wishes of friends and many of our subscribers, and to-day make it public.

The course which we have thus far pursued has, we think, sufficiently defined our position; so that any particular statement of our views at this time would be superfluous. We may say, however, that we have endeavored not to depart from those principles which have been maintained in the columns of the Gospel Messenger from the beginning.

In early life a pupil of the late Rev. Dr. Rudd, for years a member of his household, we were instructed in those principles which he loved and which we presume none will either call either ultra or modern. These principles we hope to maintain. And if ever in the course of our life our confidence in them has been shaken—when we have seen men under shelter of them becoming advocates for innovations—closer examination and more careful reflection have only served to renew our attachment to them, and to convince us that they are the only principles which a Churchman can consistently hold. We have no sympathy with any movement which aims to introduce novelties in rites or doctrines. We are for the Church as it is; seeking no improvement but a closer adherence to its principles and a deeper participation of its spirit.

During our brief editorial career, we have had occasion, in one or two instances, to differ from some of our contemporaries in relation to the expediency of certain measures. These have called forth expressions of opinion on both sides. But the treatment we have received from our brethren of the Church Press has been uniformly courteous and Christian-like. Such differences will at times unavoidably arise: but we trust that in the discussion of them we shall never forget the courtesy which is due to brethren of the same household of faith, who are ministering at the same altar.

Our thanks are due to those brethren of the clergy and laity who have assured us of their approbation of our course, and who have given proof of their good will by extending the circulation of our paper. We trust we shall not forfeit their good opinion. We must continue to ask the indulgence of our readers for our inexperience: assuring them that whatever our faults may be, our aim is to provide for them, such reading matter as shall be for their spiritual good, and further the cause of Christ and His Church.

WILLIAM A. MATSON.

We copy the following sensible and pointed article from the Episcopal Recorder. We believe that the omission complained of is only made by those who call themselves "anti-tractarian." In such it is certainly a striking inconsistency. They follow, in so doing, merely the permission of a Rubric, while they deny the express teaching of the Article. The days are not gone by when men "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel."

For the Episcopal Recorder.

Messrs. Editors,—Permit me to call your attention and that of some of our brethren to an inconsistency which has been the ground of some comment.

In the Apostle's Creed we find the article, "He descended into hell." The rubric before the creed allows the omission of these words to churches that so desire. But ought we, especially ought any single minister, to make use of the permission? I speak not now, as I might well do, of the danger of errors respecting the true nature of the only Mediator between God and man, against one of which that article is understood to have been originally the caution and protest. But something else presents itself forcibly to my mind. It may be well enough, perhaps, for those to avail themselves of the permission of the rubric, who are for adding something to the one rule of faith, and who delight to exalt the Liturgy, with its rubrics, above the Thirty-nine Articles. But can it be right for others? How can one who adheres strictly to that safe Protestant principle, that the Bible is the Rule of Faith, hear the inspired Apostle (in Acts ii.) say after the inspired Psalmist, of Christ, that "His soul was not left in hell," and then omit to say as much himself in the profession of his belief? How strange it must be to hear the minister, on Easter evening, say the thing out of Holy Scripture in the second lesson, and immediately after refuse to say it in the Creed! This, I understand, has been heard, and commented upon.

Or again, how can one who pays proper respect to the Articles, read in the third Article, "it is to be believed that he went down (descended is the same thing) into hell," and still when he says "I BELIEVE," &c., omit what the Article thus authoritatively declares? Surely, Messrs. Editors, no mere permission of a rubric ought to do away with the obligation of the one Rule of Faith, and of an Article of the Church. Will you not help me call attention to this matter? Let us cling to the Rule. Let us not allow the Articles to be slighted, as the manner of some is, in these sad times. And let no such inconsistency as that I have referred to, cause the adversary to triumph over the friends of truth.

No TRACTARIAN.

The Treasurer of Domestic Missions has enclosed the following extract from the Spirit of Missions, for insertion in the Banner. We hope it will secure the attention of our readers. Nothing need be said to add to the force of this appeal.

FUTURE ARRANGEMENTS OF THE DOMESTIC COMMITTEE.

With a view to the satisfaction of the Church generally, touching the present condition and future operations of the Domestic cause, the following statement is made on the authority of the Sub-Committee, to whom the subject was referred, viz.:—That, in order to economize to the utmost the central expenses of the Committee, and to take away from contributing Rectors and Parishes every possible objection on that score, it is resolved that no appointment of Secretary and General Agent be made through the current year; but that the duties of such office, so far as relates to the necessary superintendence of Missionary operations during the recess of the Committee, be assumed by the clerical members, and divided among them in such manner as may be found most effectual to carry out the same.

In giving this notification, the Committee cannot but trust that it may operate favorably on their receipts for the ensuing year, and enable them to pay off the large indebtedness due the Missionaries, without, at the same time, impeding their forward movements, so far, at least, as lies in re-appointment of existing Missionaries.

FUNDS.

The difficulties to which the Missionaries are usually subject, have been much increased during the past summer. The pestilence with which our country has been visited, has been a heavy addition to the toil and trial of the Western clergyman's life—depriving him, in some instances, of his congregation, and, consequently, of the chances of support;—adding, in other cases, very much to his labor, by the constant calls for his services to perform the last offices of religion to the dying, and for the dead;—increasing everywhere the already arduous duties of the Ministry in the West. Under these circumstances, the Domestic Committee would earnestly and affectionately appeal to the Clergy and Laity to make speedy and liberal contributions. Worn down by constant fatigue, and enervated by a more than usually debilitating season, the Missionaries need all the relaxation, and all the freedom from anxiety and care, which it is in the power of their more highly favored brethren, to place at their disposal. At such a time as the present, it is little to the credit of the Church, that "the hire of the laborers, who have reaped down her fields" should be kept back.

A Friend has enclosed the following from the N. Y. Sun. The liberality of which it speaks is highly creditable:

CHRISTIAN KINDNESS AND LIBERALITY.—The following incident in the life of a Christian Missionary on his way to California, is too pleasing in its character, and exhibits Christian feeling in too remarkable a manner, not to be generally recorded. We extract it from the Valparaiso Neighbour of June 29.

"A MISSION TO CALIFORNIA.—The Rev. Dr. Ver Mehr, an Episcopal clergyman, has arrived thus far on his way to California. This gentleman is sent out by the Domestic Board of Missions to preach the Gospel at San Francisco. He had made application for the appointment three months before the present movement of emigration thither, even before its cause was known in America. The visit of Dr. Ver Mehr has been peculiarly pleasant, and the impression produced during his brief sojourn in this port has been highly favorable. His humble demeanor has been such as becomes the Gospel, and such as has won the affectionate esteem of those here resident. He sails again on the 30th in the American barque Hebe. When Dr. Ver Mehr arrived from America he had not one acquaintance in this city. He knew of no friend here—except the Unseen. However he soon made friends. And when after a stay here of a few days, it became known in the place that his situation on board the ship, in which he came, was from several causes not all that could be desired, and an effort was made to effect a change, it met with a most noble response. It was found that the barque Hebe, had agreeable accommodations, and that passage for this devoted missionary and his family could be had in it for five hundred dollars. In three hours this entire amount and more was procured by the generous subscriptions of our limited community. Not an individual of all those that we applied to declined to co-operate. It was our happiness to procure these subscriptions, and the alacrity with which they were made was most cheering. Apart from all the benefit conferred on those immediately interested, it is most delightful to see the community unanimously responsive to the claims of the excellent cause in which the missionary had embarked. May this man of God never find more backward helpers than those he has found in the commercial body of Valparaiso."

The Neighbor publishes also a suitable acknowledgement of the kindness from Dr. Ver Mehr.

HONORARY DEGREE.—The Rev. Jos. Muensch, of Gambier, Rev. Bethel Claxton, of Madison, Ind., and the Rev. E. C. Hutchinson, of St. Louis, have had the honorary degree of D. D. conferred upon them. The two former by Kenyon College, Gambier, and the latter by a New England College.

RESIGNATION.—The Rev. W. Norwood, in consequence of continued ill-health, has resigned the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, to take effect on the 1st of October.

NASHOTAH MISSION.

We have just received from J. M. C., Baltimore, another promise of $100, towards the $1000.

This last contribution makes the sum complete. The subscribers are therefore respectfully notified to forward the sums promised directly to Mr. Breck. It is of great importance that there should be as little delay as possible in transmitting these sums, since the foundation of the building has been laid, and the work is stopped until the requisite funds are received.

The contributors will please designate the sums forwarded as part of this $1000, and their receipt will be acknowledged in the Banner.

The money may be safely sent in checks, payable to Mr. Breck's order, addressed to the Rev. Wm. Lloyd Breck, Delafield, Wisconsin.

BIBLES WITH THE APOCRYPHA.

To the correspondent from Georgia, who asks whether Bibles cannot be obtained, of portable size and cheap price, containing the Apocryphal Books, we answer with pleasure. Having made inquiries, we find that English Bibles, of convenient size, such as desired, can be obtained for about $3. American quarto Bibles, with the Apocrypha, can be obtained for $1.50 and upwards, according to the binding. We agree with our correspondent, that as the Church has appointed lessons from those books, Bibles containing them should be made accessible to her members. We will, if desired, obtain and forward any number our friend may need.

THE CHURCH OF THE RESURRECTION, RISING SUN, COUNTY OF PHILADELPHIA.

This new enterprise has strong claims upon the Christian liberality of the city and county of Philadelphia. Because, at present, there is no Episcopal Church within the distance of two and a half miles from the populous and flourishing village of Rising Sun, viz: St. Luke's, Germantown, on the North; St. Mark's, Frankford, on the East; St. James the Less, on the West; and the city on the South; to which the Rising Sun must, ere long, form the northern limits.

It cannot be said of this beautiful section of country, already so populous and rapidly increasing, that its inhabitants are a church-going people; though there are some such among them. But the reason why there are not more, must mainly be ascribed to the want of a place of worship, wherein may be presented, in the beauty of holiness, Christ and His Church; and likewise a Pastor to gather them into His fold, and to feed His Sheep and His Lambs. Whence it is believed, that there is no place in the vicinity of the city that needs a church so much, and where circumstances appear so favourable to the undertaking. With the aid of about four thousand dollars, a suitable edifice, seating from three to four hundred, can be erected free from debt.

It is proposed to build the church on the north side of Rising Sun, where it will be in the immediate vicinity of the populous village of Ricetown. Efforts have already been made by Rev. Thomas J. Davis, the Rector of the parish, to collect a congregation in the Public School House. The congregation at present is very respectable in point of numbers, and is constantly increasing. This enterprise, and the manner proposed for its accomplishment, has received the cordial approbation of the Bishop, and the hearty concurrence of the Clergy, and our Brethren of the Laity are respectfully solicited to give it their aid and encouragement for Jesus' sake.

ORDINATION FOR WISCONSIN.

In St. James's Church, Philadelphia, on the fourteenth Sunday after Trinity, September 9th, 1849, (by permission of the Bishop of Pennsylvania,) the Right Rev. Dr. Kemper, Missionary Bishop, admitted to the Holy Order of Deacons, Mr. Wm. Markoe, candidate for Holy Orders of the Diocese of Wisconsin, an Alumnus of the General Theological Seminary. The sermon was preached by the Bishop. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Henry J. Morton, D. D., Rector of St. James's.

The Rev. William Markoe requests that letters, &c., intended for him may be directed to Delafield, Waukesha County, Wisconsin.

EARLY CHURCH SERVICES.—The following paragraph is from the correspondent of the Baltimore Sun:

"A few mornings since, I saw a large and devout assemblage coming from the Protestant Episcopal Church, (High Church,) under the pastoral care of the Rev. Mr. Pyne. The large congregation of this church is composed of some of our wealthiest and most influential citizens; I am also informed that it is the custom of Mrs. General Taylor, whenever her health will permit, there unostentatiously to repair at 'early dawn,' and unite with neighbors and friends in the delightful duty. Those who possess a disposition to disparage the society of Washington, as merely the devotees of folly and of fashion, can just insert this item on the 'per contra' side of the statement."

From late English Papers.

We are indebted chiefly to the Guardian for the following items of intelligence:—

ITALY.—Letters from Rome state that the city was still in great agitation. It was reported that the Pope had resolved not to return to Rome but to visit Naples, Loretto, and Bologna, and to make the latter place his residence for some time. The French troops would go to Albano, and the Pope would there thank them. The Government Commission of the three Cardinals had appointed the following Ministers—Bishop Savelli, Interior and Police; the Advocate Giansanti, Justice; Signor Galli, Finances. All the ministers who served under Rossi refused to accept office unless the constitution was guaranteed.

A correspondent of the Times, who signs "A. B.," but encloses his address to the editor, announces the revival of the Inquisition:—

"Dr. Giacinto Achilli, an eminent Italian theologian, who has been for five years an avowed Protestant, and is well known as such to thousands of British Christians of all parties, has been thrown into the dungeons of the inquisition. At eleven o'clock on the night of the 30th of July (and, therefore, before General Oudinot had made over the Government to the Cardinals), Dr. Achilli was arrested by three men in plain clothes, and is now in one of the secret cells of the re-established Holy Office. They stated that they apprehended him by the authority of the French Prefect. It is, however, since ascertained that they were emissaries of the Vicar-General of Rome, Cardinal Patrizi, who had just returned to the city. Dr. Achilli had never meddled in politics; I have recent letters from him, stating that he neither had nor would do so."

A letter in the Morning Herald throws, however, an additional light upon the matter. It says—

"Dr. Giacinto Achilli is a Protestant of above five years' standing. Formerly 'Vicar of the Master of the Holy Palace,' under Gregory XVI., Professor of Theology, and Professor of Moral Philosophy at the College of Minerva, he subsequently became a Protestant, as is well known both in England and many other parts of Europe, as one who, from conscientious motives, had quitted the Roman Catholic Church. He exercised the right which the de facto constitution of Rome gave him to take up his residence there, and to labour in the dissemination of the Holy Scriptures, and in the propagation of his principles among those who were disposed to hear him."

The same Paper has the following later news in its Post-script.

The Debats, the recognized organ of the High Church party in France, expresses its regret yesterday that the return of the Pope to Rome is evidently postponed to an indefinite period. The Chronicle correspondent, writing on the same day, says:—

"The accounts received from Rome become daily worse and worse. The French Government is so disgusted at the conduct of the Cardinals, that it has given notice to the Court at Gaeta, that if the commission acting in the name of the Pope should continue to act in the same spirit, and that the consequence should be an insurrection among the Roman people, it must not look to the French garrison for assistance to repress it."

The correspondent of the Daily News, speaking of the Pope's state of health, says:—

"His Holiness is certainly far from well, and his person presents a swollen appearance, which is probably owing to the malaria prevalent at Gaeta, in common with so many other parts of the Italian sea-coast during summer and autumn. Rumours are not wanting with respect to this indisposition, for a far different cause is by some assigned as its origin than air, and suspicions are already awakened that drugs have been administered to the Pope, calculated to remove him gradually from a scene of action in which he has taken such a principal part. It is also averred that a disposition on the part of Pius to grant some concessions favourable to his subjects induced the Sacred College to this step. Such an accusation is, however, too tremendous to reproduce otherwise than as a mere report."

Father Ventura is at present at Montpellier. He has been refused passports to Paris. The President of the Republic was sufficiently recovered from his late attack to take up his residence at St. Cloud on Monday.

ENGLAND.

We learn from the English Churchman that the Archbishop of Canterbury has been suffering from illness.

The Bishop of Exeter has been suffering from a severe bilious attack at Bishopstowe. His lordship is now better, and able to attend to the business of his diocese.—Exeter Gazette.

The Bishop of St. David's, whilst passing through Liverpool, was seized with a severe attack of cholera. We are happy to state that his lordship had so far recovered as to leave the town a few days after.

The Bishop of Colombo is making exertions to obtain the establishment of a College at Ceylon, which his lordship proposes shall be dedicated to St. Thomas, the Apostle of India, the Visitor being the Bishop of the Diocese; the officers, a principal (at 400*l.* per annum), four honorary fellows, and a native tutor (in holy orders). The objects proposed are the theological and general education of students in preparation for holy orders, and of the training of native catechists and schoolmasters for the service of the Church in the Diocese of Colombo. Towards the endowment of the College there have been already promised a grant from the Christian Knowledge Society in England, 2,000*l.*; exhibitions for annual students of the annual value of 10*l.* promised in the colony; the Heber Fund, about 400*l.*, at present invested at Calcutta, and unemployed, to be transferred to the College; and from the Bishop a site of nine acres, with buildings upon it, purchased by the Bishop for 2,000*l.*; from the Bishop's income during the present Episcopate, 200*l.* per annum; two exhibitions of 10*l.* each; the Bishop's library; and from the Bishop of Calcutta, the Metropolitan, 200*l.* The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel intend to aid the foundation by a liberal donation.

On Sunday morning a remarkable scene occurred in the little Chapel of Knackersknowle, a village three miles from Plymouth. The Clergyman has just been appointed as the successor of the Rev. Mr. Moore, who has been removed to Kingsbridge—and after the prayers he ascended the pulpit, and having read his prayer introductory to the sermon, was about to state his text, when a gentleman rose in his pew, and, taking up his hat, said in an audible voice, "I will not sit, sir, to hear a sermon in a surplice;" upon which the Clergyman replied, "there is no gown here, sir—there is no gown here, or I should not do it." The gentleman bowed, and said "That is quite sufficient!" He then put his hat down in his pew, and resumed his seat. We need hardly say that this affair caused some excitement; but the Clergyman proceeded with his sermon, and it soon died away.—Plymouth Journal.

The following is a novel way of illustrating religious truth: The Coventry Herald relates a strange tale of the Rev. R. Chapman, chaplain to the gaol, who has been dismissed for torturing Mary Ball, just executed for poisoning her husband. It appears that at half-past five o'clock on Saturday, the 4th of August, the chaplain visited the prisoner, and immediately on entering the cell he called for a lighted candle, which was brought to him. He then took the candle in one hand, and with the other laid hold of the hand of the prisoner, Mary Ball, which he held over the candle, and asked her if she felt it. After a time she snatched her hand away, having previously endeavoured to withdraw it, saying at the same time that she did feel it. The chaplain asked her what that would be compared to the torments of hell, where her whole frame would be burning for a hundred years? Whilst the chaplain held the prisoner's hand over the candle she tried hard to get it away. The assistant matron, who was present, states that the hand of the prisoner was held over the candle two minutes. The candle was first held at a distance from her hand, and brought nearer to it gradually. She tried hard to get it away whilst it was being held. The chaplain afterwards read some prayers, and went away in about ten minutes. After this Miss Winter states she looked at the prisoner's hand, and, finding it very red and partially blistered, she applied some yellow soap to it, and on Tuesday it was much better, the blister having broken. After Mary Ball got her hand away, Mr. Chapman told her not to think he was actuated by any motives of cruelty towards her, and that his design was to give her some idea what the torments of hell were. These statements having been made before the magistrates in the presence of Mr. Chapman, he admitted that they were substantially correct, with the exception of the time mentioned by Miss Winter during which he held the prisoner's hand over the candle, which he did not think exceeded seconds whilst subjected to the flame. He added, that he was actuated by the best of motives, and that what he did was to facilitate her notion of pain. Also, that the prisoner was a woman of obtuse intellect, and that he thought her mind would be more likely to be acted upon through the medium of the senses. The magistrates immediately and unanimously suspended the chaplain till the next quarter sessions, when they will propose his dismissal, the Rev. J. B. Collinson in the meanwhile officiating in his place.

ST. TIMOTHY'S HALL.

A friend in this city has requested us to call attention to the Advertisement of St. Timothy's Hall. This request came at such a late hour that we have only space to give our brief but hearty commendation of this excellent Church School.

The Rev. Mr. Van Bokkelen, the Rector, will be in the city on the 21st instant, and will be happy to call on any parents who desire information. A note addressed to the care of George Zantinger, Esq., 113 Chesnut street, will receive immediate attention.

OHIO.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, CLEVELAND, OHIO, BURNT.—MESSRS. EDITORS:—You have, I think, already heard that our new, beautiful, and spacious Church edifice, which was near its completion, is consumed by fire. It is a total loss, nothing of the building worth mentioning being saved, and there was no insurance save a few hundred dollars, by an individual who had made advances.

You are aware that St. Paul's Parish is not yet three years old, and at the beginning was limited in numbers, and quite so as to pecuniary ability. But finding that a larger place than that which the steadily increasing congregation occupied, was demanded, we were driven to the necessity of building. Sensible of the annoyance to all parties, attending any attempt to go abroad and beg for cash assistance, the resolution was formed, that we would pay for our edifice, as best we could, among ourselves. We were in a fair way to do so, although the effort seemed to tax every person of the parish to the utmost of his ability. But just as we were reaching the point for which we had toiled and waited, and prayed, the fire came, and in a few sad hours turned our hopes into ashes.

The day subsequent to the disaster, we found not merely here and there one, but comparatively the mass of community, urging us to rise and build again without delay. And surely they must have meant all they said, for on circulating the subscription paper scarcely a man of them was found to flinch.

The Parish resolved to proceed and build anew: and the building committee is now engaged in the enterprise. We have not gone on in the matter without the knowledge, counsel and approbation of our worthy Diocesan. We shall do our best to complete this second edifice without applying for aid beyond the limits of our own city. But after doing all we can twice over, if not entirely successful here, may we not hope that some kind hearts among our brethren and friends elsewhere will help us a little in this our time of struggle? Our good Bishop says they will; and he feels disposed to speak a favouring word in our behalf.

If necessity should so require the understanding is, that the Rector of the Parish will visit such persons and places as our Bishop may suggest, and receive what those called upon are inclined to bestow. Believing we have your sincere sympathy, I am, yours affectionately,
G. B. PERRY.

A KING'S MEMORIAL.

By REV. JAMES GILBORNE LYONS, LL.D.

The grave of MAC THUIL, King of Imaal, may be seen at Glendalough, a celebrated valley of Ireland surrounded by the Wicklow mountains. It lies neglected beside a ruined Church, and is covered with a rough stone bearing this inscription:—"BEHOLD THE RESTING PLACE OF THE BODY OF KING MAC THUIL, WHO DIED IN JESUS, 1010."

The place is wild and desolate,
Which holds a monarch's dust;
No pyramid stands proudly there,
No column, urn, or bust:—
He sleeps where ruins strow the ground,
Within a sunless vale,
The chief who led, in days long past,
The tribes of broad Imaal.

He reigned where glad Ovoca rolls
Its waters calm and pure;
He chased the red deer up the rocks
Of misty Glenmalure;
For him brave clansmen drew their swords,
And minstrels waked their strains,
But wealth, strength, power and song have fled:
His tomb alone remains.

His tomb!—One mossed and mouldering stone,
From Erin's mountains rent,
Lies hidden in the tall rank weeds,
His earthly monument:—
Go thou, who scornest paths of peace,
Resolved to shine or rule,
And look on that last heritage,
That house of king Mac Thuil.

Yet, ere thou turn thine eyes away,
Or hasten to depart,
Take thou this truth from Glendalough,
And write it on thy heart:
"Years, as they fleet, make spoil of all,
That proud men seek or prize,
But nought shall tear the crown from him,
Who blest in Jesus dies."

CALVARY CHURCH.

The Ladies' Missionary Society of Christ Church, have, with indefatigable industry, patience and perseverance, collected a sufficient sum to commence building Calvary Church, if they can procure a suitable site. They wish to procure the lot at the corner of Front and Callowhill streets, if they can obtain five hundred dollars for the purpose. It is a most eligible situation, cheerful and attractive. If they cannot procure this small sum from the members of the Episcopal Church!! they will be compelled to take a lot where the light may be obscured by the high walls of adjacent buildings; and ventilation prevented, and the air consequently vitiated. Religion, thus invested with a gloom in the house of God, would repel, instead of attracting worshippers. The aggregate amount of thank-offerings, for exemption from the Cholera, from a few wealthy individuals, added to minor donations from those in more moderate circumstances, would effect this desirable object. May the blessing of the Creator and Preserver of mankind, prosper the generous donors, and may the hearts of the ladies soon be gladdened by their gifts. "That thou doest, do quickly."

"Then we which are alive, and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord." 1st Thess. iv. 17 v.

Forever with the Lord! O, can it be,
That this bright promise is for child of earth?
That for the sons of frail mortality,
Is given this heritage of priceless worth?

Forever with the Lord! Then to thy heart,
Believer, take this star of hope to cheer
And guide thy steps, when e'er in life thy part
Is dark with woes, and all around is drear.

Forever with the Lord! Let this sure word
Be a glad note, to quicken into life
Those dead in sin, whose spirits have not heard
Their Saviour's call to join the Christian strife.

Forever with the Lord! Soon shall the light
Of the eternal day in splendour dawn:
Then let us cast away the works of night,
And take God's armour ere that night be gone.

Forever with the Lord! Then, at the last,
We which remain shall meet him in the air;
The care, the grief, the joy of earth all past—
With his redeemed the bliss of heav'n to share.

Forever with the Lord! Ages shall roll
Onward in ceaseless flow, yet still with Him
We shall abide—blest portion of the soul:
Equal to that of brightest Seraphim!

THE DIOCESE OF NORTH CAROLINA.

I do not know whether any other Diocese has adopted the Missionary Diocesan system that we have done in North Carolina. It is founded on parochial assessment. Each organized parish is taxed, according to its supposed ability, for the needs of the Missionary operations of the Diocese. There is no exception—and justly, since each parish is entitled to its representation in the Convention.

The prime advantage of this system, faithfully complied with, as each parish is religiously bound to do, is, that it provides for a certain amount of receipts, without at all intending to restrict that amount. The religious honor of the parish is pledged that its contributions shall not be less than a known and specified sum, while the generous heart of its 'charity' (love)—the true spring of honor—may much more exceed that sum. Under this plan, adopted, I believe, for all the parishes, in union with the Convention, in the year 1847, our Missionary operations have been extended more widely than ever before. The Missionaries have planted the Church permanently west of the Blue Ridge. From the Blue Ridge to the blue waves the sound of the Gospel is heard from the heralds of Glad Tidings. Only "let us not be weary in well doing."

This apostolic caution seems somewhat necessary to the Churchmen of North Carolina, when we compare the sums actually contributed by the parishes, during the last Convention year, with the scale of their assessments. I ask room for the comparison, which is made, not in a spirit of harsh judging, but for the purpose of "provoking to good works" in future.

[The table is omitted by the Editor of the Banner, because he considers such a publication, if necessary, should be made only by the proper authorities. It should be an official act. The result stated below is sufficient for the writer's argument.]

It appears from the table published as an Appendix to the Journal, that the Church contemplated raising for the Missionary fund, the last Conventional year, the sum of $3104, while the large deficit from delinquent and unreported parishes, amounts to $1336.82. Assuming that the unreported parishes have sent in their Assessment or a part of it to the Treasurer—and also allowing for the contributions of parishes, negligently omitted by the Committee appointed to report the scale of Assessment, we may reduce the deficit to $1000, leaving $2104 for the Missionary Fund during the present year collected from the parishes. The following parishes in the Diocese have nobly met their duty to Diocesan Missions, fully, and in some cases, exceeded the required amount:

St. Luke's, Washington County, Rev. Mr. Watson.
St. Luke's, Salisbury, Rev. Mr. Parker.
Trinity Church, Scotland Neck, Rev. Mr. Cheshire.
St. Matthew's, Hillsboro', Rev. Mr. Donnelly.
Christ Church, Elizabeth City, Rev. Mr. Forbes.
St. Bartholomew's, Pittsboro', Rev. Mr. Olmstead.
Calvary Church, Tarboro', Rev. Mr. Cheshire.
Missionary Station at Seppernong, Rev. Mr. Shepherd.
St. Thomas's, Windsor, Rev. Mr. Harrison.
Grace Church, Plymouth, Rev. Mr. Watson.
Holy Cross, Chapel Hill, Rev. Mr. Davis.
St. Mark's Church, Chatham, Rev. Mr. Olmstead.
Church of Redemption, Lexington, Rev. Mr. Parker.
Grace Church, Morganton, St. Luke's, Lincolnton, Rev. Mr. Huske.
St. John's, Rutherfordton, Rev. Mr. J. Buxton.
St. Peter's, Charlotte, without a minister, at present.
St. Philip's, Mocksville, do.
Gethsemane Parish, Pitt County, Rev. Mr. Hughes.

It may be just to the delinquent parishes to mention, that some of them have given a part of their Missionary Collections to the General Missions of the Church—a practice, which we hold to be unjustifiable, when those collections do not exceed the sums which they have taxed themselves in Convention to contribute to Diocesan Missions. Be just, before you are generous—or if you choose to be generous first, then by self-denial, make up your debts afterwards.

We find that almost every parish that has discharged its full indebtedness to the Diocesan Missionary Fund, has also contributed to the General Domestic and Foreign Missions. And this is what every parish in the State can and ought to do. We do hope and pray that the spirit of enlargement will go abroad over the Diocese—that the cause of Missions, especially in the western part of the State, will not be suffered to languish for the want of a little self-denial on the part of the members of the Church. There is not an important parish in the East, which if thoroughly awake to the obligations resting upon it to support the Gospel, could not, with the co-joined aid of the respective Missionary parishes, maintain the Gospel Ministry in the scattered and destitute portions of the East and West. And well we know, that those Missionary parishes will always cordially unite in the maintenance of those who are sent to minister among them. None appreciate the privilege of the Gospel in the Church so highly, or are ready to do more for the sake of Christ. But we shall conclude—only we shall borrow words from one, whose vigorous and sound writing, carries us back to the time of Nelson—that golden layman of the Church. "The Primitive Christians gave to the Church, because it was a duty and a privilege. It is so now. But we do not give on such grounds; we give because we are ashamed to let the plate pass us, or to refuse our respectable neighbour, or because we like the reputation of liberality, or because we hate to be teased, or because we can make more money in the time it would take to talk over the matter. Of course we give as little as we can. Do we ever give to the point of self-denial? Do we ever give that which would purchase us any thing which we desire to have, and which we must forego because we give? Do we ever give any thing which will be felt in the inventory of our estates, when we are gone where that inventory is nothing more than a list of things of no use to us? This is the spirit which is wanting. Churchmen must be taught to set aside for the purposes of the Church, something which they will miss and which will be of real service. Not the one-fifth of the sum given by a man who is ten times as rich as they, but who only gives one fiftieth of what he ought to give, but something which bears a definite proportion of our own income, and this not so small as not to interfere with the scale of our expenditure or of our accumulation. This is the lesson which modern Christians have to learn and which the Primitive Christians knew." May modern Churchmen learn that lesson without delay!

MISTAKES IN THE STANDARD EDITIONS (SO CALLED) OF THE PRAYER BOOK.

MR. EDITOR: Is it not possible for us to have an immaculate edition of the Prayer Book? So far as the writer of this has observed, there is not one single edition that has not mistakes of one kind or other, and in some instances gross and inexcusable.

There has just been pointed out, by a friend, the following mis-print in Thomas Wardle's edition, which, like many others, has upon the title page the words, "By the Standard."

In the collect for ninth Sunday after Trinity, we have the following sentiment, according to Mr. Wardle's edition:

"Grant to us, Lord, we beseech, the spirit to think and do always such things as are right; that we who cannot do any thing that is good with thee, may by thee be enabled to live according to thy will; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

Such mis-prints as this are inexcusable. It is not necessary to specify the mistakes which we have met with in other editions; but, if desired, we can show mistakes in the standard, and in Appleton's editions. If any publisher will undertake to set forth an immaculate edition, and fulfil his design, we believe that he could sell a large edition, notwithstanding the many editions now in market.

Obituary.

DIED.

On Saturday after a short illness, John Barent Johnson, aged 6 years, 4 months and 15 days. He was buried on Sunday, from the house of his father, the Rev. W. L. Johnson, rector of Grace Church in this village.

Of mild and endearing manners, and of a friendly and sociable disposition, the deceased was beloved in no common degree by all who knew him. Happy those whom God traineth here as young plants in the courts of His house! More happy those whom He transplanteth ere yet any decay of sin have tainted them; whom He taketh out of this world, and giveth, (sparkling with the sanctifying dew of their Baptism,) into the immediate care of their angels!

Gone, in thy morning gone,
Gentle and lovely one,
To thy long home!
To meet with us who mourn no more,
Till, all life's cares and trials o'er,
We to that mansion come.
Blighted, while yet the dew,
Sparkling with diamond hue,
Hung on thy leaf:
Faded, before the op'ning flower
Had drunk in one sweet pearly shower—
Thy bloom alas! how brief!
Yet happy thou, so soon
To fade ere burning noon
Had wither'd thee:
To droop ere 'twas thy lot to meet
The storms that on life's flow'rets beat
So wild and ruthlessly!
Oh, rest thee in the tomb!
To thee it hath no gloom,
That thou should'st dread!
God is thy everlasting light,—
His eye will dissipate the night
That hovers o'er thy bed!
Aye! sleep securely there,
Till thou the trumpet hear
Of the last day!
Then—wash'd in thy Redeemer's blood,
Pardon'd, accepted by thy God,
To glory soar away.

For the Banner of the Cross.

In St. Thomas' Parish, Glassboro, N. J., Lucy Minette Warrick, departed in her tender age, the 1st day of September, on whose soul God hath mercy.

This little child was given to the Lord Jesus last Easter Day, in the Holy Sacrament of Baptism. The Lord has taken into His own possession the gift. He has removed it into that secret treasure house, where are kept His jewels. He has chosen her to be of that privileged number out of the redeemed, who shall follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth. In her mouth was found no guile. She is without fault before the Throne of God. Our Churchyard was without a grave, until her bed was made in it. She lieth, waiting for the Resurrection. In that cloudless morning of the New Day, shall not her grave, which was the first one closed up, be the first one that shall open? Shall not she be the Leader of that Saintly Procession, which shall have hidden and have halted in our obscure Churchyard, to escape the wiles of the world, the flesh, and the devil; and to refresh themselves after their day of hard labor; when they shall awake out of their sleep; and shall go, rejoicing on their way, up to the Judgment? Surely, it is not all fancy; there must be something of religion in it—the picture of this little child leading the young men and the maidens, the strong men and the silver haired, up to that river of water of life which, clear as crystal, proceeds out of the Throne of God and of the Lamb. It were good for our hearts, would we stop oftener in this world, full of hurrying grown-men, and think about little children who are in the Churchyard.

CHURCH WINDOWS.

(From a publication entitled "On the Reverence due to Holy Places.")

In Church Decoration especial attention should be directed to the mode in which the external light is admitted. The management of light in Architecture is always a matter of importance. Colours are known to derive expression from some analogy which we discover between them and certain affections of the mind. Much more, therefore, depends upon the impression which will be made upon worshippers, even upon the most uncultivated classes, both on entering a church, and during the time of Divine Service, than we may be disposed to allow. Our ancestors, who rarely lost the opportunity of conveying useful lessons, wisely availed themselves of the aid of ornament as a means of teaching. Through the medium of painted glass, an unequalled effect was produced, at the same time the sacred subjects occasionally selected, reminded them, as by an unearthly voice, that the place whereon they stood was holy ground. If we can find "sermons in stones," glass will preach far more eloquently to us. A "religious" light is assuredly a "dim" light, and the Poet has judiciously connected these terms. Burke remarks that all edifices calculated to produce an idea of the sublime ought rather to be dark and gloomy; but what we seek to inspire in churches are emotions of awe, devotion, and meditation: all that is expressive therefore, of melancholy and despair, is to be avoided.

Let any one enter a church where the light of day has been softened down by stained glass, and then into another where the full blaze of sunshine, with a view of the surrounding roofs, chimneys and windows, is admitted—relieved perhaps, solely by the paltry apology of holland blinds—he will be quickly sensible how ill fitted is this glare for a House of Prayer, and will subscribe to the full force of Burke's reasoning, "When you enter a building you cannot pass into a greater light than you had in the open air; to go into one some few degrees less luminous can make only a trifling change; but to make the transition thoroughly striking you ought to pass from the greatest light to as much darkness as is consistent with the uses of Architecture * * * any thing light and glaring effectually deadens the whole taste of the sublime." One who visits the Cathedral of Salisbury and immediately after that of Winchester, will from the profusion of naked windows in the former, be struck by its garish aspect; it is indeed open to Lord Bacon's objection, being so full of glass that you can scarcely tell where to be out of the sun. The same observation once applied to the parish church of St. James, Westminster, built by Wren, but a fine east window, very recently placed there by Mr. Wailes, has partially cured this defect, and will doubtless lead to further decorations of a like kind in that building. May not the introduction of painted glass into St. George's, St. James', and other churches in London, be the means of bringing it at length into the vast Cathedral of the metropolis; a beginning being there made with the three large Altar Windows? What a different aspect would at once be given, by such an addition to this now cold and cheerless pile. If the question of expense be sometimes started as a difficulty, it should be known that stained glass—though it ought to be an invariable accompaniment to a church wherever it is practicable—is not essential towards obtaining the desired effect. Those windows in the Temple Church which have not yet received this great ornament, and the opaque, clouded glass in St. Paul's Church, Knightsbridge, are proofs that a grave and solemn light may be diffused throughout a building at a comparatively light charge. Quarries with simple patterns, crossed with texts of Scripture, might also be advantageously introduced. The Puritans of past days destroyed the "perfyte glass and orient colours and imagery," contending that the "white panes and white glass" better admitted the "new light of the Gospel." Happily the taste which has been rekindled will rapidly tend to bring forth dormant talent, and revive this beautiful branch of art; while the author's recommendation of memorial windows, as substitutes for marble monuments and tablets, will further promote this end. From the very general adoption of that suggestion it appears to have accorded well with the religious feeling of the day, and thus legitimate ornaments for churches will be combined with tributes of affection. Hence, as of old,

Even the very walls of the dread place,
And the tall windows with their breathing lights,
Speak to the adoring heart.

THE RETREAT, A Boarding and Day School for Young Ladies,

Miss M. A. SPAFARD, Principal, Mrs. E. SPAFARD, Vice Principal, M. FELIX DROUIN, late Professor University of France, Teacher of French and Latin, Mr. WM. H. PENNY, late of Worcester Cathedral, Professor of Music, with a number of Assistants.

Extract from the address of the Bishop of Pennsylvania, in the Convention of 1848.

"The female school, known as the Retreat, in School-house Lane, near Germantown, has been signally favored, not only by the smiles of Divine Providence, but also with the influence of the Divine Spirit. Considerably more than a third of all the resident or boarding pupils have within the last two months been confirmed, and have also become communicants, under circumstances which have inspired me with the most lively hopes in respect to their future character and influence as Christian women. The order and spirit prevailing throughout the school have been excellent: the discipline is quiet, effective, and eminently domestic: the position of the buildings and grounds is alike beautiful and healthy; and the patronage bestowed upon it most encouraging."

The year consists of two terms, of 14½ and 29 weeks, commencing April 10th and September 4th.

COLLEGE OF ST. JAMES,

Washington county, Maryland.

The eighth session will open on Monday, October 1st, on which day the punctual attendance of all the students is requested. The duties of the classes are promptly recommenced, and it is very important that all their members, new or old, should take their places at the opening of the session.

The academical year extends from the 1st of October to the 1st of August; there being but one vacation, August and September.

In the COLLEGE, all the usual classes under a full corps of Professors, have for several years been pursuing the entire course of collegiate studies equal to that prescribed in the older colleges of the north. At the recent Commencement, the third graduating class received their academical degrees.

In the GRAMMAR SCHOOL, which immediately adjoins the college, the preparatory classes are carefully trained by competent instructors under the supervision of the Professors of the College. Thus pupils may enter the Institution at an early age and pursue their entire course of study under the same direction until they graduate. The mercantile department embraces those partial members of any of the collegiate or preparatory classes, who may be preparing for the counting-room or other non-professional life. Such students are admitted to all the privileges and advantages of their several classes, substituting in place of some of the classical studies, such as are more necessary as a preparation for business.

French is a regular study without extra charge in all the classes. In addition to the French, the mercantile students will be taught, without charge, German or some other modern language.

The location of the College is perfectly healthful; and there are no towns or villages near to present the temptations so dangerous to the young. Moral and religious education is one chief design of the Institution. The charge, covering all academical and domestic expenses, is $225 per session of ten months. The rules of the college carefully restrict any other expenses of the student.

All the departments are under the immediate supervision of the undersigned, to whom application may be made for copies of the "Register" of the college and for further information, as well as for the admission of pupils.

Mr. Editor:—The Delaware and Chester Convocation held its second quarterly meeting at New London X Roads, on Tuesday afternoon, August 28th. There were present, Right Rev. Bishop Potter, Rev. Dr. Bull, Rev. Messrs. Woodward, sen., Allen, Clemson, Kirk and Smith, members; and Rev. Mr. Heister, late of Lewistown, Pa. The Rev. Mr. Woodward, jr., arrived on Wednesday afternoon.

Evening service was held in St. John's Church, commencing at 8 o'clock. Prayers were said by Rev. Mr. Clemson, and the sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Bull, the Bishop following in an exhortation.

On Wednesday morning, prayers were said by Rev. Mr. Woodward, sen., assisted in the lessons by Rev. Mr. Heister, the Bishop reading the ante-communion service. The Convocation sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Smith. The Bishop then delivered an address upon the nature and use of Confirmation, and confirmed one person; when he proceeded to administer the Lord's Supper to the clergy present; the Rev. Mr. Clemson administering the bread, and the Rev. Mr. Smith the wine to the congregation.

In the afternoon, a meeting was held, commencing at 2½ o'clock, for the promotion of Christian education. After a few collects by the Bishop, addresses were delivered, interspersed with singing, by Rev. Dr. Bull, Rev. Messrs. Allen, Woodward, Clemson, and Smith—the Bishop closing with a few pertinent and forcible remarks. Evening prayers were said by Rev. Dr. Bull, sermon by Rev. Mr. Woodward, sen., followed in an exhortation by the Bishop.

On Thursday morning the Bishop, Rev. Messrs. Woodward, sen., Clemson and Heister, were compelled by other engagements to absent themselves from our meetings. The services were continued however through the day.

Morning prayers were said by Rev. Mr. Smith, sermon by Rev. Mr. Allen, followed in an exhortation by Rev. Mr. Smith.

In the afternoon, prayers were said by Rev. Mr. Allen, sermon by Rev. Dr. Bull.

In the evening, prayers were said by Rev. Dr. Bull, sermon by Rev. Mr. Woodward, jun., who was prevented by indisposition from attending during the day. The Rev. Mr. Smith followed in an exhortation. After prayer and benediction by the Rev. Dr. Bull, the Convocation adjourned.

Besides the above public exercises, private sessions of the Convocation were held for business, mutual consultation and prayer. Two hundred dollars were pledged for the support of a Missionary within the bounds of the Convocation. All the public meetings were largely attended by attentive congregations, and at the closing services, many were unable to obtain seats. The clergy were hospitably entertained by the members of the congregation; and we trust that the kind offices rendered may be remunerated by an outpouring of spiritual blessings. May those individuals who kindly entertained strangers, have a joyful experience that they entertained angels unawares.

For myself, I can truly say, that I derived much pleasure and benefit from intercourse with the brethren. I regret that so many of the members were absent. Could they be induced to attend one session, I am confident that nothing but absolute necessity would keep them at home afterwards. Throughout the entire services, differences of opinion, if there were any, were forgotten, and nothing but the kindest feelings were manifested. May it ever be thus.

The next meeting will be held in St. James' Church, Kingessing. The Rev. Mr. Childs was appointed to preach the Convocation Sermon—the Rev. Mr. Woodward, jun., the alternate. We hope at the next meeting to see all the members of the Convocation, and as many of our brethren from other places as can attend, yourself among the number. Rev. J. B. Smith

NEW PARISH.

BATH.—A parish has recently been organized in this growing city, by the name of Grace Church. Episcopal services have been held here for many months, and the considerable congregation attending them has had full opportunity to know and understand the Church. The new parish has firm root in the intelligent affection of its people, and already numbers about twenty communicants. The congregation worship in a spacious and well located hall. A few weeks since, our Bishop administered there the holy rite of Confirmation, which was witnessed by several hundred people. By most of them it was seen for the first time, and it is to be hoped that the solemn seriousness which then pervaded the congregation, may be the harbinger of much blessing to this infant parish. It is a parish which has a peculiar claim upon the prayers of churchmen for its welfare, from the fact that it supplies the place once occupied by the now forgotten church which existed in this neighborhood before the Revolution.

EARLY CHURCH.

The Church in Maine before the Revolution.—Under this head, an interesting article appeared in your paper some months ago, chiefly occupied with an account of St. John's Church, Dresden, but making mention also of the old church at Georgetown, now Bath. During the past summer, the Bishop and two of his clergy visited the site of the latter. It is about two miles and a half distant from the hall in which, after so great an interval, the solemn services of our Church once more unite the voices of her people in prayer and praise. It is a commanding spot. Situated on high ground, just south of a sudden bend of the Kennebec at a right angle; it looks over that river, here broad and majestic, together with a wide extent of the surrounding country. A little in front, on lower ground, stands the "Lithgow House," still inhabited in its quaint old rooms, having weathered the storms of a century. The present proprietor of the farm remembers it in its old age and desolation, when the sheep sought shelter beneath its roof, and the lowing herd was gathered within its walls at the time of even-song. But the sheep of Christ's fold which once gathered there, where are their children, and their children's children? Forty communicants were once accustomed to receive there the bread of life, and those of them who are remembered in the neighborhood, have left behind a sweet savor of holiness. The last of them died only a few years ago, and is remembered the country round with veneration due to a character more saintly than is often found on earth. Three successive pastors are known to have ministered among them; but they are all gone to their final account, and even the name of the church of which they were the rectors, has been blotted out from the book of tradition. More than thirty years ago, the church-yard had been ploughed up and the grave-stones removed. Their broken remains gradually disappeared, and barns and barn-yards now occupy the place where they once stood—above the holy dead still lying there. The church is described as a low building, about forty feet square, with a double floor, but no marks of pews upon it. The only ornament was a simple beading upon the "tie-beams." One of these was drawn many years ago from the crumbling ruins by the present proprietor, and a piece of it, with the bead upon it, given by him to the writer.

In the south-western corner of a field near by are the graves of the Lithgow family, on whose premises the church had stood, and who once worshipped within its walls. Their epitaphs give no additional information. The name, the date, the age, is all that is inscribed upon the stone, except the military titles of the heads of the family—"Major General," "Colonel"—showing the social position they must have held in a country at that time almost a wilderness.

The population of the neighborhood now centres in the city of Bath, where it is hoped, in due time, a more permanent temple may arise to the honor of God; and, within its walls, Christians be built up as of old, and more abundantly, with a spiritual and eternal temple.—Christian Witness.

BISHOP McILVAINE'S VISIT AT LANCASTER.

The new parish of St. John's Church, Lancaster, has just enjoyed a delightful visit from their beloved Bishop and faithful chief shepherd.

Notwithstanding the early hour appointed for service on Thursday morning, the 6th, the Church was full before the ringing of the second bell.

After evening prayer, the Rector, the Rev. Alvah Guion, invited the candidates for confirmation to approach the chancel, when eight persons presented themselves, (three others were prevented by sickness,) who were by the Rector presented to the Bishop as persons who had been "born of water and of the Spirit," and were prepared to receive the apostolic rite of Confirmation from his hands. The Bishop gave a short explanation of the rite, and set forth plainly and familiarly the doctrinal knowledge and spiritual qualifications, required on the part of those who approach it, and then proceeded with the service.—Western Episcopalian.

On Saturday, the 8th inst., the Rt. Rev. Charles P. McIlvaine, D.D., the Bishop of the Diocese, admitted to Deacon's orders, in St. Luke's Church, Granville, Mr. Edward H. Cumming, and Mr. George Johnson, late of the Theological Seminary of the Diocese; and the Rev. Rodney S. Nash, to the order of Priests. The candidates for the Diaconate were presented by Prof. Smith; and for the Priesthood by the Rev. Mr. French.

On the previous evening, the Bishop preached an admirable sermon, from Philippians iii. 3, and confirmed one person.

On Sunday, the 14th after Trinity, the Bishop held a confirmation in St. Paul's Church, Mt. Vernon. After sermon twenty-two persons (12 males and 10 females,) received from the hands of the Bishop the rite of confirmation.—Com.

TRINITY COLLEGE, CONNECTICUT.

At the late meeting of the Corporation of Trinity College, the Rev. Thomas W. Coit, D. D., Rector of Trinity Church, New Rochelle, was elected Professor of Ecclesiastical History. Dr. Coit has accepted the appointment, and it is understood will immediately remove to Hartford to enter on its duties. We congratulate the friends of the College and the Church, on this addition to its professorial corps. Dr. Coit's reputation as a finished scholar, and a sound divine, is too well established, to need our humble eulogium, but we cannot refrain from saying that we regard the appointment as one of happy augury for the College. The institution has now completed its first year under its new head with the best results. Internally, there has been uniform order, contentment, and enthusiastic devotion to study. The daily responsive services of the chapel have exercised a marked influence on the character and conduct of the students. The stillness, reverent attention, and earnest devotion of these morning and evening services, have presented to our mind a striking contrast to those College Chapels where no liturgic office is used, and where the celebrant carries the dress and the associations of every day life into the desk. Externally, we have occasion to know that a wide and deep interest is felt in the college, and that there is but one opinion about the spirit and thoroughness of its work, and the high career of usefulness which is opening before it.

The next term will commence on the 20th instant.—Calen.

HOUSEHOLD WALLS.

(From Eliza Cook's Journal.)

We talk of old "familiar faces,"
And love them warmly and sincerely;
But there are old familiar places
That cling to us almost as dearly.

Say, who among us, with a heart
Where feeling's holy sunshine falls,
Can bear, untouch'd, to turn and part
From even long-known household walls?

Walls, that have echoed to our pleasure;
Walls, that have hidden us in grief;
Been shaken by our dancing measure,
And garnished by our Christmas leaf.

The chairs, that we have drawn around
The twilight fire, with friends beside us,
When in that tiny world we found
The peace the larger world denied us.

The table, where our arm has leaned,
And held our brow in pensive thinking,
The cosy curtain that has screened
When north-east draughts have found us shrinking;

Oh! are there not some hearts, that ever
A tint of love from these can borrow;
And when they say "Good bye," can never Take the last look without deep sorrow?

And how the spirit learns to talk
To some old tree, or whitethorn hedge,
Or worship some poor garden walk,
As though 'twere bound by sacred pledge.

Oh! many a throbbing heart will yearn
To household wall, or old green lane,
And many a farewell glance will turn,
Half dimm'd, to peep just once again,

At some familiar noteless thing,
Which we have dealt with, till it seems
A feather in the gentle wing,
That nestles all our happiest dreams.

Oh! love, thou hast a noble throne
In bosoms where thy life-light falls,
So warm and wide, that they have sighed
At leaving even household walls.

THE LOST SNUFF-BOX.

It was a lovely morning in June—
The air, exulting in its freshness and perfume, as if just loosed from heaven's portals, played joyously around the hills of the Lowlands, entrancing all who felt its influence, from the noble invalid in his pillowed chariot, to the sunburnt goatherd reclining on the heather, into a deeper love of nature than their physical compositions were apparently adapted to imbibe.

It was indeed a glorious, heavenly morning. The fleecy clouds seemed loth to glide across the blue infinity above, and oysously did the sun illumine the little enclosure (yeapt "the garden") that lay before a white-washed cot at the foot of one of the Lowland mountains.

It was the only habitation in sight, and so clean and white it looked, as if it had been built only to make its appearance on such a day as this.

The two upper lattices of the cottage, thrown open to their utmost extent, let in the passing zephyr to fan the fever-stricken temples of two beautiful sisters, who were passing from the world ere their sun had reached its meridian, and who, drinking in the balmy air, prayed that heaven might be as sweet, and turned to pain and misery again!

But to her who watched by her dying children's pillows, the sunniest day had no charms nor brightness!

Oh! how gladly would she have exchanged the gifts of Fortune that had raised her above her sphere, to see those children like what she herself once was!

But it is time to introduce the principal character of our tale.

On an old arm-chair, outside the cottage-door, an old man sat—not that years had made him old as much as toil and hardship;—but his hair was gray, although he had scarcely numbered fifty summers, and as he doffed the forage-cap of the gallant—th Regiment—saving that they were white—his locks showed thick as ever. On his knees rested a volume that even the reckless and dissolute atmosphere of a barrack-room had never separated him from. It was closed, for the morning's ne'er-forgotten task of devotion was over, and every attention of the veteran seemed to be riveted on an urchin some eight or nine years old, who, having made himself master of his father's walking-stick, was going through the manual and platoon exercises under the old man's instructions: a duty that, at intervals, was sadly interrupted, to the utter extinction of all discipline, by some huge drone that intruded upon the "parade-ground;"
whereupon the juvenile musketeer, exclaiming, "Oh! Daddy!
there's Boney!" would forthwith make a grand charge at the encroaching foe, beating the air with his wooden weapon, until some chance and lucky blow sent the miserable interloper, humming, and buzzing, and kicking, on his back upon the ground.

It was during one of these charging exploits that the incipient hero, happening to look through the garden-gate, had his gaze attracted by an object that made him exclaim, with more alarm than pluck, "Oh! pa! here's Boney come, sure 'nough!"
and, alas! for poor puerile self-conceit, the old stick was suddenly dropped, and Master Bobby might, the moment after, have been espied standing very still (and very white) behind the cottage door, with his thumb in his mouth.

Scarcely less astonished was the father of the boy, when he saw the splendid livery of the Castle approach his humble dwelling, (he had been there but a week,) and, mentioning his name, deliver a letter sealed with such a profusion of wax as he had only witnessed once before; namely, on his being the bearer of a despatch on the occasion of the meeting of the Allied Armies in France.

The contents of the missive were an invitation to the veteran to take a seat that evening at dinner at the table of the Castle, where its munificent owner—himself a Waterloo man—was giving a feast in humble imitation of the great captain of the age, on the anniversary of the day that sealed the destiny of Europe, and witnessed the downthrow of the greatest curse incarnate ever let loose on the world and man.

A verbal reply, humbly and thankfully accepting the honor, was the only means at hand of responding to the important document: for to have obtained writing materials would have entailed a three-miles' walk to the nearest town, and a greater expenditure of capital than could with any propriety at the present time be afforded.

But who shall scrutinize the old man's dreams of happiness and grandeur as he read and re-read the flattering missive to the partner of his existence?

He had heard and read in fairy tales of beggars who had become princes—of Cinderellas, who had, in a night, been transformed to queens; but this was bringing the romance home to his own fireside in stern reality.

"How would it all end?" was a self-proposed question that made him giddy to contemplate.

The old regimentals of the—th regiment were slightly astonished, I promise you, on that day, at being so rubbed, and scrubbed, and brushed, and mended, after they had quietly lapsed into the thought that, like their old master, they were worn out, and, after a "long tour of duty," had been laid on the shelf forever. In many places they even disdained the stitches of the busy wife, and mutinously broke out as soon as attempted to be set into anything like wearing order.

Master Bobby was discovered, after an hour's hard search, sharpening the sword-blade on the homely knife-board, to the utter destruction of that useful household article.

At last all was in readiness—and having imprinted a kiss on the lips of each of his loved and only earthly treasures, the old Adjutant set forth on his journey to the "Castle."

He had just attained the summit of the nearest hill, when the strokes of the town clock came booming over the plain upon his ear. After all, it was but five! and he was an hour at the very least, too early.

But what a change had come over the scene! Cheerless, dark, and dimly the wind now whistled past, rudely tearing aside the blue cloak that he had wrapped around him ere his departure; and—strange contrast to the black heather—revealing beneath it the British scarlet uniform on the top of that bleak mountain!

Clouds—dense, lowering, and thunder-charged, were boiling up around the horizon, and in one short hour a melancholy desolation had usurped the place of all that just before was bright and beautiful!

Thus is there a time in life, when, among all our imminent and promised happiness and prosperity, we feel the barometer of the mind descend to zero; leaving us that were the moment before all joy, anticipation, and delight, a living monument of indescribable distress!

But how beautifully has Thomas Haynes Bailey described this feeling, in his plaintive ballad—

There's a time when all that grieves us
Is felt with a deeper gloom—
There's a time when Hope deceives us,
And we dream of bright days to come!

Poor fellow! may those bright days he dreamt of have reached him in a brighter world, that never reached him in this!

But let us listen to the old man's mental soliloquy, as he watches the gathering gloom, and feels the same shadow fall over his spirit with an unaccountable influence.

"To the day now passing to its end in storm and darkness, how different has been my life!—Born—ah! where was I born?
—In a gaol or a poor-house?—I know not, and little recks it now. Enlisted at scarcely manhood, to save life itself from starvation and crime!—Favored by Fortune—praised, promoted —the queen's commission conferred on me for deeds of daring!
—uplifted from my low estate, to rank with the highborn of my country—and now about to sit at table with the noblest, the fairest, the bravest of the land!—My day, begun in obscurity and darkness, is setting in sunshine and glory!—Gather on, thou threatening storm!—darker and fiercer!—and let me read, in thee, the picture of my life reversed!"

(Old man! old man! your eye has not yet come.)

Alone in the drawing-room of the castle—for the heavy drops of the coming storm had driven him onwards before the appointed time—stood the hero of our story, lost in wonder at the wealth and luxuries that lay around him; the only feeling, save wonder elicited by the display, being simply that the most trifling article there would keep his family in plenty for probably half their life.

Oh! it's a bitter thing to stand surrounded by another's wealth, when you know not where to get a crust for your own starving home-full on the morrow! when even in your daily sacrifice of prayer, the words, "Give us this day our daily bread," tremble on your lips as you breathe them upwards!— for you think how vain they are.

But joy! joy! why think of sorrow?—the rooms are blazing in countless lights!—glittering trappings!—snowy plumes!—
happy voices!—clear-ringing tones of woman's laughter!— (down, down, thoughts of the morrow!)—congratulations, happy and heartfelt!—all these are seen and heard around!—
and is the old man left alone?—Oh, no! bright eyes beam sweetly on him; noble lips pour forth praises on his head. He, the almost sole survivor of his regiment on the field of Waterloo, may nearly be considered the hero of the feast.

"Oh! but for one—the least—of the jewels that lavishly bedeck that fair and most enthusiastic interrogator of the veteran, to save my darlings from starvation!"

He cannot curb his thoughts; but this is all he thinks of.

The dinner, so unusual to English dinners in general, soon thawed into conviviality. How surely we always find, that the more inhospitable the appearance of a country the more hospitable the dwellers therein; as if to compensate by a profusion of the one for a delinquency of the other.

The dinner ended, and the toasts began. The ladies had retired to the drawing-room, and reminiscences of the eventful day were eagerly canvassed around. Pass round the ruby wine!
Not less red nor less profusely—lavish it as you will—flowed another crimson stream, that day five years ago!—

It was getting late.

"Pass the snuff-box, if you please," exclaimed the host, who at an early period after the removal of the dinner had produced an article of elaborate workmanship, studded with brilliants, presented to him by Marshal Blucher in person, as a token of admiration for his valor, and esteem for his friendship.

"The snuff-box!" "The snuff-box!" echoed the guests, passing the word one to the other; but no snuff-box appeared.

In vain were the desert-dishes pushed aside; in vain was search made under the table and under the chairs; the snuff-box had vanished, as if by magic! The attendants protested having brought it in at the beginning of the evening, and having left it on the table.

"It is quite ridiculous," exclaimed one of the company, after a while; "some one must have pocketed it in error, and I'll be the first to try my own pockets."

But no one had done so.

Matters were looking most unpleasantly serious, and each one at table was feeling as uncomfortable under the circumstances as men can be supposed to feel, when the noble host, rising, addressed the company as follows:—

"Brother-soldiers and gentlemen, I have missed an article of unsurpassable value to me. It strikes me that some one having got hold of the article, has, in error, put it into his pocket instead of his own box, and has not now the moral courage to produce it; so I will order in a box filled with sawdust, into which each of you can in turn place his hand; and the one having the box in his possession, may thereby return it without its being known by whom it was deposited. Does any one object to this?"

No one did, of course—so the box was brought, and each guest in turn left his seat and walked up to it—the others looking away—and thrust in his hand. All had completed the ordeal, and the sawdust was emptied; but still no box appeared.

"There is no doubt but some one present has the box," said a noble general, the highest in rank at table; "and under the circumstances I propose that we each in turn submit to undergo a personal investigation of pockets, and I will set the example by being the first to submit to it."

"And I—and I—and I—" flew round the table.

The news had now flown to the drawing-room; and the party, that one hour before promised to be a reunion of deep and noble feelings of cordiality and good will, became a scene of general disorder, suspicion, and confusion.

"I wish the earl had not asked people nobody knows anything of!" exclaimed one fair guest.

"Yes, indeed!" echoed another: "people may be officers—but honesty is never tested till a man is a beggar."

(True! noble lady! true!—affluence can afford to be honest.)

"Aye! search us!—search us all!" eagerly exclaimed all in turn.

ALL? no not ALL!

One lip grew pallid, and one cheek blanched white as the damask cloth before it, when the word "search" was uttered; but no one remarked it; a brimming bumper of wine, taken at a gulp, alone prevented one guest there from sinking sick and faint beneath the board.

One by one each guest underwent the self-imposed ordeal, until but one remained to undergo the investigation—it was the old adjutant.

"The adjutant! the adjutant!—where is he?"

Aye, call away! obsequious guests!—search for him from room to room! and condemn him unfound.—He's o'er the mountain, and awa'—and little hears your calling.

(From the Churchman's Companion.)

VENERABLE BEDE, PRIEST.

Those who speak of the far north, commonly think only of the rich deep mines, from which is borne in the tall dark ships unladen by swarthy crews beside the wharves of Rotherhithe and St. Katherine's, the precious mineral which burns upon the glistening Christmas-hearth, and feeds the stout engines which give motion to the rapid-wheeled vessels that plough up the silent highway of the Thames. Or, perchance, the name may awhile summon up boyhood's memories of wild tales of border-warfare; the raid of the swift moss-trooper levying his black mail; or the gleam of weapons, and the watch-fires of the Douglas, gazed on by wistful eyes from the peopled walls of Carlisle. But there are gentler recollections which throng thick upon the mind, over and above the ceaseless commerce, or the romance of old feuds, or even the calm beauty of its misty mountains and glassy lakes.

We must look back some twelve centuries ago. Upon the side of the Norman Church of Jarrow, in Northumberland, built into the wall, is an ancient stone, bearing, in uncouth letters, an inscription, setting forth that the Church of St. Paul was dedicated on the viij of the Kalends of May, in the 15 year of King Egfrid, when Cholfred had been Abbat now four years. Hard by are the moss-grown ruins of some rude monastic building.
It is the year of Grace 684. The wall of Hadrian and Severus still stands firm as when the Roman raised it. Upon a bleak moor, stretching wide between a chain of hills and the banks of the rushing Wear, and near the mouth of the Tyne, a band of monks are toiling. He who directs their labours has returned from his fifth journey to Rome; already built up the walls after the Romanesque manner; he has glazed the windows by the new art hitherto unknown, and now he hangs upon the walls of the new conventual church fair pictures of Isaac bearing the wood of sacrifice, and the Blessed Redeemer sinking beneath the Cross which He carries toward Calvary; the Brazen Serpent in the Wilderness, and Him who was uplifted on the accursed tree. That holy man is Benedict Biscop; and one of tender years watches him with tearful eyes of joy,—seven summers have cast their light upon his bright golden hair. Like another Samuel, his parents have brought from the neighbouring village the young boy, to dedicate him to the perpetual service of the sanctuary: that child grew up to be the Venerable Bede. Trumbert, who had been reared at the feet of St. Chad of Lichfield, trained him in the studies of good learning; and from John, precentor of St. Peter's at Rome, he was taught to sing the sweet hymns and psalmody of the daily service. But his chief delight was in the Word of God; that was his meditation day and night; the Divine oracle he made his rule of faith and guide of life. True it is, that in his laborious cell he compiled that noble witness of his industry and learning, the Ecclesiastical History of Britain; while the wisest Bishops and scholars of his time counted it joy to render him their aid. Amongst these were Daniel of Winchester, the monks of Landisfarne, the solitaries of Lestingham; Albinus, Abbot of St. Augustine's; and that zealous priest, Northelm, who set forth to Rome to search among the archives of its early Bishops, and bring back transcripts of all letters and histories that related to the gradual spread of the kingdom of heaven in his native land.

At the early age of nineteen, with the licence of Ceolfrid, he was admitted to the holy order of Deacon by John of Beverly, the Bishop of Hexham. Eleven years after, by the same hands he was advanced to the Priesthood. Once he was summoned to Rome by its Bishop; but he, it is said, scarcely ventured beyond his cloister, until one year before his departure he visited Egbert, lately consecrated Archbishop of York. His whole heart was given to communion with the Most High, sought through prayer, and specially the book of life. Not only, at the desire of his friend Acca, did he collect out of the ancient fathers a valuable commentary upon a great part of holy writ, but wisely commenced a translation of the Gospel of St. John into the Anglo-Saxon tongue; desiring also that all men should be able to say the Creed and the Lord's Prayer in their native language, and frequently partake of "the spiritual sustenance of the Supper of our Lord."

To Egbert, almost with a dying hand, he addressed a letter full of pious and prudent counsel, entreating him to establish Presbyters in every village to preach the Word of God, and administer the holy sacraments. One warning he added, touching the danger and inconvenience of the increase of religious houses to the prejudice of Church and State. His might well speak of the temptations of indolent and ignorant seclusion, for his only amusement was variety of employment. In astronomy, arithmetic, the learned languages, and poetry, he was a proficient; his homilies, lives of the saints, and other works, fill eight volumes of the largest size. Manual labour strengthened his body; the exercises of piety, humility, and other Christian graces, gave unction to his preaching, and beauty to his character. "With this man," says William of Malmesbury, "was buried almost all knowledge of history down to our times; inasmuch as there has been no Englishman either emulous of his pursuits, or a follower of his graces, who could continue the thread of his discourses now broken short."

In early times monasteries were a boon to the land; they were the refuge to the weak, affording a refuge and retreat of prayer to the aged, asylum and sanctuary to the orphan and oppressed: they were the seminaries of the nation, the store-houses of literature, in which were preserved the treasures of the lore of the ancient world—and the lamp of learning was still kept alight. At their gates, morning and evening, the bountiful alms were distributed to a hundred poor supplicants; their bailiffs were gentle landlords, letting their lands at moderate rents; and never in vain at their doors did the benighted traveller pray for welcome and repose; but in the refectory kind hands spread the board, and through the night sweet sounds of chant and hymn told that the chapel was full of pious watchers, and with the morning he passed out upon his way, rejoicing in delicious memory of the holy brotherhood.

Many who, in those iron days of misrule, were wearied with the orgies of the Saxons, and the cares of rank, retired to these houses of ceaseless prayer. The monks were the chroniclers of their times, and multiplied copies of the Holy Scripture by those exquisitely written and richly illuminated manuscripts, which are now stored up as above price in our choicest libraries.

In these occupations Bede spent his useful life. The solemn services of the Holy Week were ready to be celebrated in the year 735, when, now approaching the term of human life, the venerable priest felt that the Great King was about to call him hence. Until the Eve of the Ascension, he made preparation for his last summons to the world of the spirits of the just. His sickness was the asthma; but painlessly and gently the hand of death lay upon him. He solemnly warned his brethren of the hour when they, too, must depart hence, with texts of holy Scripture, and many words. His disciples he continued to teach, "Learn your best to-day," said he, "for I know not how long my Maker may suffer me yet to tarry with you." At evening, when the brethren chanted the Collect, at the words "Leave us not orphans," he wept for joy; remembering how God had been his Father from a child, when he had known no earthly parent's love. The day dawned, and his pupil, Wilbeth, entreated him to complete a chapter in his Translation of the Gospels. "Write," said his dying master, "quickly," and gave him the closing words. "It is finished," replied the youth, when his task was done. "It is finished indeed, life and this world!" he softly answered. Then he bestowed upon each monk some little memorial of affection; and bidding them lay down, and looking towards his wonted oratory upon the floor of his cell, and having uttered the hymn of praise, with the name of God trembling on his lips, he commended his spirit to Him who gave it, on the morning of the Ascension. He needed not the chariot of Elias, and the horsemen of fire; for his heart was set with his treasure in heaven, and his soul, we may hope, went with that prayer and praise up into the presence of the Eternal Glory. . . . His massive chair of oak is still shown in Jarrow. The Dane and the Norman threw down the holy house, and the brethren dwelt in Durham; and, with Elfred the Sacristan, laid his sleeping body beside the bones of St. Cuthbert. The princely Bishop, Hugh Pudsey, nephew of Stephen of Blois, placed it in a glorious casket of precious metal; and Richard of Barnard Castle translated the remains into the galilee of that noble fane, which — "huge and vast,

Looks down upon the Wear!"

In that lovely chapel, without projecting over the woody steep built up from the winding river beneath on massive walls, within with intricate aisle and clustered columns "rich beyond all words," is a long plain stone, whereon is written, "Here lie the bones of Venerable Bede." For by that name men after the Council of Aix delighted to remember him. What matters it that no costly shrine is his—no meet monument has been raised to mark out where his body lay? Already, by the munificence of Van Mildert, has been founded there an infant university. Well may we believe, that oft at stillly evening, when through the western window, the sun, loth to depart, floods for a moment with a halo of golden light the cold grey stone, the pensive student will visit the lowly grave, and purpose with meek prayer to go forth, and proclaim the tidings of eternal love along the mountains and moors of the sullen north; or, in the quiet cloister, study in holy lore, and by godly meditation, to strengthen the hands of them who toil in the vineyard of the Lord; content to sleep without reward of earth, if only he may teach and search over those holy Scriptures, which were the light of him who was "the lamp of the English Church," and are, blessed be God, the free inheritance of us and our children, sons of her who bids us "walk in the bright beams of that truth, that so we may at length attain to the light of everlasting life."

TIME-SAVING FUNERALS.

"A GREAT SAVING IS MADE IN TIME BY BURYING IN CYPRESS HILLS."—The Railroad Trains are only 20 minutes in going out! and a large procession can attend the funeral of a friend at a trifling expense and very little loss of time."

This is one recommendation of a new Cemetery on Long Island, as set forth by the Directors in their circulars and advertisements. The sentence appears just as printed above in the advertising columns of a daily newspaper. We are not apt to be over fastidious in such matters, but we confess that this cool calculation of time-saving in the burial of the dead rather shocks us. By the help of steam you will be "only twenty minutes" in reaching the grave, so that you can "attend the funeral of a friend" with "very little loss of time." Over the portals of the new Cemetery, instead of the emblems of mortality coupled with those of Christian faith and hope, or some cheering sentence from the Gospel of eternal life, we seem to see a signboard with these flaming capitals. A GREAT SAVING IN TIME BY BURYING HERE!

We do not censure the Directors for holding out such an inducement for purchasing lots at Cypress Hills, for they understand well enough that such a consideration will have much weight; that in this community time-saving at a funeral is quite an object. We give the announcement rather as an index of city life. Hurry, hurry, hurry, the living always hurry; the dead must be hurried to the grave. The thrilling vision of Schiller is no longer a dream, "Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah! the dead ride fast." See how they course over the iron track! "Only twenty minutes!" To a funeral assembly gathered in such circumstances, grudging the few moments that decency requires for the last offices to a friend, chiding the minister for the length of the funeral service—which, after all, must be measured, not by the character of the assembly or of the occasion, but by the time-table of a locomotive—in a funeral so conducted, what is there of solemnity or profit? Where are those lessons of mortality, of penitence, of faith, of hope, of life everlasting, those deep, ineffaceable moral impressions, which make it better to go to the house of mourning than to go to the house of feasting?—where those imitations of death and of immortality by the side of the open grave or among surrounding tombs? Pleasant as it is to live in the city, to feel the pulsations of its mighty heart, to be borne along by its strong, swift current, to mingle in its stirring earnest scenes, yet to a sensitive spirit it is sad to think of dying there—to be buried with the least possible loss of time—your grave unvisited, yourself forgot!—Independent.

BOOKS FOR THE FIRE.

Young readers, you whose hearts are open, whose understandings are not yet hardened, and whose feelings are neither exhausted nor incrustated by the world, take from me a better rule than any professors of criticism will teach you. Would you know whether the tendency of a book is good or evil, examine in what state of mind you lay it down. Has it induced you to suspect that what you have been accustomed to think unlawful, may after all be innocent, and that that may be harmless which you have hitherto been taught to think dangerous? Has it tended to make you dissatisfied and impatient under the control of others; and disposed you to relax in that self-government without which both the laws of God and man tell us there can be no virtue, and consequently no happiness? Has it attempted to abate your admiration and reverence for what is great and good, and to diminish in you the love of your country and your fellow-creatures? Has it addressed itself to your pride, your vanity, your selfishness, or any other of your evil propensities? Has it defiled the imagination with what is loathsome, and shocked the heart with what is monstrous? Has it disturbed the sense of right and wrong which the Creator has implanted in the human soul? If so, if you have felt that such were the effects that it was intended to produce, throw the book into the fire, whatever name it may bear on the title-page. Throw it into the fire, young man, though it should have been the gift of a friend; young lady, away with the whole set, though it should be the prominent furniture of a rosewood book-case.—Southey.

EAGLE-HAWK NECK, TASMANIA.

Eagle-hawk Neck is a narrow isthmus of sandy hillocks, not more than one hundred paces across, which joins the penal settlement of Tasman's Peninsula to the main land of Masmania. Concealed among the inequalities of the ground, formidable provisions are made for restraining within their appointed limits the miserable denizens of that crime-smitten region.

The lofty peaks and iron-bound coasts of Tasman's Peninsula forms a district within which it is not allowed to any free person to hold property, or even to reside, unless employed in the management of prisoners. The sentry and sentry-box indicate the constant presence of a military force; while posts form a portion of a line extending across the Neck from shore to shore. A ferocious dog is chained to each post, and at such a distance as to render it impossible for any one to pass through without coming within reach of the savage animals. The deafening howl of these dogs, at the approach of any unwonted footstep, render it quite impossible to traverse Eagle-hawk Neck by stealth; and as the apparently placid waters on either hand swarm with sharks, it is almost certain destruction to attempt escape in this direction. Yet so strong is the yearning of the human mind, when smarting under the bitter servitude of sin and sorrow, to venture any and every way of escape, that though none of the transported convicts have more than once or twice been known to brave the ferocity of the dogs, they have often attempted to swim across the sea in the immediate neighbourhood of the Neck, and have been drawn under and devoured by sharks. Their only other alternative is to take advantage of the concealment of the neighbouring forests of Tasman's Peninsula, and to attempt the construction of a raft or boat. This of course is next to impossible, considering the strict and constant supervision exercised over the prisoners at their work, and the many modes in which such an attempt may be detected. A number of ingeniously framed boats and rafts, discovered when in course of construction or nearly finished, are preserved as monuments of the ingenuity man will exert and the desperate boldness with which he will trust his life to the fraillest inventions, when liberty is the prize of success.

How remarkably does all this illustrate the Apostle's description of sin, and his assertion that he "had not known sin but by the law!" Shut up into a state of bondage by the righteous condemnation of the law, the sinner lives a prisoner, seeking to be free, but in vain. Those dreary sands and rocks convey the similitude of the world, such as the sinner finds it.

Those savage animals by land and by sea, portray the ferocity and snares of the great enemy of man, ever busy in driving souls back into bondage, or destroying them in their vain attempts at escaping from the law. How can we sufficiently love the Saviour of sinners, who, forgiving us all our trespasses, visited this our world, bore the weight of the law, quelled the violence of the enemy, and accomplished for us a perfect salvation.

OPTICAL ILLUSION IN THE CATSKILL MOUNTAINS.—The following interesting extract from a private letter, descriptive of a singular optical illusion on the Catskill Mountains, written by an eye witness, has been handed to us by a friend for publication.—N. Y. Tribune.

* * * The afternoon, [Tuesday, August 14] was a memorable one for the mountain. The optical illusion of last Monday week was reproduced, but more transcendently beautiful than it had ever appeared before. It is the third time in twenty years that this extraordinary phenomenon has been perceived. Mrs. A. and myself were sitting on a rock in front of the piazza, when she suddenly exclaimed, "Look, look!" I did so, and the whole hotel was surrounded in the cloud before us. The whole house was assembled immediately, and we ran out to the point of the rock from which the phenomenon of last Monday had been perceived. We were scarcely there a minute when a beautifully arched rainbow was formed in the cloud, exactly in the centre of which was seen the entire group, precisely as they stood on the ledge of rock. It was not merely their shadows, but the entire form of each person in the group was distinctly visible; each person saw the whole group, not merely the reflection of his own image. This lasted about five minutes, when the rainbow disappeared, and the phenomenon of Monday last succeeded; each person saw his own shadow of huge dimensions, reflected on the cloud and surrounded by a halo of light, but was unable to see that of his neighbor. I shall never in my life see any thing of the kind again, and if I had not seen it, I could have formed no conception of its effect; it was perfectly thrilling. The poems of Ossian; the Children of the Mist; the Death-fetch of the Germans; the Spectral Phantoms that were fearful visions to less enlightened ages, were all realized distinctly and palpably before us. This visit to the Catskills has revealed to me more of the wonders of Nature than all else I have seen put together.

Yours,

C. F. D.

ALWAYS A LITTLE TOO LATE.

Some people are never in season. One would think they must have some conscientious scruples about being early in going anywhere or doing anything. John Sheldon belongs to this class. We were playmates in childhood. He used to be a very good boy in other respects, for aught we know. But he was forever too late. Something or other always kept him from being in his place at sabbath school, until after the school had commenced. Many a time he came in during prayer. Then he was famous for being late to school on week-days. By and by I found out why he was so tardy. I got my mother's consent to stay one night at Mr. Sheldon's, and I saw how he managed. He was the last one up in the morning to begin with. It was a long while after he was called before he could muster resolution enough to jump out of bed. Then, of course, he had to dress himself hastily, in order to be down in season for breakfast.

Mr. and Mrs. Sheldon were very good people, and after breakfast they had worship. But they had to wait some time on John, for he was not ready. After prayer, it was nearly time to go to school, but John had neglected to get his lesson. So he had to study a quarter of an hour, when he ought to have been on his way to school. We both ran all the way to the school-house; and when we got there, we went in tired and out of breath.

When John grew up, he was always late to church; and if anybody made an engagement with John Sheldon, at a particular hour, they never expected he would come until the time had passed. Something seemed to go wrong with his machinery all the time. He is like a poor watch I had once. It would go too slow, in spite of all I could do. I moved the regulator, but it did no good. It did not affect the main-spring any. So it was with John Sheldon; and so I am afraid it always will be. He loses time, and you can't regulate him. Indeed I don't believe such men have got any hair springs at all; but whether they have got any or not, nobody can regulate them, so as to make them go any faster.

Young reader, take care you do not form such a habit as John Sheldon has! Be in season. Better too early than too late.—Theodore Thinker.

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1849.

THE PESTILENCE which excited so much apprehension, both as a threatened and present evil in our land, has now almost passed away. In its welcome departure there is cause to apprehend, it has carried with its retiring steps much of the salutary thought it excited. The alarm which it created was great, the gratitude felt for its withdrawal is little seen. It is a point of great practical importance for every Christian to consider whether his present gratitude is proportioned to his past apprehensions.

How many are there who tremble in awful fear when God's judgments are visible in the world, and only return when the dread passes away with increased confidence to the vain hopes of earth. There are not a few who resemble that wicked king of whom it is recorded—"And when Pharaoh saw that the rain and hail and the thunders were ceased, he sinned yet more and hardened his heart, he and his servants." These, in the extremity of their fear, while the pestilence seemed at their doors, owned their helpless misery and God's eternal might, and called upon a Saviour in supplications of deep toned earnestness. But now that the destroying angel has withdrawn his presence, they have forgotten His mercy who had respect unto their cry, and with returning confidence have returned to their thanklessness and self-dependence.

Where are the evidences, even among God's people, of increased devotion, more ardent love, and renewed zeal in the service of Him who has just blessed us with a new instance of His mercy, by freeing us from the dread of pestilence? Is there any less of worldliness, of vanity, of unlawful devotion to idle pleasures, less serving of Mammon, now than before? Is God's Holy Word, the book of life, more carefully studied, and its blessed counsels more truly followed, and its life-giving doctrines more faithfully received? Are God's Holy day's more observed and less profaned? Are His sanctuaries more frequently and regularly attended? Are Christians more given to prayer, both public and private? Is there more true penitence, more living faith, more hearty obedience now than before? Thus alone can men show their gratitude not only with their lips but in their lives.

It is sad to think that these manifest proofs of gratitude should be lacking for the signal mercies with which God has blessed our land in restoring health to its borders. But even though we are ungrateful, His mercies fail not. May they yet stir in the hearts of our people a lively sense of His goodness, so that even though we desire it not, for His dear Son's sake, we may be blessed with His present and eternal mercy.

BISHOP OTEY'S PASTORAL LETTER.

In connection with the above remarks, we may appropriately notice a "Pastoral Letter addressed to the members of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Tennessee, by James H. Otey, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese." In this admirable and well-timed Pastoral letter, the Bishop calls the attention of the flock, over which the Holy Ghost has made him Overseer, to the subject of "Christian manners." The Bishop, in this important theme, wisely recognizes the connection between manners and morals, and includes, in his discussion, the general conduct of a Christian in his worldly relations—more especially in reference to worldly pleasures and amusements.

Among the considerations which have called forth this letter, the Right Rev. Author says, "I may mention as chiefly influential, the reflections which spring so naturally from the uncertainty of life, powerfully brought home to our thoughts by the prevalence of a wasting pestilence in our country, warning us of the importance of being prepared, by the daily habits of our life, for the solemn hour of death and the awakening realities of eternity. "When thy judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness."

We will allow this letter to speak for itself, as we intend to give it either wholly or in part to our readers.

NEW ENGLISH PERIODICAL.

Few writers of the present time have excited a livelier interest in the American heart than Martin Farquhar Tupper. It is not mere popularity, such as his genius and great literary merits deserve, with which he is honored here. He won this distinction as soon as his writings became known. But the generous and earnest spirit in which he has devoted himself, and consecrated his best powers to the noble work of cultivating a kindly feeling between brothers "John and Jonathan," have kindled in the hearts of our people an affectionate interest. The sonnets and ballads, written for this noble end, have all appeared in the Banner. Their holy purpose gave them a sacred character. From the following communication, it will be seen that, in the same spirit, Mr. Tupper has commenced a periodical, with the great and catholic design of strengthening the bond of fellowship between all whom the hand of God has united by the close ties of one speech and language. When the Almighty wished to confound the impious purposes in which the wicked of earth had united, he scattered them abroad and separated them from each other by giving them different languages. Infinite Wisdom teaches us, by this expedient, that unity of language should produce unity of feeling. This truth was strongly and beautifully enforced in a noble lyric, not long since published in the Banner, on the "TRIUMPHS OF OUR LANGUAGE."

We take the liberty of adding, that this lyric, aiming at the same object as the Anglo-Saxon, led to a correspondence between Mr. Tupper and the author on the subject of his new Periodical. This gentleman has furnished us with the following notice, to which we need add nothing but our earnest and hearty wishes for its success.

TUPPER'S ANGLO-SAXON.

Dear Sir:—Many of your readers will learn with pleasure that the celebrated author of the PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY has lately established a periodical, the great object of which is to bind together the various divisions of the Anglo-Saxon world. I cannot imagine a publication having a more general interest, a wider range of topics, or a loftier aim than this; and I deem Mr. Tupper's connexion with it an assurance that it will be conducted with prudence, candor, and ability. Believing, as I do, that the progress and happiness of the human race depend much upon the union and mutual good-will of those who speak English, I think the work, to which Mr. Tupper now gives himself, one of the most noble and useful to which an illustrious writer could consecrate his talents and his life. In a letter, lately received, Mr. Tupper informs me that this important Quarterly is intended to promote "the brotherly union of those speaking English everywhere; to be conducted on principles of GLORY TO GOD, PEACE ON EARTH, and GOOD WILL TOWARDS MEN; to be philanthropic even more than literary, and practically useful rather than political." I very sincerely hope that a work of this kind, undertaken and conducted by an author of Mr. Tupper's character, will find a warm welcome in America. The subscription of five dollars a year is such as many among us can afford. Mr. Moore, of 193 Chesnut street, opposite the State House, is extensively engaged in supplying American subscribers with foreign periodicals; and I trust that he will soon have to add to his list of importations many copies of the Anglo-Saxon.

THE CHURCH ALMANAC FOR THE YEAR OF OUR LORD 1850.

Published by the Protestant Episcopal Tract Society. Depository, No. 20 John street, N. Y.

This well known Almanac contains, beside the usual matter, a full account of all the Festivals and Fasts in the Church, with the proper lessons for every day in the year. There is also appended an accurate statement of all the general and diocesan institutions, with an alphabetical list of the clergy, and much other information. It seems prepared with great care, and is a most useful publication. We take from it the following general statistical summary:

Dioceses, 28; Bishops, (elect, 2) 32; Priests and Deacons, 1,521; whole number of Clergy, 1553; Candidates for Orders, (estimated for 9 Dioceses,) 223.

Baptisms, (estimated for 15 Dioceses.)—Adults, 2,675, Infants, 13,698—Total, 16,604; Confirmed, (estimated for 4 Dioceses,) 6,723; Communicants, (estimated for 14 Dioceses,) 93,436.

Marriages, (in 11 Dioceses,) 1,938; Burials, (in 11 Dioceses,) 3,534; Sunday School Teachers, (in 10 Dioceses,) 2,142; Scholars, (in 11 Dioceses,) 18,237.

Churches consecrated, (in 14 Dioceses,) 50; Offerings, (in 13 Dioceses,) $10,104 92.

N. B.—It must be born in mind that the Parochial Returns of the Clergy, even in the Dioceses from which we have the fullest reports, are, in many cases, defective in one or more particulars. It is much to be desired that greater attention should be given to this subject; and also, that every Journal of Convention should be accompanied by a full statistical table. Such a table is found only in ten out of twenty-eight journals last published. While this is the case, any general table can exhibit only an approximation to the truth.

PLAIN AND FANCY TYPES, ORNAMENTS, &c.

We have before us the "Third Supplement to the Specimen Book of Plain and Fancy Types, Ornaments, etc., from the Type Foundry of L. JOHNSON & Co., No. 6 Sansom street, Philadelphia.

Every one who writes for printers must feel a lively interest in the progress of the Typographical art. Although good printing may not improve bad sentiments, or dull writing, yet good printing may add to the force and beauty of just thoughts well expressed. Horace tells us how much the mind is affected by the eye. A well printed paper or book has an attraction, like a good looking person, which may produce "love at first sight;" and this, if the object be worthy, may grow into a permanent affection.

In no department have the useful arts made more rapid progress in this country, than in the most important of all, the art of printing. With the exception of what is called "cheap literature," and cheap enough it is, we can without shame, compare our publications with those of any other country.

This specimen book of varied types and ornaments show most favourably the advance of this art. Messrs. L. Johnson & Co. can supply every kind of type and ornament ever used by printers. We are informed, by the publishers of the Banner, whose extensive printing establishment has been supplied with types by Messrs. L. J. & Co. for the last twelve years, that types, &c., can be here obtained as good and cheap as any in the country.

A PRESBYTERIAN CLERGYMAN LOOKING FOR THE CHURCH. BY ONE OF THREE HUNDRED.

This neat volume contains a series of letters originally published in the New York Churchman. The author, the Rev. F. S. Mines, now in California, held a distinguished rank in the Presbyterian Ministry. His abilities and learning will qualify him to rank high in any ministry. The experience of such a man, his own exhibition of the steps by which he was gradually led to find the object of his search, must needs be both interesting and instructive. The account is given in a very animated style, and with a force which must impress every candid reader. We have only room at present for this brief notice, intending to place the merits of the work more fully before our readers. We earnestly commend it to the attention of all who are "looking for the Church," as well as to those who are looking from the Church. The book is published by the New York General Protestant Episcopal Sunday School Union."

CHURCH IN FAYETTEVILLE, ARKANSAS.

Appended to this will be found an appeal from the devoted Missionary at this place. We earnestly commend it to the attention of our readers, as having peculiar claims upon the liberality of churchmen. In a state containing 55,000 square miles there is only one church edifice. This state also contains 150,000 inhabitants, and has only two officiating clergymen, and these are without a consecrated place of worship! And this, American Churchmen, in our own borders. They need at Fayetteville at least $1000 beyond what the congregation can give, to erect their church. And they must have it. And they can't have it unless churchmen give it. The conclusion is so plain that we need add not a word to make it clearer.

TO BENEVOLENT CHURCHMEN.

A Missionary, laboring in the Far West with reasonable success, amongst an intelligent and interesting people, feels greatly in want of a "House of Prayer." He therefore solicits the aid of his brethren abroad. The people among whom the Missionary labours are not able of themselves to build a house unto the Lord; or this appeal, in the fear of God, would not be made. There is but one house of worship in the state, belonging to the Church. There seems therefore great reasonableness in this appeal. If any brother or brethren would make us a donation, not exceeding $1,000, it should be expended in substantial walls, which could be finished for service from funds procured in the bounds of the mission. Any person wishing thus to bless the Church with his property, is referred to the Editor of the Banner of the Cross for particulars, and to the Missionary Bishop of the South West, for his decision in regard to the worthiness of the object.

Good Father, put it into the hearts of Thy people to help us.

I am, in hope and solicitude,

A MISSIONARY.

SPECIAL CONVENTION OF OHIO.

This Convention met in St. Paul's Church, Mount Vernon, on Tuesday, September 11th. After prayers by the Bishop, he stated the object of this special meeting, viz. the designation of a time and place for the Annual Convention. This had been appointed to meet in Sandusky on the 12th. Owing to the prevalence of the cholera in that place, it was deemed inexpedient to meet there. The Convention having been organized, it was resolved that the Convention be held on Thursday, the 11th day of October, in St. Paul's Church, Mount Vernon.

In the Western Episcopalian, we find the following from Bishop Chase:—

BISHOP CHASE'S NEW PLAN.

The following communication will, no doubt, receive the attentive and respectful consideration of the Convention, to whose Secretary it is addressed:

It will be seen that Bishop Chase now admits the possibility of selling a portion of the "South Section," but still thinks his will rather than the judgment of the "Trustees" should control in determining what portion shall be retained. We are sure that if well informed as to the tendency of things here, he would not have made the proposition he has. By drawing his line only half a mile south of the present College building, without knowing it, he gives up at once what he calls "the first principles of the institution," but which we consider an impracticable theory in reference to one of the details in the plan for accomplishing the great object of the institution—the education of young men for the ministry in the Episcopal Church.

AN EXPEDIENT OF BENEVOLENCE, TO SAVE KENYON COLLEGE.

Respectfully presented to the Secretary of the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Ohio, 1849.

PREAMBLE.

The following article is drawn up by Bishop Chase, to save the Institution, which he founded on Gambier Hill, (in law, termed the Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Ohio,) from ruin, by permitting the sale of a part of its domain, about 3,000 acres, reserving the remainder, nearly 1000, for the preservation of the essential features of the original design.

The founder claims to be a rightful interpreter of the wishes of the donors, who were solicited to contribute on the principles laid down in his letter to Bishop White. The Founder acted according to these principles and these wishes in all things, and never ceased to receive their congratulations. He was but carrying out these principles, and fulfilling these wishes, when he gave his own substance, $2,000, without annexing any conditions, believing them to be understood:—(and when, afterwards, perceiving some clouds in the moral horizon of Gambier Hill, indicating a storm, which should destroy that great and darling feature of preserving his Institution from temptations to vice—a feature without which he would never have commenced his laborious work,) he annexed conditions* to his second gift of $2,000, viz: That the south section, (one-half of the 8,000 acres first purchased,) should never be sold, nor even leased, so as to destroy the right of a re-entry, in examinations for temptation to vice and immorality.

But sad things have come to pass. Not only have these things been violated, but the whole section has been sold for taxes, and the proposition has been publicly made, and urged, that the lands be sold in fee simple, to save the Institution, under the specious plea of "making new and more lucrative investments," without any reservation to secure the first principles of the Institution.

Under these distressful circumstances, Bishop Chase makes the following DECLARATION, vouching for the consent of the English Trustees.

If the Convention of Ohio "agree," it will be good evidence that, notwithstanding all that is past, they are desirous to return to the original design, and wish to carry out the long approved plan of the Founder of the Theological Seminary, alias Kenyon College. If not, the contrary will be evinced before the Church and the world.

THE DECLARATION.

The undersigned, Philander Chase, once of Ohio, and now Bishop of Illinois, considers the covenant made between him and the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Ohio, to have been broken, and all the moneys which he collected and their avails for the Institution which he founded on Gambier Hill, Knox county, Ohio, to have been justly forfeited—to whom, he will not now say.

But, in consideration of the sad consequences, implying great injury to religion and learning in general, and to the Diocese of Ohio, (once the scene of his labors, and the object of his tenderest affections,) were he to proceed to extremities, he is willing to forgive the debt which the Seminary owes him, and all injuries, general and particular, on the following conditions, viz:

That the Institution be brought back to its original form and design; and all amendments of the charter, except the first, and all laws which oppose the meaning of that amendment, be repealed.

That the Bishop of the Diocese of Ohio be the Head and President of the whole Institution, the Theological Seminary, and Kenyon College of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Ohio; and that he keep constant watch over the same; and for this purpose reside on Gambier Hill, either personally, or by his representative, the Vice President.

That there be but one Faculty of the Institution, viz:—the Bishop, or his representative, and the Professors of the Theological Seminary; and that the same, alone, be empowered to confer degrees in theology, and the arts and sciences, all being clergymen. This was the design of the second alteration of the charter, written and preferred by Bishop Chase himself.

*These conditions apply to both donations. See the record of the facts in the College books.

That no lands be sold within a parallelogram measuring one and a half mile from north to south, and one mile from east to west, viz:—the same extending one mile north of the principal college building, one half mile south, one half mile east, and one half mile west, of the said principal college building, containing nine hundred and sixty acres.

That the lands and tenements within the above described parallelogram be all owned in fee simple by the corporation, and no tenants allowed but such as are termed "tenants at will;" this to keep from the premises all gambling houses, dram shops, and other infamous dwellings, so detrimental to the morals of youth.

That the avails of all sales of lands and tenements, beyond the precincts of the above described premises, be immediately applied to the payment of the College debts, being conscious that no Institution of Religion and learning can be the object of the divine blessing, while passing over just debts; or expect to prosper, which withholds from others their just demands, under any pretext whatever.

When all the College debts shall have been honorably discharged, then, and not till then, let the remainder of the sales be applied to the purchase of stocks, and other means of investment, for the support of Professors, such as shall be mutually agreed on by the trustees and the founder who, reserves to himself and his heirs the right of re-entry in case the above conditions are not complied with.

PHILANDER CHASE,
Jubilee College, Illinois.

August 29th, 1849.

CONSECRATION OF ST. JUDE'S CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA.

This interesting ceremony took place on Tuesday morning Sept. 18th.

The Bishop and a large number of the Clergy assembled in the Sunday School room, and at the appointed hour entered the church repeating that noble Psalm, "the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof."

After the clergy were seated, the Bishop stated that he had received a request to consecrate this edifice, assuring him that there was no debt upon it, and accordingly he proceeded with the solemn service. The Rev. Mr. Miller, the Rector, read the sentence of consecration. Morning Prayer was then begun by the Rev. J. M. Douglass, the Rev. F. Ogilby reading the Lessons, and the Rev. N. S. Harris taking the concluding part of the service from the Creed. The Rev. Dr. Dorr assisted the Bishop in the ante-communion service. The Bishop preached from the text II. Kings 5: 12. The following clergy were present besides those officiating; the Rev. Drs. Clay and Howe, the Rev. Messrs. Suddards, Hazlehurst, Durborow, Shannon, Stratton, M. C. Lightner, T. Allen, T. J. Davis, J. B. Smith, J. H. Smith, Montgomery, Quinan, Sheets, Diehl, Jaquet, Field, Mitcheson, Yarnall, B. J. Douglass, Murphy, and Rudderow.

This new building, adding another to the growing list of Philadelphia Churches, is highly creditable to the zeal, liberality and good taste of those concerned in its erection. Doubtless there are faults to be criticised; but the whole character of the building is such an advance upon the past style here prevailing, that we are only disposed to commend its excellencies. It is a substantial stone edifice, with slate roof, nearly cruciform, the greatest defect about the building being the omission of the head of the cross, which would have given it proper length as well as a noble chancel. A view of this church appeared some time ago in the Banner. The windows are of stained glass, and the roof open, and of yellow pine.

The building will now seat 600, and when the transept is occupied, it will hold 850. The cost of the building, without the furniture, was $8,150.

This church is placed in a fast increasing part of our city, and will, we trust, under its zealous Rector, soon be filled with worshippers. May peace be added to its prosperity.

NASHOTAH.

In our last paper Mr. Breck's name was given incorrectly. The change of initials escaped our notice in reading the proof. His name is given correctly at the end of the following acknowledgment.

The undersigned gratefully acknowledges the following receipts, being sums pledged sometime since in the columns of the Banner, towards raising $1000 for a permanent building, viz: One Hundred Dollars from a member of St. James' Church, Philadelphia; and One Hundred Dollars from a member of St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia.

JAMES LLOYD BRECK,

FOR THE NASHOTAH MISSION.

Nashotah, Lake George, 7th September, 1849.

SURPLICES.

We have been requested, by one of the Managers, to state that surplices can be supplied, at the Ladies' Depository in this city, of an approved pattern and made in the best manner, at a very small cost. The material of fine linen can be furnished and made up for between $7 and $8. For making alone the charge is $4.

The Rev. M. A. D. W. Howe, Rector of St. Luke's church, Philadelphia, has received the Honorary degree of D. D. from Brown University, Providence.

The following paragraph is going the round of the papers, relative to the appointment of a new Bishopric in Canada:—The Rev. Ernest Hawkins, B. D., Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, has left England on the suggestion of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, with a view to the promotion of the Society's objects in Canada, and also to make the necessary arrangements for the erection of another episcopal see in that portion of our colonial possessions. The diocese of Toronto (Canada West) covers an extent of country twice as large as all the dioceses of England put together, containing upwards of 100,000 square miles, with a population of 700,000 souls.—English paper.

HEALTH OF NEW YORK CITY.—Interments, total, for the week ending Sept. 8th, 520; decrease 167. Of these, by Cholera 94; decrease 77. The deaths by Dysentery, however, were 87. The Board of Health has ceased reporting the deaths daily, but they advise their fellow citizens to use the precautions which are still necessary.—Churchman.

From late English Papers.

The Guardian thus speaks of the cholera in London and the country:

The cholera, we regret to say, is still on the increase in London, though somewhat abated in the country. The returns published by the General Board of Health, on Monday, give the following for the week:—For London and the vicinity, 1,10; for the country, 1,089. Last week they were—For London and the vicinity, 1,005; for the country, 1,132. The Registrar-General's return, which we publish in our Postscript, applies only to the London districts, and it will be perceived exhibits a still greater increase; still, however, confined to the closely built and badly ventilated districts. The Bishop of Salisbury has set apart Friday next as a day of humiliation and prayer in his Cathedral city. We have heard from several sources that the Rev. Prelate is most active in his visitations, offering consolation and relief to the distressed inhabitants in Salisbury.

The Lord Bishop of Salisbury has appointed Friday next to be set apart as a day of humiliation and prayer, in consequence of the national visitation with which this country has been afflicted by the prevalence of cholera. A special service will consequently be held at the cathedral and in the parish churches in the city on that day.—Salisbury Herald.—The Bishop, attended by Precentor Hamilton, we gather from the local papers, has been a daily visitant to the cottages of the poor, inquiring into cases of distress, and relieving their temporary wants from his purse, and also, desiring them to send to the palace for such nourishing things as may be prescribed by their medical attendants.

At Trowbridge, on Friday last, the morning up to nine o'clock, and the evening after six, were devoted to religious services at the several places of worship, "for the purpose of entreating the mercy of God under the existing prevalence of cholera."

In this connection we publish the following interesting communication. It has already been shown that the experience of this country verifies the general truth of such statements.

PRAYER AND FASTING IN TIME OF PLAGUE AND PESTILENCE.

(To the Editor of the English Churchman.)

SIR:—The plague is among us, and yet no steps have been hitherto taken, by the proper authorities, to call upon our people to humble themselves under the chastening hand of God. How differently did our forefathers meet the appalling assaults of pestilence! And how mercifully did the Lord answer their prayers!

With your permission, I would bespeak a place in your columns for a short extract from a sermon by "John Squier, Priest, Vicar of St. Leonard's, Shore-ditch," preached at St. Paul's on the 1st of January, 1636, on the occasion of a "Thanksgiving for the decreasing of the Plague." It appears that, for seven weeks consecutively, a day of especial Prayer and Fasting was observed, beginning with Wednesday, the 26th of October, and he thus "computes God's goodness towards us:—"

1. "The first weeke, Wee did call upon God in the time of the Plague, by Prayer and Fasting; and God did heare us in that time of our trouble. So the burials decreased 190.
 2. "The second weeke, Wee did call, &c., &c. So the burials decreased 190.

"It is Saint Bernard's sentence, 'Si cessat gratiarum recursus, cessat gratiarum decursus: if we leave off to have our Blessing ascend, God will leave off to have His Blessing descend.'

The records of the last visitation of cholera showed the same result from an act of National Humiliation; and now the hearts of all our countrymen, as the heart of one man, yearn for the blessed opportunity of again seeking for deliverance from the present visitation, not only by individual supplication, but by a solemn season of Prayer and Fasting, specially set apart for the deprecation of God's wrath, and deliverance from that punishment which, by our sins, we have justly deserved.

Having published the singular account of the Coventry Gaol Chaplain's treatment of a prisoner, we now feel bound to give his own defence, leaving our readers to judge of its merits.

Copy of a Letter forwarded by the late Chaplain of Coventry Gaol to the Secretary of State for the Home Department:—

"Right Hon. Sir:—Although an official notice from the Visiting Magistrates of Coventry Gaol, respecting my suspension from the duties of the Chaplaincy, and my consequent resignation of the office, may have already reached you, I have nevertheless thought it not inexpedient to trouble you with a brief account of the circumstances which led to such an unfortunate result. The condemned prisoner, Mary Ball, (who was executed yesterday,) I had attended privately for several weeks prior to her condemnation; and from the time sentence of death was pronounced upon her until the Saturday before her execution, (i. e. for the space of a week,) I was unremitting in my exertions to prepare her for the awful fate which awaited her. No pains, I assure you, were spared on my part to awaken her mind to a sense of her condition. But I had to contend with an obtuse intellect, a lethargic temperament, a moral sense exceedingly debased, and a conscience apparently benumbed by long-continued habits of vice.

"The proofs of her guilt had been clearly established at her trial; but no acknowledgment of it could I obtain from her. On the contrary, her protestations and assertions of innocence were repeatedly conveyed to me from her lips in the strongest language that she had at her command. I trust that, as a Christian gentleman, you will make every reasonable allowance for a clergyman anxious for the salvation of a human soul, and in a state of perplexity how to secure it. On the morning of Saturday, the 4th inst., I read and explained to her several of the parables of our blessed Lord which inculcate the necessity of repentance; I also read to her the Gospel account of the penitent thief, and endeavored from these instances, and from other passages of Scripture, to prove to her that repentance without confession, or an unreserved acknowledgment of guilt, was necessarily imperfect. I then pointed out to her, as plainly as I could, the dreadful consequences of departing this life without having completed the work of repentance, and read to her some passages from a work of Jeremy Taylor, on the nature of eternal punishment in hell fire.

"Having expatiated thereupon at some length, I implored her in the kindest and most soothing accents not to incur the wrath of God by persisting in the assertion of her innocence, and requested her to kneel down with me in prayer. After these religious exercises were finished, her manner seemed to be rather subdued, in spite of a little sullenness which now and then betrayed itself, and an unwillingness to be communicative. On revisiting her in the afternoon, a thought struck me that an application to the senses of a person, who was inaccessible to reason, might be attended with the desired result. I called for a lighted candle, and requested her to give me her hand, which she unresistingly placed (or suffered to be placed) in my own. I then held it over the lighted candle, and asked her if she suffered pain, to which she made no reply, but presently began to struggle, when I instantly released her hand. This operation did not occupy more than two seconds, or three at the most, during which she never once cried out. I then inquired of her if she would venture upon another trial, and proceeded to take her hand for the purpose; but perceiving her disinclination, I did not persist in my attempt. Whereupon I addressed her in the following or similar words:—'Do not imagine that I have been influenced by any feelings of cruelty towards you in thus placing your hand over the candle. I have done this to teach you the value of your immortal soul. If you flinch from such a trifling amount of pain as this which I have been inflicting upon you, how will you endure the torments of an eternal fire hereafter?—which will inevitably be your portion unless you make an ample confession of your guilt before you die.'

"I regret very much to state that the hand of the unfortunate woman was slightly blistered by the flame; but, two days before she suffered, I received intelligence of its entire recovery, and that she had almost forgotten the circumstance.

"Perhaps it may not be unimportant to mention, that she subsequently confessed her crime, and admitted the justice of her sentence.

"I have thus endeavoured to give you as clear a statement as possible of the transaction which occasioned my suspension. The possibility of the other prisoners entertaining a prejudice against me, on their coming to a knowledge of the circumstance, has doubtless influenced the decision of the Magistrates, and this consideration will perhaps account for the apparent harshness of their resolution. Erroneous and exaggerated reports relative to this affair have been circulated, some of them too ridiculous to be credited by any person of intelligence. I have therefore thought it advisable to write to you myself on the subject, not forgetting to mention that, by the advice of my friends, I have forwarded my resignation of the Chaplaincy to the Chairman of the Quarter Sessions.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
"August 10, 1849." "RICHARD CHAPMAN."

The Guardian furnishes us with the following lament of a popular French writer over the dullness of a London Sunday. They must have improved in London since we visited that great city.

The rigid observance of Sunday is bewailed by the feuilletoniste in true French style:—

"This solemn day," he says, "belongs exclusively to religious practices and meditations. Not only is business suspended, but pleasures are interdicted. Repose would not be complete if ennui did not give its season for the greater glory of Heaven."

No newspapers, he declares, are published on the Sunday: but the prudent Cockney, he says, only reads one half of his newspaper on Saturday, so as to have the remainder to read on the Sabbath. He states that as all the shops and taverns are shut up, the people must starve if they do not take the precaution of laying in a stock of provisions overnight. He notices the advertisements of sermons to be preached at particular churches, and adds that popular pulpit orators preach the same sermon in different churches as actors perform the same character in different theaters:—

"The Rev. Wilkinson will, for the fourth time next Sunday, in the church of St. George, preach his sermon on Christian charity, which has produced such great effect on the faithful," is, he says, a frequent advertisement in the London journals.

"If," says the writer sadly, in concluding his lament over the mournfulness and gloom of London on the Sunday—

"If you would wish to know ennui in all its magnificence, pass a Sunday at London; you will then understand the spleen, and will feel surprised that last year there were only 3,500 suicides in that city; for assuredly the 52 Sundays of the year deserved more than that!"

The description, however, of another feuilletoniste, Gauthier, we think was briefer and more pithy:—"To pass the day all alone without a light, at the bottom of the well of the Great Pyramid, is preferable to a Sunday at London?"

Report of the Diocesan Church Society.—The report read at the last meeting of this Society states the annual receipts up to last Lady-day of the Society and District Branches at 2,838*l*. The Districts raised 1,216*l*, of which 399*l* was remitted to Toronto: the Parent Society's income was 2,010*l*. The issues from the Depository have amounted to 1,018*l*, including grants of books to the value of 99*l*. The books circulated were:—Bibles, 853; New Testaments, 1,230; Prayer-books, 1,659; S. P. C. K. Tracts and Books, 11,310; other Tracts, 5,300. The Society has also contributed to the support of eight Missionaries, one Indian interpreter, and one Catechist. Annuities have been granted to three Clergymen's widows and two orphan children; also, assistance from the Bishop's Student's Fund to six students. Several donations of land, some of considerable value, have been made this year for Church purposes. About 20 new parochial Associations have been organized.—Colonial Church Chronicle.

PATRIOTISM OF OUR REVOLUTIONARY ERA.—In looking over the "American Archives," (says a respected correspondent,) I found the subjoined, under the caption of "General Orders;" and, though of little importance at this day, it presents to my mind another beautiful evidence of the high-toned morality that adorned the still more lovely character of the immortal Washington.—How different (says our correspondent) from other men! The more his public life is examined, the more brilliant and shining are his many virtues; and the age of the world has not yet done, if it ever come to do, complete justice to his merits. The legacy left this nation, in his character, is inexhaustible; and the young and the old of all ages, in all time to come, may draw upon it, and, by emulating his virtues and following his example, become rich in all that constitutes the good man and the patriot.—*Nat. HEADQUARTERS, CAMBRIDGE, Feb. 26, 1776.
(Parole, New York.) (Countersign, Lee.)

The Commanding Officers of Regiments are immediately to order all axes, pick-axes, spades, shovels, and other intrenching tools, now in their possession, to be forthwith sent to the Quartermaster General's store in Cambridge.

All officers, non-commissioned officers, and soldiers, are positively forbid playing at cards and other games of chance. At this time of public distress men may find enough to do in the service of their God and their Country, without abandoning themselves to vice and immorality.

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. J. M. Bartlett has resigned the charge of Zion Church, Pierrepont Manor. His address is for the present, Newburyport, Massachusetts.

The Rev. C. B. Ellsworth has taken charge of Zion Church, Pierrepont Manor, and requests that his letters and papers be addressed accordingly.

DIVORCE AND RE-MARRIAGE.

REV. SIR, AND EDITOR:—

It is stated, on good authority, that the number of divorces in the United States, amounts annually to two thousand. This statement, should it be but an approximation to the truth, is calculated to alarm all who fear God, or desire the welfare of their country. With the view of arresting the serious attention of the members of the Church, the following passages of Holy Scripture are respectfully presented, establishing (according to the present writer's judgment) the several positions for which they are quoted,

1st. The will of God as to the permanency of the marriage bond.

St. Matthew xix: 4—6. "Jesus answered and said unto them, have ye not read, that he which made them at the beginning, made them male and female? and said, for this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh. Wherefore they are no more twain, but one flesh. What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder."

2d. By the law of God, the marriage bond is dissoluble for two causes, and for two only, viz. Death or Fornication.

(1) Romans vii: 2, 3. "For the woman which hath an husband is bound by the law to her husband, so long as he liveth: but if the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of the husband. So then if while her husband liveth, she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress; but if her husband be dead, she is free from that law, so that she is no adulteress, though she be married to another man."

(2) St. Matthew v: 31, 32. "It hath been said, whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorcement. But I say unto you, that whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery; and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced, committeth adultery."

3d. The sense of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

"It is the sense of this Church, that it is inconsistent with a law of God; and the Ministers of this Church shall not, therefore, unite in matrimony any person who is divorced, unless it be on account of the other party having been guilty of adultery."

SCHOOLS.

We had hoped to have presented our remarks previous to the re-opening of the various schools around us. Circumstances beyond our control have prevented. We still hope the few remarks we shall make upon the pernicious influences attending Protestant sons and daughters being sent to Romish schools, will awaken the minds of those parents who, regardless of the principles of their children, are still ushering them into danger. It is a startling fact, nevertheless true, that two-thirds of the number of Roman institutions are now filled up by the sons and daughters of Protestant parents!!! "Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon," while such a number of schools exist of every denomination, that so many young precious immortals are sent to schools where the design of our blessed Reformation seems to be attacked successfully at its very foundation.

Can parents be aware of the snares spread for these inexperienced young immortals, given by God to them to rear in his nurture and admonition? The spells thrown around their young imaginations, the fascinations entwined around their youthful hearts by that dangerous system of false religion, which, appealing with almost irresistible power to the senses, through them prostrates the reasoning faculties, and thus silently but surely leaves its fatal net around the unsuspecting victim. We have thus seen the foundation of a Protestant education sapped and undermined, till the promising fabric reared by parental fondness has been levelled with the dust, and the deluded parents left to mourn their alienated child, a prey to the seductions of Popery, or the not less probable danger of unsettled principles and practical infidelity.

It is too much the custom of parents to lull their minds into a false security on this all momentous subject, by requiring a promise from Romish teachers, to whom they entrust their children, that no attempts shall be made to interfere with their religion; and satisfied with this assurance, they persuade themselves that there is no cause for fear. Alas, how greatly are they mistaken! The promises thus given are often indirectly, if not directly broken. There are a thousand perils and snares inseparably, and necessarily, connected with a residence among them, or even as day-pupils. Let such parents remember the daily prayer, "Lead us not into temptation;" and the solemn warning addressed to them by Him "who searcheth the heart and trieth the reins"—"Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God."

No Roman Catholic institutions can conscientiously do their duty, if they permit pupils to be under their care without making an effort to proselyte them to their faith. We speak from experience, and defy any one of that faith to deny what we say. If there are any parents so ignorant of the religion which they profess, as to imagine that there is but little real difference between Protestantism and Popery, and that it is of no consequence what we believe, if we are sincere in that belief, the writer would earnestly entreat them to study the Word of God with more attention, and prayer for the teaching of the Holy Spirit. They will then see that "there is none other name under Heaven given among men whereby we must be saved but the name of Christ, neither is there salvation in any other;" and that as the Church of Rome substitutes many other methods of salvation, and many other Saviours, in the place of Him whom God has anointed, "she is essentially an anti-Christian Church, and therefore to be dreaded as the greatest enemy to genuine Christianity."

Let our Ministers awaken to this subject, they must, and ought to have influence over their flocks. While the lambs are being sent to folds so pernicious, let them reduce their prices, and pay Protestants to bring their children to them. Europe will send them both pecuniary means as well as teachers.

A FRINDLY DIALOGUE.

THEODORE. Cousin Arthur I never meet you now at the Lord's Supper, and feel very anxious to know the cause of your delinquency, if that be not too harsh a term to apply to your withdrawing from this holy ordinance. If you do not consider it too great a liberty, and if it would not be disagreeable to you to assign the reason, I will be much obliged to you to mention it.

ARTHUR. I feel gratified by the interest you express, and will speak without any reserve upon the subject. To receive the Eucharist was, formerly, the most delightful of my religious duties; but I have been lately reading the various contradictory opinions and views of many writers in our Church upon this subject, which so bewildered and puzzled me, that I experienced neither comfort nor satisfaction the last time I received it, and determined to abstain, until I should be more fully persuaded in my own mind in regard to the nature of this sacrament.

THEODORE. You will never attain to a state of tranquillity, until you cease to read those authors whose thoughts are so obscure and confused, that it is impossible they should convey clear ideas to their readers. Previous to the reception of this holy rite, I read and meditate upon all the passages upon the subject contained in the New Testament; and then study our inimitable Communion Service, which is the most comprehensive and satisfactory explanation of this sacrament, that was ever written.

ARTHUR. There are also three expressions in our Office for the Communion which bewilder me.

THEODORE. Which are they?

ARTHUR. "So shall ye be meet partakers of these holy mysteries," is one of them.

THEODORE. A mystery is defined, in the Dictionary, as "something above human intelligence;" "something awfully obscure;" therefore we should not expect, with our finite understandings, to be able to comprehend these matters, neither is it necessary that we should.

ARTHUR. The next is, "he hath ordained holy mysteries," &c.

THEODORE. But why has he ordained them? Not to puzzle or bewilder us, or to exercise our metaphysical subtlety; but to exercise our faith. What says the Office? "He hath instituted and ordained holy mysteries, as pledges of his love, and for a continual remembrance of his death, to our great and endless comfort." All we have to do is, to obey his command; and "to give continual thanks; submitting ourselves wholly to his will and pleasure, and studying to serve Him in true holiness and righteousness all the days of our life."

ARTHUR. Then the disputed point of the real presence puzzles me.

THEODORE. Those who unite in this sublime and elevating rite with simplicity and sincerity, I believe, feel his spiritual presence enlightening their minds, and cheering and animating their hearts, in an especial and peculiar manner, which they do not experience in any other acts of devotion. I heard a friend say, that he felt upon these occasions as if he were in the immediate presence of the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world. He said, although he was overwhelmed with a sense of his unworthiness, and of the Divine goodness and mercy, and felt annihilated with a sense of his own insignificance in the presence of the Divine Majesty, all doubts and fears which troubled him at other times vanished from his mind; and he felt that peace which passeth all understanding, which the Saviour promised to his disciples. He said the glory and brightness of the Shekinah, illuminating the sacred table, appeared disclosed to his spiritual sight. We are guarded against error by the previous expressions, "vouchsafe to bless and sanctify with thy Word and Holy Spirit, these thy gifts and creatures of bread and wine; that we, receiving them according to thy Son our Saviour Jesus Christ's holy institution, in remembrance of his Death and Passion, may be partakers of his most blessed Body and Blood."

I think nothing can be clearer. We are told, "take and eat this in remembrance that Christ died for thee, and feed on him in thy heart, by faith with thanksgiving." We are not told to feed on his real body with our mouths: and in regard to the blood, "Drink this in remembrance that Christ's blood was shed for thee," &c.

How inimitably beautiful and comprehensive are these formularies of presentation! How ineffably affecting. They would dissolve a heart of stone, we should suppose.

ARTHUR. In the thanksgiving after receiving, the words holy mysteries and mystical body are introduced.

THEODORE. We know not how our common food and drink strengthen and refresh our bodies, but we do not abstain from them until we ascertain the manner of their operation. Why should we abstain from the spiritual food of the "most precious Body and Blood of the Son of God, our Saviour Jesus Christ," because we cannot understand the mystery how our souls are nourished by the reception of these consecrated elements; when "we are assured thereby of his favour and goodness towards us." The expression, "very members in the mystical body of Christ," we are told, means the blessed company of all faithful people. All Christians feel there is a tie which binds them, in the links of love, to each other, and unites them to Christ their head. Instead of bewildering ourselves with the notions of different writers, let us obey the command of our dying Lord and Master, and fervently offer up this daily prayer: "We most humbly beseech thee, O Heavenly Father, so to assist us with thy grace, that we may continue in that holy fellowship, and do all such good works as thou hast prepared for us to walk in, through Jesus Christ our Lord;" and let it be our endeavor and meditation and study to live consistently, and daily inquire, "Lord what would'st thou have me to do?" Especially, at this time, when we have been preserved from the pestilence which has desolated so many cities, and consigned so many families to the silence of the tomb, should we present our bodies a living sacrifice to the God of our life. We should all consider what are the "good works" which God has prepared for us to do, in our peculiar sphere. Magistrates should be more faithful and diligent in restoring peace and order to our disgraced cities, and in bringing riotous offenders to justice. Clergymen should preach more fearlessly and energetically against "existing evils," and the sins of omission in the members of their congregations. Every member of the Church should contribute liberally, in proportion to his or her means, to the building of churches, and to the support of missions; and to supply the funds of Societies connected with the Church. Many of those who have this year been summoned to give an account of their stewardship would, could they have foreseen their approaching dissolution, have given a goodly portion of that wealth to promote the glory of God which they have been obliged to resign to ungrateful heirs, let the living now present thank-offerings for their preservation. Christians should endeavor to adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour in all things, by the exhibition of the operative principle of love in all their words and actions, and by that kindness and benevolence of manner, which recommend their religion. The sum and substance of true religion are comprehended in this, "to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and to love one another." It is advisable to leave all those tiresome disputes and controversies which divert the mind from attention to our practical duties to those who wish to distinguish themselves by an exhibition of their superior sagacity and discrimination, and by their critical acumen. And let us not waste that time, which could be so much more profitably employed in reading those practical works which arouse us to the performance of our duties, in perusing the wearisome effusions of those who make "much ado about nothing," in their elaborate remarks about comparatively insignificant matters.

VOCULA.

ST. MATTHEW'S HALL.

Permit me, Mr. Editor, through your columns, to call the attention of parents and guardians, who wish to give their children a sound and Christian education, to an institution of learning among the mountains of New Jersey. St. Matthew's Hall, a few miles from School's Mountain Springs, is under the successful supervision of the Rev. P. L. Jaques, and has every advantage in a literary point of view, possessed by the best institutions of the kind in the country.

But, in addition to this, the principles and practice of the Church are faithfully inculcated. The service of the Church begins and ends the duties of every day, and a sense of moral responsibility seems to be the main spring of action. The healthy situation of St. Matthews is by no means an unimportant consideration. While disease has been making its ravages in our towns and cities, the inmates of the Hall have pursued, without interruption, their course of recreations, duties and devotions. We can hardly do parents a greater favor than by recommending to them this institution, where their children can attain the education and manners of Christian gentlemen.

A VISITER.

Miscellaneous.

A SAILOR BOY.

At a meeting of the Aberdeen Auxiliary Bible Society, a few years ago, the following pleasing anecdote was related by the Rev. Mr. Grant, of Orkney, who was an eye-witness of the scene: "Some time since," said he, "a vessel from Stockholm, in Sweden, was driven upon our coast in a tremendous gale, and became a total wreck; it was so situated, that no human aid could possibly be administered for the preservation of the crew: a short time after, the vessel struck, and went to pieces. The spectators on shore beheld, with pungent grief, the awful situation of those on board, but they could render no assistance. All on board perished, except one; and he, driven by the merciless waves upon a piece of the wreck, entwined amongst the ropes attached to the mast, half naked, and half drowned, reached the shore, and was disengaged from his heart-rending situation. As soon as he was rescued, the spectators observed a small parcel tied firmly round his waist with a handkerchief: some concluded it was his money, others that it was the ship's papers, and others said it was his watch. The handkerchief was unloosed, and to their great astonishment, it was his Bible! Upon the blank leaf was a prayer, written by the lad's father, that the Lord would make the present gift the means of saving the soul of his child. Upon the other blank leaf was an account how the Bible came into the old man's hands, with many expressions of gratitude to the British and Foreign Bible Society. One petition of the prayer was, that the son might make it the 'man of his counsel,' and it was added, that he could not allow his son to depart from home, without giving him the best pledge of his love, a Bible; although that gift deprived the other parts of the family of its sacred instruction. The Bible bore evident marks of having been carefully read."

A THOUGHTLESS SOLDIER.

Dr. John Evans, the author of some excellent sermons on the Christian temper, introduced on one occasion, a sermon to young people, in the following manner:—"Shall I be allowed to preface this discourse with relating a passage concerning an acquaintance of mine, who has been many years dead, but which I remembered to have received, when young, from himself? When he was an apprentice in this city, the civil war began; his inclination led him into the army, where he had a captain's commission. It was fashionable for all the men of that army to carry a Bible along with them; which, therefore, he and many others did, who yet made little use of it, and hardly had any sense of serious religion. At length he was commanded, with his company, to storm a fort, wherein they were for a short time exposed to the thickest of the enemy's fire. When he had accomplished his enterprize, and the heat of the action was over, he found that a musket ball had lodged in his Bible, which was in his pocket, upon such a part of his body, that it must necessarily have proved mortal to him, had it not been for this seasonable and well placed piece of armour. Upon a nearer observation, he found the ball had made its way so far in his Bible, as to rest directly upon that part of the first unbroken leaf, where the words of my text are found. It was Eccles. xi. chap. 9th verse. 'Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth; and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.' As the surprising deliverance, you may apprehend much affected him, so a passage, which his conscience told him was very apposite to his case, and which Providence, in so remarkable a way, pointed to his observation, made the deepest and best impression on his mind: and, by the grace of God, he, from that time, attended to religion in earnest, and continued in the practice of it to a good old age: frequently making the remark, with pleasure, that his Bible had been the salvation both of his body and his soul."

The laudable custom of furnishing every soldier with a Bible, which was strictly attended to in the days of Oliver Cromwell, when the above circumstance took place, has been, at different times, partially revived by pious officers in the British army, especially by Colonel Gardiner. Of this gallant officer and truly eminent Christian, it is recorded, that he always marched at the head of his regiment to church or chapel; that he gave to each of his men a Bible, for his own private use: and, that to prevent its being sold, or improperly used, he expected it to be produced, and held up in the hand, as often as inspection of arms and accoutrements took place.

ANSWERING A FOOL ACCORDING TO HIS FOLLY.—The following anecdote is related in the American Messenger for August:—

During the month of November, 1843, a clergyman and an atheist were in one of the night trains between Albany and Utica. The night being cold, the passengers gathered as close as possible around the stove. The atheist was very loquacious, and was soon engaged in a controversy with the minister. In answer to an inquiry of the reverend gentleman as to what would be a man's condition after death, the atheist replied: "Man is like a pig; when he dies, that is the end of him." As the minister was about to reply, a red-faced Irish woman at the end of the car sprang up, the natural red of her face glowing more intensely with passion, and the light of the lamp falling directly upon it, and addressing the clergyman in a voice peculiarly startling and humorous from its impassioned tone and the richness of its brogue, exclaimed: "Arrah! now, will ye not let the baste alone? Has he not said he's a pig? And the more you pull his tail, the louder he'll squeal!" The effect upon all was electric; the clergyman apologized for his forgetfulness in attempting to make any reply to such an assertion, and the atheist was mute the remainder of the journey.

GOD MAKETH ALL THINGS WELL.

Frederick, a pious and sensible man, always made his children attentive to the works of God; thus leading their thoughts from "nature, up to nature's God." He often told them, as they worked together in the fields, how well and wisely God had made and ordered all things. His children often asked him why many things were made as they were; and he always gave them a satisfactory answer.

One evening he was sitting with his youngest boy, on a hill, under the shade of a large tree; beneath them was grazing a flock of sheep; just at that moment a man passed by, accompanied by a dog. The sheep, frightened at the sight of the dog, ran behind a bramble-bush, and left some of their wool hanging upon the thorns. The child, grieved at this, said: "Father, cut down that bush, that it may not again hurt those poor creatures."

His father gave him no answer. A few days afterwards he came again with his boy to the same place; the child thought that his father was going to cut down the bush. The little birds were singing merrily on a neighbouring tree.

"Do you hear how sweetly the birds sing?" asked the father.

"Yes," answered the child, "I love those little birds dearly." While he was still speaking, one of them flew to the bush, and carried off in its beak some of the wool, which had been entangled amongst the thorns.

"See," said the father, "it is taking that wool to make a soft bed in its nest for its young ones; how comfortable that will be for the little unfledged birds; the sheep can well spare a little. Shall I now cut down the bramble-bush?"

"O, no, no!" answered the child, who now thought very differently.

"Do not, then," answered his father, "find fault with what you do not understand; but remember that God has made and ordered all things wisely, even though there is much we cannot comprehend."—Church of England Magazine.

THE RETREAT,

A Boarding and Day School for Young Ladies,

Under the supervision of the Bishop of Pennsylvania, on School-house Lane, five miles from Philadelphia. Miss M. A. SPAFARD, Principal, Mrs. E. SPAFARD, Vice Principal, M. FELIX DROUIN, late Professor University of France, Teacher of French and Latin, Mr. WM. H. FENNY, late of Worcester Cathedral, Professor of Music, with a number of Assistants.

Extract from the address of the Bishop of Pennsylvania, in the Convention of 1848.

"The female school, known as the Retreat, in School-house Lane, near Germantown, has been signally favored, not only by the smiles of Divine Providence, but also by the influence of the Divine Spirit. Considerably more than a third of all the resident or boarding pupils have within the last two months been confirmed, and have also become communicants, under circumstances which have inspired me with the most lively hopes in respect to their future character and influence as Christian women. The order and spirit prevailing throughout the school have been excellent: the discipline is quiet, effective, and eminently domestic: the position of the buildings and grounds is alike beautiful and healthy; and the patronage bestowed upon it most encouraging."

The year consists of two terms, of 14½ and 29 weeks, commencing April 10th and September 4th.

COLLEGE OF ST. JAMES,

Washington county, Maryland.

The eighth session will open on Monday, October 1st, on which day the punctual attendance of all the students is requested. The duties of the classes are promptly recommenced, and it is very important that all their members, new or old, should take their places at the opening of the session.

The academical year extends from the 1st of October to the 1st of August; there being but one vacation, August and September.

In the COLLEGE, all the usual classes under a full corps of Professors, have for several years been pursuing the entire course of collegiate studies equal to that prescribed in the older colleges of the north. At the recent Commencement, the third graduating class received their academical degrees.

In the GRAMMAR SCHOOL, which immediately adjoins the college, the preparatory classes are carefully trained by competent instructors under the supervision of the Professors of the College. Thus pupils may enter the Institution at an early age and pursue their entire course of study under the same direction until they graduate. The mercantile department embraces those partial members of any of the collegiate or preparatory classes, who may be preparing for the counting-room or other non-professional life. Such students are admitted to all the privileges and advantages of their several classes, substituting in place of some of the classical studies, such as are more necessary as a preparation for business.

French is a regular study without extra charge in all the classes. In addition to the French, the mercantile students will be taught, without charge, German or some other modern language.

The location of the College is perfectly healthful; and there are no towns or villages near to present the temptations so dangerous to the young. Moral and religious education is one chief design of the Institution. The charge, covering all academical and domestic expenses, is $225 per session of ten months. The rules of the college carefully restrict any other expenses of the student.

All the departments are under the immediate supervision of the undersigned, to whom application may be made for copies of the "Register" of the college and for further information, as well as for the admission of pupils.

Rector College of St. James, P. O. Maryland.

Church Intelligence.

The old church trees were budding forth in spring, and glad birds carolled on their new-leaved branches, and a crowd had gathered round the church-yard gate, dressed in their best habiliments.

HUSH!—'tis the old man's funeral!

Toll on! thou mournful Herald to Eternity!—thou hast carried anguish to his soul ere this—but now he hears thee not!

His old sword rests upon the coffin-lid. Ah!—bear him gently to his grave, in life so roughly handled!

The bell has ceased—the earth is closed again—the tearful crowd has gone.

Peace! peace to him who sleeps beneath the turf!

His character re-established among men—he has gone to meet his God!

The Fourth Quarterly Meeting of the Schuylkill Convocation was held in St. James' Parish, Perkiomen, commencing on Monday afternoon, September 10th, 1849. There were present of members belonging to the Convocation, besides the Bishop, the Rev. Dr. Morgan and the Rev. Messrs. Stem, Mintzer, Cooley, Russell, Leaf, Lightner, Starkey and Beatty. There were also present as visitors, Rev. Messrs. Shannon, Carpenter, Bryant, J. M. Douglass, and T. G. Allen.

The first public religious service was held on Monday afternoon, commencing at 2½ o'clock. Prayers were said by Rev. Mr. Beatty, and the sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Bryant, of Virginia. Dr. Morgan followed in an exhortation from the chancel.

In the evening, service commenced at 7½ o'clock. Prayers were said by Rev. Dr. Morgan. The sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Cooley, and an exhortation made by Rev. Mr. Starkey. On Tuesday morning, service at 10½ o'clock. Prayers were said by Rev. Mr. Stem, the Lessons read by Rev. Mr. Lightner, the sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Leaf, and an exhortation made by Rev. Mr. Stem.

Divine service in the afternoon of Tuesday commenced at 2½ o'clock. Prayers were said by Rev. Mr. Douglass, and the Lessons read by Rev. Mr. Allen. The sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Starkey, and was followed by an exhortation from Rev. Mr. Douglass.

Divine service in the evening commenced at 7½ o'clock. Prayers were said by Rev. Mr. Russell, the sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Stem, and an exhortation made by Rev. Mr. Allen.

Divine service on Wednesday morning commenced at 10½ o'clock. Prayers were said by Rev. Mr. Bryant, and the Lessons read by Rev. Mr. Shannon. The Rev. Dr. Morgan preached, and afterwards administered the Holy Communion to the clergy and laity present.

Divine service in the afternoon commenced at 2½ o'clock. Prayers were said by Rev. Mr. Carpenter, the lessons read by Rev. Mr. Douglass, and the sermon was preached by Rt. Rev. Bishop Potter.

The last service was held on Wednesday evening, commencing at 7½ o'clock. Prayers were said by Rev. Mr. Beatty, and the appointed Missionary Sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Russell. An admirable exhortation from the Bishop closed the public religious exercises of the Convocation.

The attendance on these services was generally good, and the interest manifested was equal to that exhibited on similar occasions in other parishes; and whatever may be its lack of outward manifestation, it is surely a refreshing thing, in this plodding world to meet together for a few days, priests and people, to hold Christian converse, and invoke a blessing from on high.

This parish is in many respects an interesting one. I am told that it is nearly one hundred and fifty years old. The old

Parish Church which stood formerly on the right of the road as you enter Evansburg from the direction of Philadelphia, was torn down a few years ago, and has been succeeded by a more modern and commodious edifice, built on the opposite side of the road in a grove of venerable oak trees. The situation of the new church is a beautiful one. The solemn shade of the grove itself invites to seriousness; but it is a pity that the old mother church was not suffered to remain. In a utilitarian and matter of fact point of view, its very contrast would have spoken of progress. The little grave yard which surrounded it is bare of trees, and the old moss covered tomb-stones, which record the names of those who worshipped within its walls nearly a century and a half ago, seem now to miss its accustomed and consecrated shade. But the venerable building, with its wide shutters and quaint old porch, is gone, and nothing marks its site but the parallelogram free from the intrusion of tomb-stones, which is still distinctly traceable in the middle of the enclosure. These faint lines will soon be effaced by the foot-prints of a destroyer, and nothing will be left to remind the children of their fathers spiritual home. May the blessing of God rest upon the pious Pastor's labors, and enable him in his new house to lead many souls from Font to Altar, training and preparing them for that blessed home which shall be eternal in the Heavens.

NEW YORK.

INSTITUTION.—On Sunday morning last, (15th after Trinity,) the Rev. Francis Vinton, D. D. was instituted into the Rectorship of Grace Church, Brooklyn Heights. Morning prayer was said by the Right Reverend the Bishop of Maryland, after which the Institution service was proceeded with by the Rev. Dr. Berrian, President of the Standing Committee, who was the officiating Priest on the occasion. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of Maryland from 2d Cor., x. 13, and was an able and profound discourse on the relations of the clergy and laity—the source and limitations of Episcopal authority—the distinction between orders and mission—the parochial system—the duties imposed on the rector and people respectively by the pastoral relation. We hope to see this valuable sermon in print, believing its wide circulation would be highly useful and edifying. The Bishop then confirmed 20 persons, and then delivered an earnest and stirring address. The newly-instituted Rector then proceeded with the Communion Service, and was assisted in the delivery of the cup by Rev. Drs. Berrian, and S. R. Johnson, Rector of St. John's, Brooklyn.

The Bishop also confirmed a sick person at his residence, after the morning service, for the above parish.—Churchman.

From the New York Commercial.

WESTERN NEW YORK—NEW CHURCH IN BUFFALO.

We have often had occasion to speak of the rapid growth of Buffalo, and of the elegant public buildings that adorn that thriving place. It seems to us to be but yesterday that we had to pick our way with a lantern to find the only place of worship in Buffalo; and then we had to step carefully on some rough boards that had been put down as a flooring. What a change has taken place in most of our Western towns since that time. In addition to the many houses of worship already erected in Buffalo, the Commercial of that city, of Saturday, gives the following description of a new building to be erected:

A NEW CHURCH.—St. Paul's Parish of this city, has just entered upon the construction of a new church edifice, which will be, when completed, the largest, the most magnificent, and expensive not only in Buffalo, but in Western New York. It is to be located upon the site occupied by the present building which is bounded by Main, Erie, Church and Pearl streets. As the lot is a triangle, the edifice, as it is desirable to occupy as nearly as possible, the entire ground, will partake of the same form, and therefore will be unique in its outward appearance. There are to be twelve external angles, of different lengths. The dimensions of the Church are:

Greatest length	175 feet
" width	94 "
Erie street	172 "
Main and Church	92 " 2 angles.
Pearl	90 "

The main building is to be divided into various departments, as follows:

Nave—interior—length	84 feet
width	59 "
Transept length	49½ "
width	28 "
Chancel length	28 "
width	24 "
Orchestra length	29½ "
width	17 "
Vestry Room length	14½ "
width	12½ "

The tower, which is to be located in the extreme point at the junction of Erie and Pearl streets, is to be of the following dimensions:

Length—exterior	40 feet.
Width, " interior	39 "
Height from base line	13 " square.
Tower section	225 "

There are to be large windows in the belfry, 18 feet high to the apex of the arch. The spire is to be octagon, with crotchets on the corners, and windows with hooded heads. There is to be a clock in the tower, and it is the intention to have the belfry supplied with bells.

There is also to be a lesser tower or turret on Church street, of the following dimensions:

Base	16 feet square.
Height of tower section	76 "
" spire	32 "

There are to be two chancel turrets, with tower sections 49 feet in height, and 18 feet spire.

There is also to be a turret in front of the main tower, 84 feet high, with an entrance and a flight of circular stone stairs. All the gables and apexes of the turrets are to be finished with carved finial work.

There are to be 60 large double pews in the nave and 44 single ones. In the transept 39, with a capacity of seating from 1000 to 1200 persons.

The building is to be in imitation of a clear story. The walls of the chancel end are to be 43 feet from the base line to the top of the cornice, and to the apex 67 feet. On the Erie street front 41 feet, and on the Pearl street 40—nave 53 feet on both sides, and to the extreme of the apex 72 feet.

The walls are to be supported by 25 buttresses, 4½ feet by 4 at the base, and the tower by 5, 5 feet by 6 at the base.

The chancel window is to be a gothic trifol, 28 feet wide, and 39 high to the apex of the arch—with magnificent stained glass.

The roof is to be open Gothic, showing the interior work, with an arcade running through the entire length of the building—and supported in a manner similar to that of St. John's Church.

The windows are all to be of the Gothic order with stained glass.

The exterior of the walls is to be laid with Medina red stone, and the interior with lime stone, in rubble work.

The basement is to be finished for school rooms, with an entrance upon Pearl street.

The style of architecture to be observed in the building is of the early Gothic, which is not so highly ornamental as the same style which prevailed at later periods. The whole cost is estimated at $50,000.

The design of the church was drawn by Richard Upjohn, of New York, who is the architect. The building is to be under the superintendence of Mr. Thomas R. Williams, of New York. It is contemplated to get the foundation laid this Fall, and have all things in readiness for vigorous operations in the Spring, to which time the old edifice is to be permitted to remain. It is intended to have the walls up, the tower as far as the spire section, and the roof on by next Fall. The building will not be entirely completed until two and a half or three years from this time.

St. Paul's is one of the oldest Church organizations in the city, and undoubtedly the ablest in point of wealth, and is prepared to go through with the enterprise in which it has embarked.

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. J. A. Stone having resigned the charge of St. John's Church, Ashfield, Mass. has accepted the Rectorship of Trinity Church, Carbondale, Penn., and requests all letters and papers to be directed accordingly.

The Right Rev. Bishop Johns, being about to remove from Richmond to Williamsburg, requests that communications for him may be addressed to the latter place.

The Rev. Joshua Peterkin, late of the Diocese of Maryland, has taken charge of Wickliffe Parish, Berryville, and requests that his letters, &c., may be directed accordingly. We greatly regret that the late Rector of this parish, the Rev. Richard H. Wilmer has been compelled to retire from it in consequence of ill health.

ON LISTENING TO EVIL REPORT.—The longer I live the more I feel the importance of adhering to the rules which I have laid down for myself in relation to such matters.

1. To hear as little as possible what is to the prejudice of others.

2. To believe nothing of the kind till I am absolutely forced to it.

3. Never to drink into the spirit of one who circulates an ill report.

4. Always to moderate, as far as I can, the unkindness which is expressed towards others.

5. Always to believe, that if the other side were heard, a very different account would be given of the matter.

I consider love as wealth; and as I would resist a man who should come to rob my house, so would I a man who would weaken my regard for any human being. I consider, too, that persons are cast into different moulds; and that to ask myself—what should I do in that person's situation? is not a just mode of judging. I must not expect a man that is naturally cold and reserved to act as one that is naturally warm and affectionate; and I think it a great evil that people do not make more allowances for each other in this particular. I think religious people are too little attentive to these considerations.—Simeon.

contents of my plate between some bread beside me, and when no eyes were upon me, I secreted it in my pocket. None of my family nor myself had tasted meat for days, aye, long days past! and I had more that day before me than would have saved my darling children from the grave! I was a thief! My whole pittance had for months been swallowed up by the illness of my family, and what was given to me, I had secretly purloined for them. My days on earth are short. I care not to confess all. My grey hairs have come in sorrow to the grave, and little reck it what befalls me now. This is the reason I stole away like a thief rather than be searched, and dearly have I paid the penalty attending THE PERILS OF THE POOR."

The old man ceased; but the sobs that burst forth around told how deeply his tale had entered the hearts of his hearers. Spontaneously the whole host arose, and thronged around him. Kind words—noble promises—sweet condolences—from the noble, the brave, the fair, were showered on the veteran's head, but, alas!—like a soft song in the tempest—they fell unheard—unheeded.

A cottage on the estate, fitted with every luxury, was urged on his acceptance—the arrears of pay made up—all that wealth could offer, or contrition devise, was placed at his disposal—but it came too late!

"The silver cord was loosed, and the golden bowl was broken!"—aye, shattered past redemption!

The old church trees were budding forth in spring, and glad birds carolled on their new-leaved branches, and a crowd had gathered round the church-yard gate, dressed in their best habiliments.

HUSH!—'tis the old man's funeral!

Toll on! thou mournful Herald to Eternity!—thou hast carried anguish to his soul ere this—but now he hears thee not!

His old sword rests upon the coffin-lid. Ah!—bear him gently to his grave, in life so roughly handled!

The bell has ceased—the earth is closed again—the tearful crowd has gone.

Peace! peace to him who sleeps beneath the turf!

His character re-established among men—he has gone to meet his God!

PASTORAL LETTER,

Addressed to the Members of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Tennessee, by James H. Oley, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese.

DEARLY BELOVED BRETHREN:

The xxvii. Canon of the General Convention sets forth, that it is proper for a Bishop, "from time to time, to address to the people of his Diocese pastoral letters on some points of Christian doctrine, worship and manners."

Many considerations have led me to think that the present is a suitable occasion to call your attention, in accordance with the spirit of the above named provision, to the subject of "Christian manners." Among these considerations, I may mention as chiefly influential, the reflections which spring so naturally from the uncertainty of life, powerfully brought home to our thoughts by the prevalence of a wasting pestilence in our country, warning us of the importance of being prepared, by the daily habits of our life, for the solemn hour of death, and the awakening realities of eternity. "When thy judgments are in the earth the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness."

Another consideration which moves me to address you, is the request, not unfrequently preferred by my brethren of the clergy, for counsel and direction, to assist and guide them, in their efforts to preserve their people from the contaminating influences of worldly associations. Communicants of the Church are sometimes led by the persuasions of others, and without due regard to Christian caution and prudence, to visit places and scenes, and indulge in recreations, by which their consciences become defiled, their sensibility to spiritual influences weakened, and their apprehension of the value of religious privileges deadened. They then come to their pastors, complaining of the coldness of their spiritual condition, and doubtful of the lawfulness of their communing, or else plunge more deeply into excesses, and inspire their spiritual guides with the well grounded fear that they are in danger of being entangled and overcome in the ways of sin. Realizing the awful responsibility under which they act as "ambassadors for Christ," and made practically acquainted with the difficulties of "so ministering discipline that they forget not mercy," and yet heartily desiring to "be so merciful that they be not too remiss," they ask advice of their Bishop, that, aided by his counsels and instructions, they may be strengthened in the performance of their duty, and "save both themselves and them that hear them." Weighty as is the charge imposed upon your ministers, brethren, when they seek the advice of the Chief Pastor in such cases, it invests his office with an additional and impressive degree of responsibility. I shall endeavor, by God's help, to discharge my duty faithfully and fearlessly, both to you and them; and while I earnestly invoke the assistance of the Holy Spirit to direct me into a plain exposition of the truth, to deliver sound doctrine in wholesome words which cannot be gainsaid, and to save me from all errors of judgment, I bespeak your calm and prayerful consideration of what I have to say; and if it appear that what I shall deliver to you be according to godliness, and to the spirit of holiness, then give heed to my words: "for it is not a vain thing for you, because it is your life."

The subject of "Christian manners" embraces, in its consideration, our behaviour in all the relations of life. It is not my purpose, however, to give my remarks the extended range which the general subject presents to notice. Wishing to consult practical utility and brevity, our attention will be directed mainly to the consideration of worldly amusements—whether indulgence in them be compatible with the due cultivation of pious affections—consistent with that devout frame of mind necessary to make wholesome improvement of the means of grace as furnished to us in the ordinances of the Church, or as presented to the mind under the form of providential visitations.

A reference to the word of God is obviously proper in the treatment of all such subjects; and as we are informed by one who said he had the mind of Christ, that the "scriptures are profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works," we may be sure that they will shed abundant and clear light upon the subjects of our inquiry. Many, it is to be feared, do not read them so frequently as they might for their benefit. And many who read, fail to "mark, learn and inwardly digest them," in a way to "embrace and hold fast the blessed hope of everlasting life." Facts, doctrines, practice and precept are all confounded together and often lead to bewilderment of mind, instead of a clear understanding of the plan of salvation. To guard against the danger growing out of this confusion, of which many complain in consulting the lively oracles of our faith, let us remember that the four Gospels contain a general outline of the principal events or facts of our Saviour's life, and of the doctrine which he taught. The book called the Acts of the Apostles, shows how Christ's doctrine was reduced to practice—how men became Christians, or members of his Church, by submitting, upon the profession of faith and repentance to the outward rites or ordinances which he instituted. The Epistles were designed not only, to explain doctrines, but especially to give instructions, how those having received the doctrines of Christ's religion, and become members of his Church, should conduct themselves as his disciples—in other words, they were intended to teach them Christian manners. Read the New Testament with this general understanding of its aim and purport, and I am persuaded it will greatly help you to a knowledge of the truth. And especially let all your readings be accompanied with supplications to the Father of lights, for that instruction which he has graciously promised to all that ask him: "Praying that the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, will give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him: the eyes of your understanding being enlightened; that ye may know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints, and what is the exceeding greatness of his power to usward who believe, according to the working of his mighty power which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his right hand in the heavenly places."

The Epistles of the Apostles are full of instructions and directions to believers upon the subject of their behaviour towards each other, as well as their deportment to those who are without: so much so indeed, that we might easily accomplish the task we have proposed to ourself in this letter, simply by making extracts from their writings. But the force of these instructions is not unfrequently weakened, in their application to Christians in these days, by the idea that however pertinent and appropriate the exhortations and admonitions of the New Testament might be to primitive believers, they are not so to us. The world in its moral and religious aspect—in the character of its social intercourse and its amusements, is changed, it is said; and hence it is alleged that conditions in these respects being changed, there must in reason, be some modification, in the application of the precepts which are given to regulate our conduct. Whatever may be conceded to the truth of these allegations, we can never admit the consequence sought to be gained by making them: namely, that the warnings of the Apostles are no longer of binding authority upon believers, in the regulation of their conduct and intercourse. Practically, they are of the same moment now that they ever were, and every successful attempt to impair their obligation, removes the barriers between virtue and vice—between sin and holiness, and levels the walls which Christ has raised between his Church and the world. We must never forget that however the world may be changed in its social and religious complexion, the moral nature of man is unchanged. He is still the same corrupt being by nature that the pencil of inspiration presents to our contemplation—swayed by the same impulses—influenced by the same motives—governed by the same passions—liable to be overcome by the same temptations and to be ruined by the same sins. His heart is as much averse to holiness, and as much prone to iniquity as ever; and therefore he stands as much in need as ever of all those influences which divine wisdom has provided for his help and safety, by furnishing him with the means of grace to enlighten his ignorance—to strengthen his weakness—to guard him against the seductions of sense—to enable him to fight against his own carnal will and frailty, to help him in his conflict with the world, and to deliver him from the dominion of sin and from the snare of the devil.

The representations which the word of God gives of the believer, in his relations to the world, are striking and peculiar, and well worthy your most thoughtful consideration. "If ye were of the world, the world would love his own; but because ye are not of the world, but I have loved you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you." How strikingly the truth of these words was illustrated in the hatred and persecutions to which the Apostles of our Lord were subjected, in their propagation of his religion, it is needless to say. But we have a strong confirmation of their verity, in a different way, in the conduct of the worldly of this age towards those who profess the name of Christ. Direct opposition to the Gospel having ceased, it is assailed by the more cunning and dangerous arts of an insidious respect or pretended friendship. Let any who are known to be professors of religion be seen at those places, or enter into those indulgences which usually mark the assemblages of the gay, the thoughtless, the dissipated, and how readily, and even lavishly, are commendations bestowed on what the "lovers of pleasure" are pleased to call freedom from superstitious restraints and an elevated superiority to bigoted fears, which an attendance at such places exhibits. So true is it, that if we give occasion to others to think that we are of the world, "the world will love its own." Yes! every effort made to throw aside the salutary restrictions which a religious profession imposes, will be encouraged—every step taken to cast off the fear of God will be patronised—every advance in the indulgence of the appetites will be artfully stimulated—every appliance which may excite to the disregard of consistency will be skilfully used, until the victim pressed on every side, harrassed by the occasional awakenings of conscience and importuned by the indulged and now over-mastering propensities of a depraved nature, rushes headlong into ruin, "as a bird that hasteth to the snare and knoweth not that it is for his life."

"How shall we that are dead to sin live any longer therein?" asks St. Paul. "Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death: therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death, that like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life." This language marks emphatically the condition of the sincere and faithful believer and his true relation to the world; and if it were truly realized and practically acted on, little cause would there be for ministers ever uttering a word of caution to their people against the danger of worldly entanglement and of a fleshly mind. "Dead to sin!" How strong is this language! A body that is dead is insensible to every thing. Neither to a word spoken, nor to any act performed does it manifest the slightest sensibility. It is wholly unconscious though addressed in a voice of thunder, or torn limb from limb. And is this the state of the believer, towards the world, the flesh and the devil, with their manifold and oft-repeated temptations? Yes! it is the state to which he ought to aspire, to which he is constantly urged by all the arguments, motives and exhortations of the Gospel. This is the end aimed at, when your ministers exhort you to be faithful in using all the means of grace. When they urge you to read diligently God's holy word—to be constant and fervent in prayer, public and private—when they put religious books into your hands—when they explain God's word to you in sermons or in conversation—when they recommend to you the practice of charity—when they administer to you the sacraments and ordinances of religion—when they warn you and exhort you earnestly to "abstain from fleshly lusts which war against the soul," and from frequenting places and assemblages liable to be abused to excess, and in their character and tendency unfriendly to a spirit of devout affection, and opposed to that calm and serious frame of mind which seeks communion with God—in all this, the great object in view, the grand purpose to be accomplished, is to bring you into that spiritual state or condition which is described in holy scripture, as being "dead to sin!" "Ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God!"

All these things—the whole machinery of the Church in all its ordinances and appointments, and the entire range of providential dispensations are simply means to an end, and to be viewed in no other light: means ordained of God for our benefit, the use in our hands, the efficacy of them dependent on God's gracious good-will and pleasure. Without attaining this end, that is, the recovery of the affections for God—the conversion of the soul from the love of sin unto the love of holiness—the sanctification of our nature by the Holy Spirit, through the instrumentality of his own appointments, Christ has died for us in vain—the Church with the word and ministry of reconciliation has been instituted in vain—Heaven has been purchased for us, in vain; for Heaven would be no Heaven to the soul unsanctified, and yet under the dominion of sin.

You will perhaps say, that such attainments in the divine life, are very uncommon. That they are uncommon, we may all take shame to ourselves in acknowledging to be but too true. But why are they uncommon? Alas! the answer is easy and obvious. It is because we are too much in love with the world and its vain pursuits—because we allow its maxims, its principles and its vanities to interfere too much and too frequently with our religious duties—to mingle too deeply with our thoughts, and thereby withdraw us from that close and intimate union with the Saviour, in sentiment and practice, in which alone consists our safety. "I am the vine, ye are the branches: He that abideth in me and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit: for without me ye can do nothing." Again, "Love not the world neither the things that are in the world: If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. And the world passeth away and the lust thereof; but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever." Will you love that world which hated Christ your Redeemer? which rejected and crucified him? which pursued with hatred and death his Apostles? which has not ceased to malign, persecute and destroy with its open malice or concealed deceit his followers? Can you even be on friendly terms with a world which in all its history has manifested a determined hostility to God? "Know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God." Think not to escape from the force of this solemn and warning declaration, and yet be partakers in those amusements which the world claims as its own. Do not imagine that you can so nicely adjust the balance between the obligations of duty to God and compliance with worldly ways, as to stand justified at the bar of your righteous judge. If freedom from crime, a life of harmlessness, as it is called, in which neither good nor evil preponderated, in which you committed no positive transgression, though you performed no righteous or benevolent act from the love of Christ, if such a thing were possible, and you could claim the merit of such a life, still this would not exempt you from the scrutiny of that Holy One who looketh into our hearts, nor save you from that condemnation which his justice awards to the guilt of an impure mind and malicious thoughts. But in truth the conditions on which we hold the Gospel and its privileges give no countenance whatever to the idea of our living in pleasure, and yet doing no harm. Improvement, and nothing short of improvement, will meet the terms on which mercy and grace are extended to sinners. "Unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more." "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord."

FORMS OF PRAYER PREVENT FORMALITY.

When the question was discussed, in the presence of Mr. Clay, as to the use of the Prayer Book, in public worship, his simple, but sagacious remark was: "I have always considered a form of prayer necessary to prevent formality." Nothing can be more just. He who is occupied in making a prayer, is of course occupied with its form. The moment he ceases to be occupied it is a form of prayer; whether original with himself, or prepared for him by others. When the Prayer Book is taken in hand, we have but to throw our heart into it; and make our own the words which have been hallowed, by ages of devotion, and gone up with the spirits of the martyrs, to their God.

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1849.

We find the following letter from the Rev. Dr. Durbin, an eminent preacher among the Methodists, in the Christian Advocate and Journal. We republish it, because we think it well that the members of the Church should see the manner in which this case is regarded by others. At the same time we must correct the Rev. Dr.'s misapprehensions of the language of the learned Judge; and we do so, from the report of the case which, we presume, has been subject to the Author's revision.

Among the important points noticed, Dr. Durbin places first the following as a quotation.—1. That "the essential parts of baptism, were the water and the words." He thereupon asks, "Does not this decision exclude the influences of the Holy Spirit, as essential to baptism?" After a most attentive consideration of the Report, we are unable to find the words upon which this question is asked. But we do find the following words in the learned Judge's definition of "regeneration." He says (p. 14). "That was sufficiently explained by the terms made use of—by the words added to the term 'regeneration,'—regeneration by water and by the Holy Ghost; for remission of sins was given by means of the administration of water and the Holy Ghost accompanying it." The water and the words are "essential parts of baptism," but not the only essentials. We wonder the learned Dr. did not ask another question, equally pertinent, upon his quotation! He might as well have asked, "does not this decision exclude both a human agent, and human subject as essential to baptism?" A true understanding of the case would have taught him that it is those who deny spiritual regeneration in baptism, who "exclude the influences of the Holy Spirit as essential to baptism."

2. As to the second point, the learned Judge kept in view the true import of "regeneration" in this connection. He learned it from our Saviour's definition, "Except a man be born again he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God," further explained by the same Divine Interpreter, "except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God." We are certainly to argue from these words, that there is only one "new birth" as there is only one natural birth: "that which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit; and we can no more speak of the repetition of our spiritual birth than of the repetition of our natural birth."

3. As to the third point, "that infants dying without baptism are lost," the learned Judge nowhere pronounces such a decision. That would be ascending from his human tribunal to the seat of eternal judgment! The inference is drawn, by the Methodist Doctor, not by the Judge of the Arches Court. If this consequence follows the declaration at the end of the Baptismal service, with how much greater force does it flow from the declarations of our Lord, the Eternal Judge. "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God." "Whosoever believeth and is baptized shall be saved."

With these remarks, we submit Dr. Durbin's letter to our readers.

BAPTISMAL REGENERATION.

An event has just occurred in England which may prove to be one of the most important that has happened for a century past in the Protestant Church. It is a legal decision in the Court of Arches, of the question whether the Church of England does authoritatively teach the baptismal regeneration of infants in and by the sacrament of baptism? The decision affirms that she does.

The case came up on this wise. The Rev. Mr. Gorham, a minister of fifteen years standing, and of unblemished reputation, was presented by the government to a living within the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Exeter. Upon his application to the Bishop for institution, his lordship refused, upon the ground that he was unsound in the faith, inasmuch as he did not hold and teach the baptismal regeneration of infants. Mr. Gorham brought the case, by petition, before the Court of Arches, in order to test the validity of the Bishop's objection. It was heard by Sir Frederick Jenner Fust. The counsel on each side was learned and able, and the inquiry acute and protracted.

The question was not, does the Bible teach the regeneration of infants by baptism? but, does the Church of England teach it? The learned judge said, "he was particularly anxious to have it distinctly understood, that he guarded himself against being supposed to offer any opinion as to the disputed point of theology between the parties. He was not going to pronounce an opinion as to whether unconditional regeneration in the case of infants was, or was not, a true Scriptural doctrine. All that came within the limits of the authority of the Court, was to endeavor to ascertain whether the Church had determined anything upon the subject, and so then to pronounce accordingly."

The Court then said, that its only guides to a conclusion were, The Articles of Religion, the Office of Baptism of Infants, and the Catechism. After examining each of these upon the question, the Court pronounced, That the Church of England did undoubtedly hold the doctrine of baptismal regeneration.

In the lengthy and lucid opinion of the judge, two or three other important points are incidentally decided.

1. That "the essential parts of baptism were the water and the words." Does not this decision exclude the influences of the Holy Spirit, as essential to baptism?

2. That the baptismal regeneration of an infant excludes any subsequent regeneration in adult years, even should the baptized child grow up in the practice of all sin. The judge says, "True it was, that if a child lived, and committed actual sin, and reached an age at which it was capable of understanding the promises of God, so as to be able to repent, it might pass from the benefits given to it in baptism, and fall into a state in which it required faith and repentance, but not in order to regenerate him; for, according to the declaration of the Church, that had been already done."

3. That infants dying without baptism are lost. The judge says, "But what was the state of those baptized children who died before they committed actual sin? Precisely that declared at the end of the baptismal service. 'It is certainly God's word, that children which are baptized, dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved.' They must be baptized, and they must die without having committed actual sin, to bring them within that provision," that is, the provision of salvation.

In conclusion, the Judge said, "The bishop had shown sufficient cause for not instituting Mr. Gorham, and he must consequently be dismissed with costs." From this judgment Mr. Gorham appealed to the Privy Council, where the case will be heard and finally decided. Should the judgment of the court below be affirmed, the question will be settled in England, that every clergyman is required to hold and teach the doctrine of the baptismal regeneration of infants; and all who do not hold this doctrine may be refused institution by the bishop, notwithstanding they may be presented by the government.

The effect of this decision on the Church of England and the Wesleyan Methodist Church is problematical. It has created a profound sensation among the evangelical portion of the English people, and its influence must be very sensibly felt in the Protestant Episcopal Church in this country. Will the evangelical portion of the Church in either country receive the decision in England as the true teaching of the Prayer-Book, (meaning the Articles of Religion, the Office of Baptism, and the Catechism, in reference to baptismal regeneration,) which is received and used both in England and America? Heretofore the high Church party, both in England and America, have declared that baptismal regeneration of infants is clearly taught in the Prayer-Book: the evangelical or low Church party in each country has declared that it is not taught in the Prayer-Book, and is not the doctrine of the Church. But the decision in England, which, it is believed, will be affirmed by the Privy Council, has settled the question, that the unconditional regeneration of infants in and by the sacrament of baptism is the doctrine of the Church. Can the Wesleyan Methodists in England continue to yield their support to the Church if this decision shall be confirmed and carried into effect, as it has already been by the Bishop of Exeter?

It is evident that the decision, if confirmed, will change the controversy between the high Church party and the evangelical party. Heretofore the question has been, What does the Church teach touching baptismal regeneration? But this question being settled against the evangelical party, can they refrain from appealing to the Scriptures against the Church on this essential question? I do not see how they can in England. But in the United States the English decision not being of authority, the question, What does the Prayer-Book teach may still be an open one. Yet the decision in England will give the high Church party in the United States great advantage; and to the same extent bear heavily on the evangelical portion. The Protestant Church throughout the world is deeply interested in the controversy on this vital question. And how earnestly and ably it will be carried on may be anticipated from the fact, that the Archbishop of York rejects the baptismal regeneration of infants, and it is said the Archbishop of Canterbury also. It is believed that several thousand of the clergy of the Establishment reject it, and hundreds of thousands of her communicants. To these are to be added the whole body of the Dissenters, and of the Wesleyans. In this country, except the Catholics, only the high Church portion of the Protestant Episcopal Church hold this doctrine; but they are very active in diffusing and defending it. On the other hand, the evangelical portion of this Church, feel restrained somewhat in their resistance to this doctrine, because they are in the minority in their own communion; and their whole communion being very much in the minority among the leading Churches of the land, they are unwilling to make it manifest that there is any division among them touching so vital a question. The consequence will probably be, that their comparative silence and inactivity will change the gradual reception by the whole Protestant Episcopal Church of the doctrine of the unconditional regeneration of infants in and by the sacrament of baptism.

My object in this communication is not to enter in the least into the controversy concerning the baptismal regeneration of infants, but simply to set forth the present state of the question, chiefly in England, and incidentally in America also.

THANK OFFERINGS.

We earnestly hope the following gentle "hint," impressed not only by precept but by example, may be acted upon. If ever there was an occasion, on which the people of God were called upon to give substantial tokens of their thankfulness, it is at the present time. Not in the mere empty voice of grateful words, but in acts of love, should this gratitude be shown. Our fair correspondent has enriched her acceptable communication with solid gold and silver. She has also given a wise direction to her appropriate offering. The field, where our Domestic Missionaries labor, has been most sadly desolated by the Pestilence. In its wasting track, how many widows and orphans has it left to mourn in helpless misery. The dead are not its only spoils. Many, whom it has passed by, have been left a prey to want and privation. From many a poor Missionary has it taken the scanty supply which more prosperous times afforded. Let those, who have been spared, express their thankfulness by the readiness with which they follow the precept and example here set before them, and their offerings, like every gift of mercy, shall be twice blessed, blessing him that gives and him that takes.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

While reading your excellent editorial in last week's Banner respecting the recent pestilence, an idea occurred to me, which, if acted upon by every member of the Church, might produce a desirable result. I refer to a Thank Offering. Where is our gratitude for mercies received and judgments removed, if we do not express it in some form, either by word or deed? Doubtless many have done so in word, but how many in deed?

Now there are many Christians who require only a slight hint to do those things which they ought to do, and to those do we appeal. Are there not many families into which this welcome Banner comes, whom the destroying Angel has altogether passed by? And have they no thanks to offer? Let each member of the Church answer the question,—What have I rendered unto the Lord for his sparing mercy? and we hope it may be answered by golden numbers, and in silver-toned strains. Perhaps some will say, where is an object? We plead for our Domestic Missionaries. Many of them from the last reports have not received their small stipends, and may now be suffering for the necessities of life. If this feeble appeal be the means of relieving one thus situated, it will not be in vain. Enclosing a mite, together with a widow's mite, which always has a blessing,

I remain, Rev. and dear sir, yours,

"ONE PASSED BY."

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.—The Editor of the Banner gratefully acknowledges the following sums, which may be regarded as Thank Offerings. A mite for the Rt. Rev. Bishop Kemper towards the maintenance of the ministry in the West, from Lynfield;—$10.

From "One passed by," for Western Missions, $5.50.

Twenty-one dollars towards the erection of a church in Chicago, Ill., for the Swedes and Norwegians, under the charge of the Rev. Mr. Unonius, from a number of individuals in Emanuel parish, Holmesburg, Pa.

Also $5. for the same object from "G."

These sums shall be duly transmitted to their destination.

THE CHURCH IN CALIFORNIA.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—I observe by the late news from California, that the Rev. Mr. Mines has organized a parish in the city of San Francisco, and called the organization "The Reformed Catholic Church of the Holy Trinity." Is this a new sect, or is Mr. Mines dissatisfied with the title of "The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America," and seeks some other title for the Church in that far distant land?

AN INQUIRER.

As the Rev. Mr. Mines had no consultation with the editor of this paper about the naming of his Church, we cannot answer as to his intentions. We presume, however, that Mr. Mines was giving a name to his Parish, and not to the whole Church in California. We hear of St. Luke's, St. Peter's, St. Paul's Church and never have suspected that, in adopting these names, they were dissatisfied with the title of the "Protestant Episcopal Church, &c." For ourselves we are quite satisfied with that "title," being sure that it designates a Church which is both "Reformed" and "Catholic."

THE TRUE LIFE.

Such is the title of another "sketch," the proof-sheets of which we have received, by the Rev. Ralph Hoyt. The Author's name will at once bespeak an interest in behalf of the publication. We shall favour our readers with a few of these sweet and touching verses, which will, we are sure, excite a desire for a larger acquaintance.

GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

The next session will commence on Monday Oct. 1st. Candidates for admission are requested to be present at Morning Prayers on that day, at 10½ o'clock.

NEW WORK ON EGYPT AND THE HOLY LAND.

We learn with pleasure that the Rev. J. A. Spencer is about to publish a work on this interesting subject. Mr. Spencer has just returned from a visit to these countries, and, of course, as he writes from observation, will be enabled to give great interest to such a book. His attainments as a scholar, and his experience as an author well qualify him for the undertaking. The work will be published in one volume 8vo and illustrated with original drawings &c.

We surely live in strange times! Take the following from the "English Churchman," as a specimen. How perverted must be the prejudice which prefers the spirit of such unlawful tyranny to the use of a garment sanctioned by the usage of the Church.

A NEW CONDITION OF CONSECRATING CHURCHES.

(To the Editor of the English Churchman.)

SIR,—Not long ago the Bishop of Manchester refused to consecrate a Church unless the Incumbent elect gave him a distinct promise not to use the surplice in the pulpit. Intimidated by the Bishop's threat, he reluctantly gave the pledge.

Now, Sir, I shall make no other remark upon this extraordinary proceeding, than that whether or not there is any law, civil or ecclesiastical, to compel the Bishop to do his duty in such a case, one thing is clear, namely, that the law of public opinion will be found too strong for him, unless he is content to lose all his influence, and to be regarded as the most injudicious Prelate upon the Bench. It really is lamentable that the stream of charity which in this part of England has so generously been poured forth in building new Churches, should receive the check which such a course of conduct in a Bishop must inevitably occasion.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
S. M. L.

POPULAR OBJECTIONS ANSWERED.

We have received a brief pamphlet, entitled "An answer to some of the Popular Objections against the Protestant Episcopal Church." It is published in Tuscaloosa. We have marked some passages for our readers' instruction. To declare the character of the pamphlet, we need only give the dedication printed on the cover. "To the Clergy and Members of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Alabama, this Tract is respectfully dedicated, by their Friend and Brother in Christ, N. H. Cobbs, Bishop of Protestant Episcopal Church in Alabama." It is admirably suited to aid the Church, where her true character is unknown and misrepresented. We respectfully commend it as a suitable Tract for some of our Societies. Tracts of this kind are much wanted by our Missionaries.

A PLAIN APPEAL.

This is a short but pointed Tract published by D. Brunner, Baltimore, and addressed to the Methodist Communion. This discourse takes for a text that saying of John Wesley, which expresses a most undoubted truth—"It cannot be lawful to separate from the Church of England, unless it be unlawful to continue in it." The Author shows, from their own writings, that the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England—its whole theory—have received the explicit commendation of the most eminent writers among the Methodists. So that he makes them furnish evidence, from the mouth of their own witnesses, without any cross questionings, that inasmuch as it is not declared to "be unlawful to continue in it," the point is proved that "it cannot be lawful to separate from the Church." Such is the verdict which Methodism pronounces upon itself, and we most cheerfully concur in its just conclusion. We hope this short, condensed, and good tempered tract, will be read by all who have any doubts on the subject.

CHEAP BIBLES.

The last "English Churchman," which reached us after the proper time, contains a startling appeal from the Journeymen Book-binders of London to all concerned in the British and Foreign Bible Society. Here, it is a subject of complaint, that these Societies interfere with publishers, by using Charity as part of their capital in trade. But what is this compared with the startling fact now brought to the light? To make the word of God cheap, so that the penurious may obtain this treasure for a few pennies less per copy, the low wages of wretched females who had to slave, as if at the galley oar, to obtain the means of living, must be reduced. To get Cheap Bibles the average rate of regular workmen is from 11 to 12 shillings of our money per week! While a large part of the work is done by "learners," who get from 5 to 6 shillings. This appeal may well recur to the "Song of the shirt," as a fitting dirge to sing over such cheap Bibles, whose Holy pages are thus profaned by the tears and life blood of the poor.

CONVENTION OF THE DIOCESE OF NEW YORK.

This important Convention assembled on Wednesday last, in St. John's Chapel, New York. The time at which our paper goes to press, forbids our giving any account of the proceedings this week. They will be looked for with great interest by the Church.

From late English Papers.

The last steamers bring us no Church Intelligence of peculiar interest here. We are sorry to find, from the following extract from the Guardian, that the Cholera is increasing:

The returns of the Board of Health for the past week show a great increase in cholera, both in town and country. The Registrar-General's return, which we extract elsewhere, gives the amount of deaths for London and its vicinity at 1,663, making the mortality nearly three times the average of the season. We may hope, however, the worst is past, for we hear that the medical profession consider the disease is giving symptoms of its departure by becoming more manageable; and it appears to be a recognized fact, as stated by the Vicar of St. Bride's, that no case where the first symptoms have been attended to has ended fatally.

A Court is to be held at Balmoral this day to "order a form of prayer." We suppose, therefore, no day will be set aside for humiliation and fasting by State command. It will yet be in the power of the Bishops to follow the example of the Bishop of Salisbury, and set a day apart in their respective dioceses, which, no doubt, would be generally observed without affording the opportunity of desecration and riotous holiday-making, that so many parties have before turned the occasion to. The Americans have shown us an example which we should do well to follow, as well as admire.

A serious difficulty, likely to end in division, has occurred in the Wesleyan Conference. The following, from the Guardian, presents the facts.

THE RIGHT OF INTERROGATION—WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.

It seems that a revolt—or something like it—has taken place in the Wesleyan body. We learn from the Times that, for some years, certain papers, known as Fly Sheets, bearing the name of no author, printer, or publisher, but reflecting in the strongest language on the leaders of the Conference, have been printed and circulated. If the account of the Conference itself can be taken, these papers declare that the members of the Conference are unwillingly enslaved to a few leaders; that the resources of the Wesleyan body are perverted to uphold a system of favoritism, oppression, and extravagance; and that the supposed leaders of all this corruption, whom the Conference designate as "certain excellent ministers," are a set of indolent, selfish, artful, ambitious tyrants. One of the authors of these Fly Sheets was discovered, and punished by admonition and suspension. But the evil went on till the President found it necessary to make a solemn appeal to the Conference, from which the Times has selected some extracts, characterized by a curious mixture of unction and severity:—

"He must advert to one painful particular. He had mourned over the attempts which had been made to innovate upon their system. A secret irresponsible power had risen up, which interfered with the just rights of the Conference—which reflected on its acts and appointments—and which endeavoured, in various instances, to render these acts and appointments null and void."—"He mourned over this state of things, because it interfered with the blessed work of God."—"The Conference, the highest authority in this community, was bearded by this secret and irresponsible power. He had a full conviction that the time was come when this evil should be dealt with, and effectually corrected, and, by the grace of God, done away with, he trusted, forever. He believed that they were all inclined to unite in the prayer suggested by a line in one of their hymns,—

'End, Jesus, end this war within!'

This war among themselves must be terminated. It was a stumbling block to their people, and the occasion of scandal to other Christian communities."

The Conference responded to the appeal, and proceeded to call before them five ministers suspected of a hand in the rebellion, and put a "brotherly question" to them, touching their connection with the Fly Sheets. All refused to criminate or purge themselves, and were punished accordingly. One, being an old man, was affectionately admonished; one was reprovved and disqualified; and three were summarily expelled the Connection.

We extract the comment of the Times:—

"Whether such a course be right or wrong, it is at best perfectly unique in this country. No other British tribunal possesses or claims the authority to put 'a brotherly question' to a suspected person, and require 'a frank and brotherly answer.' The rule of all our Courts, both ecclesiastical and civil, is charity, 'which hopeth all things,' and which assumes every body to be innocent till he is proved to be guilty. These gentlemen are punished on mere suspicion, and for refusing to criminate themselves. We never heard the like in this country, at least in modern and peaceable times. Talk of the Star Chamber! A man might hold his tongue before that Court, stand his trial, and escape if the evidence failed to support the charge. Of the parties themselves, of the Fly Sheets, or the usual practice of the Conference, we know next to nothing. We take these proceedings on the statement of the Conference, and we pronounce them at once a gross outrage on our old English principles of fair play."

ROME.

There appears at present no more prospect of the re-establishment of a regular Government at Rome than there did a month ago. The Chronicle correspondent writes—

"The Pope and his councilors still persist in refusing to return to Rome on any conditions short of absolute submission. It appears now not improbable that his Holiness will carry the day, for the organs of the French Government are now beginning to contend that, as the intentions of Pius IX. are liberal and enlightened, it cannot signify much whether he grants favourable terms before or after his arrival in Rome. It is not, therefore, at all improbable that a proposition may be made to the Pontiff to return unfettered to his capital, under the auspices of France; but it remains to be seen if his Holiness will consent to place himself in the power of his self-constituted allies, even on these conditions. Hitherto he has always declared that he will not enter Rome so long as the city remains in the exclusive possession of the French. It has, therefore, been proposed that the garrison should be composed of French, Spaniards, and Austrians, or Neapolitans in equal proportions—a proposition which the French Government has hitherto declined."

The Daily News correspondent, under date of August 21, says:—

"The promises and asseverations of M. de Tocqueville, with respect to the establishment of a liberal form of government in the Roman States, may be considered very conclusive and very satisfactory at Paris, but I can assure you that the result of French intervention here is nothing more or less than the restoration, complete and unlimited, of priestly discipline in its most extensive forms. By an edict of the Triumvirate of Cardinals, the property of the inquisition (consisting chiefly of lands and houses) returns under the administration of the legal agent of the establishment; so that the power, as well as the inclination, of extending its sphere of action is thus restored to that formidable body. The proceedings instituted against Dr. Achilli, are carried on with the greatest secrecy, but the dungeon in which he is confined is so unwholesome that his relations fear he will hardly live to learn his sentence."

The Debats correspondent writes:—

"Pius IX. seems less disposed than ever to return to his capital. He is surrounded by people who are opposed to it, and they have a powerful influence over him; and if it be true, as is positively stated, that the Cardinal Secretary of State has ordered his furniture to be carried to Naples, our suspicions will be changed into certainty. Besides, if the Pope does not come to Rome, where will he fix his seat of Government? At Benevento? He had better remain at Gaeta. At Bologna? The state of public feeling in that province would not allow it. At Loreto? The difficulties of the position would there be less, but would still be serious, and, nevertheless, that appears to be the point fixed on. That place will be visited on the pretext of thanking the Madonna for the deliverance obtained; and then, yielding to the respectful solicitations of the Austrian army cantoned in that province, the Pope will fix his residence there until the French troops shall have evacuated Rome."

Father Prout, in the Daily News, says:—

"A religious as well as political revolution appears to be unavoidable. The celebrated Padre Gavazzi is reported to have turned Protestant; and Padre Ventura, a man whose reputation as a theologian and a philosopher gives him great influence in this country, is said to be in a fair way of following the example. In fact, those who have hitherto supported the Papal cause now abandon it; declaring that the priests, by their intemperate conduct, are paving the way for the return of the Liberals, in the same manner that the zeal of the Republicans defeated their own end."

ARNOLD'S GRAMMATIK.—This is a translation into German of Arnold's English Grammar, intended for the use of Germans desirous of mastering the English. It is translated and prepared by W. H. Furness, D. D. We are not able to speak of the particular character of the work, or of the manner in which the Editor has discharged his duty, but the original Grammar is one of the best that could be found to answer its end. It is printed by Messrs. King & Baird, in whose extensive establishment a department is especially devoted to printing in the German language. They are well supplied with German printers and types of all kinds—so that they can print in this language with as much accuracy and economy as in their English department.

A young man, a communicant of the Church, who writes a good hand, and understands Book-Keeping, is desirous of obtaining a situation, as clerk, in the city or country. He has had some experience in teaching English classes, and would be willing to take charge of a small school, or hold any situation in a larger one. The best testimonials can be shown. THE REMAINS OF BISHOP SEABURY.

The solemn office of committing the remains of Bishop Seabury to their final resting-place beneath the chancel of the Church of St. James the Great, at New London, was performed on Wednesday the 12th inst., under the direction of the Monument Committee. Of the Committee, there were present on the occasion, the Rev. Dr. Jarvis, the Rev. Mr. Hallam, (Rector of St. James') the Rev. Mr. Pitkin, and the Rev. Mr. Coxe. The Rev. Dr. Mead was prevented from attending, by the severe illness of a member of his family. The family of Bishop Seabury was represented by the Rev. Dr. Seabury, of New York, with his son, Master W. J. Seabury. There were also present the Rev. Dr. Williams, of Trinity College, the Rev. Messrs. Vail and Bennett, of the Diocese of Rhode Island, and the Rev. Messrs. Willey, Roberts, and Flagg, of New London County.

The exhumation of the remains took place in the presence of the Committee, with several others, who took every care that they should be removed with the utmost respect and reverence. A coffin had been prepared to receive them, to which they were immediately transferred as they were taken from the grave. The venerable relics consisted of the entire skeleton of the departed prelate, from which every other portion of the body had disappeared. The bones were in a good state of preservation; the head was uncommonly large, and not without some distinguishing characteristics, resembling those of the portraits. The sight of such a sacred memorial deeply affected the little circle of spectators who beheld in silence, and with heads instinctively uncovered. The bones thrown up from the humblest grave appeal to the heart of a passing spectator, and affect him with solemn emotions; but here was no ordinary occasion. A company of brethren in the priesthood were standing together over the dust of him to whom they felt in common the obligations of children, and the deeper reverence of spiritual sons for a patriarch of the Church, and a sore-tried confessor of the truth of God.

The coffin in which the Bishop was buried had almost entirely decayed, so that no trace of it could be found, save now and then a particle, containing a nail, and one large fragment, set with brass nails, and bearing the inscription. This fragment was of the shape of a heart, and almost as perfectly so as if it had been cut into that form on purpose. The nails enclosing the inscription had been set in that way, ornamentally, and had arrested the decay of the wood; but the symbolism seemed so striking, that one of the beholders remarked, on the spot, that it was like finding the heart of Cranmer in the ashes of his martyrdom. The inscription was simply this:

1796.

It was sufficient to identify the remains. The X was merely an ornamental mark; but it was observed, with interest, as a very proper token of a Bishop of the Scottish Succession, being a perfect St. Andrew's Cross.

The grave, being then completely exhausted of its contents, was immediately filled up; and the Rector, Mr. Hallam, with excellent taste, has ordered the monument which covered it to be replaced, with its iron railing, and to be left, as a cenotaph, with an additional record of the removal of the remains. These had been transferred to the new coffin, without any perceptible loss of any particle, and even the nails and handles of the former coffin were scrupulously enclosed. At ½ past nine o'clock, a considerable number of the parishioners of St. James' had arrived at the grave, and an opportunity was afforded them of looking at the relics of their former Pastor; for although no public notice had been given of the time of the solemnity, which was intended to be private, it had become known to many, who thus expressed their deep and affectionate interest in his memory. The event has served the important purpose of reviving many anecdotes of Bishop Seabury, which were becoming obsolete, even in the places that knew him most familiarly, and cherished his memory most dearly.

The coffin, which stood upon a bier, was then covered with a pall, on which was laid a Bible and Prayer Book. In this manner it was borne, by the Clergy present, about a quarter of a mile, to St. James' new Church; the procession taking, naturally, the form of an ordinary funeral, but marked by more than ordinary solemnity. The order was as follows:

Mr. Pitkin,	The Bier.	Mr. Willey,
Mr. Flagg,		Mr. Vail,
Mr. Bennett,		Mr. Roberts,
Dr. Williams.		Mr. Coxe,
Rev. Dr. Seabury and Master Seabury.
Wardens and Vestry of St. James'.
Parishioners.

As the procession turned from the grave-yard, every eye must have been struck with the tall spire of St. James', on whose beautiful height of solid stone, the golden cross was glittering in the morning sun. It was a glorious token of the future, and a speaking record of the past; reminding all of the accumulated mercies which have been derived to the Church from the great Bishop who went down to his humble grave when she was poor indeed, but who, after fifty-three years, was thus honored as the means of all that has made her rich in privileges and in blessings.

The new grave had been prepared in the Crypt of St. James', directly beneath the monument, which stands in the N. E. angle of the chancel. The flooring had been removed, and a sepulchre of cemented brick sunk in the earth, with stone slabs to cover it. As the bier was borne into the Crypt, Dr. Jarvis and the Rector, attired in their surplices, received it at the door; and the former began the Burial Service. The impressive sentence—"I know that my Redeemer liveth," though always sublimely affecting, was peculiarly so when made to express the sure and certain hope in which a body which worms had already destroyed, and which had slept for half a century, was again committed to the ground. The Anthem was then recited responsively; after which the Rector read, as a Lesson, the fifth chapter of the Book of Wisdom, from the 1st verse to the 17th. A thrill of feeling seemed to pass over all present, as he pronounced the verses—"This is he whom we had sometimes in derision and a proverb of reproach; we fools accounted his life madness and his end to be without honour; how is he numbered among the children of God, and his lot is among the Saints. . . . The hope of the ungodly is like dust that is blown away with the wind; . . . but the righteous live forevermore, and the care of them is with the Most High. Therefore shall they receive a glorious kingdom, and a beautiful crown from the Lord's hand; for with his right hand shall he cover them, and with his arm shall he protect them." The prayers which followed were the prayer, "Almighty God with whom do live," &c., the Collect for the Feast of All-Saints, and the prayer—"Oh God, whose days are without end," &c.—The coffin was then deposited in the grave, by the hands of two presbyters. The psalm Exurgat Deus (lxviii.) was recited as a thanksgiving for the perpetuation and extension of the Apostolic Succession, and the solemnities were concluded with the profession of the Nicene Creed, and by the Benediction, which was pronounced by the Rev. Dr. Jarvis.

Divine Service was then celebrated at St. James' (old Church) and a sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Pitkin, in which impressive mention was made of the preceding solemnities, and of the character of Bishop Seabury, as our apostle and evangelist. In the afternoon, service was again celebrated, and Dr. Seabury preached an appropriate sermon on the Resurrection of the Flesh.

A full report of the proceedings, and a description of the Monument, will be given to the Diocese by the Committee, in due time, and will doubtless be placed on record in the Journals. But we have thought it due to the general interest which is felt in everything relating to our first Bishop, to anticipate a more elaborate account by this imperfect sketch of solemnities in which it was truly a privilege to bear even the least and humblest part.—Calendar.

A HYMN TO CHRIST, AS GOD.

By THE REV. EDWARD C. JONES.

"They affirmed that the whole of their fault lay in this, that they were wont to meet together, on a stated day, before it was light, and sing among themselves alternately a Hymn to Christ as God." Letter of Pliny, A. D. 107.

Palmer's Ch. Hist. p. 12.

Behold the gathering! youth and age
Are blending sweetly there;
One is their destin'd heritage,
One their absorbing care.

Disciples of the Crucified!
When Earth abjures His name,
They breast, of scorn, the lava tide,—
Like Christ "despising shame."*

They meet ere yet the streak of dawn,
Has pioneer'd the day;
Their night of unbelief has gone,
Truth's sunbeams round them play.

And He who lights the Gentile world
With life-inspiring beam,
Has pour'd upon their joyous souls,
Of bliss, a radiant stream.†

Hark to the strain, where every note,
Comes welling from the heart;
And each, as on the chorus floats,
With rapture bears a part.

And what the burden of the Song,
And what the Master-key,
And what the Name that rolls along,
In swelling symphony?

Go, ask historic page, and learn
How weak a despot's rod,
When they who own'd a higher power,
Sang Hymns to Christ, as God.

Those hymns to Christ, they floated high,
When rack, and sword, and flame,
Against the little, feeble flock,
Like sweeping demons came.

Those Hymns to Christ,—they made the child
E'en manhood's strength to feel;
And woman at the torture smiled,
And Age defied the steel.

And rise they not in chorus yet,
Those Hymns to Christ, as God?
Yes, yes, in whelming strain, they float,
From main, and mount, and sod.

* "He endured the cross, despising the shame."

† "A light to lighten the Gentiles."

And may they float, increasing still
In compass, strength, and power,
Till o'er a World, redeem'd from Death,
The Church of God shall tower.

Then Heaven and Earth, in rival lays,
Shall spread the theme abroad,
And one sweet song all space shall fill,
A Hymn to Christ, as God.

DIVORCE AND RE-MARRIAGE.

REVEREND SIR AND EDITOR:—Certain passages from Holy Scripture bearing on the subjects mentioned in the title of this article, together with the sense of the Protestant Episcopal Church, were submitted to the consideration of the members of the Church, in the last number of the Banner. Allow me to ask for the insertion of the following extract from a Report to the Pennsylvania Legislature, made March 10, 1834, by the late John B. Wallace, Esq.

LEX.

"Marriage is not merely a civil—it is also a religious contract. It is not simply an institution of man—it is an ordinance of God. It is founded on a religious vow, which no human power can dissolve—and it is difficult to see how they who acknowledge the obligation of the Christian dispensation, can justify a divorce from the bonds of a legal marriage, for any other cause than that of adultery. Whether a divorce, even for that cause, will justify even the innocent party in a subsequent marriage, during the life of the former husband or wife, is at least questionable.

"The injury done to the happiness of married life by the facility of granting divorces, is not sufficiently considered. The ease of obtaining them creates and induces the wish for them, which would otherwise never have been formed. 'It is,' observes Sergeant Coleridge, no less truly than beautifully said by Sir Wm. Scott, in the case of Evans vs. Evans, (1 Haggard, p. 36,) that "though in particular cases the repugnance of the law to dissolve the obligation of matrimonial cohabitation may act with great hardship on individuals; yet it must be carefully remembered that the general happiness of the married life is secured by its indissolubility. When people understand that they must live together, except for a few reasons known to the law, they learn to soften by mutual accommodation that yoke which they know they cannot shake off; they become good husbands and good wives, from the necessity of remaining husbands and wives—for necessity is a powerful master in teaching the duties which it imposes. If it were once understood that upon mutual dissatisfaction, married persons might be legally separated, many couples who now pass through the world with mutual kindness, with attention to their common offspring, and to the moral order of civil society, might have been at this moment in a state of mutual unkindness; in a state of estrangement from their mutual offspring, and in a state of the most licentious and unreserved immorality. In this case, as in many others, the happiness of some individuals must be sacrificed to the greater and more general good." These are the remarks of the most distinguished civilian of the age, on a question of divorce, a mensa et thoro. How much more strongly do they apply against a divorce a vinculo matrimonii.

"The case before us does not require much argument to show how little merits it has: but having received the sanction of the Senate, it seemed a proper case in which to make the above general remarks, applicable as well to this as to other cases."

Miscellaneous.

THE SISTERS OF MERCY, DEVONPORT.

BY AN EYE-WITNESS.

It is our sad duty to record, that the fearful epidemic of Cholera has broken out with great virulence in the district of St. Peter's, Plymouth. The part of the district in which it has raged with the greatest fury is known as Stonehouse Lane, a low situation, and the drainage of which is exceedingly imperfect. It is inhabited, to quote the words of the West of England Conservative, almost exclusively, by persons of the very lowest class, and many of these of the most abandoned character, who live crowded together in close, ill-ventilated houses, without the slightest regard to cleanliness or decency, much less to comfort. Beer-shops and trampers' lodging-houses abound: vagrants of every class make Stonehouse Lane their home; and it is the customary resort of the numerous Irish families, who come here in great numbers by the steamers, in the hope of gaining by vagrancy in this country, that subsistence which they cannot, or will not, earn by industry in their own. The poverty of these people, their habits, the vitiated atmosphere in which they live, the dirt and misery by which they are surrounded, and the intemperance to which they surrender themselves whenever they have the opportunity, may well be believed to have rendered them more than ordinarily susceptible of the attacks of any form of disease; and we cannot be surprised that such a disease as cholera, having once got among them, should prove fatal to a great many.

Such is the locality, and the picture is by no means overdrawn: for no less than seventeen persons have been crowded together in a room eight feet four inches square; and nineteen in another room, eleven feet by nine. As soon as the outbreak was known, the utmost energy and promptitude were shown by the local authorities, and a Board of Health instituted, the secretary of which (Joseph Beer, Esq.) has shown the most unwearied attention to the poor sufferers. A temporary hospital for the reception of patients was immediately erected, and at this present time we regret to say that every bed is full.

On learning the state of the case, Miss Sellon proceeded at once to the sad scene. In her anxiety for others, she forgot her own illness, and finding that the disease had already made much way, returned to Devonport, provided nurses, and then, with some of the sisterhood, commenced her labour of love. It is impossible to give the faintest idea of the unselfish devotion, the unwearied labours, and the kind attentions of the Sisters of Mercy. On the plains of death they have walked, and laboured night and day. Where others feared to enter, they have boldly gone; cases at which the stoutest hearts might have failed seemed only to re-awaken their energies, and claim increased attention. We who have seen them can scarcely now realize it as a truth, that woman's tender nature has been nerved to meet so fearful a crisis, and rise superior to such dreadful emergencies. Let the reader imagine (before the hospital was erected) a room close and ill-ventilated. In it are lying nine persons afflicted with cholera in its most malignant form. The moans of the sufferers break upon the ear, and pierce the heart. Around on the floor is filth, from which a pestilential vapour fills the room. No hired nurse can endure it. Who then shall tend the dying, who soothe their pangs as far as they can be soothed—who give them medicines and food, if they can take it—who do all the other offices of love they stand in need of? Shall they be left? No. Look up, and leaning over them you will see the feeble form of a woman clothed in black; around her neck there hangs a simple cross, the token of the faith that burns within her breast, and of Him by whom she is supported. Yes! there is a "sister of mercy" fulfilling her mission, and doing an angel's work. Were we to state all that we have seen of the sad character of the disease, and the energy evinced by these self-denying handmaidens of the Lord, we should not expect to gain credence. At this moment, in the hospital, you may see them moving from case to case, and labouring with superhuman might, for they are supported by God himself, and the morning Psalm for the 18th day of the month, must have fallen upon their ears with sweetness and comfort. Battle fields have witnessed many a noble scene of bravery and valour, but never were given greater proofs of endurance and Christian prowess than in the hospital in Fivefield lane. Miss Sellon (who, though ill, has been on the spot every day) and her fellow-workers, may justly be added to the list of Female Heroines. In this opinion persons of all views coincide, and they who formerly opposed them, cannot now withhold the meed of praise. Truly one more reason may be deduced from such visitations for the establishment of sisterhoods, for in what other manner could such effectual assistance have been secured.

Neither can we omit to mention the noble conduct of the Incumbent (the Rev. G. R. Prynn) and the Curate (the Rev. G. Hetting) of the district. They, like the sisters, have ever been engaged in the fulfilment of their onerous duties, of which some idea may be formed when we say that four hundred cases have already occurred. We remember reading some time ago the lives of early Jesuit missionaries, and admired the self-denial, and the labours they undertook; we have read, too, of others—Priests of our own Church—who, during the plagues and pestilence, counted not their lives dear unto them; and now we have seen all we have read illustrated in these two faithful sons of the Church. Their labours have latterly been shared in some measure by the Rev. W. Hutchinson, Curate of S. Mary's Devonport, and by the Curate of Stoke Damerel. The latter gentleman has commenced a subscription to aid his brethren, and it is most gratifying to mention that his congregation have answered most liberally to an appeal made to them, by sending large quantities of flannel clothes, and other necessary things, thus fulfilling the duty of Christian sympathy, and expressing their thankfulness to God for having preserved them from the pestilence that is slaying so many around them. The poor orphans left destitute are many in number, and we hope (though we know not how the case may be) that Miss Sellon may be enabled to admit some of them into the Home, or that other means may be adopted for their safety. We may, however, return to this subject hereafter.

We are rejoiced to state that the Holy Communion is administered daily, after morning prayers, to the Sisters of Mercy in the Church of Stoke Damerel, in which parish the Home is situated. Thus they go forward to their labours, strengthened by the Bread of immortality, and prepared to say, "For me to live is Christ, to die is gain." May God preserve them unhurt in the midst of danger, and keep them safe under the shadow of His Almighty Wings.—The Churchman's Companion.

CHRISTIAN PREACHING.

We make the following extract from an interesting article on Alexander Knox, in the Irish Ecclesiastical Journal:

The second letter of Mr. Knox on "Christian Preaching," was addressed to Mr. Jebb, while curate of Swanlinbar, in answer to this request: "I should be very thankful for a few ideas on what Christian preaching should be. What do you conceive to be the medium between cold morality and wild enthusiasm in preaching?"

The reply of Mr. Knox is worthy of the inestimable importance of the subject. His letter was afterwards published by Bishop Jebb, in his edition of "Burnet's Lives." It has been twice reprinted in America for distribution among the clergy, and it is very much to be desired that it should be similarly republished, in a separate form, for circulation in this country. We extract from it the following passage, as an early specimen of the "Thirty Years' Correspondence" between Alexander Knox and Bishop Jebb:—

"To show strongly and feelingly the misery not only of sinful actions, but of that carnal, worldly, indolent, unfeeling state of mind, in which most men are content to live; and to point out the absolute necessity of a change from that state into an humble, watchful, spiritual, devout, filial frame of mind, is, in my opinion, the very foundation of all Christian preaching, as it is, in truth, the keystone of Christianity.

"The very word for REPENTANCE points out the reality and the depth of this change; μετανοια, a transformation of mind; and our Lord's words to St. Paul clearly explain wherein that change, that μετανοια, consists: to open their eyes; to turn them from darkness to light; and from the power of Satan unto God—that is, to enlighten them with a divine and saving knowledge of what is true and good—to fill their hearts with the love of it, and to furnish them with the power to perform it.

The blessings consequent upon this change immediately follow: 'that they may receive forgiveness of their sins, and an inheritance among them that are sanctified, through faith that is in Me.' Christianity, then, in this view, is really what St. Paul calls it, the POWER OF GOD UNTO SALVATION. When thus pursued, I mean, when a deep sense of inward depravity and weakness excites a man to seek divine knowledge and divine grace, in order to the enlightening of his mind, and the renewing of his heart; when this view produces conscientious watchfulness, excites to fervent habitual devotion, and presents to the mind, in a new light, God's inestimable love in the redemption of the world by His Son; then, by degrees, sometimes more rapidly, sometimes more slowly, the true Christian character begins to form itself in the mind. Then the great things spoken of Christianity in the New Testament begin to be understood, because they begin to be felt. The vanity of earthly things becomes more and more apparent; that divine faith, which gives victory over the world, begins to operate; religious duties, once burdensome, become delightful; self-government becomes natural and easy; reverential love to God, and gratitude to the Redeemer, producing humility, meekness, active unbounded benevolence, grow into habitual principles; private prayer is cultivated, not merely as a duty, but as the most delightful exercise of the mind; cheerfulness reigns within, and diffuses its sweet influence over the whole conversation and conduct; all the innocent, natural enjoyments of life (scarcely perhaps tasted before, from the natural relish of the mind being blunted by artificial pleasures) become inexhaustible sources of comfort; and the close of life is contemplated as the end of all pain, and the commencement of perfect, everlasting felicity.

"This, I conceive, is a faint sketch of that state of mind to which the Christian preacher should labor to bring himself and his hearers. This I take to be 'true religion,' our Saviour's 'well of water springing up into everlasting life'; St. Paul's 'new creature' and 'spiritual mind'; St. John's 'fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ.' 'These points, therefore, I take to be the great features of Christian preaching:—

"1. The danger and misery of an unrenowned, unregenerate state; whether it be of the more gross, or of the more decent kind.

"2. The absolute necessity of an inward change, a moral transformation of mind and spirit.

"3. The important and happy effects which take place when this change is really produced."

RESPECT FOR THE SACRED MINISTRY.

How beautiful, O Lord, are the feet of Thy holy messengers! who bring to us the glad tidings of peace and reconciliation with Thee; who teach us the way to eternal happiness, and by their pious care, help us thither. If they teach us spiritual things, it is just we should give them temporal. Make us, O Lord, entertain them as workmen sent by Thee, with respect to their persons, and obedience to their words, and, according to our power, with a free supply of their necessities.

To sacrifice disobediently is wilfully to mock God in honouring Him.—BISHOP HALL.

RELIGIOUS UNITY.

Let us beware of contracting that spirit of indifference to religious unity, which, under the abused names of liberality and charity, is one of the most mischievous enemies of our progress towards perfection. That is no matter of indifference, for which our Saviour supplicated Heaven in the last and most solemn night, even the night in which He was betrayed. If God had been pleased that we should be established in that way, which patient and candid investigation shall have led us humbly to believe the right, duty enjoins us to "hold fast our profession without wavering," but without presumption. Divisions among brethren we must not esteem of no importance; yet must so conduct ourselves as to recommend the opinions entertained by ourselves, not by violence of assertion, but by the better evidence of charity and holiness of life. Thus shall we best evince our zeal in the cause of truth and Christian union; thus best display our love and our obedience to that Redeemer, who, by the inestimable sacrifice of Himself, has purchased us to love and to good works.—Bp. SANDFORD.

A SEA-PORT TRADESMAN.

A few years since, a pious and respectable tradesman, in a populous sea-port town, took a shop, in which his predecessors had carried on a considerable trade on the Lord's Day. Determined to act in conformity with his religious profession, he closed his doors on the Sabbath, though many ship's crews repeatedly requested him to serve them. This noble decision of conduct was noised abroad, and reached the ears of the landlord, who, immediately on ascertaining the fact, gave his tenant notice to quit, saying the business would be injured, and he should be unable hereafter to let his house to so great an advantage. The tradesman modestly, but firmly replied, that whatever consequences might result from his decision, he should persevere in it as the path of duty. The landlord was angry, and determined to carry his purpose also into execution. But it was not so. The landlord was soon after arrested by the hand of death: when, to the surprise of every one, it was found that he had bequeathed the house, with all its fixtures, to his pious and conscientious tenant. "Godliness is indeed profitable for all things: having the promise of this life, as well as that which is to come."

MERLIN BARTHOLOMEW.

In the melancholy massacre in France, for three days every Protestant who could be found was put to death. By order of the king, Admiral de Coligny was murdered in his own house, but Merlin, his chaplain, concealed himself in a hay-loft. It is recorded in the acts of the next synod, of which he was a moderator, that though many in similar circumstances died from hunger, he was supported by a hen regularly laying an egg near his place of refuge.

A LONDON PICKPOCKET.

The first meeting of the Shoreditch Bible Association was held in the Church, which was very much crowded. Some weeks afterwards, the collectors called on a widow, who kept a small grocery shop, for her subscription, which she had always paid very cheerfully. As they were going away, she said, "Gentlemen, I have got a young man, a lodger, who is always poring over the Bible; I dare say, he would subscribe." The collectors were introduced to him to solicit his subscription. He answered, "I certainly will," and gave them a guinea, and desired them to put down his name for a subscriber of sixpence a week. The gentlemen were astonished, and hesitated at taking so much, and wished to return a part. He answered, "No, I owe my all to the Shoreditch Bible Association." About a month afterwards the committee wished to increase its number. This young man was proposed and accepted. But when the matter was mentioned to him, he warmly replied, "No, gentlemen, you must pardon me, I am not worthy to form a part of your committee. If you want more money, I will gladly give it: but to act on your committee, I cannot." They in vain pressed the matter, and wished to know his reasons. About a year after he requested his landlady to desire the gentlemen to wait upon him, when they called, (he had regularly paid his subscription through the medium of his landlady,) as he wanted to speak to them: which they did. "Now, gentlemen," said he, "my lips are unsealed, I take my departure for America this week. Here are five guineas. I will now tell you my short history. Two years ago I was one of the most profligate young men in the city of London. I was a common pickpocket. At your anniversary, seeing your church crowded, I, with several of my companions in iniquity, entered in order to pursue our sinful practices. From the crowded state of the church we were separated. I got into the middle aisle, just in front of the speaker. The first words I caught were, 'Thou shalt not steal!' My attention was fixed; my conscience was touched; and tears began to flow. In vain did my companions make their signals to commence our operations. As soon as the meeting closed, I hurried away, threw myself into the first coach I found, drove to my lodgings in the west end of the town, paid my rent, took away all my things, and came into this part of the city, in order to hide myself from my companions; and providentially found this house. I immediately inquired for a Bible; and for the first time in my life began to read it. I found my convictions of the evil of my conduct increased, and I hope I have now found peace and rest in believing on that Saviour whom the Bible reveals."

ON SUFFERING EVIL REPORT.—The more prominent any person's character is, the more likely he is to suffer in this way; there being in the heart of every man, unless greatly subdued by grace, a pleasure in hearing anything which may sink others to his level, or lower them in the estimation of the world. We seem to ourselves elevated in proportion as others are depressed. Under such circumstances I derive consolation from the following reflections:

1. My enemy, whatever evil he says of me, does not reduce me so low as he would if he knew all concerning me that God knows.

2. In drawing the balance, as between debtor and creditor, I find that if I have been robbed of pence, there are pounds and talents placed to my account to which I have no just title.

A SOLEMN INQUIRY.

A ticket was dropped in the street by a Sunday Scholar. A lady passing that way in her carriage discovered it, and supposing it to be a treasury note, or small bill, such as were then used for change, ordered her servant to bring it to her. He did so, when, lo! instead of its representing a small amount of earthly treasure, she found upon it the following words: "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" The inquiry was deeply impressed upon her mind, and in vain did she attempt to banish it; in vain she sought the circles of folly and dissipation, the thought still pressed upon her mind, "What shall it profit?" Nor did she ever find rest till she was brought to the feet of Jesus.

BE TRUE.

How stirring those words of George Herbert, "Lie not," neither to thyself, nor man, nor God. Let mouth and heart be one; beat and speak together, and make both felt in action. It is for cowards to lie. Lies are the offspring of fear, and slaves to it spit them forth amid the stormy workings of the soul in froth. How like a living thing this truth, as George Herbert sang it two centuries ago:

"Lie not, but let thy heart be true to God;
Thy mouth to it, to actions to them both.
Cowards tell lies, and those that fear the rod.
The stormy working soul spits lies in froth.
Dare to be TRUE. Nothing can need a lie.
A fault which needs it most, grows two thereby."

A POOR WIDOW'S PRAYER ANSWERED.

A poor, but pious widow, residing at Folkestone, derived support for herself and her family, by selling grocery and other small articles. She was, at one time, much distressed for a sum of money to meet a bill, the payment of which her creditor had demanded. The day and the hour arrived when the claim would be made which she was unable to meet. She sought the kind interposition of her heavenly father, and just then she heard footsteps in her little shop. She expected to meet the eye of her creditor; but to her great surprise, about twenty sailors made their appearance, who purchased articles to the very amount she now wanted; and thus converted her prayer to praise, encouraging her more than ever to exercise confidence in Him who has said; "Let thy widows trust in me."

FELIX DROUIN, late Professor University of France, Teacher of French and Latin, Mr. WM. H. FENNY, late of Worcester Cathedral, Professor of Music, with a number of Assistants. Extract from the address of the Bishop of Pennsylvania, in the Convention of 1848. "The female school, known as the Retreat, in School-house Lane, near Germantown, has been signally favored, not only by the smiles of Divine Providence, but also with the influence of the Divine Spirit. Considerably more than a third of all the resident or boarding pupils have within the last two months been confirmed, and have also become communicants, under circumstances which have inspired me with the most lively hopes in respect to their future character and influence as Christian women. The order and spirit prevailing throughout the school have been excellent: the discipline is quiet, effective, and eminently domestic: the position of the buildings and grounds is alike beautiful and healthy; and the patronage bestowed upon it most encouraging." The year consists of two terms, of 14½ and 29 weeks, commencing April 10th and September 4th.

COLLEGE OF ST. JAMES, Washington county, Maryland.

The eighth session will open on Monday, October 1st, on which day the punctual attendance of all the students is requested. The duties of the classes are promptly re-commenced, and it is very important that all their members, new or old, should take their places at the opening of the session. The academical year extends from the 1st of October to the 1st of August; there being but one vacation, August and September.

In the COLLEGE, all the usual classes under a full corps of Professors, have for several years been pursuing the entire course of collegiate studies equal to that prescribed in the older colleges of the north. At the recent Commencement, the third graduating class received their academical degrees. In the GRAMMAR SCHOOL, which immediately adjoins the college, the preparatory classes are carefully trained by competent instructors under the supervision of the Professors of the College. Thus pupils may enter the Institution at an early age and pursue their entire course of study under the same direction until they graduate. The mercantile department embraces those partial members of any of the collegiate or preparatory classes, who may be preparing for the counting-room or other non-professional life. Such students are admitted to all the privileges and advantages of their several classes, substituting in place of some of the classical studies, such as are more necessary as a preparation for business. French is a regular study without extra charge in all the classes. In addition to the French, the mercantile students will be taught, without charge, German or some other modern language. The location of the College is perfectly healthful; and there are no towns or villages near to present the temptations so dangerous to the young. Moral and religious education is one chief design of the Institution. The charge, covering all academical and domestic expenses, is $225 per session of ten months. The rules of the college carefully restrict any other expenses of the student. All the departments are under the immediate supervision of the undersigned, to whom application may be made for copies of the "Register" of the college and for further information, as well as for the admission of pupils. JOHN B. KERFOOT, Rector College of St. James, P. O. Maryland. Aug. 11.—2m.

The following Form of Thanksgiving to be used in the Churches of this Diocese until the first Sunday in Advent, is put forth in conformity with Canon XLVII. of 1832. Wherever the language of the Thanksgiving for deliverance from great sickness and mortality in the Book of Common Prayer is thought to be appropriate, the Clergy will please use it and omit the following.

A. POTTER, Bishop, &c.

SPECIAL THANKSGIVING.

Almighty God, in whom we live and move and have our being, and through whom our sins are most justly punished, we render unto thee our hearty praises that in the midst of thy judgments thou hast remembered mercy. We bless thee that thou hast been pleased to withdraw from us the grievous pestilence which has visited and afflicted our land; and we would offer unto thee as a living sacrifice the souls and bodies which thou hast delivered,—earnestly beseeching thee to grant that this thy fatherly correction may have its due influence upon us, and may cause us ever to remember how frail and uncertain our life is, that so we may apply our hearts unto that heavenly wisdom which in the end may bring us to everlasting life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The following stanzas are taken from a Poem, written by the Rev. Ralph Hoyt. This poem was delivered by the Author before the House of Convocation, Trinity College, Hartford.

THE TRUE LIFE.

A REVERIE.

How changeeful and how fleet the things of earth:
But yester' the fair season of sweet flowers,
Breathing its odorous beauties into birth,
With jessamine and roses twined the bowers;
But soon that time of bud and bloom was o'er,
And summer glowed, where spring had smiled before:
Summer! gay, golden summer! Lo, the fields,
Flushed with the wealth that industry hath won;
Blithely the swain his sweeping sickle wields,
And binds his heavy sheaves. September's sun
Tinges the clusters on the bending bough,
And autumn holds a brief dominion now.

And now 'tis winter! so the moments roll
That wear out life in fanciful disguise,
And show full oft a winter in the soul,
Blight on its blossoms, gloom upon its skies;
The cherished buds of hope unblown depart,
And strew their leaves all withered on the heart.
Nor Flora's beauty, nor her sweet perfume,
O'er hills, and vales, and woodlands, can restore
The blighted tree of life its Eden bloom;
It cannot see the sun it saw before,
It cannot the decaying stem renew,
Dead, in the wintry garden where it grew!

Serenest spirit of the hallowed lyre,
Sweet soother of all sorrow, come to me;
My burdened thought with utterance inspire:
Sad harp of mine, thy saddest minstrelsie
I here would fling upon the chilling wind,
Chanting unto the dead! Ah, how we bind
The memory of each departed joy
Close to our bleeding bosoms, till we feel
The past our only good, the earth a toy
With all its present charms. O let me steal
From the mad whirl of life, and pour my breath,
My heart, my soul, upon the ear of death!

BISHOP OTEY'S PASTORAL LETTER.

It is sometimes alleged, that by proposing so high a standard of attainment we discourage effort—that something must be conceded in the way of indulgence to human nature, especially when compassed about as we know ourselves to be, by manifold infirmities and assailed by strong temptations.

The very condition of weakness and trial, thus acknowledged, shows the importance of being particularly cautious how we expose ourselves, by going to places, or indulging in practices, in which there is danger of our being ensnared and overcome. Attention to the necessary and indispensable business of life, supplies ample scope for the trial of our virtues, and the exercise of our Christian principles, without needlessly encountering the danger of temptation.

The plea of those who contend most earnestly for worldly amusements, is, that there is really no danger in them; but when we urge upon them the high attainments in the divine life which the Gospel calls for, they ask, are such attainments possible? Can they be reached by beings so depraved as we are, and in a world so full of temptation? "Be not deceived; God is not mocked! for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption." If, in spite of the solemn admonitions of scripture, the remonstrances of your own consciences, and the warning voice of experience, you persist in frequenting those assemblages where nothing that is not wholly worldly finds a place, where the very amusements pursued are shaped and conducted expressly with a view to dissipate serious thoughts, and drive away sobriety of mind and speech—where approach to religious conversation is not only sedulously excluded, but an allusion even to such a topic is met as an unwelcome intruder—where in short every attendant circumstance stamps on the whole scene the impress of earthliness—such as, the absence generally of just parental restraint—the promiscuous intermingling of the persons of the young of both sexes—the freedom of contact—the soft, luxurious strains of music lending their aid to kindle the passions—the graceful activity of bodily movement and other artificial stimulants to heat the young blood—the representations of scenes, oftentimes immoral in their tendency and which true modesty would blush to witness—the darkness without and the brilliant lights within—the lateness of the hour to which such revelry is generally prolonged, alike injurious to health of mind and body, from the dangers of exposure and the interruption of regular repose, if,

I say, you persist in seeking and finding satisfaction in such scenes, you need not the voice of your spiritual adviser to tell you, that you are "the friend of the world and the enemy of God." You need not be informed that you are sowing to the flesh—your conscience has already told you this, and warned you of the consequences, in the present deadness of your spiritual affections, by a tone of remonstrance, during the silent watches of the night it may have been, and when no eye was upon you but that of God—still and small the warning voice may have been, but more impressive, more stirring to the soul, than ever falls upon the ears of mortal man.

In a scene, such as that which we have but slightly sketched, a spiritually minded person will have no disposition to mingle. He will rather seek recreation in some mode more congenial to the temper of one whose conversation is in Heaven and who sets his affections on Heavenly things. The perfect example or model after which he endeavors to shape his life and conversation is that furnished by the deportment of Christ. "He has left us an example that ye should follow his steps." Will it be said that the perfection of the model is unattainable by us? This furnishes no just reason for our not striving to copy it. It is imitable, although in all our efforts we fall far short of the perfect pattern after which we work. A child cannot by his best endeavors equal the copy after which he writes, but repeated exertion and pains-taking will enable him to approximate towards perfection. And so the Christian must be ever aiming to reach higher degrees of holiness—a more decided mastery over his passions—greater attainments in virtue—a more perfect conformity to the example of his Saviour, and a more complete victory over the world and its evil influences.

The plain and simple truth is, that our affections must by some means or other be weaned from the world, if we would ever become fitted for Heaven. The very virtues of the Christian, which are to him the comfortable evidence of his being a child of God, require for their growth and invigoration, a state of circumstances altogether opposed to conformity to the world. They cannot even exist with self-indulgence and the gratification of a passion for such pleasures as ordinarily pass under the name of "worldly amusements." He who has not been made aware of this, by his own experience, must be supposed to have learned little as yet of his own spiritual character and made but very slight improvement of those providential dispensations which, by showing man the vanity and instability of "temporal things," were designed to lead him to value aright "the things that are eternal." Such is the constitution of our spiritual nature, that we cannot be assured of the reality of any grace that enters into the character of a Christian unless it be brought into exercise, or subjected to some actual test. Thus, for example, we do not know certainly that we possess the grace of charity, unless it be manifested by kind and benevolent acts—we do not know that we are meek, until we exhibit meekness under provocations and injuries. So "faith without works is dead, being alone." And so of all the virtues which go to make up the perfect Christian. They must be brought daily and hourly into action by means of the providential circumstances which surround us through life—they become daily stronger by the occasions which thus give opportunity for their exercise, and so furnish the proper and reliable evidence upon which the believer judges of the reality and soundness of his faith—of the sincerity of his love, and of the assurance of his hope that he is "accepted in the beloved." The enlightened Christian will scarcely look for opportunities thus to "grow in grace," by mingling in the gay scenes and festivities of earth.

It is only by practically recognizing his probationary state, in the way we have mentioned, that the child of God can make progress in the divine life. It is a hard lesson to learn; but it must be learned, and if not early, it must be, through severer discipline, at a later period. But when once understood, it will introduce the believer into new and enlarged views of the divine character—His wisdom and goodness, as well as give him a more thorough insight into his own depravity, weakness and wants. Thus taught in the school of Christ, he will understand how the love of God is perfected in us, even by suffering—how our very prayers may be petitions for chastisements which the wisdom of God may appoint as necessary for our good. He will thus comprehend that otherwise paradoxical declaration of the Apostle, that "we joy in tribulation;" for he will find experimentally that "tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us." With David he will say, "it is good for me, that I have been afflicted; before I was afflicted I went astray; but now have I kept thy word."

On the other hand is prosperity his allotment, he receives it with humility and thankfulness. With humility, lest in the discharge of an increased responsibility he prove weak or unfaithful—with thankfulness, because of the opportunity afforded him of showing his gratitude by relieving the wants of the poor and distressed members of Christ's body.

Now, if the professed Christian, forgetful of his actual state in this world—that is one of discipline and trial—one in which Heaven's dispensations of whatever kind, are so meted out, as to afford appropriate opportunities and fit occasions for the cultivation of those spiritual affections which qualify him for the society of holy and pure beings, shall so indulge "in the pomps and vanities of this wicked world," as practically to lose sight of the great object of being placed in a state of probation, how can he make improvement—how can he advance in the divine life—how can he have any comfortable evidence that he is the child of God by faith in Jesus Christ—how in short can he have any assurance that he is Christ's when he never exhibits the spirit of Christ? He joins in those very diversions which the world claims as its own—which are denominated worldly from their well known and admitted tendency, and consequently violates a first principle which the Saviour has laid down for his guidance and safety, by having taught him to pray, "lead us not into temptation."

It will probably be alleged that this course of remark goes to prohibit absolutely all amusements and all recreations, and that a deportment in accordance with what is herein laid down, would render Christians austere in life, unsocial in deportment and morose in temper. It is not so. The danger lies not in that direction. The cultivation of cheerfulness is a Christian duty. But surely the believer—"whose are all things"—is not dependent on what the world supplies from its store of diversion for the cherishing of a cheerful temper. This disposition of mind is based on something altogether different. It rests on "the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost," as evidenced by a godly life. It springs from the glorious anticipation of consummated bliss in both body and soul, in the regions of immortality—from the animating hope that Christ is ours and we are Christ's—"heirs of the kingdom he has promised." This is the joy of the Christian "with which a stranger intermeddled not"—"the peace which the world can neither give nor take away." If he find recreation necessary, as he may for both mind and body, he seeks it not in the things which minister to the appetites of a depraved nature—not even in those allowable diversions appropriate to children, but unsuited to the dignity and gravity of the Christian character. His profession and proper self-respect demand of him that he "put away childish things." His duty and his pleasure alike call upon him to "walk circumspectly—to redeem the time, knowing that the days are evil"—to watch and be sober as children of the light and of the day, who are not of the night nor of darkness—to avoid every approach to "chambering and wantonness," and, with his "affections set on heavenly things," to pursue steadily and unfalteringly the course which will not disturb his communion with God—nor disquiet his own conscience—nor be inconsistent in the eyes of an enlightened Christian judgment, with the sober and steadfast pursuit of eternal life.

The considerations I have heretofore named as dissuaves from your indulging in worldly amusements, have respect to your own personal improvement in piety. But there is another aspect under which the whole subject presents itself to our notice, which I hope may not be without profit to us to consider. The Church of which we are members has long suffered under a heavy cloud of rebuke and reproach from others around; viz: that she allows of licenses and irregularities in the conduct of those belonging to her communion, utterly irreconcilable with any just pretensions to godliness. I am far from thinking that such reproaches are merited to the full extent of the terms in which they are made. But does it not become us to see and examine whether there be occasion for the utterance of any such charges at all? And ought we not, in the circumstances in which we are placed, to "avoid the appearance of evil?" Nothing, as all experience proves, exerts so direct and powerful an influence upon mankind as example; and if we would recommend the religion we profess and the Church in which it is taught to the acceptance of our fellow men, there is no way in which we can do this so effectually, as by the force of our own personal deportment and example, in the submission we render to the precepts of our religion and in the respect we pay to the authority of the Church. If, as we contend, we possess superior advantages in our ecclesiastical organization, that superiority should manifest itself by the light of the Christian life shining in undimmed brightness on all around us. In no other way may we hope to silence the voice of obloquy, and roll away the dark cloud that has so long rested upon our Zion.

I might, beloved brethren, enforce all that I have now delivered to you upon this subject of Christian manners by references to the pastoral letters of the House of Bishops—the resolutions passed by many conventions in different dioceses and the charges and addresses of many distinguished Bishops in our own and other countries. But my remarks have already extended much further than was contemplated by me when I began this letter and I must hasten to a conclusion.

In the exhortation which our ministers are required to give to their flocks a week previous to the administration of the Holy Communion, are found these words—"if any of you be a blasphemer of God, an hinderer or slanderer of his word, an adulterer, or be in malice, or envy, or in any other grievous crime; repent ye of your sins, or else come not to that Holy Table." Now as already intimated there are persons of our communion, either so wanting in caution, or so easily persuaded, as to be induced to visit scenes and places, or indulge in amusements by which their consciences become defiled and they are themselves brought into doubt respecting the safety and soundness of their religious condition. Of such persons can less be said than that they are by their conduct "hinderers and slanderers of God's word?" Theatrical representations, public balls, horse-racing and gaming are among those amusements of a worldly character which most frequently furnish incitements to the commission of the sins specified above and which, unrepented of, are set forth as grounds of worthy exclusion from the communion. In accordance, then, with my own solemn convictions of the purity and holiness of life which the Gospel requires of its professors—with the repeated admonitions of the Bishops of our Church collectively and individually, and with the spirit of warning in the Communion Office, I would advise those of you who cannot give up the devotion to worldly amusements which it has been the purpose of this letter to expose, to abstain from the Holy Communion, until you can exercise more self-control; and I recommend to the clergy, first to expostulate with such of their people as they find in this condition, upon the imminent danger they are incurring to their souls by so careless and thoughtless a life, and upon the great scandal which they are creating against religion and the Church: and secondly, if these remonstrances prove ineffectual, then to advise such persons, in consideration of their own soul's safety, and not to increase their own "condemnation," to come not to the Holy Table of the Lord.

I have thus fulfilled, very imperfectly as I feel deeply sensible, my bounden duty to you, my beloved brethren; and I pray God to give you the spirit of wisdom and understanding, to the acknowledgment of the truth as it is in Jesus, and to "preserve you in soul, body and spirit, blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Your faithful friend and affectionate Pastor,
JAMES H. OTEY.

COLUMBIA, TENN., July 12, 1849.

MORNINGS WITH THE JESUITS AT ROME.

The Rev. Hobart Seymour, a Clergyman of the Church of England, spent some time in Rome, closely studying the workings of the religious system, there. He was treated with great kindness and attention, and spent many hours with leading members of the Society of Jesuits, conversing and arguing about their claims. The discussions at these interviews is given in a work, with the above title, lately reprinted in this country. Our readers will be interested in the following extracts, copied from the Christian Observer:

During my constant attendance at all the services of the Church of Rome, I was observed by a Roman gentleman who held office in the Papal court; and being acquainted with him, he remarked one day to my wife, that I seemed much interested in these things; and asked whether I would not like to make the acquaintance of some of the Clergy. Having learned from her my wishes to that effect, he called some days after to say he had been with his personal friend the Padre Generale,—the Father-General of the Jesuits,—and had mentioned to him my wish to enter into communication with the Clergy, and he seemed to intimate that this was sure to convert me to the Church of Rome. He added that the Father-General had directed two members of the order to wait on me, to give me any information which I might desire. These gentlemen came in due course. They soon presented me to others. They introduced me to the professors of their establishment, the Collegio Romano, and thus a series of conversations or conferences on the subject of the points at issue between the Churches of England and Rome, commenced and were carried on, as occasion offered, during the whole period of my residence at Rome. A portion of my notes of these conversations constitutes this present volume of MORNINGS AMONG THE JESUITS AT ROME.

I dealt with all frankness with these several gentlemen, as to the object of their visit. They were under the impression, which they were at no pains conceal, that I was disposed favorably towards their Church;—that I was one of those Anglican clergymen, who neither understand nor love the Church of England, and who, in a restless dissatisfaction and love of change, are prepared to abandon her communion for that of Rome, and who only want a little encouragement and perhaps instruction, before taking the last step. I was very careful to undeceive them, stating that I should be most happy to confer with them on the differences between the two Churches, but that I could not do so under a false colour,—that I was devotedly attached in judgment and in feeling to the Church of England,—that I looked on her as the Church of God in England, and the most pure, most apostolic, most scriptural of all the Churches of Christendom,—that, without unchurching other Churches, she was still the Church of my judgment and of my affections; and that I had never for a moment harboured the thought of abandoning her for any other Church, and especially for the Church of Rome.

My new friends, for such their subsequent conduct proved them to be, seemed surprised at the decision of my opinions; and expressed their wonder, that I could refuse to hold communion with the Church of Rome.

I stated that I felt very strong objections, as they appeared to me, against that Church; but if those objections were removed,—if they, who were Priests of the Church of Rome, could remove them,—if they, living at the fountain-head of that Church, could prove them futile, in that case they should find me free to act, and prepared to act on my enlightened conviction, and I would without hesitation join their communion.

They generally asked me to state my objections, as they felt assured that they would be able to remove them.

I have learned, and must bear about me forever the memory of the lesson, never again to regard the extremities of credulity, as inconsistent with the most scientific attainments; or to suppose that what seems the most absurd and marvellous superstition, is incompatible with the highest education; or to think that the utmost prostration of the mind, is inconsistent with the loftiest range of intellectual power. There was in some of my friends an extraordinary amount of scientific attainments, of classical erudition, of polite literature, and of great intellectual acumen; but all seemed subdued and held, as by an adamant grasp, in everlasting subjection to what seemed to them to be the religious principle. This principle, which regarded the voice of the Church of Rome as the voice of God Himself, was ever uppermost in the mind, and held such an influence and a mastery over the whole intellectual powers, over the whole rational being, that it bowed in the humility of a child before everything that came with even the apparent authority of the Church. I never could have believed the extent of this, if I had not witnessed it in these remarkable instances. They seemed to regard the Canons of the Church, precisely as we regard the decisions of Scripture; and just as we regard any unbelief of the statements of Holy Scripture as infidelity, so they regard every doubt as to the judgment of the Church as the worst infidelity. It seemed as if a doubt of it never cast its shadow across their minds.—(pp. 5, 6.)

I stated, says Mr. Seymour, that there appeared to be many things that seemed not only extravagant, but even impossible, from their palpable absurdity; things that at times seemed so gross that no reasonable credulity could stand them; and had the effect of raising an insurmountable objection against any communion with the Church of Rome, if indeed these things were part and parcel of her system, or in any way essential to her completeness; and I added, that if they were not essential they ought to have been got rid of as offensive to so many persons.

He replied, that he quite felt that there were many things to which my remarks would very justly apply, but that there were many others that were extravagant or absurd only in appearance; and that it not unfrequently occurred that those things that at one time seemed liable to insurmountable objections, were afterwards adopted by converts without the least scruple or difficulty. He therefore wished me to specify some illustration.

I referred in return to the miraculous picture of the Virgin Mary, in the Church of St. Maria Maggiore—to the miraculous image of our Lord as a child in the Church at Araceli—to the miraculous image of the Virgin Mary in the Church of the Augustines; and to several other pictures and images, which were said to be miraculous, and which were worshipped with a special and peculiar devotion—were crowned and carried in procession precisely as the ancient heathens of Rome used to carry the images of their gods. I stated that these things seemed very gross, and that usually in England the advocates of the Church of Rome got rid of all objections derived from them by disavowing all these things as abuses, as exaggerations, as bad or superstitious practices, which were not acknowledged or practised by the well-informed, and were not approved by the Church. I therefore would take the opportunity of asking him, living as he did at the fountain-head, and capable of informing me with some authority, whether others or myself could be justified in setting the objection aside in that way—namely, by attributing these things to the ignorance of the foolish and superstitious.

He answered without the least hesitation, and in a manner that took me by surprise. He answered that I had taken a very wrong view of these particulars, in regarding them as extravagant or absurd; for, although they might appear strange to me, as at one time they had appeared to himself, so strange indeed as sometimes to be absolutely loathsome to his feelings, and although he felt himself unable to justify them in themselves, yet there was no doubt of there being approved in practice by the Church; that they were no exaggeration or caricature, but real verities, which at one time were a stumbling-block and offence to his own mind. He added that there was much that might be said in their favor, for that the Italians were a people very different from the English; that the English loved a religion of the heart, and the Italians a religion of the senses; the English a religion of the feelings, and the Italians a religion for the taste; the English an inward and spiritual religion, and the Italian an outward and visible religion; and that it was the intention of the Church, as well as her duty, to arrange all the rites, ceremonies, acts, services of religion, so as to be suitable to an outward and visible religion, and calculated for the mind of Italy; and thus those particulars concerning the crowning and processions of miraculous pictures and miraculous images, however strange and absurd to the English, have been sanctioned by the Church as both natural and wise to the Italians.

I expressed in strong terms my surprise at the position he had taken, expecting that he would have denied or softened these things, instead of asserting and defending them. And I took the opportunity of alluding to the coronation of the picture of Mary, in St. Maria Maggiore—a coronation by the present Pope (Gregory XII.), who crowned it amidst religious services with his own hands; I also alluded to the procession which conducted the same picture through the streets, in order to suppress the cholera, a procession in which the present Pope joined bare-footed, and I asked whether we were to regard these acts, in which all the chiefs of the Church, as the Pope, Cardinals, Bishops, &c., took an active part, as the acts of the Church, sanctioning the opinions that pictures could work miracles, and that the procession of a picture of the Virgin Mary could possibly stay the virulence of the cholera, and that any particular picture was entitled to any special or peculiar devotion, as a coronation,—in short, entitled to more veneration than other pictures.

To this he replied with frankness and decision, saying, that he had no doubt, and that there could be no doubt whatever, as to the miraculous powers of some images and pictures; and he explained the matter thus. It sometimes occurred, he said, that some persons were affected—specially affected or moved by some pictures or images more than by others; that in praying before these, their feelings were more touched, their sensibilities more excited, and their devotional affections more drawn out in prayer; that in answer to such prayer, God not unfrequently gave responses which were more marked than ordinary, and were to be regarded as miraculous answers to prayers made before miraculous pictures or images.

I could not avoid showing my incredulity to all this, and I certainly was as surprised as I was incredulous.

He observed this, but only continued to express himself more strongly, stating, that there was no doubt whatever as to the reality of many miracles of this nature in answer to such prayers; and that when the report of these miracles spread abroad, when the public heard of them, when the minds of the devout were excited by the fame of them, then multitudes of persons naturally flocked to such pictures and images to pray before them; and their feelings being excited, and their affections being the more drawn out by the circumstance, there were yet again other miracles wrought by God, and so these images and pictures became miraculous. He added, that the picture of the Virgin at St. Maria Maggiore was such,—that the image of Mary at the Church of the Augustinians was such,—and that the picture of St. Ignatius praying to the Virgin in the Church of Gesu was, with many others, also miraculous.

AN AGED INFANT.—An honest peasant-woman, named Marie Plor, (1841,) is at present living in the Faubourg of Manbeuge, in the north of France, and has attained her hundredth year. She lately lost one of her offspring, who had reached the age of eighty. "Ah," said the old mother, weeping for her recent loss, "I always said that I should never be able to bring up that child."

AMY—THE FACTORY GIRL.

A SKETCH BY A PARISH PRIEST.

It was a wild and cheerless morning in December, a few days before the celebration of our Lord's Nativity. Large fleecy flakes of snow fell in quick succession upon the ground. The wind blew bitterly, and wildly did it howl, as it swept fiercely adown the narrow streets. As I passed along them there were no signs of life. The inhabitants of the houses had not left their miserable homes to pursue the duties of the day. In a little while a bell sounded shrilly on my ears, and methought there was somewhat melancholy and death-like in its tones. Ere it had rung long immense masses crowded the streets, and bent their course to a large gloomy looking building, situated in a densely populated part of the town, which was regarded as the metropolis of manufactures. It was an immense building some three-quarters of a mile long, and was one of the principal factories in the place. As I gazed upon the motley group, deep thoughts and melancholy uprose within my soul. I had seen many sad sights, but none so bitter as this. There were old and young; but the latter had none of the buoyancy and life of youth. The faces of many were wan, and pale as marble, and many a gentle girl resembled a tender flower bending before the rushing storm. Some, it is true, were tolerably well-clad, but the great majority wore only thin rags, which were insufficient to defend them against the inclemency of the weather; whilst not a few were barefooted, and plodded their weary way in the midst of the deep snow.

One there was amongst them that attracted my attention. She was a tall slender girl, and, though her face had many a mark of bitter sorrow, and long-protracted suffering marked upon it, it still retained much of its former beauty. She appeared calm and collected; and, though her steps were feeble, and her form bent with fatigue, she evinced no sign of impatience. It was evident she was a superior character, and had nothing in common with the factory hands, except her labour. For she mingled not with them, nor shared their lewd and wicked jests, and conversation, in which, in spite of their poverty and the weather, they freely indulged.

Once seen she was not to be forgotten; and therefore during the day, I obtained permission to go through the mill, for I felt she had a tale of woe to tell, and was resolved, if so it might be, to pour some balm into her wounded heart. The rooms were close and ill-ventilated—crowded by hands. Here, as in the street, the majority were passing sportive gibes, and singing vain and foolish songs. Having passed through room after room, and searched in vain, I began to think that my efforts would be thrown away. On entering the last room I espied her standing at her post, but faint and feeble, and supported by one or two of her fellows. A sad and insidious disease had made no slight inroad into a constitution never strong; and it was evident that, without a great change, the place she then occupied would soon be filled by another. She was at once conducted to her home, which was situated in a dark dismal alley, a short distance from the mill. But seldom did the friendly rays of the sun shine within it, to cheer and gladden its wretched inhabitants. Her room, however, was beautifully clean, and on the window sill were some few pots containing flowers, in attending to which she took great delight, because, as she afterwards told me, "they reminded her of her home; that like them she would wither and die, and like them, if faithful, rise again after winter's sleep, clothed in fresh beauty."

She had no friends at hand to soothe and cheer her in her sickness; yet some of the rude hands of the factory were attentive to her wants, as far as their time would allow; and around the couch were the unseen messengers of heaven keeping watch over her pale and feeble form. Her history, which I subsequently learnt from her, was a sad and pitiable one. Hers had not always been a lot of toil and hardship. Time was, when surrounded with many comforts, her heart had been blythe and merry as a bird's, and hope scattered flowers of brightest hue around her sunny path. Her father, who lived by the sea-side in the fair west, and who had his business in the great waters, was captain of a merchant vessel. Most of his time was spent at sea, and Amy was brought up with tender care by a mother, who doted on her only child. A sound Churchwoman and a sincere Christian, she carefully educated her daughter in the duties and privileges of one, who born in sin after the first Adam, had been born again in the holy waters of Baptism after the Second. Bright and joyously passed Amy's early days, cheered by that best and dearest of all God's gifts, a mother's fondest love. Fourteen years of happiness had now passed away, when, as they were anxiously looking for her father's return, news was brought that the ship had been lost, and every hand perished. This information pierced Amy's mother to the heart, and ere long she slept in the silent tomb. An orphan, without a friend, Amy knew not what to do. The household furniture was soon sold, and the friendless girl was homeless too. Turned upon the wide world, she bent her weary steps from place to place in search of employment. Many a day did she journey onwards in the midst of bitter storms, weary and footsore—the ground for her bed at night—and the wide sky above for her canopy—God her hope and trust and stay. At length, after hardships beyond measure, she reached the town of M—, and obtained employment in the factory, where I met with her. There she had been for two years, and during all that time disease had been secretly stealing upon her. The hectic flush that played upon her face, had led others to suppose that she was in good health; and she herself had day by day overtasked her strength. Now she was near the hour of her departure. And as she told me the tale of her sorrows, struggles, and temptations, she had to rest full oft for very weariness. When she drew it to a close, she said with weeping eyes—"Yes, sir, you truly say mine has been an unhappy lot. I have been baptised in measure and degree with the baptism of blood—but yet how great a blessing it is to be called to follow my Lord, and tread, so to speak, the wine-press with Him. In my heaviest trials He has borne my burthen, and the pain has scarce been felt for the joy He gave. When unkind hearts turned coldly away, and would not heed an orphan's cry, or give a cup of cold water to a poor disciple, I made my prayer unto Him, and sweetly did he seem to say, 'I am the Father of the fatherless.' Many are the cruel temptations by which I have been assailed, temptations to vanity, and pride, and sin, but Christ has been within me, and by the Holy Spirit given unto me, I have been enabled to resist and conquer. Many, I know are my failings, but as I have daily striven to walk with God, and work out my soul's salvation, though with fear and trembling, He will, I trust, accept my unworthy services, and pardon my shortcomings for the sake of His dear Son. In all through which I have gone, I have ever thought my dear parents were by my side; and that unseen friends were ever around my pathway—for are not the dead in Christ still with us? Are we not one with them and they with us? for is not all this implied in the 'Communion of Saints?' And now ere noon-day I am going to my rest; I shall cease from my labours. I shall depart, I humbly pray, from a world of pain to one of peace, of agony to one of rest, of death to one of life."

Many a long day, and weary wakeful night did she spend after this. She knew that the hand of death was upon her, yet was she calm and collected, full of hopeful, but not boasting confidence. Endeavouring to recall and acknowledge the sins by which she had stained her baptismal robes, she sought for consolation in the blessed assurance that God pardoneth, and absolveth all them that turn unto Him, and unfeignedly repent. And this comfort was not denied her. She found in the contemplation of the cross, and Him that hung thereon, her surest stay. He, who is precious unto them that believe in Him, was to her a refuge from the storm, a hiding place in which she could safely rest from all her troubles and distress. Sweet and cheering was it to listen to the words which she uttered, and the calmness with which she looked forward to the period when her freed spirit should seek its native home.

At length the hour of her departure came. The holy table was spread, and the comfort of her departing soul, the communion of the Body and Blood of Christ given unto her. Never shall I forget the deep reverence with which she received the holy elements, or the change which passed over her when the blessed banquet was ended. Her eye glistened as if with brightest hope—the hand was upraised with a strength not her own—and a holy glow suffused her flushed face. In a moment afterwards she folded her arms across her breast, and said "Now, Lord, lettest Thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation. Now I have received Him, who died on the cross for me. O! Blessed Jesus! who sinless didst suffer for sinners, who didst weep in Gethsemane, and die on Calvary for me: who dying didst conquer death, and open the kingdom of heaven to all believers; I pray Thee by Thine agony and bloody sweat: by Thy cross and passion; by Thy glorious resurrection and ascension; by the wounds which now Thou bearest in Thy sacred body, take me, a wanderer, home; receive me to Thyself, to a mansion eternal in the skies." And thus she fell asleep in Jesus.—Churchman's Com. W. B. F.

PROTESTANT VIEWS OF HOLY BAPTISM.

MR. EDITOR:—

As the subject of Baptism and Baptismal Regeneration, is likely to be made a topic of thought and examination by your readers, in consequence of the recent decision of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, I have determined to send to you some Protestant views on the subject, as shown in the Public Confession of sundry Protestant Churches.

These extracts are taken from the Rev. P. Hall's "Harmony of Protestant Confessions"—and do most amply sustain the Church view on this important doctrine.

Thus speaks the CONFESSIO OF HELVETIA:

"For to be baptized in the name of Christ, is to be enrolled, entered, and received into covenant and family, and so into the inheritance of the sons of God; yea and in this life to be called after the name of God that is to say to be called a son of God; to be purged also from the filthiness of sins, and to be endued with the manifold grace of God, for to lead a new and innocent life. Baptism therefore doth call to mind and keep in remembrance, the great benefit of God performed to mankind. For we are all born in the pollution of sin, and are the sons of wrath. But God who is rich in mercy, doth freely purge us from our sins by the blood of His Son, and in Him doth adopt us to be His Sons, and by an holy covenant, doth join us to himself, and doth enrich us with divers gifts, that we might live a new life. All these things are sealed up unto us in Baptism. For inwardly we are regenerated, purified, and renewed of God through the Holy Spirit: and outwardly we receive the sealing of most notable gifts by the water; by which also those great benefits are represented, and as it were set before our eyes to be looked upon. And therefore are we baptized, that is washed and sprinkled with visible water. For the water maketh clean that which is filthy, and refresheth and cooleth the bodies that fail and faint. And the grace of God doleth in like manner with the soul: and that invisibly and spiritually.

"Baptism, according to the institution of the Lord, is the font of regeneration, the which the Lord doth give to his chosen in a visible sign, by the ministry of the Church, in such sort as we have declared before. In which holy font we do therefore dip our infants, because that it is not lawful for us to reject them from the company of the people of God, who are born of us (who are the people of God) and are but pointed out by the voice of God; especially seeing that we ought greatly to presume of their election.

"The Lord by a visible sign doth testify his grace unto us; whereby he doth regenerate us, and cleanse us from our sins, and also receive us to be his people, that we may live to Christ, die to the old Adam, and be partakers of the good things of Christ. For we all are born sinners; whereupon we have need of regeneration, and the purging of our sins, which cometh to pass by the free mercy of God, whereby also we are received into the covenant, that, being buried into his death, we may rise again in newness of life; the which thing is taught more at large in the Apostles' writings."

From the CONFESSIO OF BOHEMIA, I cite the following statement:

"This Sacrament consisteth of an outward washing, that is done with water, with calling on the name of the Holy Trinity; that of the element and the word there may arise, and be jointly made withal, a Sacrament.—(August. Homil. in Johan. cap. xiii.) And that washing is used both to signify, and to witness, a spiritual washing and inward cleansing of the Holy Ghost from the disease of hereditary sin, and from other sins, the guilt of which is here forgiven and taken away; and to the attaining of a new manner of birth, or regeneration: whereupon it is called the sacrament of the new birth, that is, of regeneration, or a washing with water in the word of life."

From the CONFESSIO OF FRANCE, comes this testimony:

"We acknowledge that there be two only Sacraments common to the whole Church—Whereof the first is Baptism: the which is given to us to testify our adoption; because that therein we are ingrafted into Christ's body, that being washed in his blood, we may also be renewed to holiness of life by his Spirit. This also we say, that although we are baptized but once, yet the fruit of baptism doth pertain to the whole course of our life: that this promise, to wit, that Christ will be always unto us sanctification and justification, may be sealed up in us with a sure and firm seal."

From the CONFESSIO OF ENGLAND, I extract this remark:

"We say, that Baptism is a Sacrament of the remission of sins, and of that washing which we have in the blood of Christ, and that no person which will profess Christ's name, ought to be restrained therefrom: no, not the very babes of Christians; forasmuch as they be born in sin, and pertain unto the people of God."

From the CONFESSIO OF BELGIA, this is the declaration:

"Finally. Baptism is a token unto us, that He will be our God forever, who is also our gracious Father. Therefore the Lord hath commanded all His to be baptized with pure water. 'In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost,' (Matt. xxviii. 19.) to signify that the blood of Christ doth internally, through the operation of the Spirit, perform and effect that in the soul, which water doth externally work in our bodies. For as water being poured upon us, and appearing upon the body of him that is baptized, moistening the same, doth wash away the filthiness of the body; so the blood of Christ, washing the soul, doth cleanse it from sin, and doth make us the sons of God, which before were the children of wrath.

"Therefore, here we do detest the error of the Anabaptists, who are not only not content with one baptism, and that once received, but do also condemn the baptism of infants, yea of those that be born of faithful parents. But we do believe that they ought for the same reasons to be baptized, and sealed with the sign of the covenant, for the which in times past, the infants amongst the Israelites were circumcised; that is, on account of the same promise made unto our infants, that were made unto theirs."

From the CONFESSIO OF AUGSBURG issues such doctrine as this:

"Also, that by baptism the grace of God is offered; and that young infants are to be baptized: and that they being by baptism commended unto God are received into God's favor, and are made the sons of God; as Christ witnesseth, speaking of little children in the Church, 'It is not the will of your heavenly Father that any of these little ones should perish.'—(Matt. xviii. 14.)

"Touching Baptism, they teach that it is necessary to salvation, and that by Baptism the grace of God is offered: that children are to be baptized; and that such as by baptism be presented to God, are received into his favor."

From the CONFESSIO OF SAXONY, the voice speaks thus:

"And that the Holy Ghost is given in Baptism Paul affirmeth it in his Epistle to Titus, saying, 'By the washing of the new birth, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost.' (Tit. iii. 5.) And in John it is said, Except a man be born again of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven."

From the CONFESSIO OF WIRTEMBERG, I quote the following language:

"Moreover we teach, that he that is baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, is sprinkled with a spiritual anointing; that is, is made a member of Christ through faith, and endued with the Holy Ghost, that the ears of his mind may be opened, and the eyes of his heart lightened to receive and understand holy things."

From the CONFESSIO OF SUEVELAND this doctrine reaches us:

"As touching Baptism, we confess, that which the Scriptures doth in divers places teach thereof; that we by it are buried into the death of Christ, (Rom. vi. 3, 4.) are made one body, (1 Cor. xii. 13,) and do put on Christ (Gal. iii. 27); that it is the font of regeneration, (Tit. iii. 5,) that it washeth away sins, and saveth us." (Acts xxii. 16.)

From a former CONFESSIO OF HELVETIA, I present this view of the Sacraments:

"For in Baptism water is the sign, and the thing itself is regeneration and adoption among the people of God. In the Lord's Supper, bread and wine be the signs, but the thing is communication of the body of Christ; salvation purchased for us, and the remission of sins. These things are received by faith, as the signs be received by the corporal mouth; and the whole fruit of the Sacraments is in the thing itself."

Such are the early Protestant views of the Holy Sacrament of Baptism, showing amply and incontestably how sound, how true, how scriptural, how Protestant, are the doctrines of the Protestant Episcopal Church on this important subject.

TIME AND ETERNITY.

We step the earth—we look abroad over it, and it seems immense—so does the sea. What ages had men lived—and knew but a small portion. They circumnavigate it now with a speed under which its vast bulk shrinks. But let the astronomer lift up his glass and he learns to believe in a total mass of matter, compared with which this great globe itself becomes an imponderable grain of dust. And so to each of us walking along the road of life, a year, a day, or an hour shall seem long. As we grow older, the time shortens; but when we lift up our eyes to look beyond this earth, our seventy years, and the few thousands of years which have rolled over the human race, vanish into a point; for then we are measuring Time against Eternity.—(From Blackwood's Magazine.)

NEW YORK CONVENTION.

Our columns are largely occupied this week, with a report of the proceedings of this important Convention. We have gathered this account from the reports in the New York Churchman, the Courier and Enquirer, and the Tribune. As the Churchman contained only the report of the first day's proceedings, we have been chiefly indebted to the Courier and Enquirer, a paper whose reports of church matters may always be depended upon.

Although some of the papers, to which we have had access, give a synopsis of the debates, we have not copied these, for two reasons. In the first place they would have occupied too much room. In the second place, such imperfect reports do great injustice to the speakers, seldom giving truly their course of reasoning, and always feebly presenting it. Although there were several long and animated discussions, upon topics exciting the deepest interest, the debates were marked by moderation and good temper. This seemed especially the case with the debate on the great question before the Convention, involving such grave personal and general interests.

The large majority by which the Resolution offered by the Rev. Dr. Higbee was carried, is an evidence of greater unanimity than was supposed to exist. A request thus preferred, cannot fail to receive a distinct and positive answer.

It is gratifying to find that this important Diocese has been highly prospered notwithstanding the disadvantages under which it has labored. This fact is shown in the following statement, which we take from "The Gospel Messenger." We consider it a proof of another fact besides those mentioned—viz., that the Divine blessing has not been withheld from the Episcopal services rendered to this Diocese.

COMPARATIVE VIEW—DIOCESE OF NEW YORK.

MR. EDITOR:

I send you the following comparative view of the Diocese of New York, during the three years before, and the three years after the suspension of her Bishop, as evincing two things; first, that the divine blessing has not been withheld from her under her trials; and second, that the Standing Committee have administered the Diocese in a way to command the confidence of their brethren both within and without the Diocese. The items are derived from the Journals of the Conventions.

For 1842-43, and 44. There were persons confirmed, 4072; Priests ordained, 32; Deacons ordained, 40; Churches consecrated, 19; Clergymen received into the Diocese, 42; Clergymen removed from the Diocese, 57. The highest number of Churches was 164; the highest number of Clergy was 203.

For 1746-47, and 48. There were persons confirmed, 4004; Priests ordained, 26; Deacons ordained, 40; Churches consecrated, 24; Clergymen received into the Diocese, 96; Clergymen removed from the Diocese, 35. The highest number of Churches was 193. The highest number of Clergy was 248. E.

REV. R. C. SHIMEALL.

This gentleman has announced to the world that, finding himself very uncomfortable in the Church, (little wonder!) he was reduced to the necessity of travelling on foot, either to ROME or GENEVA. After a profound investigation of "Holy Scriptures and Ancient Authors," which he hints had not been his "guides" hitherto, he determined to take the road to Geneva. In other words he has declared himself a Presbyterian.

We have sufficient brotherly kindness for our Presbyterian friends, to condole with them on this visitation. And we should be sorry to feel such unkindness towards Mr. S., as not to hope that the pleasure occasioned by his arrival may be greater than the sorrow caused by his departure.

BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

The Messrs. Appleton have added to their supply of Children's Books, two new Publications. The titles of them are "FANNY AND HER MAMMA," and "CITY CRIES." The first is designed for "Easy Reading Lessons," in which it is attempted to bring Scriptural principles into daily practice, with hints for Nursery Discipline. The second is intended to give the happy dwellers in the country, "a peep at scenes in town." It will have a good effect if it teaches them how much happier their lot is to hear the music of the country, rather than the discord of "city cries."

THE CHURCH AT CHICAGO FOR THE SWEDES AND NORWEGIANS.

The Rev. Mr. Unonius, acting under the advice of his friends, is coming on to make personal application in behalf of his important enterprise.

We have received official commendations of this object from the Rectors and Vestries of the two parishes in Chicago.

As these present the case in a strong light we will give them in whole or in part, at another time. For the present it will be sufficient to lay before our readers the following. The facts of this most interesting case have already been fully stated.

To the Bishops and Presbyters and the Beloved Brethren in the Lord, Friends of the Protestant Church in the United States of America.

The undersigned commends our well-beloved Brother, the Rev. Gaston Unonius for success in his truly worthy object of building a Scandinavian Church, in the City of Chicago. He will tell his own story, already approved by all. May the good God, by His Holy Spirit, open the hearts of those who have ability, to give not grudgingly, for He loveth a cheerful giver.

AN APPEAL FROM ST. ANSGARIUS' CHURCH, TO THE CHURCH OF GOD ELSEWHERE.

FELLOW CHRISTIANS:—We are Norwegians and Swedes, differing from you in language, of another nation, but one with you in the bonds of our Most Holy Faith. Impelled by a stern necessity we have left our native lands, and lured by the magic of the name America, we have come to yours with our wives and little ones. We have left our old homes, the graves of our fathers, and our sacred temples, and come with willing hands, with stout hearts, and a steadfast faith in the God of the poor and the homeless, to cast our lot among you. Attracted by the position and prospects of Chicago, we have settled here, but we find ourselves without money, and without a church. Money, at least enough for our daily wants, we can procure by industry, but how shall we have a church?

The lot will cost $700, the building about $1200.

Our parish is regularly organized in connection with the Episcopal Church in Illinois, and this appeal has the full sanction of our venerable Bishop. We have enjoyed the blessings of a regular service in our own language since May, 1849, in a hired room. We number about fifty families, and one hundred communicants, but we are too poor to build the church we need so much.

Such is our story; it would be unnecessary to multiply words. Our beloved Rector, the Rev. Mr. Unonius, has devoted himself with great zeal and self-denial to our spiritual concerns for a very inadequate support. During the prevalence of the cholera, the parish has suffered very severely, and we are consequently now less able than before to build a church. Therefore we throw ourselves upon you in all hopefulness, confident that God will provide for His destitute children. Every week new companies of emigrants, our fellow-countrymen, arrive at our wharves, industrious but penniless; and we have no church provided for them, while temptations to intemperance and immorality abound in every part of our city.

In faith and prayer we send you this simple statement, may it please God to incline your hearts to help us.

CLOSING EXERCISES OF THE SIXTH TERM.

We had the pleasure of attending these most interesting exercises. Other engagements prevented us from witnessing the examinations which preceded them, but we have been assured that they were of a character which fully sustained the high reputation of the Institution.

English Compositions were first read by the Sixth Form. After this, the young gentlemen of the Junior Class read compositions in English, French, and Spanish. The members of the Middle Class then read compositions each one in English, French, Spanish, and Italian.

Although some of these exercises were marked by peculiar excellence, we prefer expressing general rather than particular commendation. We were struck with the fluent manner, and even oratorical effect, with which most of the compositions in foreign languages were delivered. But most of all we were pleased with the tone and spirit of the English compositions. Much is gained when young men are not ashamed to express publicly religious sentiments. If they are trained up to a manful profession of the faith of Christ crucified, it is to be hoped that this noblest courage will grow with their growth, and strengthen with their strength. None could have listened, and many were there to hear, to these exercises, without discerning that these were young Christians trained up in the fear of God.

After these exercises, the President made a statement of the results of the Term to the Board of Trustees. It was a most gratifying record of God's mercy in preserving this large household from sickness and death, and of faithfulness on the part of Teachers and Pupils.

After this the Sixth Form were advanced to be Juniors and robed in their college gowns. They were then addressed by the President in words of earnest affection and timely warning, and kneeling down, received his Apostolic blessing.

The exercises were fitly concluded with Prayer and the Benediction.

NEW YORK CONVENTION.

The Annual Convention of this Diocese commenced its session on Wednesday last, 26th instant, and was opened by the celebration of Divine Service in St. John's Chapel, in this city, at 10 A. M.

Morning prayer was said by Rev. Dr. Price, Rector of St. Stephen's Church, New York, assisted by Rev. Wm. Halsey, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Sing Sing, who read the lessons. The Ante-Communion Service was read by Dr. McVickar. The Epistle was read by Rev. Dr. Seabury. The Sermon was preached by Rev. J. J. Robertson, D. D., Rector of St. Anna's Church, Fishkill-Landing. The Offertory was read by Rev. Dr. Haight. The Rev. Dr. Seabury proceeded with the Communion Service to the Canon of Consecration. Rev. Dr. McVickar consecrated, and was assisted in the delivery of the elements by Rev. Drs. Creighton, Seabury, Price and Haight.

A large number of the Clergy, Lay Delegates and others received the communion.

The Convention was then called to order by the Rev. Dr. McVickar, the senior Presbyter present entitled to a seat, who took the chair for the purpose of organizing the Convention.

The list of clergy entitled to seats was then called over; and then the list of parishes. A quorum was found to be present.

Some discussion ensued on the certificate of the Delegates of St. Jude's Parish, New York, which was signed by the Senior Warden, and not by the Rector, the Rev. R. C. Shimeall. The Rev. Dr. Anthon took the ground that the certificate was sufficient, because that individual had renounced the Ministry of the Church, and was no longer the Rector. In spite, however, of his amusing earnestness to get rid of that personage, it was maintained on the other hand that he had offered his resignation as Rector, to take effect during or after the Diocesan Convention, and that his published letter in divers prints was not a canonical renunciation of the Ministry. The matter on motion was laid on the table.

On motion the ballot was dispensed with, and Rev. Dr. Creighton unanimously elected President, viva voce, who took the chair and delivered a brief but happy address.

After the reading of the rules of order, the Rev. Dr. Haight was re-elected Secretary, and Mr. C. N. S. Rowland, Treasurer, viva voce.

The several standing committees and tellers of elections were appointed by the chair.

The Rev. Dr. HIGGEE gave notice of the following resolution:—

Resolved, As the sense of this Convention, that it is the bounden duty of every Clergyman having a parochial charge in this Diocese, to present annually to his congregation the subject of the several Diocesan Charities specified in Sec. 4 of Canon XV. in such manner as may best tend to procure the contributions for the support of such charities required by the Canon.

On motion, it was ordered that the proposed amendment to article 3d of the Constitution, relative to Lay Members, pending from the last preceding meeting of the Convention, be made the special order for to-morrow, immediately after the regular business shall have been disposed of.

The Rev. Dr. SHERWOOD moved that the resolution relative to the case of the Right Rev. B. T. ONDERDONK, submitted by him at the last Convention, be made the special order of the day, immediately after the special order relative to Lay Members shall have been disposed of, which was agreed to. The resolution—which follows a lengthy preamble, in which the facts of the case are recited,—is as follows:—

Resolved, That the Standing Committee of the Diocese of New York be requested to present forth with an Address to the House of Bishops, asking them to terminate at once the sentence of suspension, inflicted by them, upon the Right Rev. B. T. Onderdonk:—or, if unprepared to do this, and thinking the honor and purity of the Church not yet sufficiently vindicated, to request them to specify on what terms or at what time said sentence of suspension shall cease.

The Rev. Dr. ANTHON gave notice of the following resolution, viz:—

Resolved, That until effectual and permanent provision be made for the supply of Episcopal services, the Standing Committee be and they are hereby directed by the Convention to invite, in its own name and authority, the performance of such Episcopal acts, for or within the Diocese, as may be necessary, by Bishops of this Church who were not members of the Court which tried the Right Rev. B. T. ONDERDONK; and that the expenses of such services shall be paid out of the income of the Episcopal fund.

Applications for the admission of the following new Churches were presented and received, viz: St. Thomas' Church, at Armenia, Dutchess Co.; Transfiguration Church, New York; Grace Church, Brooklyn Heights; Christ Church, North Brooklyn.

The Convention then adjourned to meet this morning at half-past 9 o'clock.

SECOND DAY.

Diocese of New York.—At half-past nine o'clock yesterday, the Convention met pursuant to adjournment. Morning prayer was read by the Rev. STEPHEN DOUGLASS, of Bloomingdale, and the Rev. SHELDON DAVIS, missionary at Clinton, Dutchess county, read the lessons. The Rev. WM. CREIGHTON, D. D., of Christ Church, Tarrytown, the presiding officer, called the Convention to order, and the Rev. BENJ. J. HAIGHT, D. D., Secretary to the Convention, proceeded to read the minutes of the previous day which were corrected and approved. A number of Lay Delegates then presented certificates, which being approved, they answered to their names and took their seats.

An application from Calvary Church, Williamsburgh, was presented, and referred to the Committee on the Incorporation of Churches. The report of the Committee on the Incorporation of Churches was read by the Hon. SAMUEL JONES, and was in favor of the admission of the following churches into the Diocese:—

Church of the Intercession, Carmansville, New York; Transfiguration, Twenty-fourth street, New York; Mediator, New York city. (On the vote being taken for the admission of this church, Mr. JONES remarked to the Convention that the majority of the Rectors in this city were in favor of the admission) Grace Church, Brooklyn Heights; Christ Church, North Brooklyn; St. James the Less, Scarsdale; St. Thomas Church, Armenia, Dutchess Co.; Calvary Church, Williamsburgh, King's Co. On motion, these churches were severally admitted unanimously into union with the Convention.

The Lay Delegates from these parishes respectively presented their certificates, which were approved, and the Delegates were admitted to seats in the Convention. Rev. FRANCIS L. HAWKS, D. D., Rector of the Church of the Mediator, and Rev. Dr. VINTON, of Grace Church, Brooklyn Heights, were then admitted to seats in the Convention.

On motion, the Annual Address of the Bishop was postponed.

The next business of the Convention was the election of the Standing Committee. The President stated that the mode was by ballot.

The Rev. L. P. W. BALCH, of St. Bartholomew's Church, moved that the vote by ballot be dispensed with, and that the election be made viva voce, in order to save time. Mr. BALCH said he made this motion inasmuch as opposition to this motion could only come from the minority of this Convention, with whom he had the honor to be classed.

The motion was adopted, and the Standing Committee of last year was elected as follows:

Clergy.

Rev. WILLIAM BERRIAN, D. D.
Rev. JOHN McVICKAR, D. D.
Rev. BENJAMIN I. HAIGHT, D. D.
Rev. SAMUEL SEABURY, D. D.

Lay.

Hon. SAMUEL JONES.
Hon. MURRAY HOFFMAN.
Hon. GULIAN C. VERPLANCK.
FLOYD SMITH, Esq.

Mr. Harrison, delegate from Trinity, was elected delegate to the General Convention, and Messrs. Murray Hoffman and Abel T. Anderson, Provisional Delegates.

The Missionary Committee of last year was re-elected, substituting Rev. Dr. Higbee for Rev. E. N. Mead, resigned.

Rev. Richard Cox read the report of the Missionary Committee. Five missionaries had resigned. Eight had been appointed. Three new stations had been taken upon the list, making 34 stations, with 28 missionaries. The balance on hand at last year's report was $382.56; collections and subscriptions, $3,066.21; total means for the year, $3,448.77; paid printing, &c., $13.50; paid to missionaries, $3,150.56; balance on hand, $284.71. But there is owing to missionaries for salary on the 1st of October, $1622.50, leaving a deficiency of $1337.79.

Mr. Cox then brought forward a resolution, of which he gave notice yesterday, calling for a special collection in every church in the month of October, to relieve the committee from embarrassment.

On motion of Rev. Mr. VINTON, of Brooklyn, a special report, presented to the last Convention, but not read at the time, was now read by Dr. Haight. It exonerated the Missionary Committee from charges of partiality which had been made against them.

The report was accepted and the resolutions adopted.

The report of the Society for the promotion of Religion and Learning, was read by Rev. Dr. McVICKAR. This report was withdrawn on motion of the Hon. J. C. SPENCER, as irregular.

The report of the Trustees of the Episcopal Fund was read by the Secretary of the Convention. The amount of the disposable fund was the same as last year, $67,500. $37,000 more were out at 7 per cent. interest, and $30,000 at 6 per cent. Received during the year, in donations, interest, &c., with a balance on hand last year, $14,926.97. Paid Dr. Onderdonk $2500. Bishop Delancey $500, and Bishop Whittingham $1100, for Episcopal services in the Diocese. Balance now on hand $590.57.

Rev. Mr. Bedell asked for information respecting the difference between the accumulating and disposable Episcopal funds; and intimated that he understood that the former could not be touched, but must increase until it reached $30,000, while the latter was available for current expenses. The view was accepted as the correct one.

The report of the Trustees of the Fund for Aged and Infirm Clergymen, was read by the Secretary.

The receipts for the year were $4189.96; expenditures $3085; balance on hand $1104. Eight clergymen were recipients from the fund.

The report of the Standing Committee on the Treasurer's report was read by the Secretary of the Convention. It contained nothing of general importance.

The report of the Standing Committee on the Theological Seminary was read by Dr. Haight. It stated that there were 51 students in the institution, and that they had nothing further to report.

The report of the Standing Committee on the Diocesan Fund was not in, and therefore postponed till evening.

One or two special reports were called for, and then the Convention proceeded to the miscellaneous business before them, whereupon, Rev. Dr. HIGBEE presented the following resolution, of which he had given notice on the previous (the first) day of the Convention.

Resolved, As the sense of this Convention, that it is the bounden duty of every Clergyman having a parochial charge in this Diocese, to present annually to his congregation the subject of the several diocesan charities specified in Sec. 4 of Canon XV., in such manner as may best tend to procure the contributions for the support of such charities required by the Canon.

After a long and animated discussion on this Resolution, the Hon. J. C. SPENCER said that the plan which he would propose to the Convention to pursue, was:—

1st. To lay the pending resolutions on the table.
2d. To reconsider the vote by which the Committee in question had been elected.

3d. That the Chairman appoint a Committee of five, informally, to report the names of a Missionary Committee.

These propositions were severally put in the form of motions, seconded by Dr. HIGBEE, and agreed to by the Convention.

SPECIAL ORDER.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the special order of the day, being the proposed amendment to the third Act of the Constitution, providing that the Lay Delegates to the Diocesan Conventions "shall be communicants," and shall not exceed three in number.

Rev. Mr. VAN KLEECK desired to submit the following resolution:—

Resolved, That the further consideration of the subject be postponed until we have a Bishop to preside over the Convention.

Rev. Dr. VINTON rose to order. No question could be in order but the rejection or adoption of the amendment.

The President sustained the point of order, but subsequently the gentleman was, by unanimous consent, allowed to proceed.

A question of order, relative to the admissibility of any proposition other than the direct question upon the pending amendment, was again raised and discussed.

Dr. VINTON maintained that the 8th article of the Constitution left no alternative to the Convention, but the direct vote upon the final adoption or rejection.

Hon. LUTHER BRADISH denied this position. The article referred to, declared that the Convention may at the session following that upon which an amendment is approved, take the final vote, but that it does not make such a course imperative.

Dr. VINTON expressed the hope that the proposed indirect method of defeating the amendment would not be adopted, but that the Convention would consent to come up at once to the final vote.

The PRESIDENT having reviewed his previous decision upon the point of order, the question was stated upon the proposition submitted by Rev. Mr. VAN KLEECK.

The Rev. ISAAC PARDEE proceeded to advocate the proposed amendment and to answer the objections urged against it by its opponents, and had not concluded when the Convention, at ten minutes past 3 o'clock, took a recess until 7 o'clock, P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention assembled at 7 o'clock, when, after further discussion, the Rev. Mr. Van Kleeck's motion was adopted, by the following vote. CLERGY, Ayes 62, Noes 48; LAITY, Ayes 76, Noes 28.

The Rev. Dr. Higbee gave notice of the following Resolution, to be offered as a substitute for Dr. Sherwood's Resolution.

Whereas, The House of Bishops, and the House of clerical and lay delegates in the General Convention of 1847, passed a canon in the words following: "Whenever the penalty of suspension shall be inflicted on a Bishop, Priest or Deacon in this Church, the sentence shall specify on what terms, or at what time the penalty shall cease"—and whereas the Diocese and Diocesan of New York have been, for a long time, under disabilities which it was the design of the Canon to prevent in future,—Therefore, Resolved, the Standing Committee be requested to present at an early day, an address to the House of Bishops praying that venerable body to adopt such measures as may render the wise provisions of the said Canon of 1847 available to the relief of our diocese, so that the objects may be accomplished, of the unanimous prayer of the Convention addressed to the General Convention of 1847.

The Convention adjourned at 11½ o'clock.

THIRD DAY.

The Convention assembled this morning at 9 o'clock; Prayers were read by Rev. R. Shaw of Philipstown. Rev. A. H. Partidge of Bedford, Westchester Co., reading the lessons.

The Convention was called to order by the President, Rev. Dr. Creighton. Rev. Benjamin Haight, Secretary, read the minutes of the preceding day, which were approved of. The names of the absent members were called over.

The reports of the Standing Committees, the Committee on the Treasurer's Report, and the Committee on the Diocesan Fund were not prepared.

Rev. Dr. Taylor read the following amendment of the 3d article of the Constitution:

"The Convention shall be composed of the officiating Presbyters, who are regularly admitted and settled in some Church which shall either have been in union with this Convention for at least one year, or else shall be the owner of an edifice for the public worship of Almighty God, duly consecrated, or ready for consecration, according to the order of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America; or, who are employed as Missionaries under the direction of this Convention; or, who are engaged as Professors, or Instructors of youth in some College, Academy, or General Seminary of Learning, duly incorporated and situate within this Diocese. And of Lay Delegates, who shall be communicants, not exceeding three from every such Church, to be chosen by the Vestry or by the Congregation. No person who is a candidate for Holy Orders shall be eligible as a Lay Delegate to the Convention. But no Minister, or Church, who, or which, at the adoption of this article, is entitled to a seat in the Convention, shall be excluded therefrom, by reason of the alteration of the former 3d Article of the Constitution, provided, in the case of a Minister, he continue in the same parish with which he was connected at the adoption of this Article."

The Rev. Mr. Richmond moved the article be amended by substituting the word "Ministers" for "Presbyters."

The postponement of the question was moved by Rev. Mr. Weaver, of West-Troy, Albany Co., till the Convention have a Bishop to preside over its deliberations.

The Rev. Dr. Henry offered the following.

Resolved, That the 3d article of the Constitution be repealed and in place thereof the following be substituted:

The Convention shall be composed of all clergymen in good standing canonically resident in the Diocese, and of lay members consisting of not more than three delegates from each church in union with the Convention, to be chosen by the Vestry or Congregation. Such delegates to possess the qualifications for admission to Holy Communion prescribed by the Rubric at the end of the office of Confirmation.

Rev. Mr. Van Kleeck of West-Troy, made a motion that the whole question be referred to a Special Committee to report at next Convention.

The Rev. Mr. Cox moved that the whole business be laid on the table—he would move that it be postponed till the next Convention but that would only give cause for more debate. The motion was carried.

The report of the Committee on Nominations appointed yesterday, and of which Rev. J. C. SPENCER is Chairman, was read. The following were nominated the Missionary Committee for the year: Of the clergy—Rev. Mr. R. Cox, Chairman; Rev. Drs. Balch and Taylor, and Rev. Messrs. Lot, Jones and Richmond. Of the Laity—C. N. S. Rowland, Stewart Brown, E. H. Dunham, and Cornelius Oakley, Esqs. and Capt. W. A. Spencer.

The question on the above nominations was put to the vote, when they were confirmed.

The subjoined resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That it be recommended to the Missionary Committee in their appointment of Missionaries to vacant situations, to select the persons who shall be recommended to them by the members of our Church residing at such stations.

The Resolution of the Rev. Dr. Sherwood now came before the Convention.

A point of order was here raised upon the question of the Convention taking up the resolution of Dr. Sherwood. It had not been taken up by the last Convention, but referred over to the action of the present one.

Rev. Dr. Higbee said, that when the resolution came up he intended his as a substitute for it.

Dr. Whitehouse submitted some resolutions, and would adopt the preamble of Dr. Sherwood, with slight alterations; he proposed that if the sentence were removed, they should call upon Bishop Onderdonk to resign; that he should receive the sum of $2,000 per annum, payable quarterly, during the term of his natural life, and, in the event of his decease, the Convention should pay to his widow $1,000 per annum.

The meeting then (3 o'clock) adjourned till seven o'clock in the evening, and Dr. Whitehouse's resolutions were ordered to be printed.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention assembled in the evening at 7 o'clock, the motion of Dr. Whitehouse, presented previous to the adjournment, and which is intended as a substitute to Rev. Dr. Higbee's resolution, coming up first in order.

As the resolution of Dr. Whitehouse was not yet ready, the report of the Standing Committee was read by the Secretary. From it we glean the following details: Episcopal services of Bishop Whittingham in the Diocese of New York:

Confirmations, at 89 places, 1,348; Ordinations, 12 deacons, 11 priests; Consecrations, 5 churches; laid corner stones, 2; administered sacrament 25 times; preached 102 sermons; other addresses, 88; travelled 3,650 miles; married 1 couple.

Indisposition having prevented Bishop Doane from performing duty in this Diocese, no report was received from him.

The following deaths have occurred among the Ministry of the Diocese of New York; Revs. John A. Brown, Major A. Nickerson, William Powell, Richard Salmon, Hugh Smith, Thomas Warner, D.D.

The number of candidates for the ministry amount to 38.

The report contained some minor details of but little importance.

Dr. WHITEHOUSE rose to speak on his resolution. He requested leave to withdraw the last three resolutions, and present the first. "I was induced to the step by my own convictions of what was necessary. I simply propose this resolution, that the House may be induced to make the request to the Bishop that he may resign."

The question was called for on the resolution, when it was decided in the negative by a viva voce vote.

Rev. Dr. HAWKS rose to move a reconsideration of the vote, as there were some objections to the manner of voting, it being uncertain whether the question was decided in the negative or affirmative. The motion was decided in the affirmative, when the House proceeded to take the vote by calling the names.

A discussion here arose upon the subject of a reconsideration of the vote taken upon Rev. Mr. W.'s resolution.

Rev. Mr. Cox's motion that the rule of order requiring a two-thirds vote be suspended, was adopted.

The House, by general consent, took up the resolution of Dr. W. for action. All further debate was precluded, when the following vote was taken: AYES—Clergy, 30; Laity, 44. NOES—Clergy, 98; Laity, 70.

The resolution was declared lost.

Rev. Dr. HIGBEE's resolution now came up before the Convention for its decision.

Rev. Mr. RICHMOND rose to say that he would consider the vote of the Convention on this resolution as final and decisive.

The following is the vote on Rev. Dr. Higbee's resolution.

AYES.	NOES.
Clergy..... 91	Clergy..... 36
Laity..... 69	Laity..... 46

Hon. LUTHER BRADISH said that he rose for the purpose of offering to this body a paper containing the views of the minority. He said, we protest, in that paper, against the act consummated by the vote just passed.*

Hon. JOHN C. SPENCER raised a question of reception of the gentleman's protest; it is the first time in this body a protest has been presented by the minority. It was wrong to give a one-sided representation to posterity. There was only one way of doing—that of immediately rejecting it. He desired to know would the House consider the motion. If the gentlemen were allowed to place it upon the journal, they would have counter documents from the majority, and so those disputes would go down to posterity, a disgrace upon the doings of the Convention.

Rev. Dr. HENRY desired to know at whose request the protest was presented, when Hon. L. Bradish replied that it would be best known by the names appended to it being read.

The question on the reception of the protest was voted on and decided as follows:

AYES—Clergy, 29; Laity, 29. NOES—Clergy, 84; Laity, 61.

Some further business of but little importance was transacted, when on motion

A vote of thanks was presented to the President for his praiseworthy conduct while in the chair.

It was resolved that 2,000 copies of a journal of proceedings of the Convention be printed under the direction of the Secretary.

A motion of J. C. SPENCER, that the Convention adjourn sine die was unanimously adopted. The Secretary proceeded to read the minutes of the last session, after which the Gloria was chanted by the assembly, and the prayers read by the President, who declared that the Convention stood adjourned, the closing session having lasted till 11 o'clock.

We are informed in a letter from a friend in New York, that the Standing Committee of that diocese have unanimously agreed to invite the Bishop of New Hampshire to perform Episcopal functions therein for three months.

From late English Papers.

FORM OF PRAYER AGAINST CHOLERA.

The following is a special form of Prayer to be used in all churches and chapels throughout England and Ireland on Sunday next, and to be continued during the prevalence of the Cholera:

"O Almighty God and Father, whose power no creature is able to resist, and in whose hand are the issues of life and death; look down, we beseech thee, from heaven, thy dwelling-place, upon us thine unworthy servants, who turn to thee, their only refuge, in this season of sickness and great mortality. We confess, O Lord, that we have not deserved to be free from that visitation of thy wrath which has afflicted other nations on the earth. We acknowledge with shame and contrition that we have shown ourselves unthankful for many special mercies vouchsafed to us, and have not made that return for our national blessings which thou mightest justly require at our hands. We have departed from thy commandments; we have followed too much the things of this present world; and in our prosperity we have not sufficiently honored thee, the Author and Giver of it all. If thou wert to deal with us after our sins, or reward us according to our iniquities, we could not stand in thy sight. But thou hast revealed thyself unto us as a God of mercy and forgiveness toward those who confess their unworthiness, and turn to thee in repentance and prayer. When Israel had provoked thee to wrath, and thousands fell by the destroying pestilence, thou didst stay the sword of the avenging angel, when the purpose of thy judgment was fulfilled.—When the men of Nineveh repented of their iniquity, thou didst lay aside the fierceness of thine anger, and sparedst the guilty city, when thou sawest that they turned from their evil way. And now, O Lord, we entreat thee after thy rich mercy to grant unto us thine afflicted servants the like spirit of repentance, that thou mayest withdraw thy chastisements from our land, and stay the plague and grievous sickness, which is abroad making many desolate. May the judgments which thou hast sent work in us a more lively faith, a more entire obedience, a more earnest desire to conform to thy will, and to advance thy glory.—Make us duly sensible of thy goodness in maintaining the domestic tranquillity of our land, in preserving us from intestine commotions, and in granting a plentiful return to the labor of our husbandmen. Teach us to show our thankfulness for these mercies, by an increasing desire to relieve distress, to remove all occasions of discontent and murmurings, and to promote goodwill and concord among ourselves. And may the frequent instances of mortality which we have beheld remind us of the nearness of death, and dispose us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom; that, whether living or dying, we may be found faithful disciples of Him who has taken away the sting of death, and opened the gate of everlasting life to all believers. Hear us, O Lord, for thy goodness is great; and according to the multitude of thy mercies receive these our petitions, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

DIED on the 6th inst., at Brahan Castle, near Dingwall, Ross-shire, Right Rev. the Bishop of Norwich. The Rev. Prelate was only ill for a short time, but his malady fatally terminated in a congestion of the brain. The deceased was the second son of Sir T. J. Stanley, of Alderley, Cheshire, and was born in 1779, so that he was seventy years of age. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He was formerly rector of Alderley, and was appointed Bishop of Norwich, in 1837. He was also Clerk of the Closet to the Queen, President of the Linnæan Society, and one of the commissioners appointed in 1848 to inquire into the state of the British Museum. He was greatly beloved and respected by all classes in his diocese in consequence of his exertions in promoting education, and in supporting charitable institutions of every description. He was married in 1810 to the daughter of Rev. Oswald Leycester, by whom he leaves a large family. He was the author of the "Familiar History of British Birds," a work which has acquired an extensive circulation.

Accounts from Rome to the 4th inst. represent the state of affairs there and at Gaeta as most unfavorable, and that a crisis was expected.

We referred last week to the appeal from which we give an extract below. It is of great practical importance that this case should be fully presented to the public. There is much wrong done, innocently and ignorantly we hope, by those who are engaged in efforts for good ends.

Not unfrequently our charity injures one class, while it benefits another; or, to use a common expression, it is only "robbing Peter to pay Paul."

APPEAL OF THE JOURNEYMEN BOOKBINDERS OF LONDON AND WESTMINSTER TO THE COMMITTEE, MEMBERS, DONORS, AND SUBSCRIBERS, OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY, AND THE RELIGIOUS PUBLIC IN GENERAL, ON THE SUBJECT OF CHEAP BIBLES.

"Ye offer polluted bread upon mine altar, and ye say, wherein have we polluted thee?"—Mal., chap. i., ver. 7.

"And I will come near you in judgment; and I will be a swift witness against the sorcerers, and against the adulterers, and against the false swearers, and against those that oppress the hireling in his wages, the widow and the fatherless, and they that turn the stranger from his right, and fear not me, saith the Lord of Hosts."—Mal., chap. iii., ver. 5.

"What mean ye that beat my people in pieces, and grind the faces of the poor? saith the Lord of Hosts."—Isa., chap. iii., ver. 15.

"Whoso stoppeth his ears to the cry of the poor, he shall also cry himself, but shall not be heard."—Prov., chap. xi., ver. 13.

"The righteous considereth the cause of the poor, but the wicked regardeth not to know it."—Prov., chap. xxix., ver. 7.

The following extract gives a striking illustration. A large class of poor females are cut down in their insufficient wages to enable a rich society to distribute cheap Bibles. The Appeal, after showing that the cheap rate at which these books are afforded results from the low cost of binding, goes on to show, that the reduction is made chiefly in the wages of females.

The wages reduced are those of the females. Previous to the contract being entered into in 1844, the contractress, Miss Watkins, in conjunction with the other binders who, previous to that event, bound for the British and Foreign Bible Society, in a printed circular to the "Subscribers and Friends of the British and Foreign Bible Society," dated March 15th, 1843, put forth in consequence of a complaint of reduction of wages at that time, stated that the wages of her women should be paid "solely on time work," and should average "from 7s. 6d. to 15s. weekly for ten hours' work per day." The circular further expressed that the reason for stating publicly the wages intended to be given at "time work" was to "prevent any erroneous impressions now in circulation" respecting the British and Foreign Bible Society, "reducing the price of binding their Bibles and Testaments, and thereby oppressing their work people."

The wages here stated, from 7s. 6d. to 15s. give a medium of 11s. 3d.; but as there might be a less number considered able to earn the higher amount, it may fairly be taken to mean an average of 10s. per week: day, ten hours.

This we at the time contended was more than could be earned at the prices as then paid by the "piece" for the work which drew forth the circular, from which the above is extracted.

After the contract was entered into, time-work was discontinued, and a scale of prices of which an extract is given below was paid, the average earnings at which range from 5s. 6d. to 6s. per week, day ten hours. Indeed, we are informed, that it will require more than ten hours to make this average; however, taking it at ten hours, it gives an immense reduction. The learners, of whom there are now between fifty and sixty, and who have been as many as ninety, average from 2s. to 2s. 6d. per week in the same number of hours. This number of learners is always kept up; they serve eighteen months, and are paid half what they earn. As this number would supply many more than the contractress could employ, they are, for the most part, discharged when they come out of their time, to make room for more.

This reduction in wages, however, appears to have been made with an eye to what had been stated in print to the "Subscribers and Friends of the British and Foreign Bible Society," for we are informed that while the prices for the bulk of the work are reduced so as to give only the above average, some work is paid for the same as in the trade generally, excepting shops where cheap Bibles are bound. At any time, therefore, should the earnings of the women be called in question, it is possible on this work to produce weekly earnings which would be in accordance with the printed statement; and we have no doubt that such will be shown, in contradiction—perhaps the wages of a quick "learner"—to what we have here expressed. Nor is it wanting in the charity which thinketh no evil to suppose this, for a similar course was pursued on a former occasion.

As there is a rule in the shop that no woman shall be kept who does not earn 6s. per week—which rule, however, is not strictly acted upon—the above average will show the extent of the reduction by the very means taken to conceal it. But it often happens that some of the women do not earn anything near this amount; and as this rule might at any time be put in force, it is a common thing for those who earn less, in order to bring their bills up to the required sum, to borrow a job from those who have earned more, lest they should be discharged for earning less than the amount prescribed.

Within the last three months, we understand that this rule has been changed from 6s. to 7s. Why this change is made, seeing there is no advance in prices, we do not pretend to understand. For the last four or five years, however, the contractress, by threatening discharge to those who could not earn 6s. per week, has acknowledged, by the very act, that many could not, at her prices, earn that sum. Yet in the circular referred to, it is stated that 7s. 6d. per week, "time-work, day ten hours," shall be the lowest wages paid to women in her establishment. This rule, therefore, appears to us to be a complete acknowledgment that her promise on that occasion is entirely broken. Exactness in the women's work is indispensable, the margin of many of the Bibles and Testaments being small. There is also a system of fines in that shop unknown in the trade, some of which are for not finding out a fault in the work done by another—for example, the sewer is fined if she does not see and point out the leaving out of a sheet, or part of a sheet, by the collator—for not pointing out the sheet so left out, the fine is 1s.; the inside of the sheet (inset) 6d. Any binder to whom this statement may be referred will see, from these fines and their amount, that while the price is low, the greatest exactness is required not only in matters which relate to their own work, but to that of others; making the low price, by increasing the care and consequently the time required, still lower.

The female labour in the roan binding, gilt edges, is more than half the labour required thereon. There has been no reduction in the wages of the men's labour on this work (roan stamped). For, although they are paid by the piece (instead of time-work, as promised by the circular of March 15th, 1843,) at about the same rate; of which we complained on a former occasion, the work now is in quality of a much lower description, making these wages adequate. Were this work of the quality formerly required by that Society, or as that now done for the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, a reduction of about fifty per cent. in the men's wages would be the immediate result.

But it is not only in the binding of this Society that wages are reduced to make Bibles cheap. The cheapness of the Bibles thus obtained by the Society induces low wages in the shops that bind for the other vendors of Bibles; extending, in these, to the wages of the men as well as to those of the women. For example, the contractress of this Society also binds for other vendors of cheap Bibles, and the wages of the women are even less for the work of these vendors than for this Society;—for instance, instead of 2d. folding 100 sheets Pearl Bible and Diamond Testament, but 1½d. is paid, 12½ per cent. less. The wages of the men also are less, on this book, by about 12½ per cent., than for the Society. And in other shops, where there is no other work done by the employer to make up for the low price of the "cheap Bibles," the reduction of wages required is so great as to scarcely allow the employment of adult labour at all.

In some a succession of apprentices and learners is continually kept up, who, as soon as they are out of their time, are got rid of to make room for the same amount of less paid labour, as without it the work could not be done at all at the price necessary to compete with the British and Foreign Bible Society. Thus is the female labour reduced in value by the continual increase in their numbers, with all the evils and demoralisation attendant upon insufficient wages, by the very act of supplying cheaply the Word of Life, which denounces with its heaviest curse the depriving the labourer of his hire, and all the course which lead to departures from piety and virtue.

It is a melancholy circumstance that the female labour should contribute to make the Bible cheap. Females often have not the power to plead their cause in such matters; and, being helpless in many respects where their wages are concerned, they are trodden down until a state of things, such as described in the Song of the Shirt, appals the mind with the enormity of their injuries, their suffering, and their moral condition.

We are quite aware that there is no necessary connection between unchastity and poverty; for the most striking instances of female virtue are to be found where poverty and temptation are the most extreme, and of vice where there is neither poverty nor temptation. These, however, represent the extremes of virtue and of vice. But all things being equal it must be allowed; for instances incontestible, and, alas, almost innumerable, have been adduced of the wives of the seducer having had greater potency from insufficient wages;—of those who have fallen from the paths of virtue, who, humanly speaking, would not have been so degraded had they been able to obtain a sufficient subsistence from their labour. And, in addition to the many cases that have been mentioned of this description, we fear that some can be adduced from the shop of the contractress of the British and Foreign Bible Society, of females who attribute their first departure from the paths of virtue to the insufficient wages paid in that establishment.

Should it still be urged that there is no necessary connection between the two, we reply neither is there between poverty and stealing; but the following passage of Holy Writ will show how the one influences the other: "Give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with the food convenient for me, lest I be full and deny thee, and say, who is the Lord? or lest I be poor and steal, and take the name of the Lord in vain."—Prov. xxx. 8, 9.

MASSACHUSETTS.—CONSECRATION.

St. Mary's Church, Dorchester, was consecrated to the worship of Almighty God, on Thursday the 20th instant, by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Eastburn. We expected to have received a particular account of the services of this occasion, together with a full description of the church, but have been disappointed.

The sentence of consecration was read by the Rev. Dr. Wayland. Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. Mr. Brewer, of Newport, R. I., assisted by the Rev. Mr. Slafter, who read the Psalter, and the Rev. Dr. Crosswell, who read the Lessons. The Ante Communion Service was said by the Bishop, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Withington, who read the Epistle. The Psalm and Hymn were given out by the Rector, the Rev. Mr. Porter. The sermon was preached by the Bishop.

This church is built of wood, in the Gothic order of architecture, and is a very neat structure, erected at a cost of about five thousand dollars, exclusive of the lot. It has an open timber roof, open seats, which will accommodate about three hundred persons; the pulpit and reading desk stand without and on either side of the chancel.

The services of the consecration were attended by upwards of twenty of the clergy, and a very large and attentive congregation.

The lot on which this church has been erected, was the gift of a lady of Christ Church, in this city. We hope this example of Christian charity may not be lost upon many, to whom God has given the means, to do much in honour of His great name, by the erection and endowment of churches.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

BISHOP CHASE.—We are pained to learn, that the Rt. Rev. Bishop of New Hampshire is confined to his bed by a severe attack of inflammatory fever, which will necessarily postpone his usual Fall visitation of the parishes in his diocese.—Inquirer.

AN INDECORUM.

MR. EDITOR:—We often observe an indecorum in our churches, deserving of being pointed out, and needing to be put an end to. I refer to the very common habit which some of our people have, of coming up to the chancel, as soon as the services are ended, and holding conversation there with the clergy. Surely this is all wrong. We observed this done frequently on the clergyman's passage from the altar or pulpit to the vestry-room, in cases where the arrangement is such that he must pass along the usual way by which the congregation go out. In these cases, it is the minister's own fault; since he ought to know better than to hurry out of the pulpit or chancel, (as many do,) as soon as the blessing is given. The proper course for the clergy is to resume their seats in the pulpit or chancel, as the case may be, after they have made their secret devotions, on the conclusion of the service, and there reverently to remain until the people have generally passed out of the church, or at least left the way clear for them. Then they will meet no one to accost them. But, even when the clergy remain thus quietly seated, inviting no conversation, and looking away from the people, (thus showing their unwillingness to be interrupted or addressed by any one,) there will be found thoughtless, (though, no doubt, well-meaning) persons to go up to the railing and speak to them. The clergy have to bear this intrusion, or to repel it in a way that may be deemed unkind and rude. It is a custom which they, generally, very much dislike; which is, for many reasons, improper; and which, certainly, is very unsuitable at such a time. If any desire to speak to the clergy, after the services are over, let them have the delicacy and the patience to wait until they have come out of the vestry-room. The vestry-room is no place to go to for such a purpose, (especially not for females,) as the clergy are unrobing there at that time

It is the minister's private room, into which none should intrude unless invited, or unless they be the officers of the parish having business there. Cannot you say a word, Mr. Editor, to draw attention to these hints? D.

Miscellaneous.

THE SELF-SUPPORTING BRIDGE AT MENAI.

If this is not the age of cathedrals, it is at least the age of bridges. Bridges seem to be the grand exception,—the one thing only which the nineteenth century can build. By the side of the builders of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries we cut, in general, but a very small figure. Even in the subsidiary arts, the mechanical departments of the science of building,—as in the mechanism, for instance, of the stone-roof, or the brilliancy of the stained glass,—we fall far short of our forefathers. In church and house-building, they showed themselves better masons, more expert joiners, more cunning carvers, and, above all, far greater and nobler designers, than we can possibly pretend to be. But bridges, and perhaps we should add lighthouses, are an exception. In striking contrast to the steady, constant, and universal deterioration which is perceptible in every other department of architecture, the art or science of bridge-building has exhibited a steadily progressive improvement. To mention, at present, only the old arch-bridge,—the strength, symmetry, and beauty of our modern arch-bridges are to be rivalled only, if at all, by the bridges of those great master-builders—the people of imperial Rome. The picturesque grotesqueness of the old Gothic bridge, the pointed arch, the narrow roadway, with its steep and winding ascent, and the irregular series of tide vents which did duty as archways were undoubtedly very beautiful, but their beauty was all their merit, and even that was not the beauty of a bridge. Yet the modern arch-bridge, with its mathematical symmetry and truth of proportion, is now far from being the masterpiece of modern bridge building.

On the narrow salt-water strait, or arm of the sea, which divides the island of Anglesea from the main land, there stands a chain suspension-bridge, the wonder of its day,—and that day only now gone by—if indeed it be gone by (for the bridge was opened only in 1826)—which swings one hundred feet clear above high-water mark, and admits ships to sail to and fro beneath it; over which two four-horse coaches abreast may be, and probably often have been, driven at full speed;—and which, for the mechanism of its construction, and its light and graceful elegance, as it rises in front of the rich wood and mountain landscape behind it, is probably as fair a specimen of one of the most wonderful works of this day—the chain suspension-bridge—as can anywhere be pointed to. But, side by side with this bridge, about a mile from it, higher up the water, the traveller upon the Holyhead road is now astonished,—as he turns back to gaze upon the Menai strait, with its chain causeway hanging firmly over it in middle air, and the magnificent range of mountains in the background,—by the apparition of stupendous square masses of masonry raising their huge tops and pillared galleries, with geometrical accuracy and solidity, over the sides of the rock, surmounted with great couchant sphinxes, or lions, wrought in the marble of the country, and reminding him more of the huge remains of Luxor or Carnac than of any handicraft of these degenerate days. Those pillars and galleries are the towers and approaches of the "tubular" or self-supporting bridge over the strait, now in process of construction for the Holyhead line of railway. And the idea of such a bridge is certainly a bold one. We believe that the great Father of History, had he lived in these days, and fallen in with such an achievement as the Britannia Bridge, would most certainly have dignified it with a special chapter in his story, and have ranked it,—together with the Thames Tunnel, the Great Western "Express," the Eddystone, Bell-rock, and Skerryvore lighthouses, the electric telegraph, and one or two more things that might be named,—among the modern wonders of the world. We may be pardoned, therefore, ourselves, as humble journalists, for devoting a single article to what we feel to be a national achievement.

The chief wonder of it, no doubt, is, that "it keeps up" without anything to support it. It relies for support between pillar and pillar, simply on the great relative strength of its material in proportion to its weight. "A solid bar of iron," "could such a thing be made, of the same length, breadth, and depth, as one of the large tubes, would not," we are informed, "even bear its own weight." But the bar or tube being hollow and inflexible, nothing could bring it down which did not absolutely break it in two, top as well as bottom, a process well nigh impossible.

But the vastness of the scale on which the operations are conducted, immensely enhances their interest and importance. The height of the bridge above high-water mark is the same as that of the neighboring chain-bridge, but its length is far greater. When complete, it will present the enormous length of 1,841 feet from lion to lion, with a double square tube extended from side to side, each tube being between a quarter and a third of a mile long. Each of these tubes now consists of four separate or shorter ones, of unequal lengths, the larger divisions being 460 feet, and the smaller 230, in length. The smaller ones are built on scaffolds in the places in which they are to remain. The larger are built below, on the shore of the strait, and are floated, round and raised to their position by enormous hydraulic presses. Each of these larger tubes is so long that, "if set on end in St. Paul's Churchyard, it would stand 107 feet above the top of the cross of the Cathedral;" it weighs 1,600 tons, and contains "about ten miles of angle and T iron." When joined together into one tube, the whole of each pipe, so to say, will be one inflexible beam, resting on five supports, viz., the two abutments and three central pillars; and the ends of the pipes will be free, and will be placed on rollers, in order to allow them to travel backwards and forwards, as the weather may cause the material to expand or contract. And such will be the security of the whole, when thus knitted together and supported, that we are assured that each of the larger pipes might be cut asunder in the midst, without causing the least deflection or danger.

Such is, or will be, the Britannia Bridge, so called, not from preconceived reference to "the British Lion," but because the rock or island on which the central tower is built is, and has long been known as the Britannia rock. The bridge is now half-finished, and one of the larger tubes is across; while the success of the same principle in the bridge of like character, but smaller dimensions, at Conway, is a sufficient guarantee of its success. The interest taken in it is, as may be supposed, very great, hundreds of visitors being admitted gratuitously every day to all parts of the works. And we may here remark that the company, if they would only levy a tax of 6d. or even 3d. a head on their visitors, which they might most justly do, would probably defray half the expenses of the bridge. We do not, however, wish to throw any discouragement upon the general feeling felt for the work. In other countries the "public" have been amusing themselves with building barricades, and shooting each other from behind them; it is well that we build something else here. Let us continue so to do. Let us happily direct our energies and bestow our sympathies on somewhat nobler buildings, and greater and more worthy achievements, than those which have made the rest of Europe infamous. "Hec nobis erunt artes;" other paths are followed elsewhere: we shall see, in the long run, which will answer best.—London Guardian.

Obituary.

For the Banner of the Cross.

In Jacksonville, Ala. Sept. 18th, departed this life George Frederick, son of John D. and Anna M. Hoke, of the above place, aged 12 years, 11 months and 14 days.

Though young in years, and early called to a better world, his life has not been without instruction. Especially in his last short illness, he has given a lesson of patiently enduring pain; for under the most excruciating torture, (caused by some affection of the ankle bone, and which finally separated his spirit from this world,) he would only give vent to a suppressed groan and say, "O, why does it hurt so," while his whole countenance gave evidence that he was suffering almost intolerable pain.

He patiently endured his sufferings from a sense of duty, because, as he often said, he "knew it was right that it should be so." For the last four or five months of his life, I never knew one so young, if of any age, who was governed so much by a sense of duty. He was fearful of sin; and if at all doubtful whether an act was right or wrong, he always deferred doing it until he had satisfied himself by asking. And if at any time he was tempted to a departure from duty, he did not suffer himself to sleep until he had confessed it.

May we all have grace in like manner to bear chastisements sent by a merciful Father, and, be as fearful of sin which alone will deprive us of His favor and blessings.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

The Publishers have been kindly favored with the following recommendations from the clergy and others, who have examined this edition.

"I have spent some time in examining your beautiful edition of the Prayer Book, and comparing it with the standard set forth by the last General Convention. The result has been my conviction of its excellence, and of its correctness in every particular. So far as I can see, it is absolutely faultless. The beauty of its typographical execution will speak for itself. I join most cheerfully with my clerical brethren of this city, in recommending it, and in wishing it extensive patronage."

HENRY W. DUCACHET,
Rector of St. Stephen's Church.

"It is indeed a very superb book. The paper is excellent, the type large and clear, the engravings with which it is embellished very fine, the binding in keeping with the rest, and the execution and finish of the whole as perfect, we suppose, as the present state of the art of book making will allow, and certainly sufficiently so to please the most fastidious eye. We do not know what more can be desired."—Banner of the Cross.

"It gives me sincere pleasure to recommend Messrs. Appleton's new edition of the Book of Common Prayer as the most elegant and correct which has ever been published."

JOHN COLEMAN,
Rector of Trinity Church, Philadelphia.

"The edition of the Common Prayer, printed in various sizes by the Messrs. Appletons, demands the confidence and patronage of Churchmen."

COLLEGE OF ST. JAMES,

Washington county, Maryland.

The eighth session will open on Monday, October 1st, on which day the punctual attendance of all the students is requested. The duties of the classes are promptly recommenced, and it is very important that all their members, new or old, should take their places at the opening of the session.

The academical year extends from the 1st of October to the 1st of August; there being but one vacation, August and September.

In the COLLEGE, all the usual classes under a full corps of Professors, have for several years been pursuing the entire course of collegiate studies equal to that prescribed in the older colleges of the north. At the recent Commencement, the third graduating class received their academical degrees.

In the GRAMMAR SCHOOL, which immediately adjoins the college, the preparatory classes are carefully trained by competent instructors under the supervision of the Professors of the College. Thus pupils may enter the Institution at an early age and pursue their entire course of study under the same direction until they graduate. The mercantile department embraces those partial members of any of the collegiate or preparatory classes, who may be preparing for the counting-room or other non-professional life. Such students are admitted to all the privileges and advantages of their several classes, substituting in place of some of the classical studies, such as are more necessary as a preparation for business.

French is a regular study without extra charge in all the classes. In addition to the French, the mercantile students will be taught, without charge, German or some other modern language.

The location of the College is perfectly healthful; and there are no towns or villages near to present the temptations so dangerous to the young. Moral and religious education is one chief design of the Institution. The charge, covering all academical and domestic expenses, is $225 per session of ten months. The rules of the college carefully restrict any other expenses of the student.

All the departments are under the immediate supervision of the undersigned, to whom application may be made for copies of the "Register" of the college and for further information, as well as for the admission of pupils.

PENNSYLVANIA.

ORDINATION.—On Wednesday morning, the 3d instant, in St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, the Rev. Joel Rudderow, Rector elect of the parish of Bloomsburg, Pa., was admitted to the Holy Order of Priests by the Right Rev. the Bishop of the Diocese.

Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. John A. Merrick, (of the Diocese of New Jersey,) and the remainder of the services by the Bishop, assisted in the administration of the Holy Communion by the Rev. W. H. Odenheimer, Rector of the parish, and the Rev. Rees C. Evans.

The discourse, mainly upon the principle involved in the words of the Gospel, "Ye are the salt of the earth," was delivered by the Bishop from the altar.

The Rev. candidate was presented by the Rev. O. Evans Shannon, Rector of the Church of the Crucifixion, who, with the Rev. Messrs. Odenheimer and Evans, "the Priests present," concurred with the Bishop in "the laying on of hands."

We wish our young brother success in the responsible charge which he has assumed over that portion of Christ's people whither he has gone to labour.

At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, held on Tuesday, the 2d of October, instant—

Testimonials were signed on behalf of the Rev. F. S. Wiley, and the Rev. Joel Rudderow, Deacons, recommending them for admission to the Sacred Order of Priests.

Also, on behalf of Mr. George H. Walsh, recommending him for admission as a candidate for Holy Orders.

M. A. DEWOLFE HOWE,
Secretary of Standing Committee.

EPISCOPAL SERVICES.

On Tuesday, 2d October, the Bishop consecrated St. John's Church, West Hoboken. The request to consecrate was read by the Rev. Mr. Reynolds, the officiating minister, and the sentence of consecration by the Rev. Mr. Walton, (of the diocese of New York.) The Rev. Messrs. Henderson and Watson read morning prayers. The Bishop preached, examined the children after they had been catechised by the Rev. Mr. Reynolds, and administered the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Barry. There were also present, the Rev. Messrs. Adams, Clarkson, Mahan, Rosé, the Rev. Messrs. Pound, Diller, Wells and Peters, and the Rev. Mr. Benedict, (of the diocese of Ohio.)

In the afternoon, in St. Paul's Church, Hoboken, the Rev. Mr. Clarkson read prayers, and the Bishop preached and confirmed ten persons. The Rev. Dr. Barry, and Messrs. Adams and Diller were present.

In the evening, in St. Matthew's Church, Jersey City, the Rev. Messrs. Adams and Clarkson read prayers, and the Bishop preached and confirmed four persons. The Rector, the Rev. Dr. Barry, reading the Preface in the Confirmation Service. The Rev. Messrs. Bowden, the assistant minister, Mahan, Wells, Benedict, and Dr. Dyer (of the diocese of Pennsylvania) were present.

JUBILEE COLLEGE MILLS

Burned on the night of the 18th September, about 11 o'clock.

The loss is a heavy one, for there was no insurance.

The buildings consisted of a large three story Flouring Mill, 56 feet by 30, two run of stone, of the finest burrs, bolts and elevators, and screen for cleaning grain, estimated, by referring to the books of moneys expended, at $6,463 71.

Also a Saw Mill, recently repaired of the damages done by the late flood, in complete order for sawing lumber for the College. It was driven by a water wheel combining the powers of three patents, most esteemed, called Parker's improved percussion and reaction wheel. The whole of the Saw Mill and Dam cost $2,005 48.

How the fire was communicated to this mass of buildings is not revealed to us. The steam-engine had not been used for two weeks; the grist mill having been driven by water power alone. The miller left the mill about dark, having no candles furnished that day for grinding at night. He went to his boarding house, that of Mr. Wm. Nixon, across the creek, about 15 rods from the premises. There had been no candles or matches used in or about the mills for several days before the conflagration. There were about 150 bushels of wheat in the mill, mostly belonging to the College.

The above sad news was communicated to the Bishop early in the morning of the 19th, as he returned from reading prayers with the hands at Ham's Hall. Nothing but an unshaken faith in the wisdom of God kept him from sinking under it.

The immediate consequences, affecting the institution, he feels to be painful in the extreme. Flour and other bread stuffs necessary to support the families on the College Hill, must now be bought at the market price, in Peoria, 15 miles distant; and the labourers, coal diggers, and mechanics, are unpaid, waiting the sale of the clip of college wool. The lands out of the county cannot be sold, though their taxes have all been lately paid. The Bishop being entirely out of funds, looks to God only for support. "It is of the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good," "Jehovah Jireh, God will provide." Whether for life, or for death, all will be right.

(Signed)

PHILANDER CHASE.

September 19th, half-past 10, A. M., 1849.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

The following extracts are from Bishop DeLancey's Twelfth Convention Address.

During the year, I have officiated in seventy-nine organized parishes of the diocese, and in six places where the church is not organized, in all eighty-five places; baptized nine infants, and two adults, in all eleven; ordained three priests and ten Deacons; admitted nine new candidates for orders; received by transfer two candidates from other dioceses; transferred ten clergymen to other dioceses; received six clergymen into this diocese; instituted two rectors; consecrated three new churches; married two couple; administered the Holy Communion twenty times; preached one hundred and twenty-two times in this diocese, and twenty-nine times elsewhere; confirmed six hundred and thirteen persons in sixty-three congregations, averaging about ten persons for each parish.

For the Diocese of New York, I have, since our last convention baptized six children; administered the Holy Communion eight times; consecrated five churches; confirmed four hundred and thirty-four persons in twenty-three churches; preached twenty-nine times; ordained two priests and two deacons.

The aggregate of my labors in both dioceses since the last Convention, will be as follows:

I have officiated in one hundred and nine congregations; baptized two adults and fifteen children; administered the Holy Communion twenty-eight times; ordained five priests and twelve deacons; consecrated eight new churches; married two couple; preached one hundred and fifty-two times; confirmed eight hundred and forty-seven persons; I have travelled in discharge of my various duties, about five thousand one hundred miles.

CLERGY IN THE DIOCESE.

The diocese at present contains one hundred and thirteen clergymen, and twenty candidates for Holy Orders. The clergy canonically connected with the diocese, consists of one bishop, ninety-four presbyters and eighteen deacons.

Of this number, seven are on the list of disabled clergy; six are prevented by age or sickness from parochial labors, but sustain themselves; five are engaged in the instruction of youth, and the rest are engaged, or seeking to be engaged in parochial or missionary labors within the diocese or elsewhere.

I have given my canonical consent to the organization of five new Churches, viz: at Clayville, Oneida County; at Adams, Jefferson county; at Port Byron, Cayuga county; at Utica, Oneida county; and at Factoryville, Tioga county.

There are twenty candidates for Holy Orders.

GENEVA COLLEGE.

In regard to Geneva College, I have much pleasure in stating that it continues to merit the approval and support of the diocese, and that the effort to fill up the subscription in favor of the Hobart Professorship has reached the point of completion, authorizing the collection of the funds and the consequent application to the society in New York for the additional professorship understood to be contingent upon the same.

I trust that the attention of churchmen generally will now be turned to supplying its Halls with a large body of students. If each Parish should furnish one student, the institution would be full. During the year, the College has furnished to the Church not less than five additional candidates for holy orders.

The time of the College commencement was changed to the day before the meeting of this body, and about fifty clergymen and a large number of the laity of the church enjoyed the satisfaction of attending the exercises on that occasion.

With the united generous and decided patronage of the diocese, it cannot fail to prove a most invaluable nursery of sound knowledge, learning, and religion to the community and to the Church.

I have thus presented to you, my brethren, the usual details and facts appropriate to this occasion. In mercy, God permits us to meet again in consultation on the interest, the welfare, and the advancement of his Holy Church. With redoubled zeal and fervor, let us bend our thoughts, and apply our means and our energies to his work. The salvation of men, the edification of the Church, the glory of God,—these are our objects. Let them fill our minds, absorb our hearts, stir our zeal, and arouse our efforts, until we have done all that lieth in us, to bring all such as are, or shall be committed to our charge, to that agreement in the faith and knowledge of God, and to that ripeness and perfectness of age in Christ, that there be no place left among us, either for error in religion, or for viciousness of life.

ORDINATION.—An Ordination was held by the Rt. Rev. Dr. De Lancy, in Trinity Church, on Friday, August 17, at which time, Mr. Henry B. Whipple, candidate, was admitted to the holy order of Deacons, and the Rev. Sylvanus Reed, Deacon, was admitted to the Priesthood. The candidates were presented by the Rev. Mr. Bissell, of Geneva. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Wilson, of Sherburne. The Rev. Mr. Lockwood, of Rochester, Rev. Mr. Stryker, of Penn Yan, and the Rev. Mr. Gregory, of Rome, united in the imposition of hands. The Holy Communion was administered by the Bishop, assisted in the distribution of the elements by Rev. Mr. Bissell, Rev. Dr. Hale, Rev. Mr. Gregory, and Rev. Mr. Lockwood.—Gospel Messenger.

RHODE ISLAND.

At an ordination held in Grace Church, Providence, on the 29th of September, the Feast of St. Michael and all Angels, Benjamin Bosworth Babbitt, and Dr. George William Chevers, were admitted to the Holy Order of Deacons, by Bishop Henshaw. The last named of the candidates, was received under Canon V. 1847.

Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. F. Peck, assisted by the Rev. Daniel Henshaw. Mr. Babbitt was presented by the Rev. J. W. Cooke, and Dr. Chevers, by Rev. J. H. Eames. The sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Crocker, and the Holy Communion administered by the Bishop.

At a special Confirmation held in Grace Church, on the 17th Sunday after Trinity, September 30th, two persons received that holy rite.—Witness.

VIRGINIA.

EPISCOPAL ACTS OF BISHOP MEADE ON HIS PRESENT VISITATION.—On the last Sunday in August, five persons were confirmed at Millwood. On the first Sunday in September, six in Winchester. On the second Sunday, six at Staunton. On the following Wednesday, seven at Lexington, two of whom were Professors in the Military Institute. On Friday, four at Buchanan. On the third Sunday, two at Fincastle. On Tuesday, the new church in Roanoke was consecrated, and two persons confirmed. On Thursday and Friday, services were held at Franklin Court House, when two were confirmed, and where it is believed a church will soon be built. On the fourth Sunday, five persons were confirmed at Liberty, in Bedford county.—Southern Churchman.

The Post-Office of the Rev. J. W. Hoffman is changed from Bridgeport, to "Sleepy Depot, Conn." to which latter place all communications in future should be addressed.

The Rev. William H. Moore, having accepted the Rectorship of St. George's Church, Hempstead, L. I. New York, desires his letters and papers to be directed accordingly.

The Rev. John McNamara desires that all letters and papers intended for him be directed to Geneva Post-Office, Walworth Co. Wisconsin.

In the April number of the Church Review for 1848, when sketching a brief outline of Colonial Church Missions of the Seventeenth Century, within the limits of what are now the United States, we had occasion to speak of Rev. Dr. Johnson, and the influence he exerted upon the growth and character of the Church in Connecticut. We propose now to consider, more at large, the nature and character of that influence, as seen in the lives and history of those Clergy who were brought into the Church by his means. It would afford us great pleasure to begin with Rev. Dr. Johnson himself, first in time, character and influence, among the early Clergy of Connecticut; to detail some of the leading events of his history, and point out some of the obligations which Churchmen and others owe this venerable man. But we hope to see this better done than we should be able to do it, by the publication of an autobiography of the man, under the editorial supervision of one fully competent to the task, and who, we trust, will enrich it with many valuable and interesting notes. We shall merely say, in this place, therefore, that there is in the possession of a friend, a life of Dr. Johnson, written by himself, and which formed the basis of the biography known as Chandler's Life of Johnson. The autobiography was placed in the hands of Rev. Dr. Chandler, who re-wrote it, omitting many interesting particulars which he did not deem expedient to publish, and adding some others which the modesty of Dr. J. would not allow him to write. The work of Dr. Chandler was published under the supervision of his son-in-law, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Hobart, of New York, who does not seem to have been aware of its real origin. To this autobiography we hope to see appended such additional matter, by way of notes and illustrations, as we know to be in existence, and which shall serve to make us acquainted with the extent of our indebtedness to Rev. Dr. Johnson—an extent of which many of us seem not to have the slightest conception—which is not confined to mere matters of theological controversy, but includes also Biblical science and polite literature within a wide range.

JOHN BEACH,* the son of William Beach, was born at Stratford, A. D. 1700. He manifested an ardent desire for knowledge at a very early period, and especially for such knowledge as would throw additional light upon the Sacred Record, to which his attention was principally turned. For this purpose, geography and history were pursued to the extent of the means within his reach; and the habits of inquiry thus early formed continued to influence him through life. The counsel and example of a pious father sinking deep in his heart, and producing in him a spirit of prayer and a love of meditation unusual in one of his age, he cared little for the ordinary sports of youth and childhood; and leading a life of retirement and meditation, his enemies after reproached him with what they were pleased to term "a monkish holiness."

His father designed him for a tiller of the ground, but his longings after wisdom, and his deep solicitude to be able to read and understand the Bible in its original tongues, induced the Rev. Mr. afterwards Rev. Dr. Cutler, then the Congregational minister of Stratford, to advise, and his father to consent to his "going to college." He entered Yale College in 1717, and after "making uncommon proficiency in learning," was graduated in 1721, under the Presidency of Rev. Dr. Cutler, who had then presided over the College for two years. Through the influence of his former pastor and others, Mr. Beach was induced to study the Episcopal controversy, which was openly commenced in the Colony the following year, by the startling announcement that the Rev. Dr. Cutler, the President of the College, Mr. David Brown, a tutor in the same institution, the Rev. Mr. Johnson, the Congregational minister of West Haven, and Rev. James Wetmore, the Congregational minister of North Haven, had declared for Episcopacy. This inquiry raised many doubts in his mind concerning the validity of Presbyterian ordination, which becoming known, he was invited to Brookhaven, with a salary of £60 per annum, and testimonials proffered him to go to England for Orders. But though he had doubts concerning Presbyterian ordination, he had greater doubts as to the lawfulness of conformity in the Church of England, and hence declined the offer.

Soon after, he was unanimously called to the charge of the Congregational parish in Newtown, where he remained about seven years, or until 1732, greatly respected and beloved. The acquaintance commenced with Dr. Johnson at New Haven was continued, and the various topics of difference between them were frequently discussed by these gentlemen at Newtown, where Dr. Johnson then preached once in three months. This seems to have excited some suspicion of Mr. B.'s soundness, which was subsequently confirmed by his occasionally using the Lord's Prayer in his public prayers.*

*A Life of Mr. Beach was prepared for the press as early as 1810, and forwarded to Mr. Lazarus Beach, his grandson, then a printer in Washington. Returning from Washington, Mr. B. lost his trunk, containing the MSS. together with many valuable pamphlets illustrating the history of the times.

When to this was added the alarming fact, that in examining the children of his parish in the Westminster Catechism, he omitted the question, What are the Decrees of God? he was looked upon as one far gone in those "ways and paths of error which lead towards the Church." Nor were their fears altogether without reason, for within a year from this time he announced to his people, from the pulpit, that after a serious and prayerful examination of Holy Writ and Primitive Antiquity, he was convinced of the invalidity of his ordination, and of the unscriptural mode of government practiced by the Congregationalists—that he was satisfied of the lawfulness and propriety of conforming to the Church of England, and that he could not continue longer to administer the ordinances of the Gospel with a safe conscience, without Episcopal Ordination. He also informed them that if it was their desire, he would procure ministerial services for them while he went to England, and upon his return would continue with them. The congregation at first seemed satisfied with this, but news of the affair getting abroad, the discontented ones were stirred up to call a council of Congregational ministers, who, when assembled, proceeded at once to dissolve the connection between Mr. Beach and his parish, and to forestall him by inducing the people to call another man in his room.

Mr. Beach immediately proceeded to England for Orders, and on his return as a missionary of the Venerable Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, was stationed at Newtown and Reading, where he arrived in September, 1732. At the time Mr. Beach declared for the Church, there were but some half dozen families of Churchmen in the place; but six months after his return, he had the happiness to report forty-four communicants. An incident occurred about this time which served to increase the number of families attached to the Church. A member of his congregation, on his return from Church, lost his Prayer Book, which was picked up by a Congregationalist, who had never seen a book of the kind. It was read with considerable avidity, as a curiosity, until it was discovered to be designed for the use of the Church of England, when it was pronounced a mass book, containing many wicked and dangerous things. The circumstance becoming known, and a matter of general conversation, the owner was enabled to find his book, and the way was prepared for the ready distribution of some Prayer Books Mr. B. had brought with him from England. The addition of eight families to his flock, within a year, was the result of this apparently trifling incident. In 1734 they erected a church, and in 1736 he reported one hundred and five communicants at Newtown and Reading. In 1751 the ordinary congregation, in each place, was between two and three hundred, and the communicants between ninety and one hundred; and in 1762 he was able to report that the Churchmen at Newtown had become more numerous than all the dissenters; and they have continued to be so most of the time to the present day.

Mr. Beach was eminently practical in all he said and did; far more disposed to labor faithfully and diligently in the direct duties of his profession, than to enter into discussion and controversy. Yet, in the midst of his laborious career, he was called to buckle on the armor of the militant soldier and do battle in defence of the Church, her doctrines and discipline. In 1736, the Rev. Jonathan Dickinson, of Elizabethtown, N. J., published a sermon entitled, The Vanity of Human Institutions in the Worship of God, in which it was asserted that the Church of England, Pharisee-like, taught for doctrines the commandments of men; that forms of Prayer were not Apostolic; that the Book of Common Prayer was nothing but the Romish Mass Book re-modeled; that the Conformists to the Church in this country were dissenters, guilty of schism, rendering not merely the government but the very body of CHRIST. The high standing and commanding talents of Mr. D., coupled with the confident assurance of his statements, rendered the sermon extremely popular, and copies of it were widely circulated. Mr. Beach found them in his own parish and among his own people—given them with the polite intimation that it was a work Mr. Beach could not answer. Under the circumstances, there seemed no alternative, and Mr. Beach immediately replied, in A Vindication of the Worship of the Church of England, published the same year. To this Mr. D. replied the next year, (1737,) and was again answered by Mr. Beach the same year. The controversy was ably conducted on both sides, and sustained by arguments similar to those with which we are now familiar. In one respect, however, the points in dispute have changed. It was then agreed on all hands, that separation from a Church without lawful cause was schism; and that schism was not to be regarded as a blessing, but to be looked upon as a heinous sin. The modern notion of men being at liberty to connect themselves with, or withdraw from, any Church, as fancy or interest may dictate, had not then been heard of. Both parties also agreed in the necessity of an uninterrupted succession in the ministry—one deriving it through the line of Presbyters, the other through the line of Bishops.

*"The force of prejudice" was never better illustrated than in the Puritan treatment of the Lord's Prayer. Mr. Beach says:—"I am sorry that our neighbors not only wholly neglect this Divine Prayer, but take a great deal of pains to vilify it as no Christian Prayer, and as not fit to be used by a Christian." Friendly Expost., p. 37. This language asserts a fact that seems almost incredible. But compare with it the following expression of this "enlightened age." We quote from the Quar. Chris. Spectator, Vol. VIII. p. 257, where it is said, that "the Lord's Prayer is not strictly a Christian prayer. . . . Had CHRIST given a form of prayer after His resurrection, we doubt not it would have been essentially different." And more recently still, the language of a "Congregational Pastor" within the limits of our own town:—"This form does not meet the requirements of Scripture."—Forms of Prayer. New Haven, 1849.

A PRESBYTERIAN CLERGYMAN LOOKING FOR THE CHURCH.

(By "ONE OF THREE HUNDRED.")

The following is the opening chapter of this interesting work.

The writer of this narrative was once a Presbyterian; I may add, that my numerous relatives, near and remote, with a single exception, are Presbyterians still. And that which I had been by birth and education, and without my consent or fault, I afterwards became by conviction, and unhappily that species of conviction which is always absolute—satisfied with the potent reasoning, which even to a Nathanael, may sometimes seem conclusive—"Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" The question was unfortunately one, which modest worth has always found it difficult to answer; and I had never met with a Philip of Bethsaida, to say, "Come and see."

Of the Episcopalians, whose friendship I had enjoyed from childhood up, not one, so far as my recollections serve me ever made the slightest attempt to proselyte me to his faith; and even after it came to be suspected that my mind was disturbed upon the claims of Episcopacy—when an expression of sympathy, or an exchange of views, or a friendly consultation upon personal and local difficulties, that never find their solution in books and authors, would have been unspeakably refreshing to my mind, then grappling in its own solitude with its new perceptions of truth and duty—still, if the fact be creditable to Episcopalians, I may record it to their praise, that I never met with either layman or priest among them, who seemed so much as to care, whether a wanderer should come into his fold or not; but I felt many a time perplexed by the indifference with which they appeared to entertain a subject, on which my own mind was expending its most restless and intense anxieties. Whether those on the higher rounds of the ladder, reaching by God's ordinance from earth to heaven, were so far above me, as not to understand the pressure of an atmosphere that they had never breathed, or had not the skill to reach the helping hand so low; and that those lower down upon the same, perceived so little difference between my elevation and their own, as to wonder that I should have suffered inconvenience or should have desired a change; or whether both high and low had forgotten that that ladder, with its facilities for climbing to the skies, was for me as much as for them; it would be irrelevant, and perhaps unbecoming, at present to inquire. It is enough to say, that I was excluded from the sympathies of Churchmen, both high and low; and, in looking at the past, I often feel like one who has made his way across some desert, where the foot-prints of the wanderers, in a thousand different directions, seemed rather to bewilder than to guide, and who therefore must ascribe his preservation and his better fortune to the grace that kept his eye upon the guiding star.

I may not be able to tell the precise moment up to which, I remained a Presbyterian, nor the moment at which I became from conviction an Episcopalian; but one thing I know, that "whereas I was blind, now I see." To speak more accurately, while "seeing men as trees walking," I had been at no pains to form a definite or fixed conception of the ministry, the sacraments, the keys, the Church; but had rather passed these matters over, as things that we are not required to define, and which perhaps it were better not to define too nicely, lest, peradventure, by running lines and fences, we should be found "cursing whom God had not cursed, or defying whom the Lord had not defied." But now that, through the mercy of Him who hath touched my eyes and told me to "look up," I see all things clearly, I am more "ready to give a reason to them that ask me," and to say what that Church with its ministry and sacraments must be; and, standing on the great fact, that truth is positive and therefore exclusive, I am ready, so, to incur the imputation of an uncharitableness which I can only say my principles do not inspire, and of a bigotry which, I can only add, my private feelings are infinitely far from cherishing. As soon might we hesitate to allow the doctrine of the Holy and Ever Blessed Trinity, for fear of branding with heresy, the amiable Unitarian, the martyred Nestorian, or the ancient Sabellian: or, as soon should we hesitate to define carefully and guardedly the awful requisites of repentance, and faith, and prayer, and self-mortification, and holiness, lest we should cast a shade, perhaps a deep and disheartening shade, upon the safety, as regards the future life of many excellent persons—as to withhold accurate definitions of things pertaining to the Church, lest we should rouse the suspicion in others, or be accused of harboring the thought ourselves, that, however well our neighbours excluded by these definitions may be faring, we are persuaded that they might fare better still, and that however safe those beyond these lines may be, we feel some solicitude that they should be safer still.

The truth is, that in a world like this, and with such hearts as ours, and amidst the endless influences that within us and around us threaten to disappoint the very best of us of His salvation, where no fact is so certain or so terrific, as that even "the righteous shall be scarcely saved;" it is our duty to dig deep, if we would lay foundations for eternity—to make the definitions as accurate as possible—to place and wake the watch at every post—to spare nothing from the means of grace that a merciful God has placed within our reach; if by any means we "may apprehend that for which we are apprehended of Christ Jesus."

Although unable perhaps, as already stated, to determine the exact moment of the change which I have undergone, I may yet be able, before progressing a great deal farther with this narrative, to convince even the staunchest believer among my former brethren in instantaneous conversions, that mine to Episcopacy, however gradual and cautious, has been earnest and honest—the result of a conflict deep enough and enough prolonged, to furnish one plausible phenomenon more for the theory of irresistible grace. Indeed, one who has not been fated to pass the same ordeal, can never understand "the fightings without and the fears within," of a soul escaping, as it has been my happy lot to do, from the mazes of sectarianism, in its endless genealogies, into the genial bosom of the Church.

To abjure a well-compacted system of opinions, to which I have been publicly committed, and which I must now allow that I have held on insufficient grounds—to determine that I will “not consult with flesh and blood,” where all who are dear to me in life would earnestly resist me; to resolve that I may not even “go and bid them farewell that are at home at my house,” well knowing that I cannot answer their inquiries to their satisfaction; to disturb and break asunder the ties of brotherhood, which time and friendly intercourse and many an occasion of “sweet counselling together,” have long and endearingly connected; to withhold the homage that nature seems to claim for the ashes of the cherished dead, by appearing to insinuate a defect in their religion, and, with motives easy of misapprehension, to leave “the dead to bury their dead”—to overcome the countless expedients and sophistries to which the heart resorts, in order to persuade itself that whatever be the secret conviction, it is at least unnecessary to avow it openly; to encounter the obloquy that one must look for, in breaking old associations for reasons that, by implication, offend human pride; to admit that I have “run without being sent,” and have performed the holiest offices of the altar without the Lord’s anointing; to “go out not knowing whither,” and incur the necessity of a long probation, before I may earn the confidence of my brethren in my new relations; to be day and night agitated and unhappy on a question, on which it would be imprudent to seek sympathy, either in the ties about to be sundered, or in those about to be formed; to “go up to this Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there;” to feel goaded on by inexorable truth, to the fatal moment of proclaiming the change my mind has undergone; and, at last, under a pressure of conviction, which it would be unsafe longer to resist, and impossible ultimately to overcome, to take my new position, and yet to have not a doubt that I am right in taking it; this is a task that lays under exhausting tribute every resource and element of our frail nature. The patient investigations, and the shifting of reasons, the earnest longings for Divine guidance, and the searchings of heart; the wakeful nights and anxious days, wearing the spirits and corroding the health; now a determination to dismiss the subject, as one of externals and not of essentials, or of order and not of faith; now an effort to believe that it would be a lesser evil to continue, even at some hazard, in the old communion, than to suffer and to produce in others the necessary mischiefs of a change; now a recurrence to old prejudices, a carping at the theory in some of its details, or in its practical and local workings, or a magnifying of some incidental circumstance, to divert the mind, or to embitter it against the new relation, or to satisfy it that on the whole, the change would not be materially for the better; now the suggestion, that many learned and devout men, “of whom the world was not worthy,” have believed that Presbyterianism was a scriptural religion; now the old feeling stealing over me, that my mother, who first brought me to Christ, and first taught me to pray, and who now “sleeps in Jesus,” lived without blemish, and passed “the swellings of Jordan” without fear, in the faith which, only as to its securities, I am proposing to abandon; and again, the recollection that my venerable father, now leaning with Jacob on his staff, is in the same religion waiting with the bright anticipations of a holy hope, “until his change come;” these are but some of the tumultuous tossings in the mind of the anxious inquirer. The happier child of the Church, who was “free-born,” can scarcely conceive the tribute to be paid to old prejudices, old habits, old associations, old modes of thinking, and chiefly to the old pride of human nature, by one who would become “partaker of his liberty.” In the words of one who purchased at great expense the freedom of Rome, when Rome was free—words which were appropriated by another, who long ago preceded me in this uneven path—“With a great sum obtained I this freedom.”

A struggle like this may perhaps somewhat excuse the enthusiasm which those, who “from without” have found their way into the church, have now and then betrayed. My own enthusiasm, if any I have felt, I have endeavored not to make offensive to my brethren, either old or new. I have chosen rather, under many provocations, to “keep silence even from good words,” and to enjoy my liberty in quiet thankfulness to Him whose words hath made me free. Sometimes I have been questioned, and it would almost appear, in the same spirit in which the man, twice unfortunate, if I may so say, unfortunate in having been born blind, and unfortunate in having received his sight, was persecuted with the questions, “What sayest thou? What did he unto thee? How opened he thine eyes?” And sometimes, “out of a good and honest heart,” I have been asked to give “a reason of the hope that is in me.” But from considerations that will readily occur to a discreet mind, I have felt it proper not to break the covenant with my lips. Time may however be now supposed to have sobered down the gushing impulses of the “new convert,” and also to have in some measure healed the wound which only “the necessity laid upon me,” could have induced me to inflict on those “with whom I once walked in company;” and therefore, from motives which I know will be approved by Him, who alone has the power to discern, or the right to judge, I now venture to give a degree of form and permanence to a brief chapter from my own “experience.”

I am but one among more than three hundred ministers, who, in this country alone, have, within a few years, been “grafted again into the good olive tree,” from which, on the responsibility of our forefathers, we had in evil and violent times been “broken off.” In reaching this result, there has doubtless been no little variety in the trials that we have each encountered; but it is reasonable to suppose that “as the billows went over our soul, and deep answered to deep,” in the general features of our “experience” we have resembled each other, as “face answereth to face in a glass.” And forasmuch as few have taken in hand to give account of those things which are most surely believed among us, and especially of “that dark and terrible wilderness” through which the Lord hath brought us to the fold that was once “one,” and is as certainly to be one again, it has been suggested by others, and has seemed good to me also, “having perfect understanding of that way,” that it might be a means of usefulness, and perhaps a source of consolation, or even an humble guide to those who may come after us in the same rough path, or who may be at this moment grappling with the same rude difficulties, to see that “the fiery trial has happened” to others before them, and that a goodly “cloud of witnesses,” still panting at the goal, are looking on them with affectionate sympathy, as they run the same race from which we are now resting, and have their eye on the same invaluable prize which we have grasped.

MORNINGS WITH THE JESUITS AT ROME.

I must frankly confess that I was wholly unprepared for this. In all my former experience of controversy in Ireland and England, I had been told that all those were the mere abuses of the superstitious, and not sanctioned by the learned; if indeed such things were believed or practised anywhere. I had often heard them denounced as mere fabrications—pure inventions to injure the character of the Church of Rome, and I felt much surprised to find them not only believed and practised but defended. I felt that it was opening out to me a new state of things, a new phase of mind, and a totally new system of faith or credulity which I had never anticipated. A mind must be in a peculiar state to believe in the miraculous powers of a picture or image.

His explanation led me to advance a step in our argument, and to say that his statements seemed to imply that there was something peculiar to those images and pictures, something inherent in them as compared with others, something not in the Saint or Angel represented, but in these very pictures and images themselves. I endeavoured to illustrate my meaning by suggesting two pictures of the Virgin Mary placed side by side, and asking whether one being supposed to be miraculous, the people would pray before that one rather than the other; and whether he believed the Virgin Mary would interfere with a miraculous answer for those who prayed to her before that one rather than the other. I added that, if such was the case, it went to prove a belief that there was something peculiar, some virtue or power, something miraculous in such a picture, in one rather than the other; and that the distinction proved that the people did look for something in pictures and images, more than the persons whom they were designed to represent.

He gave the fullest assent to this, saying that they looked first of all to the Saint represented in the picture or image, and that then, in case there was a miraculous character, they looked also to that power or virtue. He added that his full belief was that the Virgin Mary was more partial to some representations of herself than to others; and that, in order to induce the devout to pray before these her favourite ones, she heard and answered the prayers so offered, while she neglected those that were offered elsewhere—answering the prayers offered before one picture which she liked, and refusing those offered before a picture which she did not like.

This was a degree of credulity, not to say superstition, for which I was wholly unprepared; and I felt that there must be something in the atmosphere of Italy, or something in the training of the mind of Italy, that could lead an intelligent, a travelled, and educated man, to such a state of credulity. (pp. 35–41.)

My clerical friend, after a pause, which I was unwilling to break, lest I should express myself as strongly as I felt, resumed the conversation, and said that the worship of the Virgin Mary was a growing worship in Rome—that it was increasing in depth and intenseness of devotion; and that there were now many of their divines, and he spoke of himself as agreeing with them in sentiment, who were teaching that as a woman brought in death, so a woman was to bring in life; that as a woman brought in sin, so a woman was to bring in holiness;—that as Eve brought in damnation, so Mary was to bring in salvation; and that the effect of this opinion was largely to increase the reverence and worship given to the Virgin Mary.

I said that I had read something of the kind, and also that I had seen a sort of parallel in some of the Fathers on the subject, but that it did not go so far as the modern opinion. But, in order not to misunderstand him, and to prevent any mistake as to his views, I asked whether I was to understand him as implying, that as we regard Eve as the first sinner, so we are to regard Mary as the first saviour,—one as the author of sin, and the other as the author of the remedy.

He replied that such was precisely the view he wished to express, and he added that it was taught by St. Alphonsus de Liguori, and was a growing opinion. (pp. 43, 44.)

[Mr. Seymour remarked that, from his observations on the devotions of the Italians, he felt that “the religion of Italy ought to be called the religion of Mary rather than the religion of Christ,” the answer, “made with perfect ease and entire frankness,” was:]—

That my impression was very natural—that such was really the appearance of things; that coming from Germany, where Christ on the cross was the ordinary object of veneration, into Italy, where the Virgin Mary was the universal object of reverence, it was no more than natural that such an impression should have been created—that such an impression was very much the reality of the case, and that, to his own knowledge, the religion of Italy was latterly becoming less and less the religion of Christ, and that “the devotion to the most Holy Virgin,” as he called it, was certainly on the increase.

I was perfectly startled, not indeed at the statement itself, for it was too palpably true to escape the observation of any one; but that a man, a minister of Christianity, should describe such a state of things with the manifest approval he exhibited, we were shocked.

He perceived this, and then proceeded to justify himself with an ingenuity and address that laid open the system, and exhibited the worship of Mary in a new light—at least, in a light in which I had never seen it before. He stated that there was a great difference in the bent or habit of mind, between English Protestants on one hand, and Italian Romanists on the other; that Protestants habitually let their minds dwell on Christ’s teaching, on Christ working miracles, and especially on Christ’s suffering, bleeding, dying on the cross; so that, in a Protestant mind, the great object was Christ in the maturity of his manhood; but that Romanists habitually dwelt on the childhood of Christ; not on the great events that were wrought in maturity and manhood, but on those interesting scenes which were connected with his childhood. He then went on to say that this habit of mind led to the great difference that, as Protestants always dwelt on the suffering and dying Christ, so Christ in a Protestant mind was always connected with the cross; and that as Romanists constantly meditated rather on the childhood of Christ, so Christ in a Romanist’s mind was usually associated with his mother, the Virgin Mary. He then continued to say that the constant dwelling of the mind in contemplation on the child, naturally led to more thought, more contemplation, more affection, and finally more devotion for the mother; that when one thinks of all the little scenes of His childhood, dwells on the little incidents of interest between the child Jesus and the mother Mary, recollects that she had Him enshrined in her womb, that she used to lead Him by the hand, that she had listened to all His innocent prattle, that she had observed the opening of His mind; and that, during all those days of His happy childhood, she, and she alone of all the world, knew that little child whom she bore in her womb, and nursed at her breasts, and fondled in her arms, was her God—that when a man thinks, and habitually thinks of all this, the natural result is that his affections will be more drawn out, and his feelings of devotion more elevated towards Mary. And he concluded by stating that this habit of mind was becoming more general, and that it was to it that he would attribute the great increase that late years had witnessed in the devotion to the Virgin Mary. (pp. 45–47.)

He repeated what he had said before on this point expressive of the greater leniency, the gentler compassion, and the closer sympathies of Mary, adding that he was borne out in such an opinion by that of the Fathers, of whom many were of opinion that even Christ Himself was not so willing to hear our prayers, and did not hear them so quickly when offered simply to Himself, as when they were offered through the Blessed Virgin.

I felt this was a hideous sentiment, and could not forbear to say so, adding that when such opinions were circulated by the Priesthood, I could no longer feel surprised at the extent—the extravagance to which the devotion to Mary had gone in Rome—that I felt the whole devotional system of the Church of Rome, the prayers unceasingly offered to the Virgin, the innumerable pictures of the Virgin, the countless images of the Virgin, the many Churches dedicated to the Virgin, the universal devotion rendered to the Virgin, the manner in which all the services and prayers of the Church and people are impregnated with thoughts of the Virgin—the extent to which, in conversation, all classes went in speaking of the Virgin, all had impressed me with the feeling that the religion of Italy ought to be called the religion of the Virgin, and not the religion of Jesus Christ. I added that it was impossible to justify such a state of things. “If,” said I, “I enter the Church of the Augustines, I see there an image of the Virgin Mary as large as life. Some are decorating her with jewels as votive offering—some are suspending pictures around her as memorials of thankfulness—some are placing money in a box at her feet—some are prostrate in profound devotion before her—some are devoutly kissing her feet and touching them with their foreheads—some are repeating the rosary before her as if acceptable to her—all turning their backs upon the consecrated Host, turning their back upon that which the Priest is elevating at the High Altar, and which he and they believe to be Jesus Christ himself bodily and visibly among them—turning their backs upon Christ, and turning their faces to Mary, practically forsaking Christ for Mary, with a prostration the most profound before her image—a prostration that was never surpassed in the days of heathen Rome, and can never be justified in Christian Rome.”

He said, in answer to all this, that for his own part he would not act thus, and that it was not right to judge of the Church by the devotion of the ignorant.

My wife then interposed, and said she had witnessed all this, and was shocked at what seemed to her to be a most fearful idolatry, for while the Priest was saying mass, and elevating the Host at one end of the Church, and some of the people bowing before it, the image of Mary stood at the other end, and some of the people were in precisely the same way bowing before it. Some preferred what they believed to be Christ. Some preferred what they regarded as an image of the Virgin.

He replied, with much gentleness, that he never prayed to the Virgin of the Augustines—that it was not a slightly image—that it was really an ugly image, and had never excited his devotion, and in fact he had never prayed before it; but still he thought it scarcely fair to speak against this devotion to Mary as exhibited by the more ignorant, inasmuch as they had learned its value by experience. Many of those, whom we had witnessed there, had no doubt offered many a prayer to her and had found an answer. Many a mother praying for her child had obtained her petition. They were poor people, subject to privations, affliction, sickness, and they found relief and consolation in going to the blessed Virgin. (pp. 101–113.)

I therefore merely asked him, though with all the earnestness which I felt, whether, if attending the bed of a dying man, he would feel himself justified in speaking to an immortal soul, when about to pass into eternity, and desiring him to fly to Mary—that in all his doubts and perplexities he was to look to Mary—that in all his fears and terrors he was to look to Mary—I asked whether, considering his responsibility at such a moment, he would address a dying man in language that pointed only to the Virgin Mary, and made no mention of Jesus Christ? I then read the following words from the Roman Breviary:—“If the winds of temptation arise, if thou run upon the rocks of tribulation, look to the star, call upon Mary. If thou art tossed upon the waves of pride, of ambition, of detraction, of envy, look to the star, and call upon Mary. If at any time anger, or avarice, or the temptations of the flesh, toss the bark of thy mind, look to Mary. If disturbed with the greatness of thy sins, troubled at the defilement of thy conscience, affrighted at the horrors of the judgment, thou beginnest to be swallowed up in the gulf of sadness, the abyss of despair, think upon Mary—in dangers, in difficulties, in doubts, think upon Mary, invoke Mary. Let her not depart from thy mouth. Let her not depart from thy heart,” &c. I asked him solemnly whether he would use such language, even though sanctioned by his Breviary, in preparing a dying man for the presence of God in the eternal world.

He replied unhesitatingly that he would, and then went on to argue that experience justified him—that experience proved that the prayers offered to the Virgin were heard and answered—that mothers praying to her who was herself a mother, with all the sympathies of a mother, were heard and answered—that such prayers for children in sin, or in danger, or in sickness, were heard and answered; and it was this practical experience that proved the great encouragement to the devotion of ourselves to the Virgin Mary.—[These extracts are copied from the Christian Observer].

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1849.

NOTICE TO THE CLERGY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

The Clergy of the City and County of Philadelphia, are requested to meet the Bishop of the Diocese at the Vestry Room of St. Andrew's Church, on Monday next, 15th instant, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

NEW YORK CONVENTION.

We have received a letter from a member of the New York Convention, complaining that our abstract of the proceedings did not present, fully and fairly, the action in relation to the Missionary Committee. He fears that from the mere statement of the reconsideration of the vote by which the committee had been elected, and the re-organization of the committee, the Convention might appear to have assented to the want of confidence entertained and expressed by some individuals. We supposed that the names of the mover and seconder of the resolutions were sufficient to prevent any such misunderstanding.

The facts of the case are simply these. A Canon of the diocese orders that collections should be made in every parish, for certain diocesan charities, to be distributed under the direction of a Missionary Committee. Some parishes have not obeyed this Canon. The Rev. Dr. Higbee offered a resolution to the effect, "that it is the bounden duty of every clergyman having a Parochial Charge," to fulfil this requisition. In the course of the debate, it came out that some parishes refused to obey this Canon, because "the Minority" were not fairly represented in the committee, and therefore they had not confidence in its administration. By the way, this is a new kind of churchmanship which has sprung up in New York, the divisions of which are designated by the terms "Majority" and "Minority." When the difficulty was fairly stated, the Rev. Mr. Cox, chairman of the committee, one of the "Majority," submitted a proposition that the whole committee should be given to the "minority." Acting upon this voluntary surrender, Mr. Spencer offered his resolutions, which were seconded by the Rev. Dr. Higbee, who expressed his willingness to resign his place, both of whom belong to the "majority." Thus, it was in accordance with the wish of those who had been elected that a new appointment was made, in which the "minority" was allowed to have seven and the "majority" three. This was certainly a wise and generous effort to bring the "minority" over to the "majority." Every fair and candid mind must regard this as indicating a willingness to advance the interests of the whole diocese, and for the blessed cause of CHARITY, to lay aside all inferior considerations. Oh, how well it would be for the Church if such a spirit animated her members in all their deliberations and actions! As to the other transactions of this Convention we think it requires but a small share of common sense to interpret them. The view which the "minority" took of the action of the Convention in relation to Bishop Onderdonk, is declared with sufficient plainness in "the Protest" signed by a large portion of them.

The following may be regarded as the judgment of a less partial witness. It is taken from the NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER, a journal not under the influence of any party in the Church.

THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CONVENTION.

We have attended each of the protracted sessions of this important body, which finally adjourned last night, between 11 and 12 o'clock. As we predicted, the convention, though it did not seem to regard with much favour the Rev. Dr. Sherwood's ponderous preamble and resolution, did adopt, by a large majority, a substitute of the same character, presented by Rev. Dr. Higbee, after having refused to adopt, also by a large majority, a direct requisition upon the Bishop for a resignation, proposed by Rev. Dr. Whitehouse. The resolution proposed by Dr. Higbee, and adopted at a late hour last night, empowers the standing committee to prepare and present an address to the House of Bishops, paying for the determination of Bishop

Onderdonk's sentence by a declaration, on their part, on what terms or at what time that sentence shall expire.

It seems to us that the Bishop's friends have secured more by the adoption of Dr. Higbee's resolution than they would have done by the passage of Dr. Sherwood's without his preamble—which preamble, it is pretty certain, could not have been carried through the convention. Had the resolution required that the address, which the standing committee are empowered to present to the House of Bishops, should be submitted to the convention, or to a special committee on which the minority were represented, the triumph of the Bishop's friends would have been less complete.—As the matter stands, the standing committee, composed exclusively, we believe, of the majority members, is instructed to say what it chooses, and what it says must be received as the language and sentiment of the convention. The minority, whose protest the convention refused to receive, appear to rely upon the conservative character of the highest judicature of the Church as a barrier to the Bishop's restoration; nor did we hear any of the majority express a confident expectation that the House of Bishops would give a favorable response to the address.

Other important subjects were disposed of by the convention, the members of which displayed a remarkable combination of candor, courtesy and independence. Once or twice, perhaps, the speakers indulged in special pleading and seemed rather more disposed to secure a majority for their views than to yield to the force of argument. It would have been strange indeed had there been, in so large an assembly, moved by such diversity of sentiment, no temporary display of such feeling. But on the whole the debates were conducted in a spirit that, under all the peculiar circumstances, reflected credit even upon a Christian assembly. On all subjects, except the vexed one of Bishop or no Bishop, the merits of the question were mainly regarded and fully discussed; and on all occasions both clergy and laity spoke and voted with noble and manly independence, and seemed to respect each other for doing so. We apprehend that the difficulty respecting the diocesan question is to be found in the strong Church principle, more or less dominant in the heart of each member but always operative in all, though sometimes influenced by, sometimes in conflict with, external circumstances or personal predilections.

The question whether non-communicants shall continue to be eligible for lay members of the convention having been sent back to the churches, as one to be finally decided at this convention, elicited much able discussion. The decision of the convention in 1848 was decidedly favorable to the exclusion of non-communicants, both clergy and laity having strongly supported the proposition. As it was understood that at this convention that question would be prominent and must be finally acted upon, it is fair to suppose that lay-delegates were appointed with reference to it. The large majority against the proposition this year is therefore significant, and we suppose will set that matter at rest, for many years at least. The convention, while making a decided expression on this particular qualification, only postponed the consideration of other qualifications until a Bishop sits in the councils of the Church.

Another important action of the convention was the disbanding of the missionary board, within a few hours of its re-appointment, and its reconstruction upon a more liberal basis. The sudden outburst of feeling, the frank avowals and explanations, the entire and sudden breaking down of the ordinary distinctions of minority and majority, the quick yielding to the pressure of what up to that moment had been regarded as the majority, the promptness with which, on both sides, the evil complained of was remedied and differences were adjusted, presented altogether a scene rarely occurring in a legislative body, and showed alike the latent power of the minority and the generous impulses of the congregated members, when not fettered or controlled by differences about principles. The concessions, and the reconstruction of the missionary committee upon the just principles of a minority as well as a majority representation, cannot fail, we should think, to produce most gratifying results in the missionary operations of the church.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

The Editor of the Banner has received $35, as "a thank-offering, for the Swedes Church in Chicago, Illinois, under the charge of the Rev. Mr. Unonius," through the Missionary Society of Immanuel Church, Holmesburgh, Pa. This contribution makes $56 received from the parish at Holmesburgh for the same object. An opportunity is offered for our city churches to follow so good an example. The Rev. Mr. Unonius is now in Philadelphia to present in person the claims of his mission. Any contributions sent to our Office will, at once, reach him. We know of no more interesting or important object for the application of charity. On Sunday afternoon, he will make a statement of the case in St. Andrew's Church. Those who feel interested are earnestly invited to attend.

CALVARY CHURCH, NEW YORK.

We copy with great pleasure, the following editorial from the New York Courier and Enquirer. We have thought it hardly worth while to correct the misstatements which have been current, both in public and private, on this subject. We felt confident all would be made clear and the true condition of this important parish be known. We congratulate the members of Calvary Church upon the happy result which continues to them the ministerial labors of their able and devoted Rector. We think Church papers should, before giving currency to a report, consider the value of the source whence it comes.

CALVARY CHURCH.—Various paragraphs have appeared in the newspapers of late, alluding to pecuniary difficulties in this Church; and finally, it was recently announced that the able, eloquent, and popular Rector of the Church—the Rev. Samuel L. Southard—had resigned his Pastoral charge and retired into New Jersey.

Matters so purely clerical and local, are not suitable subjects for newspaper paragraphs; but in as much as the pecuniary difficulties of Calvary Church have been thus brought before the public, we deem it due to the parties concerned to make the following statement.

It is true that Calvary Church is involved in a floating debt of about $22,000, and that in consequence of the derangement of its pecuniary affairs, the Rev. Mr. Southard did, on a recent occasion, tender his resignation. We are happy to add however, that at a meeting of the Vestry on Wednesday evening last, they refused to accept his resignation, and passed a resolution setting forth that if Mr. Southard would resume his Pastoral labors, there could be but little doubt that the indebtedness of the Church would be provided for, and "earnestly and affectionately" calling upon him to withdraw his resignation.

This resolution was served upon Mr. Southard yesterday morning; and we are quite sure that all the friends of one of the ablest and most eloquent Divines in the Episcopal Church, will be gratified to learn, that he promptly withdrew his resignation, and will to-morrow resume his labors in the pulpit of a Church which, under his pastoral care, has grown and prospered beyond that of any other church in our diocese during the same period of time.

In regard to the financial affairs of Calvary Church, it is proper to add, now that the subject has been commented upon by the press, that the ground upon which it was erected, is worth not less than thirty thousand dollars; and that the building and properties of the church—all new, or nearly so—have cost about seventy thousand dollars. There is a mortgage upon it for eighteen thousand dollars which has been assumed by the Corporation of Trinity Church; and that the twenty-two thousand dollars about to be raised, and which will cover its entire indebtedness, will hereafter constitute its only debt!

We make this statement upon a full knowledge of all the facts of the case; and we question whether there are many Churches in this city or elsewhere, which can boast, that with a noble edifice worth $75,000 erected upon lots worth under the hammer to-day, some thirty thousand dollars, their indebtedness of every kind, amounts to less than twenty-five thousand dollars!

Such, however, is the fact in regard to Calvary Church. The corporation of Trinity Church having very properly and magnanimously assumed the mortgage for eighteen thousand dollars, the entire debt of the church will be less than twenty-five thousand dollars, for which the creditors will hold what is virtually a first mortgage upon property worth one hundred thousand dollars.

ACADEMIC STUDIES.

Such is the title of "an Inaugural Discourse, pronounced before the Senate of Trinity College, Hartford, on Commencement Day, 1849, by the Rev. John Williams, D. D., President of the College."

The author presents his subject, and its divisions, to his hearers in the following words:

Adopting, then, the language of one of the lights of a foreign University, which fortunately with hardly a change we can adopt, though speaking from a far humbler position, I would say in the beginning, that "The studies of this place, so far as they relate to merely human learning," and so far only at present we propose to speak of them, "divide themselves into three branches.

I. The study of the laws of nature, comprehending all parts of inductive philosophy.

II. The study of ancient and modern languages, and literature; or in other words, of those authentic records which convey to us an account of the feelings, the sentiments and the actions, of men prominent in the most famous empires of the ancient and the modern world. In these works we seek for examples and maxims of prudence, and models of taste.

III. The study of ourselves considered as social and intellectual beings. Under this head, are included ethics, and metaphysics, political philosophy, history, and some other kindred subjects of great complexity, which can be only briefly touched in our academic system, and are to be followed out in the more mature labors of after life."

The important topics included in the wide field of discussion here presented, are treated in a concise and pointed manner and in a spirit worthy of the President of a Church College.

HONORARY DEGREE.—At the late commencement of Columbia College, the degree of Doctor in Divinity was conferred upon the Rev. Robert W. Harris, Rector of Grace Church, White Plains, son of the late Rev. Wm. Harris, D. D., former President of the Institution.

that I have held on insufficient grounds—to determine that I will “not consult with flesh and blood,” where all who are dear to me in life would earnestly resist me; to resolve that I may not even “go and bid them farewell that are at home at my house,” well knowing that I cannot answer their inquiries to their satisfaction; to disturb and break asunder the ties of brotherhood, which time and friendly intercourse and many an occasion of “sweet counselling together,” have long and endearingly connected; to withhold the homage that nature seems to claim for the ashes of the cherished dead, by appearing to insinuate a defect in their religion, and, with motives easy of misapprehension, to leave “the dead to bury their dead”—to overcome the countless expedients and sophistries to which the heart resorts, in order to persuade itself that whatever be the secret conviction, it is at least unnecessary to avow it openly; to encounter the obloquy that one must look for, in breaking old associations for reasons that, by implication, offend human pride; to admit that I have “run without being sent,” and have performed the holiest offices of the altar without the Lord’s anointing; to “go out not knowing whither,” and incur the necessity of a long probation, before I may earn the confidence of my brethren in my new relations; to be day and night agitated and unhappy on a question, on which it would be imprudent to seek sympathy, either in the ties about to be sundered, or in those about to be formed; to “go up to this Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there;” to feel goaded on by inexorable truth, to the fatal moment of proclaiming the change my mind has undergone; and, at last, under a pressure of conviction, which it would be unsafe longer to resist, and impossible ultimately to overcome, to take my new position, and yet to have not a doubt that I am right in taking it; this is a task that lays under exhausting tribute every resource and element of our frail nature. The patient investigations, and the shifting of reasons, the earnest longings for Divine guidance, and the searchings of heart; the wakeful nights and anxious days, wearing the spirits and corroding the health; now a determination to dismiss the subject, as one of externals and not of essentials, or of order and not of faith; now an effort to believe that it would be a lesser evil to continue, even at some hazard, in the old communion, than to suffer and to produce in others the necessary mischiefs of a change; now a recurrence to old prejudices, a carping at the theory in some of its details, or in its practical and local workings, or a magnifying of some incidental circumstance, to divert the mind, or to embitter it against the new relation, or to satisfy it that on the whole, the change would not be materially for the better; now the suggestion, that many learned and devout men, “of whom the world was not worthy,” have believed that Presbyterianism was a scriptural religion; now the old feeling stealing over me, that my mother, who first brought me to Christ, and first taught me to pray, and who now “sleeps in Jesus,” lived without blemish, and passed “the swellings of Jordan” without fear, in the faith which, only as to its securities, I am proposing to abandon; and again, the recollection that my venerable father, now leaning with Jacob on his staff, is in the same religion waiting with the bright anticipations of a holy hope, “until his change come;” these are but some of the tumultuous tossings in the mind of the anxious inquirer. The happier child of the Church, who was “free-born,” can scarcely conceive the tribute to be paid to old prejudices, old habits, old associations, old modes of thinking, and chiefly to the old pride of human nature, by one who would become “partaker of his liberty.” In the words of one who purchased at great expense the freedom of Rome, when Rome was free—words which were appropriated by another, who long ago preceded me in this uneven path—“With a great sum obtained I this freedom.”

A struggle like this may perhaps somewhat excuse the enthusiasm which those, who “from without” have found their way into the church, have now and then betrayed. My own enthusiasm, if any I have felt, I have endeavored not to make offensive to my brethren, either old or new. I have chosen rather, under many provocations, to “keep silence even from good words,” and to enjoy my liberty in quiet thankfulness to Him whose words hath made me free. Sometimes I have been questioned, and it would almost appear in the same spirit in which the man, twice unfortunate, if I may so say, unfortunate in having been born blind, and unfortunate in having received his sight, was persecuted with the questions, “What sayest thou? What did he unto thee? How opened he thine eyes?” And sometimes, “out of a good and honest heart,” I have been asked to give “a reason of the hope that is in me.” But from considerations that will readily occur to a discreet mind, I have felt it proper not to break the covenant with my lips. Time may however be now supposed to have sobered down the gushing impulses of the “new convert,” and also to have in some measure healed the wound which only “the necessity laid upon me,” could have induced me to inflict on those “with whom I once walked in company;” and therefore, from motives which I know will be approved by Him, who alone has the power to discern, or the right to judge, I now venture to give a degree of form and permanence to a brief chapter from my own “experience.”

I am but one among more than three hundred ministers, who, in this country alone, have, within a few years, been “grafted again into the good olive tree,” from which, on the responsibility of our forefathers, we had in evil and violent times been “broken off.” In reaching this result, there has doubtless been no little variety in the trials that we have each encountered; but it is reasonable to suppose that “as the billows went over our soul, and deep answered to deep,” in the general features of our “experience” we have resembled each other, as “face answereth to face in a glass.” And forasmuch as few have taken in hand to give account of those things which are most surely believed among us, and especially of “that dark and terrible wilderness” through which the Lord hath brought us to the fold that was once “one,” and is as certainly to be one again, it has been suggested by others, and has seemed good to me also, “having perfect understanding of that way,” that it might be a means of usefulness, and perhaps a source of consolation, or even an humble guide to those who may come after us in the same rough path, or who may be at this moment grappling with the same rude difficulties, to see that “the fiery trial has happened” to others before them, and that a goodly “cloud of witnesses,” still panting at the goal, are looking on them with affectionate sympathy, as they run the same race from which we are now resting, and have their eye on the same invaluable prize which we have grasped.

MORNINGS WITH THE JESUITS AT ROME.

I must frankly confess that I was wholly unprepared for this. In all my former experience of controversy in Ireland and England, I had been told that all those were the mere abuses of the superstitious, and not sanctioned by the learned; if indeed such things were believed or practised anywhere. I had often heard them denounced as mere fabrications—pure inventions to injure the character of the Church of Rome, and I felt much surprised to find them not only believed and practised but defended. I felt that it was opening out to me a new state of things, a new phase of mind, and a totally new system of faith or credulity which I had never anticipated. A mind must be in a peculiar state to believe in the miraculous powers of a picture or image.

His explanation led me to advance a step in our argument, and to say that his statements seemed to imply that there was something peculiar to those images and pictures, something inherent in them as compared with others, something not in the Saint or Angel represented, but in these very pictures and images themselves. I endeavored to illustrate my meaning by suggesting two pictures of the Virgin Mary placed side by side, and asking whether one being supposed to be miraculous, the people would pray before that one rather than the other; and whether he believed the Virgin Mary would interfere with a miraculous answer for those who prayed to her before that one rather than the other. I added that, if such was the case, it went to prove a belief that there was something peculiar, some virtue or power, something miraculous in such a picture, in one rather than the other; and that the distinction proved that the people did look for something in pictures and images, more than the persons whom they were designed to represent.

He gave the fullest assent to this, saying that they looked first of all to the Saint represented in the picture or image, and that then, in case there was a miraculous character, they looked also to that power or virtue. He added that his full belief was that the Virgin Mary was more partial to some representations of herself than to others; and that, in order to induce the devout to pray before these her favourite ones, she heard and answered the prayers so offered, while she neglected those that were offered elsewhere—answering the prayers offered before one picture which she liked, and refusing those offered before a picture which she did not like.

This was a degree of credulity, not to say superstition, for which I was wholly unprepared; and I felt that there must be something in the atmosphere of Italy, or something in the training of the mind of Italy, that could lead an intelligent, a travelled, and educated man, to such a state of credulity. (pp. 35-41.)

My clerical friend, after a pause, which I was unwilling to break, lest I should express myself as strongly as I felt, resumed the conversation, and said that the worship of the Virgin Mary was a growing worship in Rome—that it was increasing in depth and intensity of devotion; and that there were now many of their divines, and he spoke of himself as agreeing with them in sentiment, who were teaching that as a woman brought in death, so a woman was to bring in life; that as a woman brought in sin, so a woman was to bring in holiness;—that as Eve brought in damnation, so Mary was to bring in salvation; and that the effect of this opinion was largely to increase the reverence and worship given to the Virgin Mary.

I said that I had read something of the kind, and also that I had seen a sort of parallel in some of the Fathers on the subject, but that it did not go so far as the modern opinion. But, in order not to misunderstand him, and to prevent any mistake as to his views, I asked whether I was to understand him as implying, that as we regard Eve as the first sinner, so we are to regard Mary as the first saviour,—one as the author of sin, and the other as the author of the remedy.

He replied that such was precisely the view he wished to express, and he added that it was taught by St. Alphonsus de Liguori, and was a growing opinion. (pp. 43, 44.)

[Mr. Seymour remarked that, from his observations on the devotions of the Italians, he felt that “the religion of Italy ought to be called the religion of Mary rather than the religion of Christ,” the answer, “made with perfect ease and entire frankness,” was:]—

That my impression was very natural—that such was really the appearance of things; that coming from Germany, where Christ on the cross was the ordinary object of veneration, into Italy, where the Virgin Mary was the universal object of reverence, it was no more than natural that such an impression should have been created—that such an impression was very much the reality of the case, and that, to his own knowledge, the religion of Italy was latterly becoming less and less the religion of Christ, and that “the devotion to the most Holy Virgin,” as he called it, was certainly on the increase.

I was perfectly startled, not indeed at the statement itself, for it was too palpably true to escape the observation of any one; but that a man, a minister of Christianity, should describe such a state of things with the manifest approval he exhibited, we were shocked.

He perceived this, and then proceeded to justify himself with an ingenuity and address that laid open the system, and exhibited the worship of Mary in a new light—at least, in a light in which I had never seen it before. He stated that there was a great difference in the bent or habit of mind, between English Protestants on one hand, and Italian Romanists on the other; that Protestants habitually let their minds dwell on Christ’s teaching, on Christ working miracles, and especially on Christ’s suffering, bleeding, dying on the cross; so that, in a Protestant mind, the great object was Christ in the maturity of his manhood; but that Romanists habitually dwelt on the childhood of Christ; not on the great events that were wrought in maturity and manhood, but on those interesting scenes which were connected with his childhood. He then went on to say that this habit of mind led to the great difference that, as Protestants always dwelt on the suffering and dying Christ, so Christ in a Protestant mind was always connected with the cross; and that as Romanists constantly meditated rather on the childhood of Christ, so Christ in a Romanist’s mind was usually associated with his mother, the Virgin Mary. He then continued to say that the constant dwelling of the mind in contemplation on the child, naturally led to more thought, more contemplation, more affection, and finally more devotion for the mother; that when, one thinks of all the little scenes of His childhood, dwells on the little incidents of interest between the child Jesus and the mother Mary, recollects that she had Him enshrined in her womb, that she used to lead Him by the hand, that she had listened to all His innocent prattle, that she had observed the opening of His mind; and that, during all those days of His happy childhood, she, and she alone of all the world, knew that little child whom she bore in her womb, and nursed at her breasts, and fondled in her arms, was her God—that when a man thinks, and habitually thinks of all this, the natural result is that his affections will be more drawn out, and his feelings of devotion more elevated towards Mary. And he concluded by stating that this habit of mind was becoming more general, and that it was to it that he would attribute the great increase that late years had witnessed in the devotion to the Virgin Mary. (pp. 45-47.)

He repeated what he had said before on this point expressive of the greater leniency, the gentler compassion, and the closer sympathies of Mary, adding that he was borne out in such an opinion by that of the Fathers, of whom many were of opinion that even Christ Himself was not so willing to hear our prayers, and did not hear them so quickly when offered simply to Himself, as when they were offered through the Blessed Virgin.

I felt this was a hideous sentiment, and could not forbear to say so, adding that when such opinions were circulated by the Priesthood, I could no longer feel surprised at the extent—the extravagance to which the devotion to Mary had gone in Rome—that I felt the whole devotional system of the Church of Rome, the prayers unceasingly offered to the Virgin, the innumerable pictures of the Virgin, the countless images of the Virgin, the many Churches dedicated to the Virgin, the universal devotion rendered to the Virgin, the manner in which all the services and prayers of the Church and people are impregnated with thoughts of the Virgin—the extent to which, in conversation, all classes went in speaking of the Virgin, all had impressed me with the feeling that the religion of Italy ought to be called the religion of the Virgin, and not the religion of Jesus Christ. I added that it was impossible to justify such a state of things. “If,” said I, “I enter the Church of the Augustines, I see there an image of the Virgin Mary as large as life. Some are decorating her with jewels as votive offering—some are suspending pictures around her as memorials of thankfulness—some are placing money in a box at her feet—some are prostrate in profound devotion before her—some are devoutly kissing her feet and touching them with their foreheads—some are repeating the rosary before her as if acceptable to her—all turning their backs upon the consecrated Host, turning their back upon that which the Priest is elevating at the High Altar, and which he and they believe to be Jesus Christ himself bodily and visibly among them—turning their backs upon Christ, and turning their faces to Mary, practically forsaking Christ for Mary, with a prostration the most profound before her image—a prostration that was never surpassed in the days of heathen Rome, and can never be justified in Christian Rome.”

He said, in answer to all this, that for his own part he would not act thus, and that it was not right to judge of the Church by the devotion of the ignorant.

My wife then interposed, and said she had witnessed all this, and was shocked at what seemed to her to be a most fearful idolatry, for while the Priest was saying mass, and elevating the Host at one end of the Church, and some of the people bowing before it, the image of Mary stood at the other end, and some of the people were in precisely the same way bowing before it. Some preferred what they believed to be Christ. Some preferred what they regarded as an image of the Virgin.

He replied, with much gentleness, that he never prayed to the Virgin of the Augustines—that it was not a slightly image—that it was really an ugly image, and had never excited his devotion, and in fact he had never prayed before it; but still he thought it scarcely fair to speak against this devotion to Mary as exhibited by the more ignorant, inasmuch as they had learned its value by experience. Many of those, whom we had witnessed there, had no doubt offered many a prayer to her and had found an answer. Many a mother praying for her child had obtained her petition. They were poor people, subject to privations, affliction, sickness, and they found relief and consolation in going to the blessed Virgin. (pp. 101-113.)

I therefore merely asked him, though with all the earnestness which I felt, whether, if attending the bed of a dying man, he would feel himself justified in speaking to an immortal soul, when about to pass into eternity, and desiring him to fly to Mary—that in all his doubts and perplexities he was to look to Mary—that in all his fears and terrors he was to look to Mary—I asked whether, considering his responsibility at such a moment, he would address a dying man in language that pointed only to the Virgin Mary, and made no mention of Jesus Christ? I then read the following words from the Roman Breviary:—“If the winds of temptation arise, if thou run upon the rocks of tribulation, look to the star, call upon Mary. If thou art tossed upon the waves of pride, of ambition, of detraction, of envy, look to the star, and call upon Mary. If at any time anger, or avarice, or the temptations of the flesh, toss the bark of thy mind, look to Mary. If disturbed with the greatness of thy sins, troubled at the defilement of thy conscience, affrighted at the horrors of the judgment, thou beginnest to be swallowed up in the gulf of sadness, the abyss of despair, think upon Mary—in dangers, in difficulties, in doubts, think upon Mary, invoke Mary. Let her not depart from thy mouth. Let her not depart from thy heart,” &c. I asked him solemnly whether he would use such language, even though sanctioned by his Breviary, in preparing a dying man for the presence of God in the eternal world.

to: He replied unhesitatingly that he would, and then went on to argue that experience justified him—that experience proved—that the prayers offered to the Virgin were heard and answered all—that mothers praying to her who was herself a mother, with all the sympathies of a mother, were heard and answered—such prayers for children in sin, or in danger, or in sickness, were heard and answered; and it was this practical of experience that proved the great encouragement to the devotion of ourselves to the Virgin Mary.—[These extracts are copied from the Christian Observer.]

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1849.

NOTICE TO THE CLERGY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

The Clergy of the City and County of Philadelphia, are requested to meet the Bishop of the Diocese at the Vestry Room of St. Andrew's Church, on Monday next, 15th instant, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

NEW YORK CONVENTION.

We have received a letter from a member of the New York Convention, complaining that our abstract of the proceedings did not present, fully and fairly, the action in relation to the Missionary Committee. He fears that from the mere statement of the reconsideration of the vote by which the committee had been elected, and the re-organization of the committee, the Convention might appear to have assented to the want of confidence entertained and expressed by some individuals. We supposed that the names of the mover and seconder of the resolutions were sufficient to prevent any such misunderstanding.

The facts of the case are simply these. A Canon of the diocese orders that collections should be made in every parish, for of a certain diocesan charities, to be distributed under the direction of a Missionary Committee. Some parishes have not obeyed this Canon. The Rev. Dr. Higbee offered a resolution to the effect, "that it is the bounden duty of every clergyman having a Parochial Charge," to fulfil this requisition. In the course of the debate, it came out that some parishes refused to obey this Canon, because "the Minority" were not fairly represented in the committee, and therefore they had not confidence in its administration. By the way, this is a new kind of churchmanship which has sprung up in New York, the divisions of which are designated by the terms "Majority" and "Minority."

When the difficulty was fairly stated, the Rev. Mr. Cox, chairman of the committee, one of the "Majority," submitted a proposition that the whole committee should be given to the "minority." Acting upon this voluntary surrender, Mr. Dr. Spencer offered his resolutions, which were seconded by the Rev. Dr. Higbee, who expressed his willingness to resign his place, both of whom belong to the "majority." Thus, it was in accordance with the wish of those who had been elected that a new appointment was made, in which the "minority" was allowed to have seven and the "majority" three. This was certainly a wise and generous effort to bring the "minority" over to the "majority." Every fair and candid mind must regard this as indicating a willingness to advance the interests of the whole diocese, and for the blessed cause of CHARITY, to lay aside all inferior considerations. Oh, how well it would be for the Church if such a spirit animated her members in all their deliberations and actions! As to the other transactions of this Convention we think it requires but a small share of common sense to interpret them. The view which the "minority" took of the action of the Convention in relation to Bishop Onderdonk, is declared with sufficient plainness in "the Protest" signed by a large portion of them.

The following may be regarded as the judgment of a less partial witness. It is taken from the NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER, a journal not under the influence of any party in the Church.

THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CONVENTION.

We have attended each of the protracted sessions of this important body, which finally adjourned last night, between 11 and 12 o'clock. As we predicted, the convention, though it did not seem to regard with much favour the Rev. Dr. Sherwood's ponderous preamble and resolution, did adopt, by a large majority, a substitute of the same character, presented by Rev. Dr. Higbee, after having refused to adopt, also by a large majority, a direct requisition upon the Bishop for a resignation, proposed by Rev. Dr. Whitehouse. The resolution proposed by Dr. Higbee, and adopted at a late hour last night, empowers the standing committee to prepare and present an address to the House of Bishops, praying for the determination of Bishop Onderdonk's sentence by a declaration, on their part, on what terms or at what time that sentence shall expire.

It seems to us that the Bishop's friends have secured more by the adoption of Dr. Higbee's resolution than they would have done by the passage of Dr. Sherwood's without his preamble—which preamble, it is pretty certain, could not have been carried through the convention. Had the resolution required that the address, which the standing committee are empowered to present to the House of Bishops, should be submitted to the convention, or to a special committee on which the minority were represented, the triumph of the Bishop's friends would have been less complete.—As the matter stands, the standing committee, composed exclusively, we believe, of the majority members, is instructed to say what it chooses, and what it says must be received as the language and sentiment of the convention. The minority, whose protest the convention refused to receive, appear to rely upon the conservative character of the highest judicature of the Church as a barrier to the Bishop's restoration; nor did we hear any of the majority express a confident expectation that the House of Bishops would give a favorable response to the address.

Other important subjects were disposed of by the convention, the members of which displayed a remarkable combination of candor, courtesy and independence. Once or twice, perhaps, the speakers indulged in special pleading and seemed rather more disposed to secure a majority for their views than to yield to the force of argument. It would have been strange indeed had there been, in so large an assembly, moved by such diversity of sentiment, no temporary display of such feeling. But on the whole the debates were conducted in a spirit that, under all the peculiar circumstances, reflected credit even upon a Christian assembly. On all subjects, except the vexed one of Bishop or no Bishop, the merits of the question were mainly regarded and fully discussed; and on all occasions both clergy and laity spoke and voted with noble and manly independence, and seemed to respect each other for doing so. We apprehend that the difficulty respecting the diocesan question is to be found in the strong Church principle, more or less dominant in the heart of each member but always operative in all, though sometimes influenced by, sometimes in conflict with, external circumstances or personal predilections.

The question whether non-communicants shall continue to be eligible for lay members of the convention having been sent back to the churches, as one to be finally decided at this convention, elicited much able discussion. The decision of the convention in 1848 was decidedly favorable to the exclusion of non-communicants, both clergy and laity having strongly supported the proposition. As it was understood that at this convention that question would be prominent and must be finally acted upon, it is fair to suppose that lay-delegates were appointed with reference to it. The large majority against the proposition this year is therefore significant, and we suppose will set that matter at rest, for many years at least. The convention, while making a decided expression on this particular qualification, only postponed the consideration of other qualifications until a Bishop sits in the councils of the Church.

Another important action of the convention was the disbanding of the missionary board, within a few hours of its re-appointment, and its reconstruction upon a more liberal basis. The sudden outburst of feeling, the frank avowals and explanations, the entire and sudden breaking down of the ordinary distinctions of minority and majority, the quick yielding to the pressure of what up to that moment had been regarded as the majority, the promptness with which, on both sides, the evil complained of was remedied and differences were adjusted, presented altogether a scene rarely occurring in a legislative body, and showed alike the latent power of the minority and the generous impulses of the congregated members, when not fettered or controlled by differences about principles. The concessions, and the reconstruction of the missionary committee upon the just principles of a minority as well as a majority representation, cannot fail, we should think, to produce most gratifying results in the missionary operations of the church.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

The Editor of the Banner has received $35, as "a thank-offering, for the Swedes Church in Chicago, Illinois, under the charge of the Rev. Mr. Unonius," through the Missionary Society of Immanuel Church, Holmesburgh, Pa. This contribution makes $56 received from the parish at Holmesburgh for the same object. An opportunity is offered for our city churches to follow so good an example. The Rev. Mr. Unonius is now in Philadelphia to present in person the claims of his mission. Any contributions sent to our Office will, at once, reach him. We know of no more interesting or important object for the application of charity. On Sunday afternoon, he will make a statement of the case in St. Andrew's Church. Those who feel interested are earnestly invited to attend.

CALVARY CHURCH, NEW YORK.

We copy with great pleasure, the following editorial from the New York Courier and Enquirer. We have thought it hardly worth while to correct the misstatements which have been current, both in public and private, on this subject. We felt confident all would be made clear and the true condition of this important parish be known. We congratulate the members of Calvary Church upon the happy result which continues to them the ministerial labors of their able and devoted Rector. We think Church papers should, before giving currency to a report, consider the value of the source whence it comes.

CALVARY CHURCH.—Various paragraphs have appeared in the newspapers of late, alluding to pecuniary difficulties in this Church; and finally, it was recently announced that the able, eloquent, and popular Rector of the Church—the Rev. Samuel L. Southard—had resigned his Pastoral charge and retired into New Jersey.

Matters so purely clerical and local, are not suitable subjects for newspaper paragraphs; but in as much as the pecuniary difficulties of Calvary Church have been thus brought before the public, we deem it due to the parties concerned to make the following statement.

It is true that Calvary Church is involved in a floating debt of about $22,000, and that in consequence of the derangement of its pecuniary affairs, the Rev. Mr. Southard did, on a recent occasion, tender his resignation. We are happy to add however, that at a meeting of the Vestry on Wednesday evening last, they refused to accept his resignation, and passed a resolution setting forth that if Mr. Southard would resume his Pastoral labors, there could be but little doubt that the indebtedness of the Church would be provided for, and "earnestly and affectionately" calling upon him to withdraw his resignation.

This resolution was served upon Mr. Southard yesterday morning; and we are quite sure that all the friends of one of the ablest and most eloquent Divines in the Episcopal Church, will be gratified to learn, that he promptly withdrew his resignation, and will to-morrow resume his labors in the pulpit of a Church which, under his pastoral care, has grown and prospered beyond that of any other church in our diocese during the same period of time.

In regard to the financial affairs of Calvary Church, it is proper to add, now that the subject has been commented upon by the press, that the ground upon which it was erected, is worth not less than thirty thousand dollars; and that the building and properties of the church—all new, or nearly so—have cost about seventy thousand dollars. There is a mortgage upon it for eighteen thousand dollars which has been assumed by the Corporation of Trinity Church; and that the twenty-two thousand dollars about to be raised, and which will cover its entire indebtedness, will hereafter constitute its only debt!

We make this statement upon a full knowledge of all the facts of the case; and we question whether there are many Churches in this city or elsewhere, which can boast, that with a noble edifice worth $75,000 erected upon lots worth under the hammer to-day, some thirty thousand dollars, their indebtedness of every kind, amounts to less than twenty-five thousand dollars!

Such, however, is the fact in regard to Calvary Church. The corporation of Trinity Church having very properly and magnanimously assumed the mortgage for eighteen thousand dollars, the entire debt of the church will be less than twenty-five thousand dollars, for which the creditors will hold what is virtually a first mortgage upon property worth one hundred thousand dollars.

ACADEMIC STUDIES.

Such is the title of "an Inaugural Discourse, pronounced before the Senate of Trinity College, Hartford, on Commencement Day, 1849, by the Rev. John Williams, D. D., President of the College." afterwards Bishop

The author presents his subject, and its divisions, to his hearers in the following words:

Adopting, then, the language of one of the lights of a foreign University, which fortunately with hardly a change we can adopt, though speaking from a far humbler position, I would say in the beginning, that "The studies of this place, so far as they relate to merely human learning," and so far only at present we propose to speak of them, "divide themselves into three branches.

I. The study of the laws of nature, comprehending all parts of inductive philosophy.

II. The study of ancient and modern languages, and literature; or in other words, of those authentic records which convey to us an account of the feelings, the sentiments and the actions, of men prominent in the most famous empires of the ancient and the modern world. In these works we seek for examples and maxims of prudence, and models of taste.

III. The study of ourselves considered as social and intellectual beings. Under this head, are included ethics, and metaphysics, political philosophy, history, and some other kindred subjects of great complexity, which can be only briefly touched in our academic system, and are to be followed out in the more mature labors of after life."

The important topics included in the wide field of discussion here presented, are treated in a concise and pointed manner and in a spirit worthy of the President of a Church College.

HONORARY DEGREE.—At the late commencement of Columbia College, the degree of Doctor in Divinity was conferred upon the Rev. Robert W. Harris, Rector of Grace Church, White Plains, son of the late Rev. Wm. Harris, D. D., former President of the Institution.

PRESBYTERIAN CLERGYMAN LOOKING FOR THE CHURCH.

Among our selections will be found the first chapter of this instructive and interesting work. This is the best notice we have given of it. The Book will be found for sale, at the store of Mr. R. S. H. George, in Seventh street, above Chestnut.

THE CHURCH REVIEW.

We gave a brief notice of this Periodical in our last number. A more careful examination of its able articles confirms the favourable opinion expressed concerning it. This Review has now proved itself worthy of the support of the Church, and for the credit of her members we hope it will not fail to receive the patronage so well deserved. We have taken the liberty of copying an article, to show those who are ignorant of its character, how much they lose in not becoming subscribers.

NEW CHURCH AT THE VILLAGE OF RISING SUN.

We have had an opportunity of seeing the plan of this proposed church. It is a very suitable one for a village church. A liberal member of the Church has given the stone, and another expected to give the lot. About $3,000 more are needed, a portion of which has been already promised. This will enable those engaged in this important enterprise to carry out the plan, and give to a region much in need of it, a simple, church-like, and beautiful Sanctuary. We hope the members of the Church will not forget this call upon their bounty.

In the last Episcopal Recorder we find a copy of Resolutions passed by the Vestry of St. Philip's Church, Philadelphia, in reference to the resignation of their late Rector, the Rev. Dr. Neville. These resolutions express the regret of the Vestry and are highly complimentary to Dr. Neville. In the Rectorship of Christ Church, New Orleans, he will find an important sphere of duty, and we trust that his labors may be blessed therein in advancing the great ends proposed by the Church of the living God, the Pillar and Ground of the Truth.

MACAULAY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

We received from Louisville, a pamphlet of nearly eighty half the following title:

EXAMINATION OF CERTAIN STATEMENTS IN MACAULAY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND, in regard to the Church of England; of articles in the Louisville Journal, attributed to the Craik, Rector of Christ Church, Louisville, and to John McGill, V. G., Pastor of St. Louis Cathedral, Ky."

not yet had time to read it. From a partial examination of the fact that the Rev. Mr. Craik having questioned some of Mr. Macaulay's statements, a Roman Catholic to defend Mr. M. in his attacks on Mr. M. We wonder if our friend To some people one would desire to be found in such company so handsomely do they commend the opposite reason

We fully agree with the following notice from a correspondent. We have received the pamphlet, which will be found for sale at Mr. Hooker's, who has now become agent in this city for the Sunday School Union of the Church.

We will let our correspondent speak in our behalf, as we had designed noticing the work.

"THE CATHOLIC SAVED FROM POPERY."

This, Mr. Editor, is the title of a pamphlet written by the Rev. John Alden Spooner, and published at the Depository, 20, John street, New York.

It contains a most interesting account of the restoration of a member of the Church, who had been perverted to Romanism. Under God, this result was owing to the perseverance and ability of the author of the pamphlet, which contains a most admirable letter, characterized throughout by acuteness, Christian earnestness, and pastoral fidelity. This letter retarded his progress in Romanism; and finally, was the chief cause of his return to the faith of his fathers. "He confessed that every time he renewed his attempt to answer the objections made by the letter, each time he felt himself more and more embarrassed."

The fourth and chief point presented for Mr. B.'s consideration, is argued with great force and clearness: this is the point. "If you should persist in adhering to the Roman obedience, you cannot free your soul from the guilt of Schism." Confining himself to Lingard, the candid and learned Romish writer of the "History of the Anglo-Saxon Church," he proves in the most conclusive manner, the existence of the Church in England, for 600 years before Romish missionaries set foot there; and further, he exhibits with marked ability the wicked policy pursued by Rome for 900 years.

His thorough acquaintance with Lingard has enabled him to present this subject in a manner that is entirely unanswerable by Romanists, and that will greatly aid in establishing the weak and wavering. I sincerely hope that it may have a wide circulation, such as it eminently deserves. This is no pamphlet of a day, but one that will be permanently useful.

NEW YORK ECCLESIOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

The society held its stated quarterly meeting on Monday evening, Oct. 1st, at the usual place. In the absence of the President, the Rev. Dr. Vinton, Vice President, took the chair.

After the reading of the minutes, the report of the Committee was read by the Rev. S. Cox, Hon. Secretary. It announced the election during the past quarter, of seven ordinary members, viz:

The Rev. J. H. Hobart, of Trinity parish, New York, Jno. W. Pierson, Esq., of New York, Daniel Bowly, Esq., of New York. The Rev. Wm. Creighton, D. D., of Sing-Sing, N. Y., Jno. R. Livingston, Jr. Esq., of New York, Henry E. Pierrepont, Esq., of Brooklyn, and Eugene Scieffelin, Esq. of New York: and also the election of Richard Upjohn, Esq., Architect, of New York, an honorary member.

The Committee reported also the completion of Vol. I. of the New York Ecclesiologist, and laid before the Society a resolution, that it should hereafter be sent free to all the members of the Society, which resolution they were subsequently authorized to carry into effect. They reported also the gift to the library, from a lady, of "Britton's Norwich and York Cathedrals."

The regular paper was then read by the Rev. Henry McVickar, on the subject,—"The advantages of adopting a single style of architecture."

On motion of Mr. R. Ralston Cox, Mr. J. H. Hopkins, Jr., was appointed to read the regular paper at the Society's next meeting, on the subject,—"Symbolism in architecture."

Some discussion was held in reference to the propriety and expediency of returning a vote of thanks to the reader of every regular paper, which ended in a recurrence to the past custom of returning such a vote, with the understanding that it was not implied thereby that the Society approves and adopts all the opinions expressed in such papers; nor is such approval at all implied by the publication of the papers in the Ecclesiologist, although the editors would not publish a paper which they did not consider to be substantially correct.

An interesting letter was then read by R. Ralston Cox, Hon. Secretary, from the Rev. N. F. Lightfoot, Hon. Sec. of the Exeter Diocesan Architectural Society.

After some further business, and some informal conversation on the subject of the Gregorian Chant, the society adjourned.

HOLMESBURGH FEMALE SEMINARY.

We have been favored with a Circular of this Institution of which the Misses Chapman are Principals. The convenience of its situation, the well known character of the Principals, and the moderate terms on which its advantages are enjoyed, will we trust, secure for it the patronage of the Church.

From late English Papers.

The Papers received by the last Steamer, were largely occupied with complaints against the Government for refusing to appoint a Day of Humiliation, Fasting and Prayer, in reference to the visitation under which the nation is now suffering. The voice of the people of England is loud in demanding this proper observance. Why the Government refuses to gratify this desire it would be difficult to say.

In this country some reasons of policy might have been found for such an omission. But in a Government where Church and State are united, and which therefore has a supposed religious character, policy seems to unite with piety, in no very usual conjunction, to ask for a public recognition of that Almighty Providence which overrules the kingdoms of the earth.

We are glad, however, to find in the Guardian, the following favorable report with respect to

THE CHOLERA.

We are thankful to be able to point to the returns published in another column, as exhibiting a decided abatement in the pestilence with which it has pleased the Almighty to visit this metropolis during the last two months. We are led to hope that the prayers of the righteous few who have turned to the Lord in humiliation, fasting, and prayer have availed much.

The accounts of the attendance at the churches which have been opened for daily services, are most gratifying, and we trust that many doors that have been hitherto closed to the daily worshipper will be allowed to remain open for his continued benefit after the visitation is past.

The form of prayer ordered by the Privy Council has been issued by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and was used on Sunday. It will be seen by the letters we publish elsewhere that many of the Bishops have, some of their own accord others at the instance of the clergy, set apart days for the humiliation and fasting, endeavouring as they best may to supply the unfulfilled duty of the State. In London the dis-appointment felt at the Bishop of the Diocese—merely setting apart a Sunday—has led to a memorial from some of the Clergy to the Archbishop of Canterbury, praying that he will order a general day of fasting throughout his province. We wish his Grace had done so before, as it will no doubt be said that in many parts days have already been set aside. Still this is no reason why by far the larger portion of the province should not have the opportunity of filling up a neglected duty; and in a few instances where one day has been observed would a second day be objected to. Indeed, in many parts, several days have been ordered. We trust, therefore, the memorial will be listened to, and the Church show that motherly care for her children which the State has so woefully neglected.

In speaking above of the decrease in the number of deaths from cholera, we have alluded only to the metropolis; but the accounts from the country are, we believe, equally favourable. The returns of the Board of Health are, unfortunately, useless just now as a guide, out of the metropolitan districts. They have been, and still are, very incomplete. Many towns in which the disease has shown itself with more or less virulence for the last month, and now disappeared altogether, are to be found for the first time in yesterday's lists. Even with this mistake the totals of the last day or two have been less, and we trust the most virulent stage, in God's mercy, has passed. The returns published on Monday were—London 246; England and Wales, 730; Scotland, 31; Total, 1,007. Yesterday—London, 215; England and Wales, 503; Scotland, 48; Total, 766. Diarrhoea—Monday, 234; Yesterday, 158. It is also to be observed that the returns published yesterday include two days, viz., Sunday and Monday.

We find the following Prayer set forth by the Chief Rabbi, to be used in all the synagogues of the united congregations of the British empire on account of the mortality caused by the cholera, after reading the penitential psalms of David—viz., the 22d, 91st, and 103d, by the reader and congregation. We are struck with its appropriateness. Were it not for the one sad omission it might be a help to some Christians in making prayers.

"Lord Almighty! gracious, and full of compassion, who has created the universe by thy wisdom. Thine eyes are upon the earth, from the beginning of the year even unto the end thereof. Thou formedst the light and the darkness. Thou spreadest peace and raiseth calamity. To Thee, O Lord! we approach now when our souls are overwhelmed by amazement and affliction. Thou hast visited the inhabitants of this country by sending forth among them a raging disease—a dreadful destruction, so that every nerve trembles, every heart palpitates thereat. Verily, we know, O God, Thy judgments are just, for no evil can issue from Thee, the source of all goodness and mercy; but Thou chastenest us for our sins, because our iniquities and transgressions are heavy upon us, and our hearts forward and perverse. We beseech Thee, O Lord, to let our penitential prayers ascend unto Thee like incense. In thy mercy attend not to our wickedness, but cause us to return unto Thee by a perfect repentance. Let Thy countenance shine upon us Thy servants. Withdraw this plague from our land. Be as heretofore our rock and our shelter, and deliver not the beings of Thine hand unto this destroying visitation. Be Thou, O Lord, at the right hand of the physicians; enlighten their spirits and guide their counsels, for Thou alone art the merciful, the mighty healer. Father! full of grace, heal the hearts which are broken, bind up the wounds which are bleeding, soothe the souls which are afflicted, and grant that we may turn even the afflictions which befall us into a corrective to our souls. Bless us, and bless our children. Pour out Thy Divine Spirit upon all men, and restore unto us a year of life and plenty—a year of peace and redemption. Amen."

ROME.

A letter from Rome of the 8th instant asserts that the French ultimatum has been reduced to three points—a council of state, with a deliberate voice for the interior; a partial amnesty; a withdrawal of all paper money, by paying all debts hitherto contracted, and thus acknowledging the acts of the Provisional Government. Pius IX. and Cardinal Antonelli are said still to resist and to declare that His Holiness will not submit to the appearance of acting under the dictation of any party.

DAILY PRAYER.

By MRS. JOSEPH C. NEAL.

"My house is the house of prayer."
"And he taught daily in the Temple."

GOSPEL OF ST. LUKE.

How sweet a chime rings from the old church tower
Above the noise of traffic and of strife!
To Mammon's worship six full days are given:
But one, to seek to lead a truer life,
And now through open mart and throng'd street
We hear the hum of trade, the tread of busy feet.

Yet, over all, once more that solemn tone
Dies faintly, slowly, while among the crowd
Some few have turned, and, guided by its voice, Within God's Temple reverently have bowed.
A twilight hush is in the hallow'd air,
And peace steals o'er each heart now come to worship there.

Without, the dead sleep tranquilly beneath
The shadow of the church, where hoary trees
Fling out the deepening coolness of their boughs,
Waved gently by the odorous evening breeze;
Within, the living not less silent wait
The hour that calms the happy, soothes the desolate.

Some come from homes where all is love and peace,
From very thankfulness, their offer'd prayer;
Others seek earnestly for strength to win
In daily combat with a fierce despair;
All, humbly kneeling, errors past confess;
Our Father first forgives those he will freely bless.

A faint soft sunlight, gliding through the aisles,
The font, the altar in a shadow dim;
The pastor's gentle voice, the low response,
The solemn anthem and the joyful hymn,
While surging upward, swells unchecked and free,
The organ's undulating waves of melody!

Oh, who could kneel surrounded thus, nor pray
Earnestly, humbly, for a heart made pure?
And who could thence go forth into the world
Nor feel his spirit stronger to endure?
Thrice blest are they, who thus these courts may tread,
For there our Father gives his promised "daily bread."

THE CHURCH ALMANAC FOR 1850.

MR. EDITOR:—We have given some time to a careful examination of this valuable annual publication, and can attest its very minute accuracy, beyond that of former years.

It is, however, a subject of regret, that the Editors are unable to give the returns of Ecclesiastical matters complete in every respect. They have good reason to complain that so few of the Journals of our Diocesan Conventions are sent to the Board of Publication, and that many of those already received are not accompanied by a full Statistical Table. Such a table is found only in ten out of twenty-eight Journals last published. While this is the case any General Table can exhibit only an approximation to the truth. It is much to be desired that greater attention should be given to the subject.

The summary given, exhibits the American Church in a very favorable contrast to that of preceding years. It is as follows: Dioceses, 28; Bishops, (elect, 2,) 32; Priests and Deacons, 1,521; whole number of Clergy, 1,553; Candidates for Orders, (estimated for 9 Dioceses,) 233.

Baptisms, (estimated for 15 Dioceses,)—Adults, 2,675, Infants, 13,698—Total, 16,604; Confirmed, (estimated for 4 Dioceses,) 6,723; Communicants, (estimated for 14 Dioceses,) 93,436.

Marriages, (in 11 Dioceses,) 1,938; Burials, (in 11 Dioceses,) 3,534; Sunday School Teachers, (in 10 Dioceses,) 2,142; Scholars, (in 11 Dioceses,) 18,237.

Churches Consecrated, (in 14 Dioceses,) 50. Offerings, (in 13 Dioceses,) $10,104 92.

It is proper to remark in this connexion, to prevent mistake, that what are here denominated "OFFERINGS," appear to be not the sum total of all the CONTRIBUTIONS in the several dioceses, but only of a certain class; for example, the "OFFERINGS" in the Diocese of New Jersey during the current year are stated to be $1,342. This is evidently given on the authority of the latest Episcopal Address to the Convention of that See, and is correct, but from a Table appended to the Journal, a copy of which is in my possession, the sum total of CONTRIBUTIONS OR OFFERINGS of the Diocese, for all purposes, is over $7,500. We presume the same may be said of "OFFERINGS" in other Dioceses.

In addition to the usual items of interest, the Almanac gives the Ecclesiastical Calendar neatly and creditably printed.

It affords one a view of Diocesan institutions ranged in their several order, as Dioceses and Missions, a prominent place, we are pleased to perceive, being awarded to the Church's institutions for Christian education, there being above fifty Colleges, Seminaries, or educational corporations, within her borders.

An Alphabetical list of Priests and Deacons, preceded by a table of our living Prelates in order of priority by Consecration, and followed by a similar table of Bishops in other reformed branches of the Church, in England, Scotland, Ireland, and the English Colonies in order of priority of station, completes the present publication, thus keeping us in constant mind of the old axiom, Ecclesia in Episcopo.

A word, before we close this imperfect notice, concerning the external appearance of this Almanac. There is so much flashy and ornamental printing of our books and pamphlets now-a-days, that the eye sparkles to see an occasional neat and plain impression. So it is with the typography of the Banner, and so it should be with this little annual, et cetera.

Away then with such a quantity of fancy printing and ornamental pictures on little pages, and let us have the plainness for which English publishing is so widely celebrated.

Obituary.

For the Banner of the Cross.

DIED, near Brownsville, Tenn., at the residence of her husband, Wm. P. Bond, Esq., on the 2d of August, MRS. REBECCA BOND, in the 38th year of her age. She was the daughter of the late Marmaduke Johnston, of North Carolina, was born at Warrentown in that state, the 26th day of April, 1812, and for many years was a devout and exemplary communicant of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Few persons of her age have been called to drink so deeply of the waters of affliction, and few have drained the bitter cup with more humble resignation to the will of God, and with more childlike reliance upon Divine grace for support and consolation. In the sad list of her bereavements, she could number her parents, all her brothers and sisters but one, two kind husbands—one the Rev. Jno. Chilton—and two children in the bloom of youthful promise.

Her sufferings during her last illness were intense; but they were borne with uncomplaining meekness, and with Christian fortitude. Being apprised of her approaching dissolution, some days previous to her decease, she expressed frequently and constantly, her entire resignation to the Divine will, kissing the rod of affliction, and rejoicing in the pleasing hope of a blissful immortality. As the sands of the last numbered hour were running, and she was about to enter "the dark valley of the shadow of death," she called to her bedside her children, and gave to each of them a mother's blessing, inculcating earnestly the duty of trust in God, and the necessity of a holy life, in order to a peaceful death. Summoning to a last interview many other relatives, whom love and affection had drawn to her dwelling, she gave to each one of them some token of affectionate remembrance, and then gently fell asleep, "having the testimony of a good conscience, in the communion of the Catholic Church, in the confidence of a certain faith, in the comfort of a reasonable, religious and holy hope, in favor with God, and in perfect charity with the world." Such a death might have been reasonably looked for from her previous life. She was watchful over herself, attentive to her religious duties both at home and in the sanctuary, illustrating the truth and soundness of her religious principles by the holiness of her life, endeavoring to "keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." In all the relations of life, as a Christian, wife, mother and friend, she was a worthy and commendable example of holiness, fidelity, tenderness and affection; endeared to all who knew her by the constant exercise of her religious, social and domestic virtues.

"O wear for me no sable hue!

No garb of blazon'd grief—when I Shall bid the gladsome earth adieu,

And fling my spirit's garment by!

Nor mark the spot by urn or stone,

Where worthless dust unconscious lies;

Within your loving hearts alone,

The monument I ask should rise!"

MONICA, THE MOTHER OF AUGUSTINE.

A CHURCH BALLAD.

By the Rev. Edward C. Jones.

St. Augustine was born in Africa, and in his early life fell into vices, and adopted the Manichean heresy. He became an attendant on the ministry of Ambrose, while his pious mother, Monica, prayed continually for his conversion. His mind was now completely changed; he was made Presbyterian, and afterwards Bishop of Hippo.—(Palmer's Ch. Hist. pp. 62 and 63.)

He woke from fitful slumber—woke to muse,
Of sinful joys in prospect—and the hues
Of magic, coloured all the hours to come,
While thoughts of mother, God, and heavenly home,
All succumbed to the one intense desire,
Of feeding to the full, base passion's fiercest fire!!

A Mother wrestled for that erring Son,
With heart all bursting, and with yearning soul,
As Ocean-bed so deep did feeling run,
Strong as the surges as they onward roll,
Dead to all thought but this—that Folly's child,
Might break the maze of vice, and be no more beguiled.

A pen was wielded by a master hand,
And Heresy recoiled—for Truth was power,*
And who, for God, the Altar-fire hath fanned,
But he, who turned from that Circean bower,
Turned in his manhood's might, now strong in grace,
And sought within the Church, a stable resting-place.

A Bishop ruled in Hippo—and his heart,
Large as the circle of his constant care,
Was all his Master's, earth could claim no part;
His life was labor, and his breath was prayer,
That Bishop all a mother's hopes had crowned,
A brand from burning plucked—a lost one more than found.

Monica! thy soft graces all were hid,
In the effulgence of thy loved one's fame,
But can we muse on what AUGUSTINE did,
And not revere his Parent's honoured name?
In memory's tide, both shall commingling run
Both thrill the breast with joy, that Mother and her Son!!

Miscellaneous.

INCREASE OF CRIME.

Every one who is in the habit of reading the daily papers, must have noticed the fact that crime is fearfully on the increase in this country. Murders, and robberies, and assaults, are becoming the ordinary occurrences of every-day life. When we take up a newspaper, we expect to see a record of crime as much as we expect to see a shipping list. Within two weeks past, there have been some of the boldest robberies in open daylight, and the most daring assaults in the night time, which have ever been perpetrated in this city. Thefts in every form, are daily committed by men, women, and children. The officers of the law are resisted and assaulted; and this whole thing is on the increase, without any immediate prospect of abatement.

What is the cause of this increase of crime? In this question every good citizen has an interest, for the life and property of every citizen is, in these times, put in jeopardy. We shall not attempt to point out these causes, and shall only suggest one point as worthy of consideration. May not much of the boldness which characterizes the villainy of the present age, be attributed to the want of a certain and rigorous execution of the laws? We have laws enough, and ministers of the law enough, and we should have less rogues if these laws were more sternly and thoroughly enforced.

There is one fact that surely favors this view. In the City of San Francisco, where there are thousands of people, of all "sorts and conditions," from almost every nation, of every grade of moral character, and where there is no organized civil government whatever, it is said that theft is comparatively rare. Valuable goods are left out at night unprotected, and yet they remain quite secure from all depredation. Now, why is this? Is not the reason found in the fact, that the people have made an agreement that whoever is found guilty of stealing, shall be punished severely and certainly? We have understood that such as are found guilty of this offence for the third time, are condemned to suffer death. What but the certainty and the severity of the punishment, deters these men from the commission of crime? In the city of Boston—in the metropolis of this land of churches and schools—in a city distinguished for the intelligence and morality of the great body of its citizens, how would property fare if left out in the streets through the night? Why, all the bolts and bars, and constables and judicious state prisons we have, do not suffice to protect property. Robbers will boldly enter our banks and stores in daylight, and rob men of their money. They will kill intellectual citizens in the public streets, in the night time, and meta-is secure from their depredations, and nobody is safer kindred murderous assaults. There has been, of late years, a touching sympathy expressed for criminals, on the part of what we call the more but misguided men, who call themselves philanthropists. This added to the proverbial "glorious uncertainty" discussion has, we believe, served to encourage the increase of crime in the criminal code, which now obtains in San Francisco. In operation here, and we may depend upon it that it will grow scarce, and criminals will "thin off." This is a worthy of attention.—Christian Witness.

THE FLOWER THAT LOOKS UPWARD.

A group of young and light-hearted girls sat together in the twilight busily arranging the flowers they had been gathering in the pleasant woods and fields.

"What beautiful things flowers are!" said one. "And what a pleasant amusement it would be, now that we are all sitting here so quietly, if each were to choose which flower she would rather be like."

"Just as if there could be any choice," exclaimed Laura Bennet, a little proudly—and holding up a moss rose as she spoke. "Among all the flowers that grows, there is nothing to vie in beauty with the rose. Let me be the queen of flowers, or none!"

"For my part," observed her sister Helen, "I should like to resemble the luxuriant rhododendron, so beautifully described in our book of flowers. When any one, in passing, shakes it roughly, it scatters, as we are told, a shower of honey-dew from its roseate cups, and immediately begins to fill its chalice anew with transparent ambrosia; teaching us to shower sweetness even upon the hands that disturb us, and to fill once more with pure honey-drops the chalices of our inward thoughts. Oh! who would not wish to be meek and forgiving, like the rhododendron, if they could? But it is very difficult," added poor Helen, with tears in her eyes.

"It is, indeed," said Lucy Neville, gently, "if we trust only in our own strength."

"And who is there to help us? It is only when my father looks at me in his grave, kind manner, that I have the slightest control over myself."

"What a pity it is," said Lucy, simply, "that we cannot always remember that the eye of our Heavenly father is ever upon us."

"I wish I could," replied Helen.

"I have heard my mother say," observed Lucy, "that praying is better than wishing."

"Now, Clara," interrupted Laura Bennet, turning impatiently towards a fair gentle looking girl by her side, "we are waiting for you."

Clara smiled and immediately chose the pale convolvulus, or bindweed, winding so caressingly in and out among the bushes and flinging over them a graceful covering, an emblem of meek beauty and loving tenderness. "The only pity is," said she, "that it should so soon close up and fade."

"But what says our dear Lucy?" exclaimed Helen.

"I think that I can guess," said Clara Seymour; "either a violet or a heart's-ease—am I right?"

"Not quite," replied Lucy, with a deep blush; "although both the flowers that you have mentioned are favorites of mine. But I should like to resemble the daisy most, because it is always looking upward."

"Do tell me," said Helen, as they walked home together, carrying the flowers which they had gathered to adorn their several dwellings, "do tell me what made you wish just now to be always looking upward, like the daisy?"

"Oh, Helen, can you ask? What more do you require for happiness than to be able, let the cloud be ever so dark, to look upward with the eye of faith, and say, It is the Lord's will, and therefore it is best?"

"Do you always think thus?" asked Helen.

"Alas, no!" replied poor Lucy, while the tears fell fast. "But I am trying and praying to God to teach me."—Lutheran Standard.

ENGLISH LITURGY.

The ritual of England breathes a divine calm. You think of the people walking through ripening fields on a mild day to the church-door. It is the work of a wealthy nation, that by dedicating part of its wealth consecrates the remainder—that acknowledges the fountain from which it all flows. The prayers are devout, humble, fervent: they are not impassioned: a wonderful temperance and sobriety of discretion—that which, in worldly things, would be called good sense—prevails in them: but you must name it better in things spiritual. The framers evidently bore in mind the continual consciousness of writing for all. That is the guiding, tempering, calming spirit that keeps the whole in tone—that, and the hallowing, chastening awe which subdues vehemence, even in the asking for the infinite, by those who have nothing but that which they earnestly ask, and who know that unless they ask infinitely they ask nothing. In every word, the whole congregation, the whole nation prays—not the individual minister; the officiating divine functionary—not the man. Nor must it be forgotten that the received Version of the Book of Common Prayer—observe the word common, expressing exactly what I affirm—are beautiful by the words—that there is no other such English—simple, touching, apt, venerable—hued as the thoughts are—musical—the most English that is known—of a Hebraic strength and antiquity, yet lucid and gracious as if of and for to-day.—Blackwood's Magazine.

PRAYER FOR SLEEP.

In a beautiful hymn composed by Sir Thomas Brown, as a half adieu for each night to the world, are these striking lines:

Sleep is death. O make me try,
By sleeping, what it is to die;
And as I gently lay my head
On my grave as on my bed;
Howe'er I rest, Great God, let me
Awake again at last with thee;
And thus assured, behold I lie
Securely—or to wake or die.
These are my drowsy days; in vain
I do now wake to sleep again;
O come that hour, when I shall never Sleep again, but wake for ever.

To some people one would be willing to owe almost everything, so handsomely do they confer kindness; while from others a favour, for the opposite reason, is a load.

YOUNG MINISTERS.

POSSIBLE ERRORS OF, AND IN RESPECT TO.

BY TRUMAN PLAYFAIR.

No. 1 The young minister, having long been accustomed to prepare exercises with critical exactness, to be read before his class-mates, may imagine that his hearers are all like his former associates, and hence prepare his sermons with reference to the head and not to the heart.

No. 2 The church and society having long been accustomed to listen to sermons that were like the former chaos of creation, "without form and void," while darkness was upon them, may undervalue those which are prepared with care and precision.

No. 3 The young minister, supposing himself to be learned and his people unlearned, may undervalue their real capacity and knowledge, and hence, in his efforts to simplify truth to their comprehension, may make his sermons insipid to the great majority of his hearers.

No. 4 The leading members of a congregation, long accustomed to the able preaching of a man of mature years, or having formed their standard of desirable preaching from a few choice sermons which they have heard on public occasions or on exchanges, may be most unreasonable in their demands for constantly rich and labored sermons.

No. 5 The young minister may yield to his own feelings and to the constant entreaties of his own people, may spend a large part of the week in making long visits, and on Sabbath morning find himself compelled to go into the pulpit with the most imperfect preparation.

No. 6 The people, forgetting that it is impossible for a man to be in more than one place, or to do more than one thing at the same time, may, by the violence of continued importunity, compel their minister to visit during the week, and then on Sabbath evening complain because they have had no more able sermons during the day.

No. 7 In the natural confidence of youth, and in the full assurance of the correctness of his own views, the young minister may imagine that it is an easy thing to beat old errors out of his people, and make them feel and act as he does.

No. 8 The deacons and the Diotrophes of the congregation, thinking that they are old and wise, not dreaming that it is possible for them to be bigoted or self-willed, may refuse to listen to any new suggestion, or to adopt any new measures whatever, though they are most reasonable and the most necessary.

No. 9 Rejoicing that he is at length engaged in his long anticipated work, and full of zeal and philanthropy, the young minister may undertake too much, and consequently fail in all.

No. 10 The church and congregation having just turned off an old, able and faithful pastor, and having formed the most extravagant expectations in regard to what a young minister can do, may demand more of him than seven men and an angel could accomplish.—Advocate.

A POOR COTTAGER.

A lady who had just sat down to breakfast, had a strong impression on her mind, that she must instantly carry a loaf of bread to a poor man who lived about a half a mile from her house, by the side of a common. Her husband wished her either to postpone taking it till after breakfast, or to send it by a servant, but she chose to take it immediately herself. As she approached the hut, she heard the sound of a human voice, and wishing to discover what was said, she stepped unperceived to the door. She heard the poor man praying, and among other things he said, "O Lord, help me; Lord, thou wilt help me; thy promises cannot fail: although my wife, myself, and children, have no bread to eat, and it is now a whole day since we have had any, I know thou wilt supply me, though thou shouldst again rain down manna from heaven." The lady could wait no longer, but, opening the door, "Yes," she replied, "God has sent you relief. Take this loaf, and be encouraged to cast your care upon Him who careth for you; and whenever you want a loaf of bread, come to my house."

REASONS FOR LEARNING TO SING.

WILLIAM BYRDE, a celebrated musician of the Elizabethan era, endeavours in the preface to his edition of "Psalmes, Sonnettes, and Songes of Sadnesse and Pietie," (published in 1598,) by the following reasons, whose amusing quaintness deprives them not in the least of their sound sense, to induce persons to learn to sing:—

Reasones breffe sett downe by ye auctor to perswade everie one to learne to singe.

1. It is a knowledge easilie taught and quicklie learned, when there is a good master and an apte scholar.

2. The exercise of singinge is delightfulle to nature, and good to preserve the healthe of man.

3. It dothe strenghtene all partes of ye hearte and dothe open ye pipes.

4. It is a singular good remedie for a stuttering and stammeringe in ye speeche.

5. It is the best means to preserve a perfectte pronunciation and to make a good orator.

6. It is the only waye to knowe where nature hath bestowed ye benefytte of a good voyce: whiche gifte is soe rare yt there is not one amongst a thousand yt hath it, and, in manie, yt excellente gifte is loste because they want an arte to expresse nature.

7. There is not anie musicke of instruments whatsoever comparable to yt whiche is made of ye voyces of men, where ye voyces are good and ye same well sorted and ordered.

8. The better ye voyce is the meeter it is to honor and serve God therewith, and ye voyce of man is chiefe toe be employed toe yt end—Omnis spiritus laudit Dominum.

"Since singynge is soe good a thinge,
I wishe alle men would learne toe singe."

FROM BISHOP OTEY'S ANSWER TO POPULAR

OBJECTIONS AGAINST THE CHURCH.

To any one much acquainted with the views and opinions of the great mass of people in this country, it must be evident that there is a strong prejudice existing in many minds against the Protestant Episcopal Church. Various objections are urged against her, and these being frequently repeated, exert an influence on many persons who would not knowingly be unjust nor uncharitable in their judgments. It will be the object of the writer of the following pages, to notice some few of the popular objections which he has often heard brought against the Church of which he is a minister, with the humble prayer and hope, that he may possibly be the instrument of causing the claims of the Church to be more favorably regarded by those who may condescend to read what is here written.

1st. The first objection against the Church which we would notice is, that she does not teach spiritual, vital, experimental religion, the religion of the heart; that all of her religion is made to consist in the observance of forms and ceremonies. This is a very common and wide-spread objection, and entertained by many good and pious people who have formed their opinions on common rumor, or on the defective teaching of some one individual who claimed to be of the Church. But in order to perceive how unfounded is this objection, let us briefly examine what the Church teaches in her standards, in the Prayer Book; and thus see how constantly and how distinctly she inculcates heart religion.

In the very beginning of the service appointed for Morning and Evening Prayer, a service which all of her ministers are bound to use, the Church, before calling upon her members to pray, gives them a solemn warning against the mere formality of the lips, bidding them engage in that sacred duty with a "pure heart." This warning is not given now and then, but is always repeated on every occasion of public worship; showing the deep solicitude of the Church that the heart should be engaged.

After a general and most humble confession of sins has been audibly made by the congregation, the minister is then directed to read the Declaration of Absolution, of which there are two forms: in the first of which occurs this petition: "wherefore, let us beseech him to grant us true repentance and his Holy Spirit, that those things may please him which we do at this present, and that the rest of our life hereafter may be pure and holy." After the reading of the Psalms and the Lessons from the Bible, and the repetition of the Anthems and Doxologies of the Church, the minister calls upon the people to unite with him in the Litany, and other Prayers, and that this duty may be reverently and properly performed, he utters the pious ejaculation—"Oh! God, make clean our hearts within us," to which is given the very appropriate response, "and take not thy Holy Spirit from us;" a response in which we are taught that our hearts cannot be made clean without the Holy Spirit. In the Litany we pray in one of the petitions to be delivered from all blindness of heart; and in another, we beseech the Lord to give us an heart to love and fear him: and again, in another clause, we ask for the "grace of the Holy Spirit to amend our lives according to his Holy Word." In the service for Evening Prayer, we ask of God in one of the collects, that "our hearts may be set to obey his commandments."

After the singing of a Psalm or a Hymn, the Ante-communion service is read, which begins with the earnest petition, that "God would cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of his Holy Spirit;" and then at the end of each commandment occurs ten times in succession the petition—"incline our hearts to keep this law."

After all the commandments have been read, there is then offered up the prayer that "God would vouchsafe to direct, sanctify and govern our hearts in the way of his laws." After the sermon is preached, there is commonly offered up the prayer that the "word heard by our outward ear, may, by God's grace, be so grafted inwardly in our hearts, as to bring forth the fruit of good living;" and then all is concluded with the benediction, "that the peace of God may keep our hearts, &c." We thus see it is heart religion all through and through the service of the Church—that in her daily teaching, the Church begins and ends with the heart.

HONESTY REWARDED.

A few years ago, by the entire failure of his business, a tradesman, with his wife and child, were entirely ruined, and compelled to seek shelter in the house of a relation. Adversity led to reflection, and reflection to repentance on account of sin, so that both husband and wife became "new creatures in Christ Jesus." A situation presented itself in which the poor man was employed, and soon after a claim was made upon him for a debt, which of course he felt it his duty to pay; but as his salary was small, and his child ill, the creditor consented to take the fifth part of his sum till the whole was paid. The day came for the payment of the first instalment, which the creditor received. That very night, most unexpectedly to himself, his employer not thinking his services adequately rewarded, increased his salary exactly one-fifth. They had yet other debts to discharge, and they resolved, by Divine help, to pay them. They prayed ardently for that help. To their great astonishment they received a letter inclosing a sum of money, from a distant relation from whom they had not heard for some years, who said their names had been in his will for a long time for this sum, but it had occurred to him that he had better send the money while he was living. The sum thus sent paid their debts, and again enabled them to enter into business. "Whoso is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the lovingkindness of the Lord."

THE WORD OF GOD.—All the heresies which have corrupted and afflicted the Church, owe their origin to men's departing from the simplicity of Scripture, and must derive a cure from a return to it.—Dr. Samuel Clarke.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

The Publishers have been kindly favored with the following recommendations from the clergy and others, who have examined this edition.

"I have spent some time in examining your beautiful edition of the Prayer Book, and comparing it with the standard set forth by the last General Convention. The result has been my conviction of its excellence, and of its correctness in every particular. So far as I can see, it is absolutely faultless. The beauty of its typographical execution will speak for itself. I join most cheerfully with my clerical brethren of this city, in recommending it, and in wishing it extensive patronage."

HENRY W. DUCACHET,

Rector of St. Stephen's Church.

"It is indeed a very superb book. The paper is excellent, the type large and clear, the engravings with which it is embellished very fine, the binding in keeping with the rest, and the execution and finish of the whole as perfect, we suppose, as the present state of the art of book making will allow, and certainly sufficiently so to please the most fastidious eye. We do not know what more can be desired."

"It gives me sincere pleasure to recommend Messrs. Appleton's new edition of the Book of Common Prayer as the most elegant and correct which has ever been published."

JOHN COLEMAN,

Rector of Trinity Church, Philadelphia.

"The edition of the Common Prayer, printed in various sizes by the Messrs. Appletons, demands the confidence and patronage of Churchmen."

"It combines, in a degree hitherto unequalled, accuracy of Text, with a large clear type, and a portable sized book."

COLLEGE OF ST. JAMES,

Washington county, Maryland.

The eighth session will open on Monday, October 1st, on which day the punctual attendance of all the students is requested. The duties of the classes are promptly recommended, and it is very important that all their members, new or old, should take their places at the opening of the session.

The academical year extends from the 1st of October to the 1st of August; there being but one vacation, August and September.

In the COLLEGE, all the usual classes under a full corps of Professors, have for several years been pursuing the entire course of collegiate studies equal to that prescribed in the older colleges of the north. At the recent Commencement, the third graduating class received their academical degrees.

In the GRAMMAR SCHOOL, which immediately adjoins the college, the preparatory classes are carefully trained by competent instructors under the supervision of the Professors of the College. Thus pupils may enter the Institution at an early age and pursue their entire course of study under the same direction until they graduate. The mercantile department embraces those partial members of any of the collegiate or preparatory classes, who may be preparing for the counting-room or other non-professional life. Such students are admitted to all the privileges and advantages of their several classes, substituting in place of some of the classical studies, such as are more necessary as a preparation for business.

French is a regular study without extra charge in all the classes. In addition to the French, the mercantile students will be taught, without charge, German or some other modern language.

The location of the College is perfectly healthful; and there are no towns or villages near to present the temptations so dangerous to the young. Moral and religious education is one chief design of the Institution. The charge, covering all academical and domestic expenses, is $225 per session of ten months. The rules of the college carefully restrict any other expenses of the student.

All the departments are under the immediate supervision of the undersigned, to whom application may be made for copies of the "Register" of the college and for further information, as well as for the admission of pupils.

DIOCESE OF NEW JERSEY.

CONSECRATION.—On Tuesday, October 2d, the Bishop of the Diocese consecrated St. John's Church, West Hoboken, Hudson County. At half-past ten o'clock, A. M., the procession, consisting of the Sunday School children of the Church, the builder and mason, the Wardens and Vestrymen of the Church and Grace Church, Van Voorst with others, and the Clergy present, several of them arrayed in the surplice, formed at the house of Mr. J. D. L. Walton, and thence proceeded to the Church, about a quarter of a mile distant. The Bishop preached an excellent and instructive sermon from Exod. xii. 26, "What mean you by this service?" after which the Sunday School children were called up to the chancel, catechised by the Minister, (whose questions they answered with great readiness,) and addressed by the Bishop in a simple, happy, and affectionate strain, which well befits the chief Pastor who careth for the lambs as well as the sheep of his flock. The Bishop then proceeded with the Communion Service, and was assisted in the delivery of the cup by the venerable Dr. Barry, of Jersey City.

After the Consecration, the Bishop, with the Clergy, and a large part of those who had shared in the inspiring services of the day, was conducted to the commodious apartment formerly used as the place of worship for the congregation, where a handsome cold collation had been prepared. The room was tastefully decorated with evergreens and flowers.—Churchman.

NEW YORK.

The Right Rev. Dr. Carlton Chase, Bishop of New Hampshire, has been invited to perform Episcopal duties in the Diocese until the first of January next. Should he accept the invitation, it is expected that he will visit the Parishes in Sullivan, Putnam, and Westchester counties, and those on Long Island which have not recently enjoyed Episcopal services, and any other parishes whose Rectors may make special application to the President or Secretary of the Committee.

Morgan Dix and Edward C. Babcock have been admitted as candidates for Holy Orders.

A Letter Dimissory has been granted to the Rev. D. McIlvaine, to the Diocese of Delaware.

Order has been taken for the Institution of the Rev. W. H. Moore into the Rectorship of St. George's Church, Hempstead, and the Rev. Samuel Roosevelt Johnson, D. D., appointed Instructor.—Churchman.

CALIFORNIA.

We had only room to mention, two weeks since, that a plan was in contemplation for procuring a Church edifice, to be sent out to California. We would now again call attention to the matter, which is one of the most serious importance to the welfare of the Church in that region. Several clergymen of the Church are now there, and are faithfully employed in various places, but the great difficulty is the want of suitable places in which to celebrate the worship of God. An ordinary room, any way suitable, it is almost impossible to obtain; the high price of labor, and the unwillingness of men to engage in it, even if funds could be obtained, render it out of the question to build there, if the materials are to be procured on the spot.—We have been told that at present rates the building of a wooden church of the size and description of that of Mr. Wills's, whose lithograph plan many of our readers have doubtless seen, would cost $75,000! The Rev. R. Townsend Huddart, well and favorably known among us for many years, a teacher of youth and a gentleman of high talent and accomplishments, purposes to settle in that region, and to go not alone. His plan is as follows:

He "intending, with Divine permission, to settle in California, and there to unite his Ministerial duties with the cause of Collegiate education, respectfully solicits, from his friends and the public in general, who may feel an interest in the moral welfare of that country, the means to purchase and send out a Church, of which he will have the Pastoral charge."

"It may be well to remark, that nothing of the kind for the accommodation of Episcopalians has as yet been sent out from any part of the United States. An impression seems to prevail in the minds of some, that a fund was raised for this very purpose a few months since; such, however, was not the case; and the assertion may be made with confidence, that the result of the present appeal, if successful, will be, the erection of the first Episcopal Church in California."

"The proposed movement will in no manner interfere with those Missionaries who have already gone forth on their errand of good—not only is the field of usefulness sufficiently extensive, and varied in location, for many more Clergymen—but it is much to be feared that the supply will not be in any proportion to the demand for Spiritual aid. Moreover, the ultimate object of this undertaking is to apply for a Charter and appropriation for a College as soon as the people have the power to grant them—in other words, as soon as California shall have become a State—and thus connecting the sacred functions of the Ministry with the important work of Education—to pursue a course altogether different in its nature from their sphere of action and of duty."

"The cost of the Church will be about Three Thousand Dollars, including freight: it is to be built of Iron, from the plans of an eminent Architect, and so constructed that it can be taken apart in sections, and afterwards put together with facility in a few days."

We cordially recommend this object to our readers, and urge them to obtain copies of the very interesting statement of Mr. Huddart, which is approved of by several of the most eminent of our clergy—Rev. Drs. Berrian, Higbee, Whitehouse, Balch, Hawks, McVickar, Taylor, Seabury, Cutler, Lewis, Vinton, and Mr. Bedell. The plans, we are informed, are very carefully matured, and the small amount required will be manifold repaid by the incalculable blessings which the establishment of a church edifice will confer on those of our own countrymen who now dwell far from the fountain of living waters, in the waste and howling wilderness of spiritual destitution.

Britton assisting in the laying on of hands.

In the afternoon the Rev. Mr. Burr preached, and after an address from the Bishop, who preached in the morning, 13 persons were confirmed.—Western Episcopalian.

THE NOBLE-HEARTED SAILOR BOY.

A little boy twelve years of age, poor and ragged, came into the cars between Boston and Fall River. There was a slight shrinking from him, manifested by some of the well dressed passengers. He took his seat quietly near me; and a sea-captain, who entered at the same time told me his touching story.

I learned that he was a poor orphan, and three days before he had been wrecked near Montauk Point; the schooner upon which he was, being struck by a white squall and instantly sunk. While the lad was floating upon some wood, a vessel near, which had seen the accident, sent forth its boat to save from a watery grave any who might be rescued. They spied the little boy floating amid the waste of water, and approached him; but he with a generosity, alas! too rare, cried out, "Never mind me; save the captain, he has a wife and six children." Poor fellow! he knew that the captain had those who loved him, and would need his support.

The captain in telling me the story, was much affected, and said, with a generosity characteristic of the mariner, "The boy has only the clothes you see, sir, or he would not be so ragged. I care not much for myself, though I, too, lost all, but the poor lad will have a hard time of it."

Several persons on hearing this story, gave small sums to the poor orphan, and advised him to make a statement to other passengers, who would doubtless give something.

"I am not a beggar," was the only answer; "I don't wish to beg their money."

At this moment a fine, benevolent individual arose in a seat near me, and offered to plead for him who would not prefer his own claim. Most successful was the warm-hearted appeal which he made to the passengers, and ten dollars were collected.—

Selections.

EARLY CLERGY OF CONNECTICUT.

That Mr. Beach had the advantage of his opponent in this discussion may be fairly inferred from the fact, that Mr. Dickinson, in his answer to Mr. Beach, published the next year, (1738,) shifts his ground somewhat, and instead of making the direct charge of Schism against Churchmen, is satisfied to maintain, The Reasonableness of Non-conformity to the Church of England in point of worship. At this time, Mr. B. published a sermon under the title of The Duty of Loving our Enemies, which, though not directly an answer, appears to have closed the controversy.

In 1745, Mr. Beach published a sermon On the Freeness and Fullness of Salvation, from Rom. vi, 23; to which Mr. Dickinson replied in 1747, in A Vindication of God's sovereign free Grace. Mr. Beach replied the same year, vindicating the doctrines of the sermon, to which Mr. D. replied the year following, (1748:) to which Mr. B. soon rejoined. The same year the Rev. Mr. Hobart, the Congregational minister of Fairfield, published A serious Address to the Members of the Episcopal Separation in New England, in which symptoms were manifested of a disposition to give up the doctrine of Apostolic succession. Mr. Beach replied to this early in 1749. About 1750, Rev. Mr. Dickinson of Norfolk renewed the discussion concerning Decrees, etc., to which Mr. Beach replied in such a clear and convincing manner, developing the consequences involved in the Calvinistic doctrine of decrees, with such force and precision, that Mr. Dickinson confessed in his reply, "that if God's decrees do influence the event, I must acknowledge his [Mr. B.'s] consequence just, and his arguments from God's decrees unanswerable." Mr. Dickinson escaped this dilemma, however, by denying that the decrees of God do influence events; whereupon Mr. Beach affirmed, that the real ground in dispute was conceded; that a decree which did not render the event necessary, was no such decree as Calvinism taught, and that Mr. D. himself was approximating Arminian ground.

In 1760 he preached a sermon before the Clergy in attendance upon a Convention held at New Haven, containing a vindication of the fundamental articles of the faith, afterwards published with a preface from the pen of Rev. Dr. Johnson. In 1765 he published an answer to a thesis proceeding from some one connected with Yale College, entitled "Obedientia personalis non est necessaria ad Justificationem." His other publications so far as known, were, 1758, An Inquiry concerning the State of the Dead, which being misunderstood, was misrepresented, and which he therefore regretted publishing; though the doctrine itself seems to have been sound and orthodox. Mr. Beach also published three sermons at Boston, without date, with the title Discourses, Casuistic and Practical, on 2 Kings ii. 23, 24; Matt. xx. 16; and Luke xxi. 28. Also a sermon on the death of Rev. Dr. Johnson, in 1772. There is also one other publication of Mr. Beach, deserving notice. In 1762, an anonymous pamphlet was published, entitled, Advantages of Conforming, purporting to be Letters from a Clergyman of the Church, purporting Rev. Mr. Beach,* to a young man, who is represented as of dissolute habits. For some time, Mr. B. refused to take any notice of the scandalous thing, but some persons believing, or pretending to believe, that they were genuine letters, Mr. B., under the advice of the Archbishop of Canterbury, addressed A Friendly Expostulation to the authors and abettors of the work: which, considering the provocation, is written in a spirit of great moderation and calmness. The work, which was attributed to the pen of one or more Congregational ministers with whom Mr. B. had been engaged in controversy, represents the Church as a convenient rendezvous for gentlemen of other persuasions, who meet with difficulties in their doctrines, but especially in their discipline; intimating that the clergy of the Church were good livers, sparing neither punch nor Madeira, and that they were particularly attentive to the ladies. The writer then says: "I have dwelt the longer on these temporal advantages of the Church of England, because I think the hinge of the whole controversy turns upon them; since I have good grounds to believe that there are ten times as many converts made by them, as by all other arguments put together." It is hardly possible to conceive of such diabolical practices in any Christian man, but especially in one who calls himself a Christian minister; and it must be regarded as proof of a mastery over the spirit rarely attained, that Mr. Beach could bring himself to treat the authors with ordinary courtesy. He mildly meets the infamous charges—denies their truth; boldly challenges inquiry into the minutest circumstances attending the conformity of the clergy; defies the authors to make good any of their wholesale charges; and finally inscribes his work to the Governor of the Colony, himself a Congregationalist, as a judge and arbiter between them. When we consider the time, place, occasion, and manner of this publication, it must be regarded as a triumphant vindication of the general purity of motive and Christian character of the Churchmen of those days.†

This was not the only annoyance experienced by Mr. Beach from the same quarter. Upon the publication of his sermon concerning the state of the departed, which has been already mentioned, they made garbled quotations from it, representing him as a heretic, to which accusations of immoral living were added, and the whole transmitted to the Society of which he was a Missionary. When these were received in London, copies of them were transmitted to Mr. Beach for his answer, when he was able to meet and reply to them to the satisfaction of his employers; thus defeating and putting at nought the counsels of his enemies.

The asperity of feeling thus produced and kept active by this species of warfare, rendered Mr. Beach's situation peculiarly uncomfortable during the entire period of the Revolution. Believing that hostility to the Church was one of the chief causes of the civil dissensions and troubles in the Northern Colonies, he not only refused to participate in them, but resolutely continued to pray for the "King and Royal family," until the close of the war, being, it is supposed, the only clergyman in New England who did it. This caused him and his parishioners to be, to use his own language, "the butt of general hatred;" and of necessity led to many annoyances, the particulars of which have not been preserved.

The amount of labor performed by Mr. Beach was immense. For nearly half a century he filled a cure extending twenty miles in length and twelve in width, besides performing service in numerous other places, on a great variety of occasions. At the end of forty years he had preached twice every Sunday, alternately at Reading and Newtown, having lost but two Sundays by sickness, notwithstanding he had been troubled with a rheumatic colic which had not allowed him a day's freedom from pain during the whole period. The distance between the churches of Newtown and Reading, was between eight and nine miles, and the road not good; and yet winter and summer, snow and rain, were to him alike, neither cold, nor storm, nor unbroken paths ever preventing, in a single instance, his regular attendance at church on Sunday. Once, in attempting to ford a deep and rapid river, he came near being drowned, and was rescued from a watery grave in a most providential manner, and often in his travels he was without the common comforts of life. But he bore all with cheerful resignation, rejoicing that he was permitted to follow the footsteps of his Divine Lord and Master,—to be made partaker of his sufferings, that he might hereafter partake of his glories. He departed this life on the 19th of March, 1782, in the 82d year of his age.

Among the parishes which owe their existence to the labors of Mr. Beach, besides those under his immediate care, are those of New Milford and Roxbury, in Connecticut, where parishes were organized by him, and where there are now flourishing churches. The parishes of Lanesborough in Massachusetts, and Arlington in Vermont, owed their existence mainly to emigration from the parishes under the care of Mr. Beach. At New Milford, Churchmen were fined for non-attendance upon Congregational worship, which fines, under the advice of Mr. Beach, were paid, and copies of the proceedings taken to be forwarded to the Bishop of London, in order to be laid before the King and council. This fact becoming known, the authorities were glad to refund the money, and grant permission to build a church, which before had been refused. All the other parishes in the same vicinity were also under more or less obligation to Mr. Beach.

Of Mr. Beach's personal appearance we have no knowledge. That his scholarship was much above the common standard of educated men of his day, there is every reason to believe. His numerous publications show him to have been a man of clear head and sound mind, quick to perceive, and apt in developing the hidden tendencies of any premises, true or false; ready himself to abide all the consequences of his principles, and holding others strictly to the same course. Yet he was ever ready to distinguish between acknowledged principles and their logical consequences, when those consequences were disavowed. His style of writing was simple and unadorned, yet nervous and generally convincing. His theological opinions were such as were common to the clergy of New England, and coincided, in the main, with the views of Barrow and Butler, Clarke and Cudworth, J. Scott and Secker, Sherlock and Stillfleet, Leland and Lowth, Leslie and Lowman, Hall, Wilson and Whitby, Patrick and Pearson, and other kindred writers, which were the text-books and the examples of the early clergy of Connecticut. That men who followed such guides would be sound in the faith, is a necessary inference. Yet there have not been wanting men, both then and since, ready to charge the whole body of the clergy of that day, as being anti-evangelical, wanting all experimental knowledge of the deeper mysteries of the Gospel. And this charge, made first in the heat of party strife, and perpetuated by sectarian prejudice, has deceived some of our own members. It is due to the Church, and to the memory of the departed faithful, therefore, to set this matter in its true light.

That there was a wide difference between the theological sentiments of the early clergy of the Church and their opponents, is known to every one; but in what these differences consisted, is not so well understood. That those who were arrayed in theological hostility to our forefathers, accused them of being unevangelical, all are aware, but what were the grounds upon which those charges were based, few seem to understand. We must know, therefore, what were the points in dispute between the parties, and what were the consequences of the respective views upon the practical teaching of both, before we are prepared to decide how far the allegations were even apparently well founded. Indeed, it is mainly by the fruits of the doctrines, as seen in their practical teaching, that we are to judge the truth or falsehood of the premises from which those consequences proceeded. But, unfortunately, on this most important point the public are almost entirely without any means of judging. The early Clergy of Connecticut were too much engrossed by the multitude of their labors to have leisure to pen or publish practical treatises on any subject, and were so much embarrassed by their position that they would not have been able to publish them, had they been written. The works they did publish, were such as the controversies of the day imperatively called for, and these being almost entirely confined to a few controverted points of doctrine and discipline, give us little insight into the character of their parochial teaching. But the good providence of God has put it into our power to remove some of the obscurity resting upon this point. A volume of manuscript sermons, written by the early clergy of Connecticut, and by them preached in their respective parishes, collected at first as a matter of curiosity rather than for their historical interest and value, came into our possession several years since, in which are comprised sermons by Rev. Drs. Johnson and Cutler, Rev. Mr. Beach, Andrews, Marshall, and Winslow, together with some the writers of which are unknown. We should have been glad to give copious extracts from these, but our limits will not permit, to which we might add extracts from some publications of a polemical nature, made by the Rev. Dr. Leaming and Rev. Mr. Andrews, and by these we should be entirely willing to abide as to the scriptural and evangelical character of the teaching in question. And the decision of this point decides the place which all the early clergy of Connecticut should hold in our affections and reverence, for among the many sermons, letters, pamphlets, and publications made by these men, which have passed under our notice, we have discovered not a single trace of any diversity of sentiment among them, as regard either doctrine or practice. They held the unity of the faith in the bond of peace, more strictly and thoroughly than any other set of men within our knowledge, since the primitive ages, and the result has already been seen upon our pages.

Man's utter helplessness without the assistance of God's Spirit, and his freedom therewith,—his inability to do any thing whereby to merit God's favor, and yet the necessity of obedience,—his justification by faith alone and the necessity of good works flowing from a true and living faith, are among the fundamental doctrines of the early clergy. And they saw in these more than a mere spiritualism,—they saw them outwardly realized in the Church and the Sacraments, to depart from which, was to involve themselves in the heinous crime of schism. The circumstances of the times gave some doctrines a peculiar prominence, especially in their more public ministrations, and this fact was seized upon by their enemies, and turned into evidence of an undervaluation of other important doctrines, which more reckless opponents interpreted into a denial of them. We can now add no more than to say, that we know none among all the calumniators of the early clergy of Connecticut, who, judged by the standards of the Church, would be more sound as Churchmen, or more evangelical in doctrine, than they.

Rev. TIMOTHY CUTLER, D.D., was born at Charlestown, Mass., A. D. 1683, and was graduated at Cambridge, 1701. He was ordained as a Congregational minister at Stratford, Conn., January 11, 1709, where he remained ten years, in high esteem, being the most celebrated preacher, and most liberal scholar in the colony. In 1719 he was elected President of Yale College, which was regarded as a most auspicious event. President Allen says, "he was a man of profound and general learning, particularly distinguished for his acquaintance with Oriental literature, and that he spoke Latin fluently;"—President Styles, that "he had more knowledge of the Arabic than any man in New England before him, except President Chauncey, and his disciple Mr. Thatcher;"—and Rev. Dr. Miller, that, "he was a man of strong natural powers and extensive acquirements, well acquainted with classical learning,—one of the best Oriental scholars ever educated in America, and well skilled in Logic, Metaphysics, Moral Philosophy, Theology, and Ecclesiastical History." These testimonies from men of different faith, leave no doubt of the extent and variety of his erudition, or of his great popularity.

For about thirty years Dr. Cutler labored earnestly and faithfully, scarcely losing a day by any illness whatever. But for the last eight or nine years of his life he suffered greatly. He died Aug. 17th, 1765, in the 82d year of his age. His manner was distinguished and lofty, but rather distant, nor was he skilled in the art of winning general popularity: yet, says, Elliot, "people of every denomination looked upon him with a sort of veneration."

We cannot wonder, therefore, that when, in 1722, he announced to the corporation of the College that he was convinced of the invalidity of his ordination, and of the necessity there was laid upon him of withdrawing from the communion of the Congregationalists, and conforming to the Church of England, that it should have thrown the whole colony into commotion, and that every effort should have been made to induce him to retract his announcement. Especially, when we remember that the Rev. Mr. Johnson, another of the best preachers and scholars in the colony, made the same declaration, in which Mr. Brown, one of the tutors, and Rev. Mr. Wetmore, another Congregational minister, coincided, and that the Rev. Messrs. Hart, Elliott, and Whittlesbey confessed themselves almost persuaded of the same fact,—when we remember all this, and consider the state of public feeling here at the time, we cannot be surprised at the harshness and severity that was afterwards manifested towards them; nor, that the magnificent donation of books, made by Berkeley to that Institution, similar to those which were supposed to have been the first cause of this defection, should be considered by Cotton Mather as "a sad accident to the College."* But we do not, and at this time, cannot understand nor appreciate the strength of motive that must have operated upon the minds of such men, to have induced them to forego all the temporal advantages they possessed,—which caused them to give up a certain competence, with honor and praise as much as man could ask, for an uncertain maintenance among a few despised, dispersed sheep in a wide wilderness, amid hatred, obloquy, and disgrace. The charge of worldly and mercenary motives which some of the most reckless of their opponents brought against them, has not a shadow of foundation; and when it was said in the testi-

* We have seen a parallel to this in our day. In 1819 a scurrilous pamphlet was published at New Haven, without name or date, with the title—"A Serious Call to those who are without the pale of the Episcopal Church: By a Consistent Churchman;"—which pamphlet was got up by three Congregational ministers, two of whom are now living and hold prominent places among their brethren.

† A copy of the Advantages of Conformity, &c., was sent to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who said of it: "It is written in a ludicrous manner, yet with strong virulence, and seems likely enough to do great mischief."

* It is a curious fact, not generally known, that two of the principal donors of Yale College were Churchmen. Elihu Yale, the chief donor, and after whom the College was named, was a Churchman, and gave what he did, not for the purpose of confirming the Colonists in their religious opinions, but because he deemed the light of intelligence essential to their recovery from error. Bishop Berkeley also gave about a thousand volumes of valuable books to this College, together with his farm in Rhode Island. Nor have these donations been unblest, for of about one thousand and six hundred clergymen educated in this College, previous to 1845, over one hundred and sixty, or more than one-tenth, have been or have become Episcopalians.

monials given them, on going to England for Orders, that they were "men of unspotted characters and of the nicest virtue," who, "pursuing the dictates of a good conscience, had forsaken their dearest interests and valuable settlements," nothing was said beyond the strictest truth.

Cutler, Johnson, and Brown sailed from Boston, November 5th, and arrived in England December 15th, 1723. They underwent the usual examinations, and were ordained a short time after by the Rt. Rev. Dr. Green, Bishop of Norwich, acting on behalf of the Bishop of London—who lay at the point of death. Upon their return, Cutler was appointed to the charge of a new church recently organized in Boston; and consequently his subsequent history properly belongs to the Diocese of Massachusetts. We shall only add in this place, therefore, that in three years from his arrival in Boston, he had a congregation of from seven to eight hundred, which subsequently became much larger. He died August 17, 1765, aged 82 years.

It is an honor in which the Church in Connecticut may well rejoice, that, under God, she was permitted to have three such men for her founders, as Cutler, Johnson, and Beach; and it was owing in no small degree to the long and faithful lives of the two last, that her foundations were so deeply and securely laid. Men of sound and well stored minds, masters of all the learning of the age, of unceasing industry and toil, they were patterns to their flocks and should be to the clergy of coming ages. Lest our language should be considered as the eulogy of partial friendship, we extract the following from President Allen's Biography of Rev. D. Johnson:—"He was happy in the calmness of his temper, which was seldom decomposed. Those who knew him, generally revered him. The same good disposition which made him amiable in private life, marked all his proceedings of a public nature, and may be discovered in his controversial writings. Benevolence was an auspicious trait in his character. He seldom suffered a day to pass without doing to others some good offices relating to their temporal or spiritual affairs. His conversation was enlivened by the natural cheerfulness of his disposition, yet in his freest discourse he retained a respect to his character as a clergyman. His piety was unmingled with gloom or melancholy, and he contemplated with admiration and gratitude the wonderful plan of redemption disclosed in the gospel." He published, among other things, A System of Morals, 1746; A Treatise on Logic, and another on Ethics, reprinted together in 1782; A Hebrew Grammar in 1767, which evinced an accurate acquaintance with that language,—reprinted in 1771, with additions and improvements.*

The history of the Church in West Haven bears the following testimony to the character of the same man. "We cannot leave this part of our subject without lingering a few moments to contemplate the character of him, who is justly styled the Father of Episcopacy in Connecticut and to admire and adore that overruling Providence, which has evidently guided and governed us from the beginning. Upon the character of the Rev. Dr. JOHNSON, no one can dwell but with satisfaction. As a man, as a scholar, as a Christian, and as a minister, it is deserving of high eulogy. His talent for learning was very considerable, and his mind clear and discriminating. He had read much, and thought more, and having the result of both his reading and reflection well systematized and arranged, he was unusually ready on all points of learning likely to come up; and for this reason possessed an advantage over almost every man he met. And when to this we add the kindness, the affection, and the sincerity of his manner, accompanied as it was by a life that evinced the reality of all his professions, it is not wonderful that he was able to hold the minds of such multitudes in subservience to his own, or rather, we should say, it is no wonder that he should have been able to have infused so much of his own spirit into those around him. When we consider Dr. JOHNSON in every point of view, we cannot hesitate to pronounce him one of the master-spirits of the age, and if we may so speak, as a pivot on which, to a considerable extent, the character of the age was made to turn."

The picture we have here drawn of a few of the early clergy of Connecticut, is descriptive of all, and is true of all;—in proof of which we do ourselves and our readers the pleasure of copying the following tribute to their memory, from the pen of one who has taken much pains to inform himself on this point:

"They were men of God. They were men of prayer. They were devoted to their sacred calling. Each one taking charge of several different flocks, which were scattered, and far apart; constantly occupied in riding to and fro; preaching on the Lord's-day, and preaching on the week-day, visiting the sick, burying the dead, comforting the mourning; and ever making the business of their profession their sole business, they were models of missionary zeal and devotion. They were everywhere venerated. They were everywhere beloved. . . . Their sect might be spoken against, but themselves never. Officially and personally they were without reproach; and tradition, so far from relating any incidents respecting them, which should cause a sigh to be heaved over human frailty, of them and their lives, triumphantly declares, that of whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, they were patterns.

"They were, also, men of learning. They were scholars. And though few of their number would now be called polite scholars, yet the acquirements of all were solid and exact. . . . They were living in the midst of learned men of another denomination, who were continually demanding of them reasons for their faith. In despite of themselves, they were compelled to be scholars, and scholars armed at all points. They were attacked from the pulpit, they were attacked from the press, they were attacked in private conversation; and from the pulpit, from the press, and in private conversation, they were obliged to give prompt and full replies. If a fondness for classic case is sometimes to be imputed to the clergy, they at least are exempt from the charge. They were champions in full array, and champions who knew no rest. They were sentinels, and sentinels who knew no relief. Now they were attacked from this quarter, and now from that. Now they had to confront argument with argument, and now, authority with authority; and in order not to discredit their cause, but to acquit themselves like men, they were obliged to explore the inmost depths of sacred erudition.

"They were men of too stern a mould to heed consequences. Truth they had sought, truth they deemed they had found, and truth they were determined to follow at all hazards. They did declare openly, that they had been preaching without the proper authority. They gave up their places. In vain kindred wept; friends entreated; brethren now threatened, and now expostulated, and now deserted. In vain arose in vision the dangers of a long voyage over the deep. In vain appeared in certain reserve, a life of toil, self-denial, and poverty. In vain raged the war of pamphlets, and paragraphs, and of village calumnies. On they went in their noble career, with an almost martial bearing and tread, and with that inward majesty of soul, with which truth and principle always inspire their faithful votaries.

"Having finished the work which was given them to do, they are now taken to their reward. They are gone to that Saviour whom they served. They walk in light, with the goodly fellowship of the prophets, with the noble army of martyrs, and with the spirits of all just men made perfect. They are with that cloud of witnesses, brethren, who are marking our course; for the eyes of all in that invisible world are upon us."

We have already pursued these sketches so far, that we must omit further biographical notices until a future number. There are many other names equally deserving, which we hope to notice, and among them, none more so than that of Bishop Seabury, whose energy, learning, and zeal were instrumental, in a high degree, in preserving for the Church in this country those sound principles of doctrine and discipline, which Johnson, Beach, and Cutler were so successful in planting, and so faithful in defending. Nor do we intend to rest with the early clergy of Connecticut, for, Deo volente, we purpose to give sketches of the early clergy of the Church in the country generally.—Church Review.

CANADIAN COLLOQUIES.

NO. VI

MINISTERIAL SUPPORT.

The village of Eckington is situated in a newly settled township in Canada West, inhabited chiefly by Irish Church people, but with an admixture of English and Scots. Though not lying within the defined boundaries of my parish, I visited Eckington as often as lay in my power, and these occasional ministrations were eagerly, and I trust not unprofitably, attended by the settlers.

In process of time several of the leading families began to express much anxiety to have a clergyman settle amongst them, and requested me to communicate with the Bishop on the subject. His Lordship expressed his desire to comply, if possible, with their desire, and instructed me to make the necessary preliminary arrangements for carrying the measure into effect. Accordingly, at my next visit to the settlement, I sought an interview with Mr. Bromehead, one of the leading farmers in the district. He was a native of England, and was zealously attached to the Church of his fathers, hospitably entertaining such of her ministers as chanced to visit those parts, and doing all in his power to aid their usefulness and promote their comfort.

Having stated generally to my friend the object of my visit, our conversation proceeded after the following fashion:—

Mr. B.—Rejoiced am I to learn that our good Bishop has taken our case so kindly into consideration, and earnestly do I trust that ere long Eckington may be favored with the precious services of the Church every Sunday.

Myself.—I am very happy to hear you say so, for I look upon it as the best proof that could be given that my labours have been made a blessing to you; for you know that our Lord said, "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness."

Mr. B.—When I was at home, we regularly went to our parish church on Sundays. Master used to take us all in the morning, when the parson preached. In the afternoon he did not preach, but after the second lesson he catechised the young folks; and I do think I learnt more at catechising than I did at preaching. When I came here, however, a good many years ago, though I did feel lonely on Sundays, it soon began to wear off, and I came to spend the time idling about, and sometimes I am afraid even worse than that. But still I couldn't altogether forget old times, and have never ceased to long for a parson here as well as in the parish I lived in at home. And indeed I can see no difficulty in the matter. There are nearly as many folks in this township now as lived in the parish I was born in.

Myself.—Why, Mr. Bromehead, you must remember that in England every parish is enabled to maintain a clergyman, either from tithes or the rents of lands which have been set apart for that purpose. If the people who hold lands in this country were to do as the landlords formerly did in England, there would be no difficulty in supporting a clergyman in every settled township.

Mr. B.—Why I thought it was the Government that gave the parsons the tithes or the rents they get.

Myself.—Mr. B., you make the same mistake which many people who ought to know better fall into. The clergy in England are not paid by the Government, and the Parliament have no more right to interfere with the property of the Church than they have to meddle with yours. In ancient times, when the owners of the soil were converted to Christianity (for you know that England was once a heathen country), they, knowing that it was their duty to make provision for their tenants' religious and moral instruction, provided for that purpose duly ordained clergymen. To make a decent maintenance for these pastors, they set apart a proportion of the profits of the land; and as God had directed that the Jews should give one-tenth, they thought that Christians could not do less. It was in this way that tithes began to be paid. You must see, therefore, that in giving the parsons tithes, they gave it from their own pockets—for the simple reason, the tenant could not, or would not, pay the same amount of rent if tithes were exacted from him.

Mr. B.—Well, but we have no tithes here, which I must say, without any offence I hope, Sir, that I am very glad of.

Myself.—I should be as sorry as you could be to see tithes imposed by Act of Parliament; but if you remember what I said you must own that it was the owners of the soil in the old country that provided for the maintenance of God's ministers; and we must in this country look to the freeholders to do the same thing.

Mr. B.—Why, Sir, you surely don't think that we in the backwoods could support our own parson! Many of us have not paid for our lands; and those who have, or had got their lands free, have only just enough to live on themselves.

Myself.—I do not suppose that you could at present give sufficient in money to maintain a clergyman, and I am glad to be able to inform you, that at present, if you will only provide a part of the clergyman's stipend, the remainder can be made up from other sources.

Mr. B.—I rejoice to hear that, for I think we can do something; and I am sure we ought. But how much do you think we shall have to pay?

Myself.—The rule is, that, wherever a settled clergyman is appointed, the parish or mission must supply a house and one-half of his stipend.

Mr. B.—That seems reasonable enough.

Myself.—Well, then, in answer to your question, as to how much you would have to give, let me ask how much think you the clergyman ought to receive?

Mr. B.—Why, I can't say that I very well know. Our rector in Derbyshire used to get a sight of money in tithes; and I were told that he used to give his curate a hundred pounds a-year—so that, perhaps, if our parson were to get a hundred a-year, it would do.

Myself.—Pray, Mr. Bromehead, did the curate in Derbyshire keep a horse?

Mr. B.—He had no occasion to do so. The parish was not a big one, and he could walk all thro' it in a day.

Myself.—Is he still a curate?

Mr. B.—No, Sir; I am glad to say that I heard from my married daughter in England, that the Bishop had given him a living, which she told me is as good as £300.

Myself.—Did your daughter tell you how it happened that he got that living?

Mr. B.—She told us that the Bishop gave it to him, because he had made such a good curate, and had done so much good in the parish.

Myself.—Well, now, you see that your curate had £100 a-year in a small parish, in which he had to keep no horse, and where I dare say he boarded with some comfortable farmer at some £20 or £25 a-year; and because he was diligent in his duties, he got a living worth £300 per annum. Do you honestly think that £100 a-year to your settled clergyman would be as good as £100 a-year to a curate in England?

Mr. B.—Well, I did not think of those things; but they certainly make a great difference.

Myself.—I believe, Mr. B., you have a son in one of the merchants' shops, in Toronto. Pray, what salary does he get?

Mr. B.—I am happy to say that, though he is hardly twenty-one yet, he has just got his wages raised to £75 a-year.

Myself.—Does he not board with his employers?

Mr. B.—Yes, Sir; so that he can save a good deal out of his wages. His situation is quite as good as a £100 a-year.

Myself.—Well, Mr. B., if your son in a merchant's shop, who is only twenty-one, receives as good as £100 a-year, you must be well aware that such a sum cannot be a reasonable stipend to give to a clergyman, who must support a family—keep at least one horse—and, unless you expect his wife to cook and wash for the family, and himself to take care of his own horse and cut the wood for the house, a female servant and a boy. Now, tell me, to begin with, what does it cost to keep a horse?

Mr. B.—I don't know exactly. We don't think much about what the horses cost, as we have always both hay and oats.

Myself.—I find that my horse eats one bundle of hay (14 lbs.) and three gallons of oats each day, which I think you will find makes nearly two tons and one-half in the year, which, at 40s. per ton, will be £5; and 137 bushels of oats, which, at 1s. 6d., amounts to £10 5s. 6d.; so that the horse costs £15 5s. 6d.

Mr. B.—Well, I never thought a horse cost so much as that. But, Sir, I can't sell my oats for 1s. 6d.: they only fetch 1s. 3d. in Toronto.

Myself.—That is very true. Oats will only sell for 1s. 3d. in Toronto; but I can never buy them here at as low a price as they can be had in town; and in putting them down at 1s. 6d., I have reckoned them at the price which I have given on the average. But even the sum which I have named does not cover all the expenses of the horse, for he must be shod, which will make the total cost at least £17 10s. per year. To this, also, must be added something for wear and tear: clergymen's horses do not improve in value as they grow old any more than yours do.

Mr. B.—If you go on at this rate, you will make it appear that the parson must have a deal more than £100 a-year; for you have not mentioned all the expenses belonging to the horse, for I can testify that my blacksmith's bill for mending sleighs and wagons comes to a good big sum every year; and I know that you broke your cutter all to pieces last winter, in the new clearing, when you came to see me when I had such a bad cut, which I got while chopping in that clearing.

Myself.—Well, we will not for the present take into account such incidental expenses; but, tell me, what wages will the clergyman have to pay to his servants?

Mr. B.—As we have to pay servants' wages in money, when we have them, I can answer that question. My wife paid a girl who lived with her last summer $4 a-month, and I have given the same wages to a big useful lad which I had.

Myself.—Well, that will add £24 more to the clergyman's

* Bishop Lowth said of the first edition of this Grammar: "I have read it with much satisfaction, and I think, in both parts, it is as clear and full as anything I have met with in so small a compass."

annual expenses; and now, what do you suppose the food for the house will cost?

Mr. B.—I don't know what food would cost for gentle folks; but we reckon that if we board a labourer, it's worth $6 a month.

Myself.—Well, we will suppose, then, that gentle folks and labourers cost all alike, and take your reckoning. The clergyman, his wife, female servant, and the boy, are four grown-up persons. If there are children (which is likely enough), we will reckon two of them for an adult, and supposing that there are four of them, this will increase the family to six. The cost alone of food to the clergyman will be £108 per annum.

Mr. B.—Why, Sir, you have made the expenses of the family to be £150 a-year, all but 10s. I am sure I don't spend anything like that.

Myself.—If you would reckon all you consume at the same price which the clergyman will have to pay for it, you will be surprised to find that it will come to quite as much as what I have stated, and probably more.

Mr. B.—Well, perhaps, it is because we don't think much about these things; but I have always reckoned a £100 a-year a good deal.

Myself.—I hope you now see that £100 is not sufficient to support a clergyman's family. You have yourself made it come to £150, and remember you have not reckoned anything for dress or fire-wood, or for the education of the children, to say nothing of blacksmith's bills, and so forth. Now, tell me, what should you suppose should be the lowest stipend which a clergyman ought to have?

Mr. B.—I am afraid if you were to make me reckon up what clothing and fire-wood, and schooling, would come to, it would make me think so much was wanted to pay the parson, that we should never get one. But, mayhap, if he had a careful wife and a good garden, which you know the boy could take care of (thus saving him a good deal of money in the year for garden-stuff) he could make £200 a-year do.

Myself.—I agree with you, that, supposing there was a careful wife and the good garden, and the faithful lad, £200 a-year would be a bare sufficiency.

Mr. B.—I beg your pardon, Sir, but here is the old woman telling us that supper is ready, and you must needs require refreshment and rest after your long rough ride.

Myself.—Indeed I do, Mr. Bromehead; so we shall postpone the remainder of our confabulation till to-morrow morning. You had better call your family together for prayers.—The Church.

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1849.

BISHOP IVES' PASTORAL LETTER.

We received, through the Post office, from New York, a week ago, this Pastoral Letter. Regarding it as strictly a diocesan matter, we did not consider it necessary to bring it before our readers. But the manner in which it has been referred to by other journals, renders some notice of it necessary.

Our readers may form some idea of this Pastoral from the following table of "Contents."

I. The existence of great agitation and alarm in the Diocese. II. The alleged ground of this agitation. III. The action of the late Convention. 1. The Convention does not determine what is to be believed, but receives what is determined. 2. The power to teach and enforce Christian doctrine and discipline, resides not in the Convention, but with the Clergy. 3. Our Church recognizes and acts upon this principle. 4. The Clergy, and not the Convention, responsible touching doctrine, discipline, and worship. 5. The Constitution of the Convention forbids its pronouncing on such points. 6. Remedies against false teaching. IV. Actual state of the Diocese. I. Consideration of Doctrine. 1. Testimony of the Diocese concerning priestly intervention in pardoning sins. 2. Nature of Repentance. 3. Contrition. 4. Confession. 5. Origin of Private Confession. 6. Voluntary Private Confession in the Primitive Church. 7. Church of England view of Confession. 8. Satisfaction. 9. Absolution. 10. The bearing of Absolution on Confession. II. Consideration of Ceremonies and Practices. III. Consideration of Pastoral Exactness. IV. Society of the Holy Cross; alleged surrender of previous views. V. Reasons for present course and conduct.

With respect to the views of doctrine and discipline set forth in this Pastoral, their soundness or unsoundness, the wisdom or indiscretion of their publication, it is not our office to speak. If the Bishop has promulgated anything contrary to the Doctrine, the discipline and Worship of the Church, there is but one remedy. That is not to be found in newspaper attacks, or in anonymous assaults from unknown opposers, but in an honest, open, and manly appeal to the only proper tribunal. When we have canon law, we need not appeal to Judge Lynch!

The point in this letter to which we feel bound to refer, is the action of the Convention in this case. We feel more constrained to notice this, because an article published in the Banner, first presented this action before the Church. That article, we thought at the time, was written by a friend of the Bishop. And we still think that it was written with a friendly intention, though some may think otherwise. Certain we are that it was published with a friendly design. Of course, as we knew little of the circumstances of the case, we could form only a partial judgment.

Having given what is esteemed the statement of one side, we now feel bound to present the Bishop's own account, this we do in the Bishop's own words, taken from the first three heads of the letter.

DEAR BRETHREN:—You were doubtless surprised, that I should so far seem to suspect your confidence in my fidelity to our branch of the one Catholic Church, as during the sitting of the late Convention at Salisbury, to think it necessary to give you assurances of such fidelity, in the form of a charge to the clergy. I am aware, had you been duly represented,* there would have been as little demand for such assurances, as there was ground for requiring them; and the only apology I can offer you for so humiliating an act, may be found in the desire, I have always cherished, to shield you from harm at any sacrifice of mere personal feeling or right. Besides the circumstances under which I acted should not be overlooked. I was confined to my bed by severe illness, not admitting of my writing or even thinking intensely without danger to my life. While in this helpless state, I heard incidentally of some intended action in the convention in regard to my own views and teaching. So extraordinary a proceeding I could hardly credit. Still I felt it to be my duty to have some communication with that body, and with this view sent for two of my presbyters, to whom, after consultation, I consented to dictate the charge to which I have alluded, authorizing them, however, to present it to the clergy, only on the express condition, "that no resolution should be passed in the Convention implying its right, either directly or indirectly, to affirm what you, as a diocese hold, in regard to doctrine, discipline or worship; or what, in respect to these points, the clergy are bound to teach."

As the circumstances under which I dictated this charge forbade all explanation at the time, I expressed to my presbyters, my determination to address you on this subject, so soon as God should give me strength to do it. Which determination was by no means relaxed, on finding the condition I had imposed wholly disregarded, and my act much misunderstood, as a yielding of those principles, which I hold most sacred, and a due carrying out of which, I believe to be essentially identified with the welfare of the souls committed to my trust.

Had I nothing, Dear Brethren, but my own interest and honor to consult, I should here lay down my pen, and yielding to the strong impulse of my heart, offer humble and devout thanksgiving to God for most undeserved blessings, for your great forbearance and exemplary kindness to me for nearly twenty years of very imperfect and unworthy, though well intentioned services. As a man I have nothing to utter but thanks, and nothing to ask, but your earnest prayers to God for the pardon of my many sins, and for His grace and strength to bear me up under the heavy burden of my duties and responsibilities, that I may stand the severe trial of this day, which is showing with an awful distinctness, "who are His, and who is holy." But I bear to you another relation. I have "the rule over you" by divine commission, and must give account for your souls at the day of judgment. I was, without my seeking, made your bishop. God empowered me, and exacted of me a solemn vow, to "teach and exhort you, to withstand gainsayers, and to use all diligence to banish and drive away from the Church all erroneous and strange doctrine." Therefore I now speak to you, "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," and I entreat you for Christ's sake and for your soul's sake to give heed to my words. My motive (God knoweth,) is a humble desire to glorify Him, and keep you in the way of truth, unto eternal life. If, in what I have to say, I may seem to touch unnecessarily upon some small things, it is because of their relation to great ones; or may seem to reflect upon individuals, it is for the defence and protection of the diocese. Great and essential principles are often involved, in what might otherwise appear unimportant acts.

I.—Hence I must be allowed, in the first place, to bring to your notice what I conceive to be the errors of principle, in the first document on the page of the Journal—the report on the state of the Church, which introduces the subject of excitement in the diocese. The words of the report are, "the committee deplore the existence, among the members of the Church, of great agitation and alarm, arising from the impression, that doctrines have been preached not in accordance with the Liturgy and Articles of the Church," &c. Now, from the manner in which this assertion is put forth, it is to be presumed, that the committee meant to be understood as affirming the existence generally in the diocese, of this "great agitation and alarm." But upon what testimony, I would ask, is this assertion made? The only testimony which the diocese in her canons allows, in such a case, is "a written account of the state of each parish, given by its minister, in his parochial report." The 5th canon says, "that it shall be the duty of each minister to report annually to the bishop"—among other things—"a written account of the state of the parish. Which reports shall be, by the bishop, communicated to the convention, and read in their presence, in order to promote a general knowledge of the state of the Church." These reports, on the occasion referred to, were handed to the bishop, and by him communicated to the convention. And, according to our canon law, they contain all the testimony in respect to the state of the Church in the diocese, or any portion of it, which is either legal or trustworthy. I call upon the Church, in the diocese, and throughout the union, to examine these parochial reports, and discover, if possible, any "account" or evidence, from the only persons allowed by canon to testify—viz: the parochial clergy and the bishop—of "great agitation and alarm," either in the diocese, or any one parish in the diocese! To say that there is such "agitation and alarm," when the parochial clergy, to a man, are silent on the subject, is to say, that they have been culpably negligent in a canonically prescribed and commanded duty.

II.—The next thing to be noticed, is the alleged ground of this "agitation and alarm"—which, to use the words of the report, consists "in the impression that doctrines have been preached not in accordance with the Liturgy and Articles of this Church, and that ceremonies and practices have been introduced, either unauthorized by the customs of this Church, or in plain violation of its rubrics." It is true, the committee decline either to affirm or deny the existence of these things, on the ground that "it is not their business." But if it be not be their business to inquire into the fact of their existence, by what authority do they touch them at all? And more than this; by what authority do they indirectly define them and assert their existence in an attempted exculpation of "the far greater part of the clergy," and hence, in an implied charge of guilt against the minority of the clergy, embracing the Bishop of the Diocese? For how can the committee know that the greater part of the clergy are entirely opposed to certain things, except as they define them, and hence give them existence? I agree with the committee, that it "was no business of theirs" to determine, whether or not the matters charged upon a portion of the clergy were founded in fact. But I must be permitted to go further, and affirm, that (if possible) it was still less their business to pass an implied, but not, on that account, the less oppressive censure upon that portion, with the Bishop at their head. I say the Bishop—for it is useless to reply that he was not named, since it is notorious, that both in the Convention and the committee, he was named as the chief offender. And now, brethren, consider the circumstances under which this was done. The Church, at large, have a right to suppose, that this was an extreme measure, resorted to after every canonical means had failed; while the truth is, no canonical means had been tried. No expostulation with the Bishop by the clerical members of the standing committee, nor by any other body of the clergy. No charges laid before him against any priest or deacon, as teaching heretical doctrine, or practicing forbidden things. No complaint by any rector that he had been annoyed by the practices of any neighbouring priest, nor from any layman, against those of his pastor. No word, save in one solitary instance of friendly counsel on the subject, except as sought by the Bishop himself, from any clergyman or layman in the diocese. But, after a quiet and apparently profitable visitation throughout the low country, in which all his sermons, which are now said to have produced excitement, were preached, with the almost universally avowed approbation* of clergy and laity, the Bishop finds himself virtually arraigned for his teaching by a convention assembled in a remote part of his diocese—called with no general knowledge of the intention of a few alarmists, representing only thirteen or fourteen parishes out of about fifty—having in it only nine clergymen out of forty, and six laymen out of the whole representation, who had ever heard the sermons,† indirectly, but no less injuriously, referred to in the report of the committee.

Besides, if the teachings and practices of the Bishop and those who may sympathize with him, had been of the character implied in the report, what evidence had the far greater part of the clergy‡ given of their peculiar and exemplary fidelity? The false teaching or irregularity supposed, in order to produce such "great agitation and alarm," must have been both known to these clergymen, and very dreadful in itself. Where is the evidence of their manly and canonical resistance? The conclusion, in justice to them, is inevitable, that they believed these things either to have no real existence, or to come within that class of views and practices, about which clergymen may differ and still be faithful to the Church. But to these things as existing in North Carolina I shall recur in the sequel.

III.—I now come to the consideration of that which, in my humble judgment, may well excite "alarm" in the breast of every true son of the Church, as striking, in principle, at the very foundations of truth and order, as hitherto held and acted upon by this diocese—I mean the preamble of the resolution relative to the publication of the report on the state of the Church and the Bishop's charge.

I. In regard to this matter of the preamble, I shall say nothing;—whatever may be its merits or demerits, they are perfectly harmless. But of the principle involved in it, viz:—the right of a convention to affirm what a diocese holds, or what the clergy may, or may not teach, I am now called upon to speak. I protested against this principle, at the time, as strongly as my feeble state would allow; and had I been present in the convention, no such principle would have been sanctioned, for no such resolution involving it would have been put to that body. And I am bound here to state, upon good authority, that, as it was, the clergy who were silent, and many who voted for the preamble, would have opposed its passage, had they not been under a wrong impression as to my real views of it. Be this as it may, I now renew my protest against the principle involved in it, as utterly subversive of the fundamental faith and polity of the Church. No Convention, constituted as our conventions are, has a right to determine what is, or should be, the faith, or practice under the faith, of a diocese. That is determined by a power far above it.

Having shown the strong and unanswerable grounds on which the assertion rests, that no Convention has the power to declare what should be the faith or practice of a Diocese, the Bishop proceeds:

* The rector of one of our largest parishes, and a member of the committee, as I was about to leave, after having delivered my course of sermons, called with members of his vestry, and said to me these words—"Bishop, we had, before your visitation, heard much of your popery; but all I can say is, that I hope you will be able soon to return and give us as much more as you please of the same kind!" To which his vestry present seemed to yield a hearty assent. Many more like conversations, if needful, I might relate, with only one, and that a sufficiently notorious exception.

† I feel bound to state, that the lay delegates from all the old parishes, who had heard the sermons, and were accustomed to represent the convention, were, except in two instances, utterly opposed to the whole Salisbury proceeding.

‡ I do by no means intend here to sanction the idea, that the far greater part of the clergy, are opposed to my teaching. On the contrary, I doubt not, the "greater part" are now united with me. The differences are merely nominal.

VI. But suppose the Bishop, or any of his clergy, teach false doctrine, or enforce unauthorized terms of communion, what is the remedy?

In answering this question, I am compelled to touch upon that which I would most gladly have avoided, my own authority as Bishop. But the time has come which calls upon me to sacrifice all feelings of mere delicacy, and to raise my voice, though I may stand alone in my diocese, or in the American Church, against what I regard as an invasion of the powers entrusted to me, and to me alone, by Almighty God, for the spiritual government of this portion of His kingdom.

In self-defence, I am obliged to say I did not covet these powers, I did not seek them; that in fact they were forced upon me against my will; that I was taken from a quiet and happy sphere of duty, to which my heart fondly clung, and constrained by the providential circumstances* of my election to enter upon the arduous and awfully responsible duties of my present office. The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, acting by commission from Almighty God through her Bishops placed me over this diocese, and made me alone† responsible to the Church at large for its "doctrine, discipline and worship." To inspire me with vigilance and prompt me to vigorous action, she imposed upon me the most stringent vows of fidelity: vows which bind me to answer to God and the Church, not only for myself, but for every Priest, Deacon, and baptized person within my jurisdiction. Such vows, as bind no other being in the diocese; and exact of me an accountability to which no other being is made subject. Besides this, to enable me to fulfil my trust, she has endowed me, under God, as she hath endowed no other man or body of men in this diocese, with a special gift of the Holy Ghost for my office and work of overseer, and hath admonished me, to remember to stir up this gift, or "the grace of God given me by the imposition of hands," reminding me, that God hath not thus given me the spirit of fear; but of power and love and soberness.‡ Whatever man, therefore, or body of men, take upon themselves the power of dictation, or control, or under any form, the chief direction, in regard to the doctrine, discipline and worship of this diocese, or of any part of this diocese are guilty of arrogating powers, committed solely to my hands, assuming a trust for which I alone am made responsible, and resisting the authority of Christ, and the functions of the Holy Ghost with which I only am invested.

They do more than this, if they be clergymen—they violate their own solemn vows of fidelity and submission. Each and every priest and deacon, in the diocese, is put into his office by the Bishop, makes his promise of fidelity to "the doctrines, discipline, and worship" of the Church, to the Bishop; vows obedience directly, and under the most awful circumstances, to the Bishop; and is made amenable to him, and to him alone,§ for failure in duty, "error in religion, or for viciousness in life." If any complaint is to be made, it must be made to the Bishop—if any admonition be given, or punishment inflicted, it must be by the Bishop. And all this is not left to be inferred, from the inherent powers of the Bishop, but is fixed by the written law of the National Church.

We are here put in possession of the remedy, which the people have against unlawful teaching or practices of priests and deacons, and which they have against one another. If any communicant feels aggrieved under the discipline of the priest; or, if any vestryman shall be scandalized by his teaching or practices—or if any deacon shall have cause of offence against any priest, or any priest be offended with his brother, the way of redress is open by the law;—the appeal is to the bishop. And here let me remind you, brethren, that any other mode of reaching these evils, or attempting their cure, must be schismatical in its character, and utterly subversive of law and order in the Church.

And now we come to the final remedy, viz: that against the false teaching and unauthorized and oppressive discipline of a bishop. Aside from that confidential and friendly intercourse which should always subsist between a bishop and the clergy and laity of his diocese, (the influence of which may always be great and salutary,) there is recognized, by the spirit and laws of the Church, a right on the part of his priests to counsel with him, and if need be, expostulate with him, in reference to any matter relating to the soundness of the faith, or welfare of the diocese. And, finally, if, after this, he shall openly violate the laws of the Church, or teach heretical doctrines; or shall refuse to subject to godly discipline, those of his clergy who so do; then a convention of his diocese may present him for trial, to his peers—the bishops of the Church. But any attempt on the part of any one or number of his clergy to thwart his views, or embarrass his official labors, by combinations among themselves,||

* I was unanimously elected without any previous intimation of the intention of the diocese, after repeated unsuccessful trials to induce others to accept.

† "A Bishop," says Hooker, "is a minister of God, unto whom, with permanent continuance, there is given not only power of administering the word and Sacraments, but also a further power to ordain ecclesiastical persons, and a power of chieftly in government over presbyters as well as laymen, a power to be by way of jurisdiction, a Pastor even to Pastors themselves. So that this office, consisteth in those things which are common to other Pastors, as in ministering the word and Sacraments; but those things incident to this office, which do properly make a Bishop, cannot be common unto him with other pastors." Vol. ii. page 137.

‡ See the Office for the Consecration of a Bishop.

§ Read the Office of Institution.

|| In reference to this point, see an able pamphlet of the late Bishop Hobart, addressed to a clerical association in his diocese, just before his death, and received with almost universal applause throughout the Church. Mark, also, the following from the Apostolic Canons: "Let not the presbyters or deacons do any thing without the sanction of the bishop—for he it is, who is entrusted with the people of the Lord, and of whom will be required the account of their souls."—Canon 39.

Observe the warning from CHALCEDON. "The crime of conspiracy," says the 18th canon of that General Council, "or banding together, is utterly forbidden even by the civil laws; much more, then, ought such a thing be forbidden in the Church or with the laity; or to intimidate and coerce him, by exciting against him the popular mind—lending a willing ear to exaggerated statements, and giving publicity to confidential, desultory, and unguarded conversations—and by aiding and abetting unauthorized, oppressive, and irresponsible conventional acts, is, if there be any virtue in principles, or force in vows, a direct violation of those ties of fellowship and sacred promises of obedience, with which every priest and every deacon, binds his conscience and his soul, at his ordination;—while it virtually annihilates the Episcopal office, exposes that of the priesthood to contempt, and infuses into the whole body of Christ, the elements of disorder, feebleness and death.

Brethren, "I would not be negligent to put you in remembrance of these things, which are more surely believed among you; and to endeavor, moreover, that ye may be able, after my departure, to have them always in remembrance. For we have not followed cunningly devised fables."

Now these are matters which, we conceive, interest deeply the Church at large. They are not mere subjects of speculative concern, but practical questions of grave import. How can there be "one faith" in a confederate Church like our's, if each Diocese is to set forth, by resolutions of Convention, what doctrines are to be inculcated, what practices followed? And what contempt will fall upon our ecclesiastical administration of law, if a Bishop is to be tried and condemned without a hearing, by his own Convention? When such a case is fairly presented to the consideration of the Church, we are sure there can be no doubt as to the judgment of every mind, whose sense of justice is not perverted by the strongest prejudice.

ST. MARK'S CHURCH.

At the invitation of the Building Committee, we had the pleasure of visiting this Church, now complete in all its parts. We think that even the sternest and most rigid ecclesiologist must exercise great ingenuity to find fault with this noble edifice. The shafts of criticism will find hard material to penetrate, in its massive stone and solid oak. There may be many who prefer other styles of architecture, and, in this free country, they have a perfect right to enjoy their peculiar tastes. Still we hope there are few who can enter such an edifice as this, without feeling deeply impressed by the solemn influence of the Holy Sanctuary. All is sober, truthful reality. No glare, no vain show of gaudy colouring, no attempt at flimsy splendor, no cheap finery meet the eye. It is a temple of realities, as well as "a temple of solemnities." The following full description, furnished us by a member of the Building Committee, will give our readers a better idea of the Church than we can hope to give. We also would call attention to the communication of a valued correspondent, who speaks as a less partial witness. In the zeal by which churches have been multiplied in our city, Philadelphia comes behind no other city in the land. And there is now, we are happy to think, a corresponding progress in church architecture. As our older church edifices will compare with any of their cotemporaries in other cities, so our new churches need not fear a similar comparison.

We congratulate most heartily, all who have been engaged in this worthy effort, upon the happy completion of their work. May this noble monument of true churchmen's taste and zeal, long stand, in its beauty, to gather within its blessed shelter the weary and the heavy laden, and many souls find this house of God to be for them the gate of heaven!

On Sunday next, for the first time, that Sanctuary will resound with the voice of prayer and the notes of praise. Long may the voice of our brother, who thus auspiciously begins his ministry in this city, be heard within those blessed walls. And at his earnest, faithful, calls may souls, now wandering in the paths of error, be turned into the ways of truth and peace, and all the flock brought within this earthly Fold, be gathered at last into the "One Fold" where there shall be "One Shepherd."

DESCRIPTION.

This beautiful Gothic structure is situated on the north side of Locust street, west of Schuylkill Seventh street. It is the design of John Notman, Esq., and was erected under his immediate superintendence. It is remarkable for the purity of the style, and for the beautiful simplicity and chasteness which characterize the whole building, which is of that order of Gothic architecture known as the Decorated. It is built entirely of freestone, neither paint nor plaster having been used internally or externally in the construction, the inside walls being all lined with stone; all the wood work throughout is of solid oak. Its length east and west is 150 feet in all over the buttresses, and its whole breadth, including the tower, 91 feet. The tower is in the position of the south porch, the first stage of which is now erected, and through it is the principal entrance by a deeply recessed and richly moulded doorway, ornamented with foliated shafts in the jambs. The windows of the aisles and clerestory on the flank, are of two lights, or parts divided by mullions of stone, which is foliated in the arch, showing a variety of beautiful patterns; they have also moulded worked stone jambs.

The Church edifice comprises a chancel, nave and aisles, with a building attached as a vestry. The chancel is 38 feet deep, 23 feet 6 inches wide, and is furnished with stalls for 24 seats, which are made of oak; there is also an arcade of three niches, forming the ancient sedilia, and a recess to be used as a credence of God. If, therefore, any of the clergy should be discovered either conspiring or banding together, or forming any evil designs against the bishop or their fellow clergy, let them be altogether deposed from their proper rank."

table—the floor is paved with encaustic tiles; these are in various colors, red, blue, buff, white, &c., arranged in a variety of patterns. The altar is of stone, covered with a rich crimson cloth of velvet, bearing in front a floreated Greek cross, with the monogram I. H. S. exquisitely wrought in gold colored silk, the fringe being of the same beautiful material. Above the altar is the great east window of five lights, with mullions and foliated tracery in stone; this is filled with exceedingly beautiful stained glass of the richest and most magnificent colors, by the Messrs. Gibson of this city and New York; it contains figures of our Saviour, Saints Peter and Paul, and St. John the Baptist, and St. John the Evangelist; they are represented in niches with canopies over them, beautifully executed in coloring of the richest kind; the tracery is filled with fine glass, representing the Evangelistic symbols, &c. &c. The three south windows and a north window are also filled with stained glass, which are elegant specimens of taste and skill. The organ, built by Hall, is in a recess adjoining the chancel, and separated therefrom by an oaken screen most beautifully carved. The ceiling is of oak, divided into panels, and shows seven equal parts of a polygon.

The nave is 28 feet wide, and 100 feet long. The north and south aisles are each 14 feet wide by 100 feet in length. The division is in seven bays on each side; the piers and arches are of cut stone, supporting the clerestory, with bracket shafts for the roof timbers. The roof is of oak, open timbered, with hammer and collar beams moulded. The north aisle connects with the organ aisle, by a fine stone arch, which is also open to the chancel. The seats are of oak, of plain but suitable design. The windows are all glazed in quarries, set in lead, having borders and tracery in colored glass, exhibiting a great variety of patterns. The great west window in the nave is of four lights, and will contain, when completed, figures of the four Evangelists. The tracery is also filled with fine glass; this noble window gives admirable effect to the whole structure.

The prayer desk is of an elegant design, corresponding in some degree with the pulpit, both of which are of carved oak, and of an octagonal form. The pulpit is raised on a stone base on the north side of the chancel arch. A moveable lectern stands between the two, from which the lessons are to be read. The font, placed near the principal entrance, is of an octagonal shape, finely carved by Simpson of this city. The whole floor of the different passages is laid in tile, with a great variety of patterns and colors. The Church is warmed with heated air, and lighted with gas; the gas fixtures are made by Cornelius, in the shape of candelabra, placed in every arch of the arcade. The rubble work was done by the Demurs, of this city, and the cut stone by the Messrs. Simpson, Hough and Stewart, and Thomas Stone. Most of the beautiful tracing in the windows, was done by Mr. Stone.

The carpenter work, including nearly all the carved work, was done by Mr. Archibald Catanach, who deserves great credit for the skill and workmanlike manner which he has executed and carried out the design of the architect. The grounds about the church were laid out under the superintendence of Mr. Francis Bell. The cushions in the chancel pews, &c. were made by Lutz. The Church will be open during the week for the inspection of the public, and for Divine service on Sunday next, as will be seen by the resolutions of the vestry.

SWEDISH AND NORWEGIAN CHURCH AT CHICAGO.

We ask the attention of our readers to the following commendation. The Rev. Mr. Unonius is still in the vicinity, engaged in the good work of raising the necessary funds for this important object.

We have received and handed to Mr. Unonius, $5 from Christ Church, Elizabeth city, N. C.

The undersigned, Rector, Wardens and Vestrymen of Trinity Church, Chicago, understanding that it is the intention of the Rev. Mr. Unonius to solicit aid, in the Atlantic States, towards the erection of a place of worship for the Church of St. Ansgarius, founded by him in this city—beg leave to express their approbation of the enterprise; and respectfully to commend their Rev. Brother and his cause, to the favorable regards of the friends of the Church.

The Scandinavian population of this city numbers probably more than 700 souls, and is daily receiving large accessions. Among the European emigrants, they are distinguished for their industry, honesty and attachment to the religion of their country.

That religion is Episcopalian. The Swedish and Norwegian Churches have retained "the primitive truth and Apostolic order." Ignorant of their affinity to our Church, a portion of these emigrants have been drawn aside into schism. Others of them have been counseled by their Pastors at home, to put themselves under the care of the Episcopal Church. It is obviously the duty of the Church to receive them in the arms of fraternal love; and to encourage and aid them in organizing under the regimen of our Bishops.

We regard the organization of the Church of St. Ansgarius as the auspicious beginning of a system of measures which, we humbly conceive, may, and should be carried into effect in other portions of the North-West. Why should the Church forego by inaction, large accessions to her numbers which may be had for the asking? An hundred communicants have been already gathered into this little fold, besides those who have fallen in the late epidemic pestilence. A very large church edifice, if it could be had, would, in all probability, be presently filled.

The Rev. Mr. Unonius has won the respect of this community by his professional talents, gentlemanly manners, and ministerial fidelity; and still more by his exemplary and self-sacrificing devotion to his suffering brethren, upon whom the late calamity has fallen with peculiar severity. Day and night he has been in unweariable attendance upon the sick and dying. More than forty times has he read the burial service over the dead of his people. His presence among us has been a blessing to this community! More might be said to commend this gentleman to the hearts of the faithful—less we could not say in justice to our feelings.

It is scarcely necessary to add, that the pecuniary circumstances of the Pastor and his flock, do not allow him to "go a warfare at his own charge," nor them to "begin to build" without the certainty of adequate assistance. It may be supposed that sufficient aid may be obtained on the ground. It is far otherwise; most of our churches are little less needy than the present supplicant. Our strongest churches are oppressed with debt, and struggling with difficulties; and are scarcely yet weaned from the "nursing care and protection" demanded by infant churches. It is want, not wealth, that seeks this field of toil. Here a new world is to be subdued, and all our foundations are to be laid by few and feeble hands.

Our most favorable conditions are sufficiently trying. On one hand we are hemmed in by sects, strong in numbers, instinct with the spirit of proselytism, and spurred on by competition. On the other hand, overshadowed by a Hierarchy, wielded by a system, and wielding the masses detached from the population of Europe, and the vast resources disbursed by her politico-ecclesiastical treasuries. Our Church alone is poor. "If the Lord had not been on our side, surely our soul had been put to silence." Let it not be thought strange that, while "our eyes look up to the hills from whence our help cometh," they should also turn with longing to the homes and friends of our youth.

The "little flock" of Trinity church would gladly give to our worthy brother and his congregation, something more substantial than sentiments and words. Our "own house" is poorly provided for, our calls are numerous and pressing. "Silver and gold have we little;" such as we have let us be permitted to give—our love and blessing. We may at least wish our brother God speed! We desire him to go forth on his errand with this testimonial of our personal regard—our cordial approbation of his object, and our earnest hope that God will so prosper him in his way, as to bring his enterprise to a successful issue.

DEATH OF A CLERGYMAN.

We copy from the Calendar the following notice.

Died, at his residence, of dysentery, on Wednesday, the 3d inst., Rev. FREDERICK MILLER, Jr., Rector of Trinity Church, Branford, aged 38.

It is with feelings of the deepest regret that we record in our present issue the death of one of our most faithful and valued Clergymen. Mr. MILLER long since won from us an affectionate regard, which all we have since known of him, both as a man and a Clergyman, has only tended to augment and confirm. The decease of such a "pastor" is a loss not merely to his family and friends, (irreparable though it be,) but to the whole Diocese.

DIED,

In this city, on Friday morning, Oct. 12th, B. J. Tucker, Esq. in the 59th year of his age.

Among the many who are called to mourn by this affliction, the Rector of the Church of the Ascension has to deplore the loss of a valued parishioner, and an active and devoted member of his vestry. In the short time of Mr. Tucker's residence in this city, among whose merchants he held an honorable place, he has won for himself the respect and esteem of a large circle of friends. Upright and faithful in all his relations, courteous and affable as a Christian gentleman, wherever he was known he secured respect and esteem. In Bermuda, in the legislature of which he was still a member, this dispensation will afflict many hearts. But they and we have no cause to sorrow "as men having no hope."

He died, as he had lived, a faithful member of that Church, whose precepts teach us how to live, and whose comforts soothe us in our mortal need.

At a meeting of the Vestry of the Church of the Ascension, the Rector informed the vestry of the death of B. J. Tucker, Esq.

Whereupon it was RESOLVED, that this vestry have heard, with deep regret of the death of Mr. Tucker, one of the most highly esteemed of their associates.

RESOLVED: That we have formed the highest respect and esteem for Mr. Tucker, during the period in which he has acted as a member of this Board, in which he has always proved himself devoted to the best interests of the Church.

RESOLVED: That we sincerely condole with the members of Mr. Tucker's family, in their affliction, and desire to convey the earnest expression of our deep sympathy.

BY THE LAST STEAMER.

We are glad to find from the following account that the cholera is decreasing.

THE HEALTH OF LONDON DURING THE WEEK.—(From the Registrar-General's return.)—The mortality from cholera has rapidly declined. The deaths from all causes registered in London in the three weeks ending Sept. 22, were 3,160, 2,842, and 1,981. The decrease has been exclusively in the cholera deaths, which were 2,026, 1,682, and 839 in three weeks. The deaths from cholera, which in the first week in September were 300 and 400 a day, fell on the 19th to 110, and have since not exceeded 123.

DIOCESE OF NORWICH.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE BISHOP OF NORWICH.—On the morning of Monday, the 17th Sept., the remains of the late Bishop of Norwich were removed in a hearse, followed by a single mourning coach, from Brahan Castle, near Dingwall, Ross-shire. On reaching Invergordon, which is about twenty miles from Inverness, the body was put on board the Duke of Sutherland steam-vessel, which reached Yarmouth Roads at about half-past five 5 P. M. on Wednesday. Thence the remains were conveyed, in a hearse with four horses, to the palace at Norwich, arriving there about eleven o'clock at night, and being at once placed in the private chapel. On the coffin, which was covered with black cloth, was the inscription, "Edward Stanley, D. D., Lord Bishop of Norwich, aged 70; died Sept. 6, 1849, at Brahan Castle." During the preparations for the funeral, the Cathedral Service was performed in St. Luke's Chapel adjoining. On Wednesday and Thursday an immense number of applications were made for tickets to view the interment, more than 1,200 of which were issued. Yesterday morning Norwich was filled with the Clergy and gentry of the surrounding district, all anxious to pay their tribute of respect to the memory of the late Bishop by accompanying his remains to the tomb. All the shops were closed, and business of every kind was suspended until the funeral was over. The Cathedral, the Close, and Palace gardens even, were crowded with people anxious to view the mournful ceremony, and to show the esteem in which the departed Prelate was held by them. The funeral procession left the Palace at one o'clock, the coffin carried by twelve bearers.

ECCLESIASTICAL APPOINTMENTS.—Some of the non-official papers have been giving out, for two or three days past, that the Bishopric of Norwich has been assigned to Dr. Hinds, the present Dean of Carlisle. As no contradiction to this statement has appeared, we are inclined to accept it as probably true. The appointment is neither the best, nor the worst, that might have been made. Dr. Hinds is of Queen's College, Oxford, and was, we believe, Chaplain to Lord Clarendon, at the beginning of his Lord-Lieutenancy. He is the author of two or three respectable volumes, on "The Rise and Progress of Christianity," "The Inspiration and Authority of Scripture," and "The Three Temples of the One True God." His faults—if, as a theologian, he has any—we take to be those arising out of a bias towards the Whately and Hampden theology.

The See of Madras, vacant by the resignation of Dr. Spencer, is understood to be given to Archdeacon Dealtry, the successor of Mr. Baptist Noel, at St. John's Chapel. The Archdeacon having spent many years in India, and being still in the vigor of life, the appointment is a judicious one in every point of view. It is anticipated, we believe, that the Rev. Thomas Nolan, one of the most eminent of the Liverpool Clergy, will succeed the Archdeacon in St. John's Chapel.

The Epscopal Chapel in Gray's-Inn-lane, of which the Rev. Thos. Mortimer has for some years been the Minister, is about to be resigned by him to the Rev. Edward Garbett, now Lecturer of St. George's Church, Southwark. This is the Chapel which it was apprehended would be taken by the friends of Mr. Baptist Noel. Mr. Garbett commences his Incumbency early in October.—Morning Herald.

ST. MARK'S CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA.

MR. EDITOR:—During a late visit to your city I was much attracted by the noble and truly church-like edifice, erecting for the newly-formed congregation of St. Mark's. Our country can boast of very few superior buildings, certainly of none in which the harmony of Architecture has been more strictly observed, or in which every arrangement more distinctly evidences the holy purpose for which designed. The perfection of the design, the unexampled rapidity with which the building has been erected, and the economy of expenditure, reflect great credit upon the Vestry; and certainly entitle the Architect, John Notman, Esq., to the first rank in his profession for energy and skill. What delighted me most, was the fact that everything about St. Mark's is reality. There is no massive column of lath and plaster. There is no painting to imitate stone. There is no graining to make pine look like oak. All is real, just as a house ought to be, which is erected to the glory of God. It is literally true, that St. Mark's is the only large Gothic Church which is not an Ideal Church. And when we consider that all this reality has been attained at a very reasonable expenditure, we may venture to recommend those who are engaged in the good work of church building, to visit St. Mark's before they decide, from motives of economy, to make things seem to be what really they are not. My special object in calling the attention of Churchmen to St. Mark's, is to acquaint them with the method adopted for raising the necessary funds. Too often Church building is a matter of speculation. Contracts are made without any certain source from which to realize the money. Everything depends upon the sale of the pews; and thus often the Church is burdened with debt, and honest mechanics are left to suffer for their confidence in the promises of the Vestry. The uncertainty which unfortunately attaches to such contracts is one, perhaps the chief reason why Church edifices cost such extravagant amounts. In St. Mark's these difficulties have been avoided, and the work has been rapidly and economically prosecuted by several gentlemen of the Vestry uniting to advance the full amount for the erection of the edifice; they and not the contractors assuming the risk. After the sale of the pews, the money advanced will be refunded; and thus it remains to be proved, whether this plan of church building will prove as satisfactory to the liberal Vestrymen, as it certainly must to the industrious mechanic. Indeed, it seems to be the only strictly correct plan, for certainly there should be no speculation in any way about the house of God; and a beginning should not be made until the cost has been counted and provided for. Should the effort in the present case be successful, I think the example will be followed in other cities where increased Church accommodation is much needed. An appropriate site should be selected, the building erected, the contractors paid, and then the pews offered for sale, and worship commenced in a house free from all disgrace of debt. I trust, therefore, that the plan adopted by the Vestry of St. Mark's will prove successful, for very much depends upon it.—Let no person who is able, decline to purchase, because he thinks he can rent. Let no one be unwilling because the Church is actually built, to do less than he would if the work had not commenced; but let every Churchman, according to his ability, aid in carrying out the noble undertaking. For the honor of Philadelphia, and for the sake of a good example to the Church at large, we wish it complete success. B.

WILBERFORCE ON THE INCARNATION.

A FEW OBSERVATIONS. By Rev. H. U. Anderson.

MR. EDITOR:—The re-publication in this country of Archdeacon Wilberforce's work on the Incarnation, will no doubt prove beneficial. Besides that most of the remarks on Priesthood are eminently valuable, the author's erudition and research have explored much ground fruitful in reconde theology, not familiar to most of our laity, or indeed to many of our clergy; and the volume, if only its untrained and fatiguing style be mastered, will expand and deepen their views both of the higher doctrines of Christianity and of the higher speculations which contemplations of this kind naturally superinduce.

Among these higher speculations and doctrines, some occur spontaneously to the profound thinker; as what Lord Bacon calls "the blessed and individual society of three Persons in Godhead" anterior to and independently of creation; also, the various heretical unpoisings, and orthodox poisings, of the doctrines of the Trinity and the twofold nature of Christ,—which poisings are accurately and admirably given in the Athanasian Creed. There are fancies, however, in these lofty excursions of the mind, which may be pronounced non-natural, strange, even presumptuous; they rest obviously on unnatural hypotheses. And to one of these, prominent in Mr. W.'s book, and but feebly qualified by diluent concessions, it is the object of this paper to invite attention. The hypothesis and the dilution may sometimes amount very nearly to saying and unsaying: the saying is the matter here in hand.

For the restoration of fallen men, argues this theory, Christ enters into "human nature" as the second Adam, assuming the consanguineous headship or paternity of our race, and thus repairing what, in his natural consanguineous paternity, the first Adam wrecked for us by his fall:—the consanguinity including the whole transmissive constitution of men in body and soul, the "HUMAN NATURE" or "humanity" of Mr. W.'s treatise. The natural parentage of Adam, when depraved, by natural consequence corrupted the progeny; and in like manner, the supernatural parentage of Christ, unpolluted, and with divinity combined with "humanity," by (as it were) natural consequence, purifies them, or those among them to whom this consanguinity is graciously imparted; "by conjunction with the purity of the second Adam, may be regained what was lost by the transmitted defilement of the first:" (p. 330) both the deteriorating and the remedial process having a sort of affinity with physiology: "there needs some mode of union between every individual and Christ, as real as that actual paternity by which Adam acts on all his children." (190.) To give full coherence to the theory, "human nature" is described, not only as a "principle," an "influence," a "law," but also as an "entity;" (53, 152) so likewise with the several kinds of lower animals: it is the "nature" of each kind that perpetuates in the offspring its distinctive peculiarities. This "nature," this "human nature" or "humanity," is not properly (it is allowed) a physical "entity," but neither is it metaphorical: may we not, as an approximation, term it quasi-physical,—a quasi-physical aura, manifested like "electricity, by its effects,"—a quasi-palpable influence? This quasi-physical and quasi-palpable "entity" is called by Archdeacon W. "that plastic [form-giving] nature;" (42) and he speaks of "the actual existence of human nature," the "reality of human nature as a thing existing in the external world," its "objective existence;" (48) an "objective plastic entity,"—what less than a Creator! Although "it is not implied that there is any reality in 'human nature' distinct from the personal characteristics and conditions of the individuals who bear it," yet "Appearances lead us to imagine that the whole series of man's race is in some sort an organized whole;" (45) again, "When Christ declares Himself the vine, and His people the branches, this is because the trees of the field have an organized life;" (244) again, "That the Church is one body results from organization." (247.) Nor this only: the author, waxing bolder, declares "our Lord's body was obviously consubstantial with ours;"—"with whom He consented to become consubstantial both in body and soul," "our salvation rests on the fact that he who is consubstantial with the Father, is also consubstantial with His brethren;"—"our Lord is declared to have a natural body consubstantial with ours;" (79, 85, 149, 218) and further, to the same effect, "it is the purpose alike of each [Christ and the Spirit] to join us to that manhood of Christ," &c.,—"union with the man's nature of the Son of God," "our union with the man Christ Jesus by sacramental grace" is "not a mere figurative expression, but an actual operation,"—in baptism "the body of the regenerate person becomes [fit, is made] the flesh of the crucified One." (226, 229, 319, 314, and title-page.) On p. 409, we read, "the reality of that momentous change, whereby the whole family of mankind was reconstructed." This enormous cumulation of language,—and there is more of it,—might warrant our calling Mr. W.'s idea of "human nature" physical rather than quasi-physical.

Now, it cannot be rightly said that corporeal fabrics constantly changing their particles are "consubstantial" with their parents, with Adam, with each other, or even with themselves after the lapse of many years; and of course the expression must be incorrectly applied to the human relation of Christ to mankind: nor can any of His superhuman relations to us be founded on such "consubstantiality." Much less are souls "consubstantial" one with another: these, Mr. W. argues, are separately created; (47) and even the (more probable) "transduction" of the soul from the parents, should it be unquestioned, is too vaguely imagined for so broad a conclusion. Yet, to give what is called "HUMAN NATURE" its hyperbolic effectiveness in the Christian economy, all these things are predicated of it, entity, organization, consubstantiality throughout the whole race of Adam; and all these are changed, through Christ, into a "human nature" having conjoint entity, interpenetrative organization, consubstantialness, with His "human nature;" and through that "objective" "union" and substance-oneness of the "humanity" of the God-man with our fallen "humanity," comes, as of course, as by a stated process, our rescue from the fall, our holiness, our acceptance. May not this be well denominated speculative physiological divinity?

Concerning the scriptures alleged in its behalf,—they have other and more reasonable interpretations. Thus,—“one body,” not by a blended corporality, but because of “the unity of the Spirit,” by whom “we are all baptised into it.” Even the passage, “we are members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones,” relates primarily to the intimate (yet not literal) oneness of man and wife, and only secondarily, through that analogy intensively referred to “one’s own flesh,” to our oneness with Christ,—not importing, in either case, positive unity of “flesh and bones.” The words, if taken strictly, would prove much more than the participation of “human nature” with Christ, as their undiluted meaning is the absolute identity of our really organized animal frames with His separately organized animal frame: the fabric-severalty is cancelled. A figurative sense becomes, therefore, unavoidable; and this, departing from the letter, from the very “flesh and bones,” dissolves every kind of superlative of that text and of its cognates. How agrees with any literal interpretation here of “flesh and bones,” the following from p. 321? “Not that the connecting principle which binds together mankind and their Head is any material derivation . . . that whereby they are joined is the spiritual power by which Christ acts upon His brethren. This power has been shown to be immaterial.” What congruity—between this obvious truth and the notion of a real intercommunity of “flesh and bones,” the notion of a conjoined organization, of consubstantiality!

Concerning the alleged “organization” of “human nature,” the want of evidence is absolute: nothing whatever, not a single fact, lightens the burden of proof. In real physics, such dogmatizing is rejected. The blood, for example, is not without indications of being organized, as the flesh and bones undoubtedly are: but physiology is restrained, by (perhaps only) the want of complete facts, from declaring the former, and, it may be, from combining it with the latter, and so making of the two a continuous or interlinked organization of the blood and the solid frame. Yet, without one fact, and at the mere bidding of an hypothetical surmise, with only at the best a patristic warrant, “human nature,” the law of like progeny,—with the complex of intellectual, moral, gracious, divine qualities,—is ranked as an “organization.” Utterly, mournfully visionary!

And concerning the notion that all human beings are “consubstantial,”—it is equally an illusion. The word, of course, is here employed strictly, and means identical substance: for that our bodies are of like substance with each other, or with that of Christ, is a mere and barren truism. The homöousian* doctrine is, that the Godhead is “one substance,” undivided: division of the triune “substance” would make tritheism, three gods: “nor dividing the substance,” declares the Athanasian Creed. The body is but partially consubstantial with the food eaten yesterday, and not at all (probably) with that consumed ten or twenty years ago. No one regards an animal as consubstantial with the tree, or with the butt-ends of grass, that has furnished it nutriment; for, severance of substance obliterates consubstantiality, otherwise there would be but “one substance” (mixed and crude) in the world. Animals nourished by the mother are not consubstantial with her: while unborn, there is not unity so properly as community of substance: and not even that in those hatched from eggs. Links in a chain of ancestry and progeny are obviously links of substances, of like substances, not of one substance: the chain is one, the links are many and distinct, not consubstantial. So determine fact and science and ever triumphant common sense.

Organization and consubstantiality, however, are predicated of “human nature,” to give form and stamp to the theory of an interwoven quasi-aural connexion, through that “nature,” between Christ and men. More crudely, “Godhead entered manhood that it might leaven the whole lump,”—the whole lump of manhood. (250.) This leading notion of the reintegration of “human nature” is the key to Mr. W.’s book,—the hinge, the vital essence, the sine qua non of the benefits procured for us by the Redeemer,—so that, without this theory, (he affirms,) the mediation, the atonement, sanctification, lie in darkness and emptiness. Take the following from one page: (55) “the existence of ‘human nature’ is a thing too precious to be surrendered to the subtleties of logic, [fact however, must take its course,] because upon its existence depends that real manhood of Christ . . . upon the reality of this fact is built that peculiar connexion between God and man which is expressed by the term Mediation.”† “Unless we discern this real impulse [the quasi-physical “alteration” and “elevation”] which was bestowed upon ‘humanity,’ the doctrines of Atonement and Sanctification, though confessed in words, become a mere empty phraseology.” Take these other assertions: “the ‘nature’ which was pure and holy, entered as a renovating principle into the corrupted line of Adam’s race;” (149) “that ‘manhood’ of Christ which is the principle of regeneration ‡ to all His brethren;” (155) “the salvation of Adam’s race depends upon the influence of that higher ‘nature’ which has been introduced into it from above;” (170) “the renewal of man’s nature is effected through union with the ‘manhood’ of Christ” (300) “to be the real bond of union between different ‘natures’ is to be a Mediator;” “thus does the truth of His Mediation imply our actual union with his man’s ‘nature.’” (238, 239). These are startling positions: for, though they presume the mediation, the atonement, regeneration, renewal, sanctification, they disparage them by overcasting those clear principles with the veil of an imaginary penetration of Christ’s “nature” into “human nature.” And to minds absorbed (like the book itself) by this notion, the high doctrines mentioned will seem dependent on it; so that in proportion to the acceptance of that notion will be the insecurity of the doctrines. And a future generation may be so strenuous, so “one-idea’d,” for this consanguineously diffused “Incarnation,” as to accept the cradle and the life for the Cross and the death, and thus discard the Altar of Calvary, on which the Incarnation itself and all Christian truth and hope are built, and which never can be overmagnified. Even now, the high-toned Christian Remembrancer (see Churchman of August 4) can assert that the Atonement is not “the centre of the doctrinal system of the gospel,” is not

* The homöousian assertion respecting our bodies, would, if amplified, be odd. Our bones and blood and flesh are of “like substance” with chalk and charcoal, with locks and lucifer matches, with balloon gas, with air and water and salt, with eggs and glue, and, alas, with fire and brimstone. Of what may try such consubstantialness, theologians will be chary.

† If this “term” be here reduced from its moral meaning, from mediatorship to medium-ship, it certainly imports an objective quasi-physical “mediation,” a substantive medium,—that being the body or manhood of Christ. What becomes, then, of the moral Mediation (of which the Intercession is only a branch) of the man Christ Jesus between the moral Creator and His moral creatures? Mediatorship being settled, how can the medium (except the positively appointed sacraments) through which it shall operate be a vital matter? Hence, I leave the word in its high meaning.

‡ On p. 330 is the following remark: “the soul’s regeneration like the body’s growth, is of course a protracted process, which the whole of life is not too long to complete.” It is added, that in baptism “this process is begun.” In other words, the new birth (here combining the baptismal and the moral) is gradual, not instantaneous, and is not consummated at the font.

“the gravitating point,” and can declare that view to be “a loose, fragmentary conception;” offering, for this “misplacement” (!) of the heart of the scheme of mercy, “the great central sun of the Incarnation,” in its quasi-physical results, as “the actual thing, Christianity.” Alas, alas! “What are these wounds in thine hands?” Those with which I was wounded in the house of my friends.”

The doctrine of the Incarnation is one thing: that its benefits come to us through the pervasive “organized” action of the “entity” of Christ’s divinified “human nature” on the “entity” of our “human nature,” is another thing. The one is vital, the other visionary. Why seek more or other agency or instrumentality, for communicating Christ’s favour to us, than that of the Holy Ghost? why, more or other, for our “participation of the divine nature,” and as the bond of union of the saints with Christ and with each other? “he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit,” and conversely, “he that is one spirit is joined unto the Lord.” And why, as frequently in this work, disparage “natural religion,” which is sound knowledge when soundly held, by opposing it to Christianity, by making it a nickname, or term of depreciation, for all direct communication with God or the Spirit, for all communication with or from them not resolvable into the mediation of a medium? What can be gained by the quasi-physiological interlinking of human beings by “organized consubstantiality” in their common “human nature”? Suppose even that it was the palpable “organized consubstantiality” of the Siamese twins, extended through the whole progeny! might not some of them prove saints and some reprobates? yet would not the motive of not dishonouring our “real” incorporation into Christ be more impressive than it could be made by the present halo-ish theory? Have we a right to make a motive to piety, by crowding into scriptural truth the supreme improbability of an “immaterial, organized, consubstantial, active human nature,” not to call it an absolute impossibility? And what beyond the allegation that it presents such a motive, can be plausibly adduced for the hypothesis? And the practical efficacy of this motive,—what is it? We all are in God, as the creature is in the Creator,—all in Christ, as the restored from annihilation or worse are in the Restorer; and God and Christ are correspondingly in us; yet men sin. We all have the Holy Spirit within us in the conscience, and many have Him in the new-born and ripely gracious heart; yet we all sin, and go on in sin of different shades. We partake of the eucharistic body and blood, and so “dwell in Christ, and He in us;” yet we sin. What greater nearness or oneness could there be in the quasi-physical or very-physical diffusion of Christ’s “nature” into ours? and what better result could we hope for,—after the notion ceased to be an absorbing novelty or revival of a novelty? Be the manifested presence of Jehovah what it may, from the Shecinah burning on the mount, to the “still, small voice” in their bosoms, the children of Adam, yea, the children of the second Adam, may and do dishonour It. Familiarity, whether through the “delay” at Mount Sinai, or through the hourly whispering within,—familiarity, from whatever cause, (especially if aggravated and abused by precocious or talkative handling,) will dissolve the reverence begotten by impressions, whether sensible, (or sensuous,) or imaginative, or, alas, gracious—leaving only the reverence of principle; and that requires not the stimulating fancy of an Incarnation thus “extended” to and through “human nature.”

Disagreeable to the present writer as is the function of a censor, particularly when it bears on a respected name, he cannot excuse himself from submitting that the foregoing mass of objections,—and there probably are others,—is an overwhelming condemnation of the theory now brought before the reader.

Unphilosophical philosophy is an injury to any code of truth. This subjecting all the remedial functions of Christ, even our holy change and sanctifying, even the Atonement itself, the very corner-stone of ALL moral congruity in the creation, and of ALL hope in moral creatures, to an unproved and unprovable hypothesis, is lethal to Christianity, and not to be compensated for by any revivification of energy (imagined or real) in the Church or its members, by any quickening or soaring of their faith. Truth, sooner or later, will resent beclouding error. The approval of such fancies, the longing for them, is resolvable into the irregular and undisciplined action of a good feeling, earnestness in religion, which, like all good in our “earthen vessels,” (souls as well as bodies,) may be betrayed into evil working. And earnestness when morbid is not good. Let me call such fancies hobby theology; for pleasantry is no mean help to grave and tender expostulation. Hobby theology, in some shape, has always existed. We had, in our day, the hobby of a more efficient operation of the Sanctifier through animal excitements, including society stimulations. We now have a pleading hobby in the gentler animalism of sensuousness; carrying ornament, architecture, reverence, “decent order,” and even sentiment, beyond good taste and sound feeling, and beyond the truthful relative sanctity of sacred things, to a quasi-sacramental transcendence. We have also the further hobby theology which marches boldly into doctrine, and would suffocate, with clouds of gossamer, plain Christian good sense and clear philosophy. By loosening thought from its foundations, and then (this often is catchrestlessly deemed profundity) piling thought upon thought, though they be slender as thistle down, the imagination can mount beyond the appointed central attraction of revelation and firm science, and glide hither or thither in uncontrolled sublimeness,—mounting to superlatives beyond the venture of sober faculties, far beyond the check of the understanding, which ought to be its fellow-traveller. From that region of attenuations, the ideal progeny is introduced among Christians. Fortunately, it is not sempiternal. Like insects, the hobby brood go out with the season,—and must then wait for another season before they can renew their vapoury existence.

On those readers who happily “take no note” of things occult, but peruse a deep current by its surface, Archdeacon Wilberforce has conferred an obligation by his copious right and persuasive teaching. In theology as in legislation, not a few comprehend what is “read by its title” as well as if pronounced.

* In newspapers two or three months ago, were these quasi-figurative expressions, (manifested quasi’s are unavoidable,) from foreign sources,—“invoke the sublime essence of gratitude,” for educating street boys,—a “providential aureole about the men at our head;” a Hungarian confidence of special divine protection. What better, except tropically, the phrase “spiritual presence [not influence] of Christ’s manhood?” (310.)

Appleton's Standard Edition of the Prayer Book, in six different sizes, PRESENTING ABOUT THIRTY DIFFERENT VARIETIES.

The attention of the members of the Protestant Episcopal Church is called to the elegant editions of the Book of Common Prayer, in five different sizes, published by

GEORGE S. APPLETON,

164 CHESTNUT ST., CORNER OF SEVENTH.

These superbly printed and beautifully illustrated and bound books, may safely be styled the HANDSOMEST SPECIMENS OF BOOK-WORK yet published in this country.

The paper upon which they are printed, manufactured expressly for the purpose, is of a beautiful texture, and of much finer quality than has heretofore been used.

The text is printed from the authorized copy adopted at the last General Convention; the proof sheets corrected by one of the three Presbyters appointed for that purpose.

There are five illustrations elegantly engraved on steel, from the unique designs of Overbeck, and a finely executed illuminated title-page.

The six different sizes, 32mo, 24mo, 18mo, 16mo, 12mo, and 8vo, are bound in the very finest manner and by the best workmen.

The type of the 18mo and 24mo sizes will be found to be much more beautiful than any printed.

They may be had in every variety of style of binding, varying in price from $1.00 to $10.00, comprising rich Turkey Morocco extra, imitation Morocco, antique, or in rich paper mache in imitation of the antique, very neat; also in Morocco extra with clasp, and in elegant silk velvet, with plain rim or clasp.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

The Publishers have been kindly favored with the following recommendations from the clergy and others, who have examined this edition.

"I have spent some time in examining your beautiful edition of the Prayer Book, and comparing it with the standard set forth by the last General Convention. The result has been my conviction of its excellence, and of its correctness in every particular. So far as I can see, it is absolutely faultless. The beauty of its typographical execution will speak for itself. I join most cheerfully with my clerical brethren of this city, in recommending it, and in wishing it extensive patronage."

HENRY W. DUCACHET,
Rector of St. Stephen's Church.

"It is indeed a very superb book. The paper is excellent, the type large and clear, the engravings with which it is embellished very fine, the binding in keeping with the rest, and the execution and finish of the whole as perfect, we suppose, as the present state of the art of book making will allow, and certainly sufficiently so to please the most tasteful eye. We do not know what more can be desired."

—Banner of the Cross.
"It gives me sincere pleasure to recommend Messrs. Appleton's new edition of the Book of Common Prayer as the most elegant and correct which has ever been published."

JOHN COLEMAN,
Rector of Trinity Church, Philadelphia.

"The edition of the Common Prayer, printed in various sizes by the Messrs. Appletons, demands the confidence and patronage of Churchmen."

"It combines, in a degree hitherto unequalled, accuracy of Text, with a large clear type, and a portable size book."

HENRY J. MORTON,
Rector of St. James' Church, Philadelphia.

EDMUND NEVILLE,
Rector of St. Philip's Church, Philadelphia.

In the intervals of the Divine service, the usual business of the Convocation was transacted. Appointments were made for the January session, and an order was passed, appointing Danville as the place of holding the January session. An appropriation was made for a missionary to be employed within the bounds of the Convocation; and a resolution was offered to alter the first article of the Constitution, by striking out the words "Bradford, Tioga, Centre, Mifflin and Huntingdon." This Resolution lies over until the next session.*

The public services were unusually well-attended, and a deeply increasing attention characterized the whole Congregation. It has been my privilege to attend many services of this kind, but I do not recollect one where there was more to interest the heart, and to warm it in the great work of contest for Heaven. May the dews of God's heavenly grace attend these solemn services!

NEW YORK.

The Bishop of New Hampshire has accepted the invitation of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of New York to perform Episcopal Services in the Diocese, and will commence a visitation at Monticello, Sullivan County, on the first Sunday in November. Thence he will proceed to Newburgh, and then visit the parishes which have not been visited recently, in Putnam, Westchester, King's, Queen's, Suffolk, and Richmond counties. He will spend a few days in this city before returning to his own Diocese. We are glad to learn that the Bishop has recovered from his sickness, and is able to undertake the duty requested at his hands.—Churchman.

OHIO.

CONFIRMATION.—On Thursday evening, the 11th inst., in Rosse Chapel, Gambier, Bishop McIlvaine confirmed ten persons. This is the second confirmation in this parish within the year, making in all fifteen confirmed since last Convention, seven of whom are students.

But for the unavoidable absence of the Bishop at the time of Commencement, four others of the graduating class would have been added to this number. Brethren of the Clergy and Laity, pray for the spiritual welfare of your Diocesan Institutions. God is blessing them. Let prayers go up continually unto God for them from all parts of the Diocese.—Western Episcopalian.

TRINITY COLLEGE.

In the late changes connected with the building of St. James' New Church at New London, the Rector and Vestry have very kindly sent the Holy Table, which was formerly in the old Church, to Trinity College. It was the one constructed under the direction of Bishop Seabury, and always used by him in the Holy Offices. Each panel is a whole board; and inasmuch as boards of the width of the front panel could only be obtained with considerable pains, there is little doubt that the work was designed to be symbolical of Unity. It is proposed eventually to restore the venerable relic to the same holy purposes for which it was originally designed, and it is hoped that it may continue in all time to be the Altar of Trinity College. The Wardens and Vestry of Christ Church, Salem, have also forwarded to the College the copy of the Holy Scriptures which Bishop Seabury used in the Church above mentioned. It is a folio, in good preservation, of Baskett's edition, of 1753, and is remarkable for reading "Strain out a gnat," in Matt. xxiii. 24.

It may be proper to add, that an excellent clock has also been presented by Mr. B. B. Satterlee of Plymouth, intended for the College Library.—Calendar.

CONDUCT OF A DOG.

The remarkable instance of sagacity and feeling in a dog which is the subject of the following circumstantial statement, comes from an authentic source, and must be reckoned among the most striking of the many facts, in illustration of the reasoning faculties of dogs.

"In the summer of 1846, my son at that time twelve years old, was visiting in the country.—Having occasion to cross the field of a neighbor, the lad was pursued by a fierce dog, and as he looked back over his shoulder to see if the dog was gaining upon him, he stumbled and fell down upon a ledge of rocks and broke his leg. He lay helpless, and the dog came up in a moment in full cry ready to pounce upon him. As he came up he seemed to understand that something had happened to the boy, and after looking at him long enough to learn the precise state of the case he set off towards the house, which was far beyond the reach of the child's cries. But the dog went only within call, as if fearful of leaving the boy alone, and there barked for some time without attracting attention. Failing in his purpose, he went home, and by his incessant howling and running in the direction from which he came, he succeeded at last in persuading some of the family to follow him to the spot where the suffering child was still lying.

Now, the point of special interest in these facts is this; the dog unusually fierce, pursued the boy as an enemy, trespassing on his master's grounds, but the moment when he saw his enemy down and in distress, his ferocity turned to pity, and with far more principle than most men exhibit, he resolved to do him good. He sought to save the life which he seemed bent to destroy. This is the only case that has come to my knowledge, where a brute showed mercy on one whom he regarded as a foe. The best of us may learn a lesson from this dog.—Newark Advertiser.

PRO ECCLESIA.

By THE REV. EDWARD C. JONES.

"And again we exhort you, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye have in remembrance, into how high a dignity, and to how weighty an office and charge ye are called, that is to say, to be messengers, stewards, and watchmen of the Lord."

The Ordering of Priests.

Pro Ecclesia—up and toil,

While the crimson east is glowing,
Thickly soon Night's shade will fall,
Fast the stream of life is flowing:
Heart and hand, and voice and pen,
Pledge them all to dying men.

Mind'st thou not that solemn vow,
Which from altar-side ascended?

Wilt thou shrink a craven now,
Ere the dusty road be ended?
Heat and burden nobly bear,
Strife and watching firmly share.

Ye are shepherds—guard the fold,
"People of His pasture" feeding,
Let His Truth be kept unsold,
Error's syren voice unheeding:
Want and woe, if come they must,
Ne'er should drive you from your trust.

Pro Ecclesia—stand you then,
Like the Vestals by the Altar,
Never for the scoff of men,
Should your heart a moment falter:
If the Saviour do but smile,
Bear the taunt, and spurn the wile.

Faithful Steward! oh, when Death,
Like a shadow o'er thee stealeth,
Gladly wilt thou yield thy breath,
For the bliss thy God revealeth:
Then, like star from waning free,
Shalt thou shine eternally.

FIFTEENTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY.

THE SUFFICIENCY OF EACH DAY'S EVIL.

Out of the many lessons conveyed in the Holy Gospel for to-day, I will choose one for our present consideration. It shall be that conveyed in its closing words, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." This is the great principle on which our Saviour's previous warning is founded. Because the evil of each day is sufficient for it, He warns us not to add the evils of to-morrow to the evils of to-day, lest we should lay upon ourselves a burden heavier than we can bear. For we cannot bear the burden of evil unless God give us strength to bear it; and although He does give strength to His own elect for every burden which He shall lay upon them, yet to none can we be sure that He will give more strength than is required to bear the burden of each day's evil as it comes. If He send sorrow, He will send grace to bear it; if He appoint sickness for us, He will give patience to endure it; if He permit us to suffer loss, He will make the loss to be gain. But He will not help us to bear a load which we choose to lay upon ourselves, in addition to what He lays upon us. He will leave us to bear it as we can, at least we have no right to expect otherwise; and then we shall find that we cannot bear it. Each day, even, brings more of evil than we could bear without the grace of God to help us; how much less then can we bear the accumulated load which we lay upon ourselves, by looking forward to the future, and with anxiety, and doubt, and fear, and despondency, anticipating the evils which may befall us! For thus we both increase the burden of evil, and forfeit the grace which has been given to enable us to endure the day's own portion.

Thus some men err; lading themselves with a far heavier burden of natural evil than God would lay upon them, and so weakening their spiritual strength, that they are ready to sink under trials which otherwise they might bear cheerfully, and advance withal along the way to heaven.

How much wiser would it be to seek first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness, and then calmly trust His promise that all things that we need shall be added unto us. Consider what our condition really is. Our life in this world is most uncertain; it may come suddenly to an end, long before any of those evils which we dread can come upon us. We see our fellow men frequently cut off in this way, in the midst of their worldly anxieties; we see all their hopes and fears about the means of life suddenly cut short by death; and we know that the same may happen to ourselves any day; and then, far other hopes and fears will open out upon our sight. Then our state will be fixed forever. Nothing will then lie betwixt us and endless misery, or endless joy, but the judgment day. What then will become of us in that awful period which lies between our death and the judgment day? and how shall we be supported under that day's terrors? and who will carry us safely through that fearful trial? All these things we can only leave in the hand of God. In Him we trust that He will sustain our souls in the state of separation. On Him who gave His life for us, we must lean for support when every creature's support shall fail us, and we shall stand naked and helpless before our Judge to give account of our sinful lives. And yet we are afraid to trust Him for the little remnant of our earthly life! His tender love, His gracious mercy, His compassionate care, are all our trust for deliverance from everlasting misery, and the attainment of eternal life; and yet we dread the passing griefs of this transient life, and fear the loss of fading joys as if there were no good God to trust in, no gracious Providence to watch over us.

Surely this is most inconsistent. It is inconsistent in the religious man, because while he trusts in God for greater benefits, he fears to trust Him for the lesser. It is inconsistent also in the man who thinks little of religion, because while he is anxious and fearful about those troubles which may come upon him in this life, he is altogether careless and indifferent about those far deeper and more awful miseries which will surely overwhelm him in the world to come, unless he provides against them by turning, while he may turn, to his offended Maker.

Both these inconsistencies are unhappily too common. Religious persons find it easier to trust God for eternal life than for this life: irreligious men will fear possible evils in this world more than certain ones in the world unseen. My brother, if you can with a quiet mind trust God to provide for your everlasting salvation, and yet take over-anxious thought for the future of this your transient life on earth, consider whether this does not show great want of faith in a way that you do not perhaps suspect. Of course, if you had a simple child-like faith in God's promise, and a calm trust in His love, that would remove all over-anxiety about the future. But I think, that if you find yourself giving way to fears about worldly troubles, whilst you can easily trust your immortal soul to the loving care of God who made it, there must be in you a great want of faith in the reality of the world unseen. You fear the trials of life, because you know what they are, and how much you suffer under them. If you do not fear the trials that will follow death, is it not because you have not realized how awful they are? If you find it hard to trust in God for the little future of a life that is fast passing away, and yet can without difficulty trust Him for a future that will never end; is not this to act as if your present state were to last for ever?

Surely, if we find the future possible evils of this world press so far more heavily than the future possible evils of the world to come, there must be in us some grievous want of faith in the reality of that unseen future; and it is quite time that we tried to make sure that our seeming trust in the mercy of God for everlasting salvation, is anything more than carelessness as to our future condition altogether.

Thus, I think, I have shown that those who are careful and troubled about many things, and anxious about to-morrow's evils, are in great error, and that, perhaps, in more ways than one.

But others err in a different way. Having a fulness of the goods of life, and no reasonable prospect of their failure; having had no experience of unbearable evils, they say, like the unwise man in the Gospel, "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease." To them it rather seems as if the good of each day were sufficient, than the evil. And for the future they have no fear of want, because the fulness of sufficiency seems to them, by the force of habit, their natural condition. For them, then, it remains to learn the truth expressed in the words of Christ, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." How it will be taught them God only knows; but we know, that in some way they will come to the knowledge of the misery of life in due time. They will learn what they have to learn, and they will learn it by experience. Meantime, I say, the evil is present to them, though they know it not: evil, and a sufficiency of evil, comes upon every man every day; and not the less upon those who boast themselves in the multitude of their goods and strengthen themselves in their riches; not the less, but the more.

I see a poor man, weak in constitution, and often suffering much bodily pain. He rises early, and goes forth to his work, scarcely refreshed by a short night's sleep from the labors of yesterday. The cold sharp dews of early morning fall upon him and chill him through, and he turns to his ordinary labor. His meals are scanty, and two of them he takes in the open air. One healthy child brings him his homely dinner, and sits beside him as he eats it; and when evening comes, his wife receives him thankfully home again. But one of his children lies on a hard bed, ill of a heavy fever; and another pale and thin, sits by a scanty fire, very slowly regaining the strength which the fever had taken away. Two children he has more: one is a boy, far away working for his bread in a distant colony; the other is a daughter, once his joy and pride, but now his deepest shame, and cause of his keenest sorrow.

But let this vision pass; for who knows what peace may be within, how calm, and pure, and steady, and bright may burn the inward light of holy and heavenly affections amid all this outward evil! and let us turn and view another picture.

I see a man prosperous in the world, surrounded with a sufficiency of all things. He is young and full of health and spirits. Beloved by all his friends, he heartily returns their kind affection. By the world he is respected; and in return he wishes well to all the world. He is just setting out in life, and bright visions of hope are opening out before him in addition to his present happiness. Moreover, his heart is alive to the tenderest affections, and his heart is fixed on one who faithfully returns his love. He loves and is beloved. He lives for her happiness in whose happiness his own is bound up. And for her too the prospect is bright. Why should he fear lest she should be unhappy? He has just brought her to a noble house, where all that heart could wish is at her command. She has men-servants and maid-servants, horses and carriages, parks, and gardens well stored with flowers and fruits, as fair as the fairest climates of the earth can produce. What then could heart wish more! How smoothly and pleasantly the days roll on! no cares, no fears, no harassing doubts, but a plentiful fortune well secured, a loving wife, good health, and a cheerful mind: this is his portion, a portion ever bright and fresh as each succeeding day shines pleasantly upon him. And yet these very days are full of evil: they have their ample sufficiency of subtle, secret, penetrating evil. A worm is at the root of all this brilliant happiness, unless by penitence he kills it. The damps of spiritual death are spreading over the smooth polish of this worldly splendor, and the rust is eating out the brightness of his joy. It is of course possible, a man in such a station and under such circumstances may be humble and penitent; and possible too, that the poor man whose condition I have described may be discontented and proud. But if not; if the poor man in the depth of his misery is humble and confiding, and the rich man is self-confident, and forgetful of his real misery, give me the poor man's lot. Let me be like Lazarus, the friend of angels, full of sores, and subsisting upon alms, rather than like the rich man faring sumptuously every day, to lift up my eyes in torments hereafter. "Lord, let me know mine end and the number of my days, that I may be certified how long I have to live." "Give me neither poverty nor riches, feed me with food convenient for me."

The eye of our Judge is over all, and He spies out all our ways of vanity. A few remember this, and live in the fear of God, and the rest forget. But for this, their condition is not the less full of evil, but the more. The sons of Job died before their father, and saw no second period of earthly prosperity. Their days were overhung with evil, none the less because they forgot, if they did forget, their sinfulness and frailty. If they forgot, their father remembered; for we read they "went and feasted in their houses every one his day: and sent and called for their three sisters to eat and drink with them. And it was so, when the days of their feasting were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them, and rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt-offerings according to the number of them all; for Job said, It may be that my sons have sinned and cursed God in their hearts. Thus did Job continually." He remembered the presence of the Judge, and was conscious of the awfulness of sin, and knew how much of evil was blended with all the ways and thoughts and doings of sinful men, and how liable they were who seemed in the highest prosperity to lose all that their souls delighted in, and find sorrow and suffering in its place. Now surely when the sorrow came, when one heavy affliction followed another, when the waves of trouble went over him, it was far better for him that he had remembered the secret evils of the days of prosperity. "Ye have heard of the patience of Job," has become a proverb: but a far different report of him would have come down to the world, if he had enjoyed his great prosperity to the full, and forgotten that sin will overwhelm the soul with misery unless atoned for.

Here then, I think, we have suggested to us the remedy for over-anxiety about the future troubles of life. To know and realize the evil of to-day, is the best remedy for over-thoughtfulness about the evil of to-morrow. To know wherein our true misery consists, is the best means to bring us to a right dependence upon our God and Saviour. If pain, sickness, grief, loss, or perplexing difficulties lie heavily upon us, these all, we must remember, are the fruits of sin, and as such must be patiently borne by sinners. But though the fruits and punishment of sin, they are designed by a merciful Father to cure the evil of which they are the evidences; therefore we need not dread their final issue, if we are of those who confess their wickedness, and are sorry for their sins.

If, on the other hand, we are free from these and similar earthly trials, and find that our days are pleasant and our nights refreshing, then there is the greater need for us to make some means to know our true condition.

It would be an awful thing if we should bring upon ourselves the curse pronounced against that lukewarm Church which said, "I am rich and increased with goods, and have need of nothing;" and knew not that she was "wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked."

Whichever be our state, our Saviour says to us, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Let us pray Him to realize to us, as we are able to bear it, the full meaning of His words, and we shall find that this will remove from us either presumptuous self-confidence, or vain anxieties. Thus to pray, if we do it earnestly, will be to anoint our eyes with eye-salve that we may see. Then will the prosperous and self-satisfied man behold such a vision of unsuspected evil ever haunting him in his happiest days, as will humble him in salutary fear and sorrow at the foot of the cross; while the thoughts of the over-anxious and too careful man will be carried forward towards higher hopes, and more awful dangers, and his energies will be more decidedly devoted to preparing for a trial far greater than any that awaits him in this world; and so the one great work of life will proceed more vigorously; pleasures will be enjoyed more humbly; sorrows will be borne more calmly; and the gracious providence of our heavenly Father will be confided in more uniformly.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

S. BARTHOLOMEW, LONDON. (PART I.)

In the midst of crowded cities, and near streets traversed by thousands of passengers every day, as well as in the peaceful solitude of the happy country, nooks and corners may be found. There, as well as elsewhere, are little charmed spots, calling up a thousand recollections of the past, and bringing back again the memory of those who have long slept with their fathers. These may be unnoticed by the thousands who carelessly pass them by; and stones, pregnant with many a lesson, and which, if gifted with the power of speech, could tell many a tale of the godly self-denying zeal, of long-protracted vigils, and saintly piety of the men of other days. Such a spot, in all respects, is the one we have selected for the present paper. To the vast masses that in the immediate neighborhood attend for the transaction of business, or who are collected here to celebrate the wild and unseemly revels of the fair, the Church of St. Bartholomew, and the buildings around it, suggest no food for meditation; but the thoughtful and religious, in the midst of the city's din, will here enjoy calm and gentle peace, and dwell upon the memory of Rahere, and the religious companies that erewhile lived and prayed, and departed in joyful hope within its sacred precincts.

Marvellously wondrous is the history of that remarkable man, as handed down to us in the writings of a monk some short period after his death. The whole of this we would willingly transcribe; but our space will not allow, and we must, therefore, content ourselves with condensing what we have perused with no ordinary interest. It is full of wonders, and marvels passing strange; and our readers must bear in mind, that in quoting any of these we do not stamp as authentic, but give them as illustrations of the sentiments that obtained at the time to which they refer.

Rahere was sprung from the people, and yet in early life became associated with nobles, and the high of the land, and even made his way in the king's palace. (Henry I.) "He was a pleasant-witted person," and spent his time in revelry and mirth, amusing his friends by his gibes and "courtly mockeries." In time, however, the voice of God spake within him, and by the grace of the Holy Spirit he was enabled to leave his wicked and ungodly course of life. When serious thoughts took possession of his mind, he set out on a pilgrimage to Rome, and at the shrine of the blessed Apostles, SS. Peter and Paul, wept, and prayed that God would have mercy on him, and blot out his sins. At Rome he was afflicted with a severe illness, and was brought nigh to the gates of death. Believing that his last hour was come, "he shed out as water his heart in the sight of God, and all brake out in tears." Then he made a vow, that if God would restore him to health, he would establish a hospital for the benefit of poor men. Not long after he was restored to health, and was favored with the vision which is thus related by his chronicler.

"When he would perfect his way that he had begun, in a certain night he beheld a vision full of dread and sweetness. It seemed to him to be borne upon a high beast, having four feet and two wings, and set him on a high place. And when he, from so great a height, would incline and bow down his eye to the lower part downwards, he beheld a horrible pit, whose beholding impressed in him great dread; for the deepness of the same pit was deeper than any man might attain to see; therefore he (secret knower of his defaults) deemed himself to slide into that cruel a downcast. And therefore, as seemed him inwardly, he was afraid, and for dread trembled, and great cries of his mouth proceeded. To whom appeared a certain man, pretending in cheer, the majesty of a king, of great beauty, and imperial authority, and his eye on him fastened. 'O man,' he said, 'what and how much service shouldst thou give to him that in so great a peril hath brought help to thee?' Anon he answered to this saint, 'Whatsoever might be of heart, and of might, diligently should I give in recompense to my deliverer.' And then said he, 'I am Bartholomew, the Apostle of Jesus Christ, that come to succor thee in thine anguish, and to open to thee the secret mysteries of heaven. Know me truly, by the will and commandment of the Holy Trinity, and the common favor of the celestial court and council, to have chosen a place in the suburbs of London, at Smithfield, where in mine name thou shalt found a Church. This spiritual house Almighty God shall inhabit, and hallow it, and glorify it. Wherefore doubt thee nought; only give thy diligence, and my part shall be to provide necessities, direct, build, and end this work.'"

Moved by this vision, Rahere returned to England, and applied to the king for the site which had been marked out to him. His request was granted, and Rahere commenced his work. This, however, was no easy matter, inasmuch as at this time the place was "right unclean," a marsh abounding with water, and the part highest above it being used as a gallows. The many difficulties by which he was surrounded yielded to the extraordinary energy and application with which he labored, and his work prospered in his hands. He built a Church of stone (1113), and a hospital house at some distance from the Church. In this latter a number of clerks dwelt, over whom Rahere was the Prior. In a while he associated with himself a man of sacred age, with experience of long time, named Alfyn, who had built the Church of St. Giles, Cripplegate.

But Rahere was not allowed to go on uninjured by the tongue of malice and envy. Many a severe trial had he to endure, many a bitter cross to bear. At length he laid his complaints before the king, who confirmed his previous grant by the following charter:—

"In the Name of the Holy and undivided TRINITY, FATHER, SON, and HOLY GHOST, 1st Henry, King of England, to William, Archbishop of Canterbury, and George, Bishop of London, and to all Bishops and Abbots, and earls, justiciary barons, sheriffs, and ministers, and to all men and their lieges, and to the citizens of London, greeting: Know ye that I have granted, and by my charter confirmed, to the Church of St. Bartholomew, London, and to Rahere the Prior, and Canons regular in the same Church serving God, and to the poor of the hospital of the same Church, that they may be free from all earthly servitude, and earthly power and subjection, except episcopal customs: to wit, only consecration of the Church, baptism and ordination of clerks; and that, as any other Church in all England is free, so this Church be free; and all the lands to it appertaining, which it now has, or which Rahere the Prior, or the Canons, may be also reasonably to acquire, whether by purchase or by gift; and have socage and saccage, and thol and theme, and infangetheof; and all liberties, and free customs, and acquittances in all things which belong to the same Church, in wood and in plain, in meadow and pastures, in water and mills, in ways and paths, in pools and parks, in moors and fisheries, in granges and shrubberies, within and without, and in all places, now and forever. And this Church, with all that appertains unto the same, know ye that I will to maintain and defend, and to be free as my crown, and to have taken in my hand in defence against all men; wherefore I grant to Rahere, and to the same Church, in all its own rights and possessions, the breach of peace, and skirmish made in the house, and the invasion of house or court, and all forfeitures in its own jurisdiction made, and for estate, and flemenefermen, in the way and without, in the feud and without, in the city and without: also, that it may have discussions of causes, and the rights of causes concerning all plea which may happen in their lands, and all customs, whether in ecclesiasticals, or seculars, as fully and freely as I should have of my own domain and table. I release also, and acquit Rahere the Prior, and the aforesaid Church, and all belonging to the same, of shire and hundred, of pleas and plaints, and murders and scutage, and gold and danigelds, and hydages and sarts, and assizes and castleworks, or the rebuilding of castles and bridges, of enclosing parks, of removing woods, or other things of fordwit and hengwit, of ward-penny and ave-penny, and blood-wite and fightwite, and childwite, of hundred-penny and thring-penny, and manbrate, and mischinige, and schewinge and frithsokes, and west geilteof, of warden and outlawry, and forefenge and whitfonge; and they be quit in all my lands of tollage and passage, and pontage and lastage, and stallage, and of all secular service in land and in water, and ports of the sea, so that they may be loaded with no burdens of expedition, or occasions or aids of sheriffs, or reeves of the hundred, or pontifical ministers. I prohibit also, by my authority royal, that no men, whether my minister, or any other in my whole land, be troublesome to Rahere the Prior, or the aforesaid Churches, concerning anything which belongs thereto; and that no man of the clergy or laity presume to usurp dominion of that place, or introduce himself without the consent of Prior or brethren."

SCENES IN REAL LIFE.

[From a Correspondent in Texas.]

Comal Town, New Braunfels, September, 1849.

In my letter of last week, I promised to give you some incidents respecting the cholera in San Antonio. Perhaps I ought not to have promised, for, though they are interesting to me, yet they might not be to those unacquainted with the parties concerned, and all the attending circumstances. But I must be brief.

Death of a Missionary's Wife.

In a low harkal, rendered uncomfortable by the recent winds and rains, resided a family who, though strangers in a strange land, were not strangers to suffering. Inspired by that love which knows no limits, and draws back from no practicable undertaking, they had left the home of their childhood, and sought on the western continent, a more extensive field for usefulness. Not meeting with that support which he had anticipated, and not being able to communicate with those abroad from whom he received a scanty pittance, he was at once reduced not merely to poverty, but to want. In such a plight the dreadful malady seized upon the sharer of his griefs, the soother of his sorrows. In a few minutes it became evident that she must die. Amid the throws and dying agonies of dissolving nature, but one thought appeared to trouble her. It was not that she had to be thus suddenly hurried from all that was dear on earth; it was not that the hour of her last conflict had come. O no! Death had been robbed of his sting. In was not that she must make her grave among strangers, and without the walls of a Romish cemetery. She felt assured that her spirit would dwell within the walls of the new Jerusalem. Nor was it even the thought of leaving him whose being had become a part of hers, and whose countenance as he bent over the form he loved, bespoke the poignant grief of his heart.

O no—it was none of these. But she had a little boy, about two years old.—Should his father also die, what would become of him! Would he be left to the heartless mercies of the world? Was he to be instructed by degraded Mexicans? the only persons into whose hands he would be likely to fall. Was he to be educated in the dangerous dogmas his parents had renounced?—These were the thoughts that harrowed up the bosom of the dying woman. But committing her boy to Him who befriends the orphan, she asked but one more boon—it was to partake once more with her husband, of the emblems of Christ's broken body and shed blood. A clergyman is sent for—messenger returns without him. Again they send for a clergyman. He arrives—and there in that miserable cottage—around that dying Christian, they partook, for the last time, till they eat it anew in the blessed kingdom—of the Lord's supper.—That bereaved husband goes to an American lady and informs her that he had neither money nor friends, and how was he to bear the funeral expenses. "Tell him"—said a noble hearted young man who overheard the conversation—"tell him not to be troubled—his wife shall be buried like a lady." True to his word, everything necessary was furnished. On a dark and rainy night—at the late hour of ten—this young man—accompanied only by the driver of the hearse, and the sorrowing husband of the deceased, followed to the grave—and committed to the earth the remains of the wife of Montsalvatge.

The Dying Mother and Grandson.

In another part of the town, at a large hotel, the proprietor, and her little grandson, a promising boy about 12 years old, are taken with the same disease.—A female acquaintance steps in—the house appears deserted, but in one room sits a son beside his dying mother—in another sits her daughter bending over a dying son.—Had not Providence directed the footsteps of that acquaintance, there would have been no one to lay them out, no one to dress them decently for the grave. But the next morning, after the greatest difficulty in procuring persons to pay the last tribute of respect, the grand parent and son lie down together in the same narrow home—the home for all this busy world.

But hark! what scream is that? O! another Mexican has left this world, and the survivors giving vent to a wild despair, fill the air with their frantic yells.

Angels of Mercy in Pestilence.

Two females may be seen entering a house of poverty. They had seen the husband almost frantic in pursuit of a physician. And here let me remark that much has been written about the excellence and loveliness of woman—much too that better never have been written. But I must say, that I find no words adequate to express my admiration and esteem of some who went forth, the angels of love and mercy, braving the dangers of the pestilence, soothing by every assiduity the downcast and bereaved—and pointing the dying to Him "who taketh away the sins of the world."—God blessed them, for the pestilence came not nigh their dwellings—and may He continue to bless them forever.

They approach the dwelling, they enter—what think you first meets their eyes? Why a mother alone, trying to close the eyes of an only daughter!

These same females enter another dwelling. It is a pitiful sight they behold. Two little children sit by the sick-bed of their parents—one fanning his father, the other her mother—their only attendants in that hour of gloom. That father had loved the world, and now when death approached, he had no heart to attend to the subject of religion. A friend who was present, dreading to have him leave the world thus, asked him how he felt about dying? The poor man turned his face to the wall with a groan—intimating that he could not attend to it now—and thus he died.

AN ENGLISH PARSONAGE.

You see the date of my letter, (Nottinghamshire,) and I have seldom in my life passed a more agreeable Sunday. I have been twice at church, and am staying with the clergyman. He is a gentleman of fortune, and though without title himself, he married a lady of rank, and his family are allied by blood or marriage to some of the highest aristocracy in the kingdom. He specially invited me to come and pass a few days with him, and I came by appointment yesterday, and shall leave to-morrow, as my engagements do not admit of longer delay, though he has urged me to remain. He has a small church; a parish, with the exception of a few families, composed principally of tenant farmers and laborers. His salary is £900, that is, $4,500, and a house and glebe of about forty acres. His father, a man of great wealth, lives directly in his neighborhood.

Imagine a beautiful country, not naturally fertile, but made one of the most productive by cultivation, and everywhere covered with a most luxuriant vegetation; imagine roads as fine as can be trodden, without a pebble to impede the carriage, and bounded with green and neatly trimmed hedges; imagine here and there a substantial farm house, surrounded with acres and acres of green crops, and many of them with stacks of wheat and barley made in the most finished and beautiful manner, in some cases twenty, thirty, and even forty in number, containing, by estimate, two hundred and three hundred bushels of grain each, (I am only stating facts;) imagine your approach to a large cluster of ornamental trees, through which you see the turrets of the house rising, and occasionally appearing and disappearing as you approach; imagine several smooth avenues, bordered with shrubs and flowers of the richest description; imagine an extensive lawn, stretching far away in front of one side of the house, as smooth as Milton describes it, with the sheep and cattle grazing upon it; imagine a beautiful mirrored lake of half a mile in length, and with corresponding width, glistening and sparkling at the foot of the lawn; imagine a grove of magnificent forest trees in the rear of the parsonage, with the tower of the old church mantled with ivy, showing its grey and venerable image among these trees, with its churchyard, and marble and moss-grown monuments, where Old Mortality might find congenial employment for days and months; and you will have some little notion of the exterior of my transient resting-place.

Now enter the house, and find the libraries stored with books, and the drawing-rooms, elegant in their plainest attire, but crowded with the most beautiful objects of ornament and curiosity, and fitted up with every possible appendage of luxury and comfort; imagine an elegant dining-room, the table covered with the richest plate, and this plate filled with the richest viands which the culinary art, and the vintage, and the fruit-garden can supply; imagine a horse at your disposal, a servant at your command to anticipate every want; imagine an elegant bed-chamber, a bright coal fire, fresh water in basins, in goblets, in tubs, napkins without stint as white as snow, a double mattress, a French bed, sheets of the finest linen, a canopy of the richest silk, a table portfolio, writing apparatus and stationery, allumenettes, a night-lamp, candles and silver candlesticks, and beautiful paintings and exquisite statuary, and every kind of chair or sofa but a rocking-chair, and then you will have some little notion of the place where I now am, and indeed a pretty accurate and not exaggerated description of my residence for the last three weeks, four weeks, five weeks, three months—I cannot say how long; and then judge whether it is not likely to spoil me. For the last fortnight, for example, with the exception of one day, I have dined off of silver and porcelain, and have sat down each day to a table as sumptuous and abundant, and various and elegant as I ever saw at any dinner party in Boston,—indeed, more so; and much of the time with a large party of ladies and gentlemen, as elegant in dress and manners as you can meet with; never with less than four men-servants, many times with eight or ten, and in one case I counted eleven, eight of whom were in elegant livery, trimmed with silver and with silver epaulettes, &c.—Coleman's "Letters from Abroad."

ANECDOTES OF AVARICE.

Avarice, says the author of the Religio Medici, seems to me not so much a vice, as a deplorable piece of madness; and if he had added incurable, his definition would have been perfect; for an avaricious man is never to be cured unless by the same medicine which perhaps may cure a mad dog. The argument of reason, philosophy, or religion, will have but little effect upon him; he is born and framed to a sordid love of money, which first appears when he is very young, grows up with him, and increases in middle age, and when he is old, and all his passions have subsided, wholly engrosses him.

The greatest endowments of the mind—the greatest abilities in a profession, and even the quiet possession of an immense treasure, will never prevail against avarice. My Lord Hardwicke, the Lord Chancellor, who is said to be worth £362,000, sets the same value on half a crown as he did when he was worth only £100. That great captain the Duke of Marlborough, when he was in the last stage of life, and very infirm, would walk from the public room in Bath to his lodgings, in a cold dark night, to save a sixpence in chair hire. If the duke, who left at his death more than a million and a half sterling, could have foreseen that all his wealth and honors were to be inherited by a grandson of my Lord Trevor's, who had been one of his enemies, would he have been so careful to save a sixpence for the sake of his heir? Not for the sake of his heir; but he would always have saved the sixpence.

Sir James Lowther, after changing a piece of silver in St. George's Coffee-house, and paying two-pence for his dish of coffee, was helped into his chariot, (for then he was very lame and infirm,) and went home;—some time after, he returned to the same coffee-house on purpose to acquaint the woman who kept it that she had given him a bad half-penny, and demanded another in exchange for it.

Sir William Smyth, of Bedfordshire, who was my kinsman, when he was near seventy, was wholly deprived of his sight; he was persuaded to be couched by Taylor, the oculist, who, by agreement, was to have sixty guineas if he restored his patient to any degree of sight. Taylor succeeded in his operation, and Sir William was able to read and write without the use of spectacles during the rest of his life; but as soon as the operation was performed, and Sir William perceived the good effects of it, instead of being overjoyed, as any other person would have been, he began to lament the loss (as he called it) of his sixty guineas. His contrivance, therefore, now was how to cheat the oculist: he pretended that he had only a glimmering, and could see nothing perfectly; for that reason the bandage on his eye was continued a month longer than the usual time.

By this means he obliged Taylor to compound the bargain, and accept of twenty guineas; for a covetous man thinks no method dishonest which he may legally partake to save his money.—Dr. King.

THE CHURCH IN OUR CITIES.

In considering the many demands upon the Church, in fulfilling her great mission of providing for the spiritual wants of men, we are too much disposed to confine our regard to the unoccupied wastes of earth, as the great fields for the efforts of Christian charity. We are most inclined to look only upon the multitudes in the wilderness and in the desert places, to ask, "whence shall we buy bread that these may eat?" It is indeed well that our charitable thoughts should be thus directed; and still better would it be, if our charitable thinking were so followed up by deeds of love that none should be left to wander in the wildernesses and spiritual wastes of earth, as sheep having no shepherd. At the same time it is not wise that, in looking at distant cases of need, we should overlook the miserable destitution at our very doors. It is undoubtedly in those places where wickedness has the greatest energy, from the combination of evil influences, that the strength of the Church's salutary power should most be brought to bear. And it has always been true that evil, of every kind, has found the most congenial soil for its growth in cities. As pestilence spreads more rapidly in their crowded population, so moral diseases are more speedily extended, for vice is equally infectious. In our cities, then, the Church is called upon most urgently to zealous diligence in applying the preventive and restorative remedies of the Gospel. But has our Church discharged her important duty in this respect? Let the spiritual condition of our cities, and the meagre provision for their masses, answer this question.

In all of our larger cities, there are many churches, we admit. But by whom are they chiefly filled? Is it not by those who choose to frequent them, and are able to pay for the privilege? In which of our cities has the Church obeyed that command—"Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in hither the poor and the maimed, and the halt, and the blind?" And in which of our cities might the servants answer, "Lord, it is done as thou hast commanded, and yet there is room?"

We will take, for example, the city nearest home. Our churches have been multiplying in Philadelphia, with great rapidity. Why is it, then, that the depraved condition of a portion of our citizens has been, in no corresponding degree, corrected? The answer is plain. Because the very people who most need her salutary influence, have not been provided for by the Church. There is not a single City Mission Church in Philadelphia. There are two or three Missionaries laboring in this vast field. But they have no place to which they may invite the poor, and say "Come, without money and without price." We venture no rash assertion when we say that there are thousands in this very city, who spend the Lord's Day in that idleness which too often leads to vice, because they have no place where they feel they can go without intrusion, to worship Almighty God. The floating church is the only exception, and that is filled to overflowing. This is a subject which demands the earnest attention of the Churchmen of our city. Indeed every citizen, who is a lover of peace and order, is concerned in this matter. As long as this, or any other, city is negligent in making provision for the spiritual instruction of those most exposed to vicious influences, so long will riot and outrage make it their chosen habitation. Let the Church fulfil her high and holy Mission, and our citizens may rest in their beds, undisturbed by the din of murderous conflict, and unguarded by bands of armed soldiers.

CONVENTION OF OHIO.

We have received in the Western Episcopalian, the account of the proceedings of this Convention, too late to give it in full. The following is an abstract of the most important business transacted.

This body assembled in St. Paul's Church, Mt. Vernon, at 10 o'clock A. M., on Thursday the 11th. The Convention sermon was preached by the Rev. Anson Clark, Rector of St. Timothy's Church, Massillon, from 2 Cor. iv. 7. "But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God and not of us." This discourse we had not the pleasure of hearing. We heard it spoken of however as sound, able, and judicious.

The Convention organized after divine service. About 40 Clergymen and 30 Lay Delegates were in attendance. The usual Committees were appointed. In the afternoon the Bishop delivered his Annual Address. The Bishop spoke feelingly on the prevalence of pestilence within the Diocese during the past year, and congratulated the Convention on the fact, that not one of the Clergy had fallen a victim although some of them had labored faithfully and diligently in the discharge of their solemn duties in its midst. He deplored the loss of several of the laity, who had been called suddenly to render an account of their stewardship; and expressed his own and the Convention's cordial sympathies in the afflictions of those who have been bereaved. The detail of Episcopal acts showed that although our beloved Diocesan has himself been where the "pestilence walketh in darkness," yet in labors more abundant "for the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom," he had not been behind the "chiefest" of his brethren. As we purpose publishing this address entire, we allude no farther to it at this time. Several topics suggested in the Address for the consideration of the Convention, were referred to the appropriate Committees.

A memorial was read from the Wardens and Vestry of St. Peter's Church, Ashtabula. The memorial, in respectful tone and kindly spirit, sets forth that the Rector and congregation of that parish have never taken part in the controversy between members of the former Vestry and the Bishop, and that on Easter Monday last, an entirely new Vestry was elected. The memorialists therefore, respectfully request a repeal of the resolutions passed by the last Convention, touching the case of St. Peter's Church, Ashtabula. The memorial was referred to a Special Committee of five.

On Friday morning a memorial from the Board of Trustees of the Theological Seminary of the Diocese was presented by the Rev. Mr. Burr. The memorialists ask the Convention to "sanction a proposition to sell a portion (say about three-fourths) of the Seminary domain, and so invest the proceeds, as that the interest alone shall be used, and a sinking fund provided for the extinguishment of the debt." The memorial was referred to a Special Committee of five.

The Committee on Missions presented their Report. The Report states the present indebtedness of the Diocesan Missionary Treasury to be $800. It complains that "Some parishes have neglected to use the Missionary and Education Committee as the channel for conveying their bounty to Missionaries and Beneficiaries."

Among the remedies proposed by the Committee is the following.

2. That Missionaries be appointed and sustained by the Canonical authority, and not by individual or Convocational enterprise merely.

The following was the action in relation to the Astabula case and Kenyon College.

The Committee on the Ashtabula case reported—recommending the parish of St. Peter's Church, Ashtabula, to comply without delay with the substance of the terms submitted to them by the last Convention, reciprocating the spirit of the memorial and expressing the hope that ere another year transpires this difficulty will be terminated.

The Report was adopted.

The Committee on the memorial of the Board of Trustees of the Diocesan Theological Seminary presented an amended Report. The preamble and following resolutions were unanimously adopted.

1. Resolved, That the Convention are of opinion that the Board of Trustees have full legal authority to sell and convey in fee simple the lands belonging to said Seminary.

2. That a sale of a portion of said lands as proposed by the Board is expedient, not only to enable the Trustees to discharge the debts of the Seminary, but also to enable them to place that Institution upon a better footing as to its income. The remainder of the Report, imposing restrictions on the Board, after an interesting discussion, indefinitely postponed.

FAMILY PRAYER.

The Toronto Church, in an interesting article on this important subject, has the following sound remarks. It is certainly of great importance that the spirit of the Church's solemn worship should be carried into all our devotions. We address the same God in the sanctuary, in the family circle, and in the closet. It is especially important that children should in early life be impressed with the peculiar beauties of our holy worship. And no feature is more attractive or more happy in its effect than its responsive character. All feel that they have a part. And it is sweet to hear the praises of our heavenly Father lisped by our little ones, as they gather with us around the family altar, to adore His goodness and to supplicate His mercy.

The following are the remarks of the editor of The Church.

Some years ago, in conversing with a friend on the subject of Family Prayer, our friend told us that a gentleman of the Wesleyan persuasion had observed to him that in his opinion that service ought to be more liturgical than it usually is. By this, he meant that it ought to be made more responsive, and in other respects so constructed as to divide the vocal exercise between the head of the family and its members.

The remark dwelt upon our minds—not as altogether new, but as confirming views to which we had been led by the habit of using a portion of the Common Prayer of the Church in family worship. To this habit we were led by other considerations; but we became satisfied by experience that a responsive service is peculiarly fitted for the young and the uneducated; of which two classes, the larger portion of families mainly consists. It is not natural for either of these classes to keep the mind long engaged upon any subject, be it ever so interesting to them; and therefore a religious service in which their direct attention is required only at intervals, is much more likely to maintain that attention throughout.

For this reason we especially approve of those manuals, such as that of Archdeacon Bethune, which are drawn up on the basis of the Prayer Book.

DAILY SERVICE.

It is remarkable to see how certainly truth prevails over mere prejudice. Not long ago, to advocate a daily service was esteemed one of the marks of "Romanizing." The following, from "the Christian Observer" of this city, shows that among our Presbyterian friends, are now to be found advocates for a daily service.

DAILY CONCERT OF PRAYER.—Is there not a spirit of practical infidelity abroad in the Church, on the subject of prayer? God has said in his word—"Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and ye shall find," &c. This promise is virtually repeated in many places in the Bible; and Christians are accustomed to pray, with the promise before them. But do they pray as if they were expecting its fulfilment, while waiting before God? Do they offer their supplications with the fervor, and importunity, and deep humility, of those who believe that the Divine Spirit will be given, and that an invisible, almighty hand will be extended to bless and save, in answer to their prayers? We cannot here discuss this inquiry. The reader may find an example of humble, believing prayer, such as we speak of, in the ninth chapter of Daniel.

And such prayer, it is earnestly hoped, will now be offered by many in concert, for the revival of pure religion through the Church, in every part of our country. Our correspondent, "Philo," repeats his proposal for united prayer at evening twilight, in an article inserted on our first page. The proposal, we trust, meets a cheerful, cordial response in many hearts. The conviction is growing and extending, that if the Church shall bless our wide country with the hallowed influences of the Gospel—if the destitute are to be supplied with the word of life—if a ministry is to be reared, to respond to the earnest calls from pagan shores—there must be prayer, and spiritual life, and advancement in the Church at home. The means for promoting it, is not a new measure of questionable tendency—but a means divinely approved and honored in the memorials of fasting and prayer. Esther iv. 16. Acts i. 14.

To which we add the following from the Calendar.

The following paragraph has been handed to us by a friend who is observant of the course of events. It is from a Boston paper:

Morning Prayer Meeting.—We are happy to learn that the daily morning prayer meetings, which have been held for several weeks past in Mount Vernon Chapel, (the Rev. Mr. Kirk's) are to be continued as long as the attendance and interest will justify.

These meetings are not designed for the benefit of one church, or one denomination alone, but for persons of all denominations in the city, or who may visit the city from other places.

Services commence at 8 o'clock, and close a quarter before nine in the morning of every week-day.

Meetings for preaching will be notified from time to time from the pulpit.

COMMENCEMENT OF COLUMBIA COLLEGE.

At the Annual Commencement of Columbia College, held on Tuesday the 2d inst., the degree of Bachelor of Arts was conferred on thirty-two young gentlemen, members of the Senior Class—and that of Master of Arts, in course, on thirteen Alumni of the College, among whom was the Rev. William J. Frost, an Alumnus of the General Theological Seminary. The Honorary Degree of A. M. was conferred on the Rev. James Stephenson, an Alumnus of our General Theological Seminary, and on Mr. George Alexander Crooke, Tutor in Burlington College. The Honorary Degree of Doctor in Divinity was conferred on the Rev. Robert W. Harris, Rector of Grace Church, White Plains, a son of the venerable Dr. Harris, for many years President of the College.

The Exercises of this Commencement of our Alma Mater were of a very high order, and gave unbounded satisfaction, to the large and respectable auditory. The only ground of regret which any had, was the consciousness of the fact that it was the last occasion when the Presidential Chair would be filled by that accomplished scholar, and truly Christian gentleman, Dr. Nathaniel F. Moore, who for the last seven years has discharged the responsible duties of his high office with rare fidelity, and great success.

We are pleased to learn that four of the Graduates of this year, all of whom took honors, and two of them the highest honors—and one of the class of the last year, also a scholar of high distinction, are about to enter the General Theological Seminary.—N. Y. CHURCHMAN.

A EULOGY ON THE CHURCH OF IRELAND.

The following is a Roman Catholic "Prelate's" account of the Church of Ireland. From the mouth of the Archbishop of Tuam such words may be taken as expressing a rather extravagant eulogy.

"The circumstances that called for his immediate attention were indeed painful. He, as their Bishop, the lawful representative of the true Church of God, felt it his duty to warn them against the wily and crafty assaults of a base and corrupted Church—a Church filled with such filthy and foul abominations that he would blush to mention—a Church begotten and founded by Luther and Calvin—a Church cherished and nursed by brutal force and the lustful desires of Harry VIII. and Elizabeth, a wicked Church, a cursed Church, established on the spoil of the old Catholic Church of God—a Church that would now rob the poor of Ireland of the last legacy left them by their forefathers—a Church that was now tampering with the youth and age of this parish, under the awful visitation of Providence, to ensnare them, by holding out to them pecuniary relief only to ruin their souls—a Church whose aim was to invent traps and snares for them. They will give you schools for your children, damnable schools, and then seduce you into their churches. O, what a curse! Could he believe it to be the case that any parents should be found base enough to murder their children? Whatever were their excuses they were more inexcusable than Cain, who killed his brother Abel.

"No; it is a Church which robbed God of his glory. A Church that despises his virgin mother, and deprives her of her honor. How can they honor the Son when they despise the mother? A Church which despises the saints; a Church which divests the true Church of God of its glory, and had only retained the loathsome, filthy carcase, with which they would fain feed the poor deluded souls they were destroying by their heretical doctrine."

FLOATING CHURCH MISSION.

The thanks of the sailor and his friends are tendered to the Sunday Schools of Christ Church parish, for their handsome donation of a bell for the Floating Church. The bell weighs 250 lbs., and is of very fine tone; inscribed on it is the text, Isa. lx. 5., "The abundance of the sea shall be converted unto Thee." May both those who have given it and those who shall be summoned by this messenger to the Lord's house on earth, meet together in the temple of heaven!

I would also bring to the notice of Christians, the subject of providing us with means to procure religious books for sailors "going to sea." Bibles, Prayer-books, and tracts, we can obtain from the societies which distribute them, but there are many other valuable books which we require. The benefit which sailors derive from wholesome reading cannot be estimated. Every book is studied and learned, a silent preacher. Every sailor who has one is a missionary; the crews of perhaps a dozen different ships will all in turn read each volume. The owner carries the seed of truth with him from port to port; and as the sailor is constantly changing from ship to ship, his library is literally circulating, one book will probably travel over the whole ocean, and be studied by hundreds! No man is more benefitted than the sailor by a good book; no one so grateful. "I begin to believe now," said a sailor to me the other day, "that there are some who care for us." He had just been confirmed by the Bishop, and was taking leave of me to go to sea. I had furnished him with tracts, books, &c., and given him a letter to the chaplain of the port to which he is bound. When it is remembered besides, that the sailor is at sea at least four-fifths of his time, deprived of all the privileges of the sanctuary and the means of instruction, which landmen, from their frequency and abundance do not appreciate, there is no way of keeping alive the impression which an occasional visit to the house of prayer, and a short conversation with its pastor, may have produced, except by furnishing him with such books as will tend, under God's blessing, to perfection of grace and knowledge. This brief statement of our wants, together with the sympathy so generously manifested in behalf of the seamen's mission, will, I am confident, induce many to contribute and furnish us with the means necessary to attain the object contemplated.

The subjoined acknowledgment is proof of the generous promptness with which the sailor's wants are met.

R. S. TRAPIER.

The Rev. Mr. Trapier gratefully acknowledges the receipt of thirty volumes of religious works for the sailors to take to sea, from Miss R. S.; $5. contributed by Mrs. E. S. B., and $5. by a member of St. Stephen's church, purchased this little library.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

The Editor of the Banner, gratefully acknowledges the receipt of the following sums. For Bishop Chase for Jubilee College, $5.

From a friend and lover of the Church, $5. for Nashotah, and $5. for Mr. Unonius.

From W. H. S. for Mr. Unonius, $5. From M. R., by the hands of G., $5.

Our friend of the Calendar supplies us with the following pleasantry.

DIVORCES IN CONNECTICUT.

Apropos of Divorces. We believe the following jeu d'esprit has never yet been published. A clerical gentleman, of this city, attended the House of Representatives last Spring, to read prayers, and being politely requested to remain, seated near the Speaker during the debate, he found himself the spectator of an unmarrying process, so alien to his own vocation, and so characteristic of the Legislature of Connecticut, that the result was the following

IMPROMPTU,

Addressed by a Priest to the Legislature of Connecticut.

For cut-ting all connect-ions famed,
Connect-i-cut is fairly named!
I twain connect in one, but you
Cut those whom I connect, in two:
Each legislator seems to say
What you CONNECT I cut away.

THE PRIMARY VISITATION OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

On Thursday, his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury commenced his Primary Visitation in the Metropolitan Church of Canterbury. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Spry, Canon Residentiary of Canterbury, from the 2d Corinthians ii. 17:—"For we are not as many which corrupt the word of God; but as of sincerity, but as of God, in the sight of God speak we in Christ."

At the end of the sermon the Archbishop proceeded to deliver the charge:—

Of this Charge, which is chiefly confined to practical topics of discussion, the Guardian thus speaks.

The Archbishop of Canterbury's Primary Charge, which we print at length this morning, brings somewhat to mind the dignified gentleness which used to characterize his Grace's predecessor, and seems rather to aim at a similar treatment of the difficulties which environ the Church. The influence of the teaching of the Societies of which the present Primate is so distinguished a patron is, however, very apparent throughout the main portion of his Grace's Charge. It touches very lightly on the question of education, as now in controversy between the Church and the Committee of Council; speaks more categorically, but not more fully, of Mr. Wortley's attempt to alter the Marriage Law; and treats the subject of Baptismal Regeneration as one on which, being still sub judice, it would be improper to offer any remarks. On the Marriage question the Archbishop, so far as he says anything, expresses only what we believe to be the undoubted sentiments of the Church at large, but on the Education question the Charge is certainly both vague, and, to a certain extent, ambiguous.

The address to the Archbishop, from the Clergy of the province of Canterbury, requesting his Grace to authorize the observance of a day of humiliation and prayer throughout the province, on account of the prevalence of cholera in this country, was forwarded to Lambeth yesterday. It was signed by upwards of 450 clergymen.

The following answer was returned.

"Reverend Sir,—In compliance with what I understand to be the general wish of my clergy, as well as from my own sense of the duty incumbent on us at the present season I recommend that Friday, the 5th, or Wednesday, the 10th of October, be set apart as a day of humiliation in all parishes where no such service has been hitherto observed. A favourable opportunity will be thus afforded for exhorting your parishioners to supplication for themselves, to intercession for others, and to thankfulness that they have been spared in the mortality so prevalent around them. The communion service, together with the communion service for Ash-Wednesday, will be a suitable addition to the usual prayers.—I remain, Rev. Sir, your faithful servant,

J. B. CANTUAR.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has presented the Treasurer of the Colonial Bishopric Fund with a donation of 500*l*.

An anonymous donor, under the signature of "Z" has presented to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts a gift of 2000*l*. in the Three and a Half per Cent. Consols, to be applied towards the funds of Colonial Bishoprics Endowment Fund.

The following shows us that one who was so unfortunate in his pursuit of the "ideal," has been more successful in obtaining what the world esteems the real.

The death of George Henry Ward, Esq., of Northwood-park, after a lingering illness, without issue, leaves his estates, and they are very large, in the Isle of Wight and on the borders of Sussex, to his nephew, the Rev. George William Ward, the proceedings against whom at Oxford, and his secession from the Anglican Church, became so notorious a few years since. The Daily News says the Rev. Mr. Ward was destitute of money when he left the Established Church, and has latterly been living on 100*l*. a-year, which he obtained as tutor in a Roman Catholic family. He is now possessed of property worth 10,000*l*. a-year.

Not the least pleasing intelligence, by the last steamer, is the news which furnishes a slight ground for hope, that Sir John Franklin and his companions are still safe.

We find the following in the English Churchman regarding ROME.

From Rome we learn that the French and the Pope are wider asunder than ever. His Holiness is not at all inclined to accede to the ultimatum of Louis Napoleon, who, on his part, cannot with safety to himself recede from the basis which he laid down in his letter to Colonel Ney. Should the Pope go to Loretto, and place himself under the protection of the Austrians, affairs would become still more complicated; for the jealousy between the French and Austrians is well known, especially upon all Italian questions. We said before that we thought it would take a cleverer man than General Oudinot to get the French army out of Rome, and we think so still.

To the above we add the following remarks from the last English Churchman.

The French are tolerably quiet, awaiting anxiously the explanation of the Government on the Italian and Turkish questions. It is reported that the Gallican army is to be withdrawn from Rome, but this we do not believe. There is no doubt that the Government are much displeased with the Pope's manifesto, which has excited great dissatisfaction throughout Italy, and particularly in the French army. His Holiness has certainly good reason to be cautious after what has happened; his attempt to "baptize that wild matron democracy" having turned out such a signal failure. It is important to bear in mind that the Papacy allies itself to liberty or to despotism, according as its interests incline. Reckless little what instruments it employs, provided it accomplishes its work, it is royalist when in a position to sway the minds of Kings, and liberal in the midst of popular assemblies, when they win its favor by exalting the Pope. As long as the people cried out "Viva Pio Nono," the Pope was a reformer; but, as soon as he found they wanted to deprive him of his temporal power, he fell back into the arms of Austria. We do not wonder at this; we only mention it to show how completely the Romish Church has failed in taming democracy, and turning it to her own purposes. The Pope is still at Portici, but it is said that he is going to Vienna to consult with the Emperor of Austria and the Grand Duke of Tuscany on the affairs of Italy.

An English officer (Colonel Pakenham) has been ordered to quit Tuscany, because he distributed some tracts on religious matters, written in the Italian language. What would be said if Italians were ordered to quit England for distributing Romish tracts on religious subjects, written in the English language?

The recent appointment of Dr. Hinds as Bishop of Norwich, seems to be well received. While some Journals express apprehensions that his Church views are not according to their wish, there is but one opinion declared with respect to the excellency of this choice, as far as ability, learning, and personal character are concerned. Having had an opportunity of knowing this to be true from our own observation, and having enjoyed the kind and courteous attentions of Dr. Hinds, we give with pleasure the following testimony, quoted by the Guardian.

THE NEW BISHOP.

(From the Spectator, Liberal Paper.)

Happy would it be for the Church, if the official selection for appointment to high places were always so good as it has been in the choice of Dr. Samuel Hinds for the vacant see of Norwich. That it should have excited no censure in quarters whence censure was almost certain for any appointment that the Whig Government could make, is in itself strong negative proof that the new Bishop is unassailable in qualifications for the Episcopal office. And such is the fact: he is a sound theologian; few men in the Church have had more practical experience; few have joined so much zeal and benevolence to so much discretion—so much ability to so blameless a life.

For the following account we are indebted to "The Belfast Commercial Chronicle."

THE NEW CHINESE BISHOPRIC.

SCENE AT MANCHESTER.

On Monday last an extraordinary scene of confusion and clamour was witnessed at Manchester, in "a public meeting" at the Exchange Dining-room, "on behalf of the fund for establishing a Missionary College at Hong Kong, and other necessities of this new diocese." The meeting was to a large extent composed of clergymen and ladies, with a few of the more respectable merchants and manufacturers belonging to the church, and at the head of it was the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Manchester (who presided,) the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Victoria, the Chevalier Bunsen, Prussian Ambassador, the Rev. Hugh Stowell, the Rev. Archdeacon Rushton, and the sub-dean. This portion of the meeting occupied nearly the whole of the seats: the extreme end of the room was filled up by working men in their rough every-day attire, and with their swarthy, unwashed faces, forming a strange contrast with all around. It was soon surmised by those who had the conduct of the meeting that the working portion of the public present were socialists; but there was not the least ground for this surmise beyond this fact, during the first portion of the proceedings, the two bishops and the mover and seconder of the first resolution being listened to with the most orderly attention, so that when the storm at length burst, it evidently came with great surprise upon most of the persons present, and especially upon the ladies.

The Bishop of Manchester very briefly opened the proceedings, and

The Bishop of Victoria then spoke at some length, detailing the object of the meeting. He stated the footing on which the subjects of this country were admitted into China since the late war, gave an account of the manners of the people, their position as regarded education, adverted to the state of religion and the prospects of the Christian Church there; and said the people of this country could never expect to promote the spread of Christianity there, to the extent which was desirable, by means of missionary efforts from this country, and it was important, therefore, to establish and maintain a college such as that in progress of formation at Hong Kong, for the purpose of training up a native Christian ministry. He said about £5,000 was wanting to complete the college according to its original projection, and that afterwards about £1,500 a year would be wanting for the support of the college and its tutors, and for the maintenance of students. Towards this, government had declared its inability to contribute anything, giving only £250 towards the conveyance of himself to China, and called upon the meeting for its support in aid of the required funds.

The Rev. W. H. McGrath then moved the first resolution:—"That, contemplating with the deepest interest the unparalleled field which God has opened for the propagation of the Gospel in China, and regarding the past appointment of a bishop of our Church to that great sphere of missionary labor with earnest satisfaction and hope, we feel called upon to give some useful manifestation of sympathy and bountifulness towards the infant mission and its newly-appointed bishop."

Mr. John Sharpe, engineer, seconded the motion.

The Bishop of Manchester was about to put the resolution, when—

Mr. Southwell (a young man who had hitherto sat quietly amongst a body of clergy on the left of the chair) advanced to the end of the table and said—"Allow me, my Lord, before the motion is put to the meeting—"

The Bishop of Manchester—"You cannot address this meeting unless you have an amendment to propose."

Mr. Southwell—"I have an amendment."

The Bishop—"Let me see it."

Mr. Southwell here handed forward a slip of paper.

The Bishop (crumpling it up in one hand)—"This amendment is irrelevant. It cannot be put."

Mr. Southwell—"Will you read it?"

The Bishop—"No. (Cries of "Yes.")

Mr. Southwell—"Then I shall move another. (Applause from the working men.)

The Bishop—"Let me see it. I must have it in writing."

Mr. Southwell here took up a pen and scrip of paper, and commenced writing his second amendment.

The Rev. Hugh Stowell (addressing the writer)—"You will not be allowed to come from London to interrupt every meeting here, I assure you."

Mr. Southwell—"How do you know we come to interrupt? You have not heard what I have to say."

The Rev. H. Stowell—"If you wish to promote your own tenets, do it by peaceable means."

Mr. Southwell—"I am perfectly peaceable, sir, and rather calmer, I think, than you."

The Rev. H. Stowell—"You may depend all this will recoil upon yourselves."

Mr. Southwell—"Keep your temper, sir; don't be angry; look to your own position, and never mind mine."

The above dialogue took place between Mr. Stowell and Mr. Southwell while the second amendment was in preparation—the working men at the other end of the room creating a perfect storm of disapprobation because their friend was not allowed to proceed. The second amendment was here handed to the Right Rev. prelate who presided.

The Bishop (to Mr. Southwell)—"Be kind enough to step this way. I can't read it."

Mr. Southwell stepped to his Lordship's elbow, to make out the piece of caligraphy.

The Bishop (addressing the meeting)—"I decide again this amendment is irrelevant."

Mr. Southwell—"Read it to the meeting."

The Bishop—"I shall not."

(Great uproar from the meeting, some calling for the amendment to be read, others condemning the interruption, and some demanding that as it was a public meeting the amendment ought to be read.)

The Bishop—"I am placed in this chair to decide upon questions of order. Two amendments have been placed in my hand diametrically opposite to the object of the meeting, and I refuse to put them. I now put the original motion (here the show of hands was taken, and there was a great number on both sides.) The resolution is carried. (Cries of "No, no.")

Mr. Southwell—"I protest against the right of the chairman to put the resolution until I had been heard upon it, and I will maintain my right yet to be heard. (Applause and disapprobation.)

Here the Right Rev. Chairman called upon the Rev. Hugh Stowell to move the second resolution, but the meeting became a scene of the utmost confusion directly Mr. Stowell rose, there being by this time in addition to himself and Mr. Southwell, two speakers on the forms at the other end of the room as candidates for "the public ear."

The Bishop said he must confess it was with astonishment in a meeting like this, where the object was a charitable and religious one, and where persons were only asked to contribute voluntarily, this opposition should be given, and that they should be met with an amendment diametrically opposed to its spirit. (Cries of "Read the amendment.")

Mr. Southwell—"I demand proof of this statement—let the amendment be read."

The Bishop—"I am astonished."

A Voice—"Read it, and let others judge as well as yourself (cheers and continued uproar.)

The Bishop—"I am astonished that the people of Manchester, when an illustrious foreigner and the bishop of a distant land are here amongst you for the first time, should thus disregard public decency. I will not be put down."

Mr. Southwell—"And I will not be put down."

The Bishop here threatened to dissolve the meeting; but, after a consultation with Mr. Sharpe, who is a magistrate, the police were sent for.

A superintendent of police and two constables soon afterwards made their appearance at the opposite end of the room, but Mr. Southwell maintained his position, saying he had a right to be heard, and that he would only be deprived of his right by being forcibly taken from the room. The meeting was a scene of the utmost confusion, and the ladies, hemmed in and unable to escape, were much alarmed.

At length a superintendent of police forced his way through the meeting till he reached the platform.

Rev. H. Stowell said—"Give him in charge."

Mr. Southwell—"Will Mr. Stowell take the responsibility of giving me in charge?"

Rev. H. Stowell—"I will."

The superintendent of police here asked Mr. Southwell if he would go without compulsion; and he was in the act of stepping forward, when the Rev. Mr. Birch gave him a push.

Mr. Southwell (turning upon the Rev. gentleman)—"Don't push me, sir, this is a Christian meeting."

Here the speaker was led out in custody, but it was understood that he was set at liberty outside.

The Rev. Hugh Stowell then move a resolution approving the establishment of a native ministry in China, the Archdeacon Rushton seconded the motion, and it was agreed to.

Archdeacon Rushton was then called to the chair, and a vote of thanks to the Bishop of Manchester for his conduct in the chair was proposed and carried unanimously.

The Lord Bishop, in returning thanks, said he could not allow the meeting to pass over without making a few observations. He had for the first time been present at a meeting at which there had been anything like a spirit of opposition or dissension. In the exercise of that duty which had been placed in his hands, he had decided that both of the amendments were irrelevant and improper. It was of little consequence to him that he was met with a flat denial on the part of the person who had proposed them. He should still have acted on his own responsibility. (Hear.) No consideration would have induced him to alter that decision. However, not in justice to himself, but to the people of Manchester, whose interests he was bound to respect and regard, and in justice to that deluded few who had been led away by the person who attempted to address them, he should now read the amendments.—The individual said he was friendly to the meeting, and that his amendments could properly and reasonably be put. Why, what were they? The first was, "That considering the Established Church of these realms is by far the richest in the world, this meeting protests against any call for funds with a view to the extension of its principles and its anti-Christian authority." That is an amendment at a meeting on behalf of the advance of missions! The second was, "That the meeting are of opinion that missionary labors should be carried on in foreign parts after the spiritual wants of the people are duly supplied." Was that on behalf of the diocese of Victoria? But he, (the Bishop) wished to be understood properly. No man throughout the length and breadth of the land was more devoted than himself to the real interest and dignity of the working man (applause), the man who earned his bread by the sweat of his brow, and did his duty in allegiance to his sovereign and in duty to his God. (Applause.) He looked upon the display they had that day witnessed as the last flickering flame of in almost burnt-out candle. He had looked with the deepest interest at the proceedings of the working men of Manchester at a recent meeting, at which they sought an advance of wages; and he was gratified to see that they could temperately and deliberately discuss the question. But he would say to them, are these your friends? (No.) Is it to such men as these that you will entrust the dignity of yourselves, the independence of your families, the interest of the manufacturing classes, and the after-benefit and prosperity of the country? (No.) He trusted; not. The exposure, however, had that day taken place; it would go forth in the newspapers; and he was convinced that the working men themselves would support him in the course which he had that day taken.

CATALOGUES OF ST. MARY'S HALL, AND BURLINGTON COLLEGE.

We have received the catalogues of these Institutions: of the former, for the twenty-fifth term, of the latter, for the sixth term.

Through a season, which has been especially trying to schools and colleges, these Institutions have enjoyed their usual proportion of success.

The winter term opens on the first of November, and we hope that these schools may enjoy in it the share of prosperity which they so well deserve.

New Publications.

HISTORY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION OF 1848. By A. D. LAMARTINE. Translated by Francis A. Durivage and William S. Chase. First American Edition. Boston: Phillips, Sampson & Co.

This is a handsome volume of nearly 200 pages, including the two volumes in one. The history covers a period of great interest, and this is increased by the fact that we have not yet seen the end of which these things were the beginning. No one could be better qualified, for the task of writing such a history, than Lamartine, who may well say, quorum magna pars fui. When we add to his abundant sources of information, the graces and attractions of his peculiar style, and the interest which attaches itself to the Author's name, we are sure this book will be eagerly sought after by the public.

HUME'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.—From the same Publishers we have the third volume of this republication. It contains the history of the period from A. D. 1485, to A. D. 1558. This period embraces the reigns of Henry VII., Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Mary. To a Churchman, the most important and interesting in the History of England.

From the same Publishers we have received Nos. I. and II. of SHAKESPEARE'S DRAMATIC WORKS. The text, which is beautifully printed on fine paper and in large clear type, is accompanied with "introductory remarks, and notes original and selected." We are told, in the Advertisement, that "the object of the Publishers has been to prepare an edition from the highest authorities, and in the most elegant form; not too much encumbered with comments, nor so destitute of them as to be obscure to the general reader." "It will be issued in semi-monthly numbers, at twenty-five cents each, each number containing a play complete" with a fine steel engraving.

Those who wish to obtain, in a cheap and easy way, a splendid copy of the great Writer, will find their desires fulfilled in this admirable Publication. We have received these works through Mr. G. S. Appleton, from whom they may all be obtained.

REVIEW OF A WORK ENTITLED, "THE DOCTRINE OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND, as to the effects of Baptism in the case of Infants." With an appendix, containing the baptismal services of Luther, and the Nuremburgh and Cologne Liturgies. By William Goode, Rector of St. Antholin, London, 8vo. pp. 500.

We have received a pamphlet with the above title. The subjoined note is prefixed to "the Review."

"The following numbers on Mr. Goode's book, are published with the view of exciting in the ministers of religion generally, especially in those of the Episcopal Church, a desire to possess the whole work, so as to justify some bookseller in its republication."

In keeping with this statement this Pamphlet seems rather a eulogy on Mr. Goode than a review. It begins with the following small flourish of trumpets. "The Rev. Wm. Goode of London, is beyond all doubt the ablest controversialist of the present day." This is certainly a new fact, and we humbly thank the Reviewer for the intelligence. We have not yet read Mr. Goode's book, but we are quite sure that he deserves the above commendation if he has been able to prove that baptismal regeneration is not "the doctrine of the Church of England." We are informed that this important work will be republished, "should sufficient encouragement be given," by Stanford, Swords & Co., New York. As it is well to hear both sides, and as Mr. Goode is put forth as the great champion of one party, the work ought, by all means, to be republished.

JOURNAL OF WESTERN NEW YORK.

We have just received the Journal of the Twelfth Annual Convention of the Diocese of Western New York. It shows a most encouraging and prosperous condition of this Diocese. Firm and united, undisturbed by dissensions, this Diocese enjoys that rest, in whose blessed calm, now, as of old, the Churches "walking in the fear of the Lord and the comfort of the Holy Ghost," are multiplied.

We shall publish "the summary" next week.

ST. MARK'S CHURCH.

A Committee of the vestry will sit in the School House adjoining the church, every afternoon this and next week, from four to five o'clock, for the purpose of selling such pews as remain unsold.

The Rev. A. S. Smith has resigned his office as Principal of "The Columbus Female Institute," and removed to Norfolk, Va., to take charge of the "Norfolk Female Institute" in connection with the Rev. L. L. Smith.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, JACKSON, MICHIGAN.

STATEMENT BY THE VESTRY.

This Parish was organized in the winter of 1838-9, there being then but two male and five or six female communicants, the village of Jackson then comprising about seven or eight hundred inhabitants. During the year following, the Rev. Charles Fox was stationed here as a missionary, the parish paying him at the rate of four hundred dollars a year as a salary. He remained with us about two years, during which time he rendered us very efficient services, and the interests of the Church here were apparently placed upon a firm basis. A small church edifice was erected, sufficient for the wants of the parish at that time, and a number of communicants were added to the church.

Mr. Fox was succeeded by the Rev. Edward Waylen, who, however, remained with us but a short time, and in May, 1842, the parish was supplied by the Rev. C. W. Fitch, now of the diocese of Ohio. Mr. Fitch retained the pastoral charge of the parish until the first of June, 1847, the parish continuing a missionary station until he left, (with the exception of an interval of about two years,) since which time it has been self-sustaining, and has paid a salary of five hundred dollars per year.

In August, 1847, the Rev. Daniel T. Grinnell, our present much esteemed Rector, took charge of the parish. We now number about eighty communicants, and the population of our flourishing village has increased to about twenty-five hundred inhabitants.

Our village is located eighty miles west of Detroit, and is the county seat of Jackson county. It occupies a central position in the state, and it is of paramount importance that the Church should be well grounded here.

Although the number of our communicants has so increased, and although the population of our village has increased threefold, and is continually increasing, yet since about the year 1843 our congregation has not increased in numbers. This is owing to the fact that all the slips and pews have been occupied, and we are unable to provide sittings for numbers who would otherwise come in, numerous applications being received every year. Great numbers, who might otherwise be brought into the congregation, and eventually into the church, are thus excluded, and either do not attend any place of worship, or become identified with the different sects about us.

There is no way in which this evil can be corrected except by the erection of a larger and more commodious house of worship, and in this way alone can the interests of the Church in this heart of Michigan be advanced.

For two years preceding the close of the ministry among us of the Rev. Mr. Fitch, it was an object of great solicitude with him. He saw we had not room adequate to the growing wants of the parish, and he made many efforts to contrive a way in which such deficiency could be supplied. It was evident, however, that such a house as would suffice for the increasing population of the place, could not be erected for a less sum than about $5000, and it was impossible to raise anything like that within the parish. No definite action was therefore taken in the matter until the winter of the present year, when the Vestry, deeming longer delay a positive neglect of duty, determined to make an effort, with a view to the erection of a church the present season, and a subscription was circulated for that purpose. The amount subscribed, however, fell so far short of the required sum, that the commencement of the building was postponed for another season.

Our subscriptions now amount to the sum of about $2500, and we will be able to increase it in this place to $3000; and in order to make up the required sum, and seeing no other way in which it can be done, the Vestry concluded to request their Rector, the Rev. Mr. Grinnell, to solicit aid from Churchmen, kindly disposed, in the more settled parishes at the east, where the ordeal of an early settlement has been passed. He has consented to undertake the duty; and we hope and pray, and that with great confidence, that his mission will be successful, relying, as we do, upon a most meritorious cause, and the spirit of open handed liberality which has heretofore characterized our brethren at the east in reference to other but not more needy parishes.

Extract from a letter of Bishop McCastry to the Rector of the parish.

"It gave me great pleasure to hear of the noble effort made by the members of your parish to erect a suitable building for the worship of God. No one who knows their circumstances could have expected more from them, and I feel confident that our friends at the east will aid you and them in the effort they are now making. You have my free authority to go to the east on your benevolent errand, and I trust your application will not be in vain. Jackson is one of our best and most prosperous villages, and the Churchmen there deserve aid, for they have been foremost in every good work. I have no parish in my diocese that stands so pre-eminently distinguished in this respect, and I would, therefore, most earnestly ask Churchmen to aid you."

The Rev. Mr. Grinnell will visit this city in a few days, and give Churchmen an opportunity to aid his people in their efforts to erect a building adapted to the wants of the parish.

VOLTAIRE.—INQUIRY ON HIS "ÉCRASEZ L'INFAME!"

"Conceal your march from the enemy in your endeavors to crush the wretch."
VOLTAIRE.

MR. EDITOR:

Most of your readers are already aware that in the words which we have placed as a motto to our article, was comprised the watchword of that infidel and dissolute party of which the profligate Voltaire was the chief.

Impious as the expression must be allowed to be, it is nevertheless a fair question for discussion with reference to its real and intended application; and though Christians may not be expected to vindicate the reputation of an enemy of their holy religion, yet for the credit of our fallen nature, they may be willing to believe that the charge of blasphemy may be removed from even his vile memory. It is a question of doubt. There are opposing opinions about it. Opinions as far asunder as heaven and earth. Some, distinguished for their accurate learning and diligence, such as T. H. Horne, Palmer, Whittingham, Editors of the Christian Observer, &c., do not hesitate to charge the arch-infidel with the blasphemy; and others equally learned and accurate maintain the contrary, that the scoffing words alluded to do not refer to the Redeemer of men, but to the received religious system of his day and country.

On the one hand, the Rev. Dr. Horne, in his Introduction to the Study of the Holy Scriptures (Vol. 1, bk. 1, c. 1, § 5,) says: "At the very moment in which he was plotting the destruction of Christianity, and introducing the awful watch-word of his party, 'Écrasez l'infame!'—at that very moment, with bended knee and uplifted eye, he adored the Cross of Christ, and received the host in the communion of the Church of Rome;" and in a note he interprets the expression "écrasez l'infame" to mean JESUS CHRIST.

This accusation is supported by the Rev. W. Palmer, the Oxford Historian, in his valuable little Compendium, a work which has received the editorial sanction of the present Bishop of Maryland. The author speaks in the following forcible tones. Voltaire, a man whose private life was defiled by the grossest immorality, and whose heart burned with such a demoniacal hatred of Him who came down from heaven, and voluntarily sacrificed Himself on the Cross for the salvation of sinners, that he adopted as his watch-word on all occasions those awful words, "Écrasez l'infame!" Crush the wretch! that is, "crush CHRIST," "crush the Christian religion."

The words of the Christian Observer, edited by such men as Wilberforce and his co-peers, (Vol. 1, p. 578, note, 1802) are to the same purpose: "It is well known that Voltaire had been accustomed for many years to call our Blessed Saviour the wretch, 'l'infame,' whom he vowed to crush."

On the other hand, Southey, the Ecclesiastical Historian and Poet, in a note to a passage in the "Poet's Pilgrimage," inclines to the belief that not our SAVIOUR, but the Roman Church is meant by Voltaire, under the designation of the Dissolute, or the Scarlet Woman of the Apocalyptic prophecies. He says: "I have seen her (Rome) somewhere called the Scarlet Woman—and Helen Maria Williams names her the Dissolute of Babylon. Let me here offer a suggestion in defence of Voltaire. Is it not probable, or rather can any person doubt, that the écrasez l'infame, upon which so horrible a charge against him has been raised, refers to the Church of Rome under this well known designation? No man can hold the principles of Voltaire in stronger abhorrence than I do; but it is an act of justice to exculpate him from this monstrous accusation."

And now, Mr. Editor, for myself I may say, that I have heard the charge denied with indignation by some who confessed that, for the principles of that Prince of Scoffers no greater admiration could readily be found than that they professed. Other circumstances there are that might be offered but for the want of space, which strongly incline the present writer to the resolution never to employ such a charge, until the "concentrated essence of malevolence" which it embodies, can indisputably be credited to Voltaire's enmity to the Blessed Redeemer of the world.

And now the question may be put,—Is the arch-infidel justly liable to the horrible charge of blasphemy, in the quoted expression, or, are we borne out in the more charitable supposition, (giving him the benefit of the doubt) that, in his letter to the Marquis De Villevieille, in A. D. 1767, from which we have taken our motto, he contemplated only the annihilation of the oppressive system of his Roman Mother, in France, before whose altars he bowed in hypocritical adoration to qualify himself for civil office? whether he ever employed the phrase, as has been alleged, as a party watch-word, alluding to the Adorable Son of God? or, whether he merely wished to emancipate France and Frenchmen from the burdensome restrictions of the French Church, by means of her destruction?

A reference to the scope and context of the original passage will probably be sufficient to place the matter beyond all controversy; so voluminous, however, are the writings of M. Voltaire that few are able to prosecute a thorough search for the solution of the difficulty. For the line above quoted, which contains the awful expression, we are indebted to an incidental citation in another work.

It is a doubt which ought to be solved, not only as an act of justice worthy of a magnanimous opponent, but also because, if the allusion to our Lord was designed, we may safely urge it, without fear of successful contradiction; but if not, that we may not be guilty of uttering a false charge against our enemies, and thus weakening our onset.

PHILALETHES.

J. A. Merrick.

RELIGIOUS STATE OF LONDON.

In the last British Banner, a statement is made by the Congregational minister respecting the attendance of public worship in London:

The population of the city is calculated at 2,353,111. The whole number of places of worship is 797, with sittings for 601,518 persons. They need 1,176,555 sittings to be provided, to accommodate the whole population.

It is a fact, that on an average, after making allowance for the variation of attendants at different services, not more than 600,000 attend public worship; consequently, from various causes, every Lord's day in London, during every service, about 1,700,000 persons attend neither church nor chapel.

Miscellaneous.

We copy the following in the hope that none of our readers will be so wanting in conjugal affection as to give their wives such cause for grief. We would at the same time remind them that Editors, Publishers, and Printers, have not only wives, but also children.

A WIFE IN TROUBLE.

"Pray tell, my dear, what is the cause of those tears?"

"Oh, such a disgrace!"

"What—what is it my dear? Do not keep me in suspense."

"Why, I have opened one of your letters, supposing it addressed to myself. Certainly it looked more like Mrs. than Mr."

"Is that all? What harm can there be in a wife's opening her husband's letters?"

"No harm in the thing itself. But the contents! Such a disgrace!"

"What, has any one dared to write me a letter unfit to be read by my wife?"

"Oh, no. It is couched in the most chaste and gentlemanly language. But the contents! the contents!"

Here the wife buried her face in her handkerchief and commenced sobbing aloud, while the husband eagerly caught up the letter and commenced reading the epistle that had been the means of nearly breaking his wife's heart. It was a bill from the printer for nine year's subscription.—Sandy Hill Herald.

APPARITIONS.

Dr. Fowler, bishop of Gloucester, in the early part of the eighteenth century, was a believer in apparitions. The following conversation of the Bishop with Judge Powell is recorded.

"Since I saw you," said the lawyer, "I have had ocular demonstration of the existence of nocturnal apparitions."

"I am glad you are become a convert to truth; but do you say actual ocular demonstration? Let me know the particulars of the story."

"My lord, I will. It was, let me see, last Thursday night, between the hours of eleven and twelve, but nearer the latter than the former, as I lay sleeping in my bed, I was suddenly awakened by an uncommon noise, and heard something coming up stairs and stalking directly toward my room; the door flying open, I drew back my curtain, and saw a faint glimmering light enter my chamber."

"Of a blue color, no doubt."

"The light was of a pale blue, my lord, and followed by a tall meagre personage, his locks hoary with age, and clothed in a long loose gown, a leathern girdle was about his loins, his beard thick and grizzly, a large fur cap on his head, and a long staff in his hand.—Struck with astonishment, I remained some time motionless and silent; the figure advanced, staring me full in the face: I then said, 'Whence, and what art thou?'"

"What was the answer—tell me—what was the answer?"

"The following was the answer I received: 'I am watchman of the night, an't please your honor, and made bold to come up stairs to inform the family of their street door being open, and that if it was not soon shut, they would probably be robbed before morning.'"

DAILY SERVICE.

Bishop Wilson, in the charge from which we have made an extract, relative to Scripture Readers, thus speaks in reference to having daily service in the cathedral, which has been erected in Calcutta, chiefly through his untiring exertions:

"In the promotion of all these designs the new mission cathedral at Calcutta will, I trust, take its appropriate place. It was consecrated October 8th, 1847; and as a district church in a quarter where it had been imperiously required for twenty or thirty years, it is already most completely successful. As a cathedral also of the metropolitan diocese, it is beginning to follow the model of those at home, so far as circumstances will allow. Daily morning prayers are regularly performed; to which such other services as are in use in England will be added as the cathedral clergy are increased. To the daily morning prayers I attach great importance in the circumstances of Calcutta, where the masses of Christians, nominally such, of all ages and all ranks, who have no opportunities of attending family devotions, are sunk so deplorably in irreligion. The prayers offered up, and the large portions of Scripture read, would afford them an important means of grace. It will take, I am aware, a long time to break up their indifference and lead them to overcome obstacles. The example, therefore, of the clergy and gentry is of the greater importance; who, though they have the blessing of family prayer themselves, yet might easily attend occasionally, if only out of love to their fellow-creatures; though thirty or forty minutes given in the early morning to the public honor of God could not fail, in most cases, to be a material help to the business of the day."

PLACID FACES.

Eliau says of Socrates, that notwithstanding his domestic vexations and the public disorders of his time, he was never known to leave or enter his house with a disturbed countenance. It was his practice, when tempted to anger, to lower his voice and resolutely assume a more than usual gentleness of aspect and manners.

Although Socrates lived more than two thousand years ago, and had no lights from revelation to guide him, his example might be advantageously followed by multitudes of the present day who profess to have learned at the feet of Jesus Christ.

Rightly considered, it is melancholy to think how little the bland and cheerful influences of Christianity, is visible upon the countenances of its disciples. A large proportion of the faces you meet in your walks, tell of some inward disquietude.

ACCIDENT TO ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, CLAYVILLE.

We regret to learn that this new and beautiful structure was much damaged, during the storm on the night of the 16th inst. The following account of the accident is copied from the Utica Herald.

On Tuesday night, during a gale of wind, the spire in progress of erection on this Church was blown down, carrying with it the scaffolding and brickwork underneath, and precipitating the whole through the roof of the Church into the gallery. The roof was broken in just south of the organ, which fortunately did not receive any material injury.

The large window on the east side of the Church and also one on the south side, were considerably damaged. The whole will be repaired immediately.—Gos. Messenger.

DIOCESE OF TENNESSEE.

MR. EDITOR,—As the following information has not appeared in your paper, I send it, for insertion or not, at your pleasure.

On Sunday, Sept 9th, Bishop Otey confirmed in St. James' Church, Greenville, twenty-six whites and five blacks. It is but twenty months since the Church was organized in this place, and it is considerably less than a year since the Rev. Mr. Good was settled there. Where twenty months since there were not two communicants, there are now probably fifty. In connection with the Church is a Sabbath school consisting of ninety or a hundred scholars. During the time above specified, a Church has been erected and nearly finished, and an organ ordered from Philadelphia, and the expenses of all have been chiefly paid by members of the Parish.

Connected with the Parish, also, there has been gathered a female school, under the charge of the rector, which is now in a flourishing condition.

Such instances of the extension of the Church are as rare as they are refreshing to the soul. A correspondent writes concerning the confirmation, 'I can assure you last Sunday was a great day for Greenville—you have no idea what an effect was produced upon the congregation. We met in the New Church, and it was full. During the administration of the solemn rite nought could be heard but the suppressed sob of the congregation; the most careless seemed awed and subdued. When the Bishop called for the candidates to come forward, there was not room enough for them all to kneel around the chancel. The Bishop was very much moved, and Mr. — (a clerical brother who had been much with this new Church,) could not restrain his tears.'

MASSACHUSETTS.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, NANTUCKET.

MR. EDITOR,—As many of our kind brethren in Boston have contributed to our relief, it may be interesting to them to learn that our new Church building is covered in and ready for finishing inside.

The ladies of the Parish, assisted by a few very zealous ladies from abroad, who spent the summer on the island, have recently realized nearly two hundred dollars, from a sale of useful and fancy articles.

But, with this added to the beneficence of our Boston friends, we are not able to complete our little Church. Consequently, our indefatigable rector is about to go abroad once more for aid. In this he has the countenance of our Bishop, and we earnestly hope that wherever he may go, whether in the diocese or out, he will be kindly received in the name of the Lord.

Although we are few in number, and poor in this world's goods, the Church here has peculiar claims upon all Churchmen. Vessels from all quarters of the globe find their way to our harbor, and hundreds of tracts, Testaments or prayer-books are now doing something for the Lord, which were placed in the hands of seamen, on Nantucket, by the very man who may call upon some of the readers of the Witness for some trifling pecuniary aid. Besides this, our island is becoming a place of resort for very many Churchmen during the summer months, while they are in search of health or recreation from business and the heat of our large cities.

One half the sum already contributed by Bostonians will complete our building, and it is with the hope that it will meet the eye of those who devise liberal things, that this article is written.

We gave in our last, an abstract of the proceedings of the Convention. The Western Episcopalian has the following remarks upon the proceedings of this body.

Sermons were delivered during the Convention by Rev. Mr. Winthrop, and Rev. Mr. Tyng. The entire proceedings were characterized by Christian courtesy and brotherly kindness, and were terminated with harmony, and a deepened affection of the members of Convention for each other, and the blessed cause in which they labor. May the Head of the Church own what has been done, by causing to rest upon it his blessing.

SUNDAY AFTER CONVENTION.

This is always an interesting day, the members of the body and visitors remaining together to participate in the Holy Communion, and enjoy the "Communion of Saints." In the morning a sermon was delivered by the Rev. Dr. Perry; in the afternoon Missionary addresses were delivered by the Rev. Prof. Smith, Rev. E. Burr, and Rev. D. A. Tyng, and in the evening a sermon by the Rev. Mr. Nicholson.

After the evening sermon, the Clergy gathered around the chancel, and received the parting counsel of their Diocesan. The burden of that counsel, was "live near to Christ," "cultivate in your hearts the love of Christ," "get down yourselves, at the foot of the cross and rest there." "In all your trials look to Jesus." "The older I grow," said the beloved chief Pastor with emphatic earnestness, "the older I grow, the more insignificant appear to me all other things except the simple preaching of Christ crucified; just as the stars disappear, as the sun advances. Preach Christ, preach him in all his offices, and in all his relations to man as a poor lost sinner." He alluded to the shortness and uncertainty of human life, to the likelihood that we should not all meet again on earth, and to our meeting in the judgment, and then united with his clergy in singing the 145th hymn. "Rise my soul and stretch thy wings," &c. This whole scene was very impressive. God was felt to be present. Few hearts were unmoved. After prayer and the benediction the Clergy took leave of each other, with hearty congratulations, and expressions of thankfulness to God for so delightful and harmonious a meeting together. To him be all the praise.

From the same Paper we add the following extracts from the ANNUAL ADDRESS OF THE BISHOP OF THE DIOCESE OF OHIO.

BRETHREN OF THE CLERGY AND LAITY.—After a year in which our Diocese and many of our congregations, in common with other parts of our country, have been visited with a desolating pestilence from the hands of the Lord, we meet together again without a single death to mourn among our ministers. Several have been laboring in the midst of danger, faithful to their calling and called to lament the death of beloved parishioners, but the Lord has spared our clergy. No such tree in the vineyard has been cut down; no such branch in the true vine has been taken away. Why is it? Who can help answering—that we may attain more growth in grace; that we may manifest more of the life of faith; that we may bring forth more fruit in our personal holiness and in our work as Ministers of Christ. How should the awful manifestation of the hand of God in the desolations which many of us have seen, and all have heard of, impress us with a sense of the uncertainty of this life, of the facility with which God, with a breath, can turn all the pride of man to dust and all his joy to mourning; of the greatness of the work which ministers of God are charged with to souls unprepared to die; of the need and duty of their being always alive in their own hearts and unceasing in their efforts, by all the means which their Master has put into their hands, to call sinners to repentance and to lead them to Christ. Never shall we know the whole solemnity of our office, nor the full value of the Gospel we have to preach, till we stand at the bar of God to answer for our faithfulness, and see all those to whom we are sent receiving at his hands their sentence to hell or their acceptance to His own glorious kingdom.

But while we are thankful to the Father of all mercies for his sparing hand toward our clergy, and that while many of our parishes have shared in the pestilence, many more have been permitted to escape it entirely, we cannot but remember that many of our brethren of the laity have been sore afflicted in the death of beloved relatives, and have a claim upon our affectionate sympathy. Let us pray and hope that to them the chastening hand of God may be richly sanctified, and that our congregations and our whole land may learn righteousness and may be led to attend with greatly increased earnestness to the things which make for their eternal peace, by such examples of the judgments of God.

I desire thankfully to acknowledge on this occasion the goodness of God to me and my family during a visitation of disease the last winter, scarcely less fatal than that of which I have been speaking. Dangerously ill myself, with three of my children successively in the same state, we were raised up again to our accustomed health. The Lord be praised!

The attention of the Convention is especially called at this time to the subject of our Diocesan Missions.

I have recently received from the Secretary of the Domestic Committee of the General Missionary Society the notification that in consequence of the state of the finances of that Society, it has been concluded to make no more appropriations to Missions in the Diocese of Ohio. We are thus to be left hereafter entirely to our own resources. What I chiefly regret in this, is its suddenness. It would have been better had the Committee given us a year's notice, so that we could have taken measures to secure the missions hitherto depending on their appropriation from injury and suffering, instead of thus suddenly, without a day's notice, cutting off all their stations in the diocese, and leaving the Missionaries so unexpectedly without support. In any other point of view, if the cause of missions shall be now properly taken in hand among us, we shall suffer no loss by the change. The idea that we were assisted by the General Society, and that we were assisted much beyond the reality, has always operated to keep down exertions which might have been made among ourselves, or to send contributions to that Society which ought to have been kept at home. Let it now be understood that we are committed, under God, exclusively to our own efforts; that we must support our missions, or they fall; let us remember that from the beginning of this month, the aid of the General Society to the Missionaries hitherto depending on it, ceased; that the question is now exclusively for us to answer whether those stations shall be abandoned and our missionary operations in general be more confined than they have been, or whether they shall be continued as before and enlarged; let each parish minister solemnly consider his duty to God and the Church in Ohio, and lay the cause suitably and frequently before his people, and we shall find that we can do a great deal more than we have ever done in this behalf. I fear the report of the Missionary Committee will be far from an encouraging exhibit of the zeal of the Diocese for the support of its own missions.

There is need of attention to the Resolution of the Convention passed some years ago with regard to Conventions, lest their action in regard to the support of particular missionaries within their respective bounds, should interfere with the canonical duty of your Missionary Committee, and so impede and confuse instead of promoting its proper work.

You are aware that difficulty arose this year for want of a provision in the Constitution of the Diocese providing for the alteration of the time and place of the Convention, when epidemic disease makes that appointed by the previous Convention or by the Constitution necessary. It seems expedient that measures should be taken at once to provide against the occurrence of the same difficulty in future. And while the Constitution is thus under consideration it would be well to consider whether the time when the Convention usually meets is the best, and if it be to make it the fixed constituted time, instead of its being as at present subject to an ordinary resolution changing it from year to year. If another time would be better let it be ascertained and fixed by constitution, so that nobody need be dependent on the Journal for his knowledge from year to year, of the time of the meeting of the Convention.

Difficulty has arisen from the want of some way of determining, and some authority to determine, when a parish shall be considered as so far defunct as not to be entitled to representation in the Convention, not a subject of assessment for the expenses of the diocese; and thus not properly to be placed on the list of parishes in the Journal. It necessarily happens, from various causes which you are all acquainted with, that parishes which either were organized without sufficient reason or which never attained much growth beyond their organization, fall away and become virtually defunct. They may not signify to us that they wish to be considered as defunct; a few members may remain, but there is no body that ought to be represented on this floor, or that may be expected to answer any assessment for the expenses of the Diocese. Their names remain on our Journals; they appear on the list of assessments only to delude us. What shall be provided on this subject it is time for the Convention to consider.

We need Prayer Books for gratuitous distribution and for sale at the lowest possible prices. We have been already indebted to the Bishop White Prayer Book Society in Philadelphia for supplies, and I have no doubt that if we do our proper part toward assisting the funds of that Society, we will be supplied to the extent of our wants. I would therefore earnestly recommend to the clergy that they devote one collection each year to that Society. Its books are particularly well made, and are sold at very low prices, when not given.

The little time that I have had between my last visitation and the sitting of this Convention prevents me from addressing you on any but such points as could not well be omitted. What I have said, has been prepared under pressure of much duty and little opportunity. I have only to conclude by my humble prayer, dear brethren, that the Lord and Head of the Church will be with you in all your doings with his most gracious favor, and further you with his continual help, that all things being begun, continued and ended in Him, may glorify His holy name, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

"Ephraim is joined unto idols—let him alone."—Hosea iv. 7.

Father of love! tho' I too often stray
From thy bless'd path to wander in my own;
If Thou hast ever heard me when I pray,
Oh! hear me now, and leave me not alone.

Jesus, the steadfast anchor of my soul—
Thou who dost share Jehovah's awful throne—
If I am Thine, oh help me to control
My unbelief, and leave me not alone.

Spirit of life! Thy voice was once with me;
Have I then silenc'd quite the heavenly tone?
Oh! hear my prayer—return again to be
My guide, my friend, and leave me not alone.

Dark is my path on earth, when it is trod
Without the light for the believer sown,
Sin casts her cloud between my soul and God—
His smile has vanish'd, and I walk alone.

Oh! for that hour unutterably sweet,
When doubt and darkness have forever flown,
And my freed soul, before my Saviour's feet
In rapture bends, no more to be alone!

A VISION OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.*

(Supposed to be translated from an Ancient Latin Manuscript recently discovered.)

This writing, which will presently be put forth into the world, is a plain, simple, and truthful narrative of a fearful vision which has been even now shown unto me, and which I, (considering that so singular a revelation would not have been vouchsafed to a poor humble Priest, except that he might declare it unto others,) do now record, hoping that it may keep some from the first beginnings of carelessness in the worship of God, seeing into how horrible guilt they may thereby be unawares betrayed. Even now I tremble exceedingly, as I recall what I pray God in His mercy my eyes may never really behold.

It happened lately, as I was sleeping on my bed about midnight, that I imagined myself in a large and goodly building. It was lofty, and very fair to look upon, having stately pillars supporting it, and curiously wrought work in wood and stone, surpassing any I have ever beheld. While I considered these things, there entered many people in most strange and various dresses, of divers colours and fashions; at which I marvelled greatly, for I had never seen the like before. And it seemed to me that they opened sundry little wooden doors, which admitted them into small rooms or closets, so that none could see the others unless they stood upright. Only some two or three, who looked duller and meaner than the rest, sat apart in the open space.

After observing and wondering for some time, seeing that the place continued to fill, I perceived that it was a public assembly; though for what purpose gathered together, or why divided by these little rooms, I could not discern. They looked gay, and some smiled on one another, and some talked to those near them. Also there were wonderful and beautiful books, of many sizes and colours, and some read in them. After a while there was a sound of glorious music, and I thought the people were come to hear it, but it soon ceased, and all stood up and took the books into their hands; but I noted that they looked not on the books but each one on his neighbour's. And I suddenly heard that one was reading in a strange tongue, with a loud voice, but few seemed to heed him, for they presently hid themselves again in their rooms, as if weary. And the walls of these rooms prevented me from seeing any but those who sat very near unto me. Presently, he who was reading ceased, and that same glorious music swelled forth loudly, and after a little, I heard the voices of some who sang therewith, but the music was louder than they; and then they shouted with all their might, that the people might hear them, and all stood up to listen to the music, and to look at those who sang. And while I wondered what all these things meant, and while again they hid themselves as the music ceased, and then after a time stood up as it sounded again, I espied one standing by my side, of a grave and sad expression, but yet with something so lovely in his face, that I could not turn my eyes from it. And as I looked upon him, I saw that, strangely mingled with the sadness, was a look of bright calm happiness; and that, though he appeared full of love and gentleness, yet withal there was somewhat of indignation, which did not hide his gentle loving nature, but seemed mysteriously a part thereof. And methought he spoke to me and said, "Thou wouldst know why all these people are here gathered together?" and I answering "Yes," he said, "They are here to worship their God; this is His temple, where they believe him to be always present." "Alas!" I said, they know not the One True Eternal God, and the merciful SAVIOUR; oh that some one would show unto them the truth! how would these heathen rejoice to hear the blessed Gospel!" The man looked mournfully on me for awhile, then he said, "It is given unto thee to hear and understand." And suddenly I understood the words of those who sang, and they were, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Sabaoth: heaven and earth are full of the majesty of Thy glory!" and I wondered exceedingly at these words, and at the light carelessness of those who sang them. But I said, "They are heathens, and do not fear their false gods." But the man still looked sorrowfully upon me, and said, "Hearken!" and they sang, "The noble army of martyrs praise Thee; the holy Church throughout all the world doth acknowledge Thee;" and I began to fear and tremble, but the man still said, "Hearken!" And they sang, "The FATHER of infinite majesty, Thine honourable, true, and only Son, also the HOLY GHOST, the Comforter." With that I cried aloud, and my soul was sick with exceeding terror; for now I knew that they were Christians, and I feared lest God in His wrath should crush them at once, for each looked on his neighbour, and some seemed weary; and some I saw who talked or smiled, and none seemed to know the meaning of these words, or that God was present among them. But I said, "They do not know all: they know not what CHRIST has done for them." But he said, "Hearken!" and I heard, "Thou art the King of glory, O CHRIST; Thou art the everlasting SON of the FATHER: when Thou tookest upon Thee to deliver man, Thou didst not abhor the Virgin's womb; when thou hadst overcome the sharpness of death, Thou didst open the kingdom of heaven to all believers." And I cried aloud in anguish, "O that one would warn them of the judgment to come, of the evil of their sin; they know not that they are BOUND to serve God; they know not the condemnation they bring on themselves by so blaspheming His Presence!" But he still looked more sorrowfully on me, and I heard them sing, "We believe that Thou shalt come to be our Judge; we therefore pray Thee, help Thy servants, whom Thou hast redeemed with Thy Precious Blood." And I could forbear no longer, but cast myself on my face, and cried aloud to God to have mercy upon me, and on these sinners. And the man bade me rise and fear not, "For the Most High," said he, "discerns between the innocent and the guilty." And I stood on my feet and trembled exceedingly; for I now perceived that all these were Christians. I had heard them speak words of praise, and declare how great things had been done for them by the divine love of the SAVIOUR; they had also declared their belief in His future coming in judgment, and had confessed themselves His servants, dependent on Him for help: and yet I could see no love, or fear, or reverence on any face, but they looked all as though they were but at some public spectacle which concerned them not. And when the music ceased again, I heard the reader declaring the Gospel unto them, and he recounted CHRIST's passion and death; and I looked round to see if none were moved with grief, and love, and thankfulness, and I trembled yet more and more at their cold silent faces; and I said, "Is there not one here who fears God?" And the man led me about the building, and into many of the little rooms we looked, (for none seemed aware of our presence,) and then I saw that one here and another there—some very few—bore marks of humble reverence; and I thanked God for the same. And the man said to me, "These faithful ones, though they be so few, are as a shield to save the many wicked from the wrath of the Almighty; and this not alone by their fervent intercession, (for in their hearts the Spirit Himself maketh intercession with groanings which cannot be uttered, and He which letteth will let until He be taken away,) but also by the righteousness of their own lives. How little do these careless ones think, that to two or three whom they know not, or knowing perhaps despise, they owe God's forbearance, and the lengthening of their time of hope!" And he said further, "I am commanded to open thine eyes, that thou mayest see truly what is passing around thee." And as he spoke I became suddenly aware of a light, very dazzling, and which bewildered me, so that for some minutes I was fain to close my eyes; and when I could see steadily, I perceived that all the building was filled with this wonderful light, which was brighter than the brightest sunshine, and it pierced into every part, and lighted up the darkest corners, and shone through the pillars and the walls of the little rooms, and made them as though they were but thin air; and through all which covered or hid any who was there; so that the face of each one in all that crowd was most vividly and distinctly revealed: there was not one there who was in any degree hidden from this searching light. And when my eyes were accustomed to this great radiance, I perceived that the whole air was filled with many spirits, some bright and glorious, with glittering wings, with which they shaded their faces as unable to bear the intensity of that light, and yet seeming at the same time to rejoice in it with joy unutterable; and other dark forms, which seemed to shrink from the light, and to try to hide from it in their dusky wings, as though it pained and tormented them. And those bright ones joined, with clear, sweet voices, in the praises and prayers which were spoken; and I turned to look for him who had spoken to me, and lo! he too was an angel most glorious and I feared to speak to him. But he said to me, "Fear nothing: this is the light of God's presence, which is the joy and support of all His faithful servants whether in earth or heaven." And I saw that it proceeded from the last, where was such unapproachable splendour that I could not steadily look towards it. And the angel bade me look on all around, and note well what passed; and in a little time I discerned, that by each one person there watched attentively, both a bright angel and one of those dark evil spirits. And each angel held in his hand a small cross, so surpassingly bright, that I could believe it made of nought but that same glorious light which flooded all around, gathered together and intensified; and on each, in letters of sparkling light was inscribed, "Thou, God, seest me." And the good angel strove to flash the light of these words evermore in the eyes of his charge; but the dark spirit held in his hand a book with many leaves, on which were divers pictures painted, and the evil spirit strove evermore to interpose this book between the cross of light and the eyes of him whom he watched, that so he might rather look upon the pictures than on that which the angel held. And I perceived that neither spoke or did aught but silently try to attract attention. And I saw that the people had free power to choose whether of the two they would look upon, and that very many more looked on the evil spirit's book than on the cross of light.

There was one who knelt near to me, whom at first I especially marked. When I first looked on him, he was gazing intently at the pictures in the book, in which I saw figures of men and houses which moved and changed continually; he seemed to forget all around in them, though even then his lips moved unconsciously with words of prayer, when suddenly the cross of light flashed across his eyes, and with a look of starbled awakening, he turned from the tempting book and prayed God to forgive him. And then the light shone more softly, and yet brightly, on him, and his good angel looked less sad; but soon again the pictures caught his eye and fascinated him, and the light grew fiercer, and again the angel looked grievously on him, while the evil one laughed to himself; for both knew well this man's weakness. And my guide said, sternly, as I thought, "Behold the man of impulse; he hath no root in himself, and strives not after heavenly strength."

I turned away to where many sat together in one room, and my heart shook within me with worse horror than I had yet felt, for here I saw some who had even taken the books from the evil spirit's hands, and eagerly turned the leaves for themselves, showing them ever and anon to each other, and seeming to take delight in pictures so foul and horrible, that I could not bear to look upon them, but turned with unutterable loathing away. And on these the light shone with a red and very fierce brightness, showing vividly every line of their faces, which (oh, fearful spectacle to behold, regenerate Christians turning themselves into companions for devils!) seemed to be growing like unto those dark and wicked ones who were among them, and who exulted and laughed scornfully and triumphantly among themselves. And I looked for their good angels, but they were no longer near, yet hovering above them in the distance, looking constantly upon them, and sometimes even trying to throw the gleam of the cross of light upon them, but they hid it from themselves with the pictured book.

Gladly I turned from this sight of dread to where a young girl knelt alone. She was all in black mourning garments, and her face was pale and careworn, and wet with tears; and I saw how the dark spirit continually urged her to look into his book, upon a fair picture of many lovely ones, and her tears flowed faster as she looked upon them; and for a little while the wicked one hid the cross of light from her with this picture, but I saw how she now strove to push from her the book, and to look with earnest steadfastness upon the cross of light. It seemed very hard to her not to look on that picture, but she cried passionately to God, and her good angel looked very lovingly on her and the light shone upon her with a gently soothing brightness, which made her look very lovely; and presently the evil spirit drew farther from her, for he could not endure her earnest prayers, and the cross of light shone ever upon her, and she seemed comforted.

And now methought I said to my guide, "How is it that the pictures in some books are so fair and beautiful, while in others they are vile and hideous, so that I dare not look on them?" And he answered, "Well have mankind named him who is the lord of these wicked ones, the serpent, for herein we see his subtlety. He knows that there are many here who, having still some fear of God in their hearts, would shrink trembling from those pictures which are his own, and which he loves, and might perchance in their fear betake themselves to prayer; and so he tempts them with goodly pictures, which they might consider at all other times without danger, though here, (as all which hides from them the thought of God's presence is sinful,) the harmless becomes unlawful, and the bad is increased to tenfold wickedness; and men yield easily to his craftiness, not being armed by prayer and watchfulness. These are the books of memory, or imagination, and the evil one selects ever those scenes which he knows will prove more captivating. To some he even represents holy places and things which he would hide from them at other times; but here they serve to distract the heart from God and make even a good man pass that time in idle fancies and recollections, which should be occupied with hearty prayers and praises." And I said, "It is hard for them to do right, for there is much arrayed against them." But he answered, "Nay, there is far more for them if they would use it: they have the Spirit of God within them since their baptism, if themselves have not driven Him forth; they have the Presence of God all round them; they have holy words sounding in their ears; they are in the house of God; they have a strong and never-failing weapon within their grasp, even prayer, before which the evil spirits retreat in anguish; and above all, they have One Who (having in His incomprehensible love placed them in this state of salvation,) loving them still with Divine love, ever maketh intercession for them at the right hand of the FATHER, Who wills that all should be saved and perish not. All these things are for them; who will dare say that he cannot prevail against Satan!" And I was silenced, and ashamed that I had spoken so carelessly.

And now I observed where knelt a mother in the midst of her children; and no evil spirit stood by her, though one still watched her from afar, ready to draw close if she turned her eyes from the cross of light. But it shone ever in those meek eyes, whether she prayed, or looked gravely and warningly on her little ones. I watched her long, and the cross shone unceasingly in her eyes, and on none in all that building did it shine more steadily; and brightly too it shone on her children; but I perceived that the evil spirits crowded busily above them, though it seemed as if they could not come near without fear and pain, and they showed gay bright coloured pictures, sometimes for a moment obscuring the cross of light therewith. But bright angels anxiously sought to shed its pure radiance again upon them, and their mother's eye was upon them, and her prayer around them, and the wicked ones gnashed their teeth with rage.

And again, I saw one, an aged, solitary, care-worn man, and on him fell, ever without wavering, the light of the cross; and I saw that he (like the holy mother whom I just watched) was growing in the expression of his calm happy face, like the beautiful angels who were about him, and this although at times tears would dim his eyes, and a memory of some deep-seated bitterness would make him smite upon his breast, and bow himself to the earth in remorseful abasement. I noted that to such moments would succeed a still more heavenly expression, so that I could have lingered near him for ever to see it.

Again, I came to where many young children were crowded together, and among them the evil spirits were busy, and each seemed more glad to look into the tempting book than on aught else, and the angels sadly lingered among them, watching them; and it seemed more dreadful than all to see so many of CHRIST'S little ones giving themselves up to the devil's service.

And many more I noted; some two or three bright and angelic, but many, many more resembling the dark evil ones: some who constantly wavered, now yielding to look into the book, and now turning away only to look again for a longer time; some who never ceased to hold, and gaze into the alluring pictures; some who rejoiced only in the cross of light. But these last were very few; and my heart sickened to see so many unconscious that they were blaspheming God and worshipping the devil in His immediate sight and presence.

And while I thought with fear and great trembling on what would be the end of these things, and also thanked God that He had still some few faithful ones, as salt to preserve the whole from corruption, gradually the whole scene faded from me.

May God in His mercy grant that Christians may never be guilty of such fearful sin, of blaspheming God openly in His temple, regardless of the fearful judgment hanging over their heads, and always ready to fall upon them. "For our God is a consuming fire to the obstinately and carelessly wicked; but to the righteous and the humble penitent 'a light and defence.'"

POPULARITY—A SNARE.

DR. DODD.

Dr. William Dodd, with whose name so melancholy a history is interwoven, was the eldest son of a laborious country clergyman, who, for many years, held the vicarage of Bourne, in Lincolnshire. Sent at the early age of sixteen to the University, he was admitted to a sizarship at Clare Hall, Cambridge, in 1745. In 1749-50, he took the degrees of B. A. in honors, his position in the Tripos being that of fifteenth wrangler.

His eloquence, usefulness, and heartfelt devotion to his sacred calling were now so generally recognized, that the highest honors which his profession could bestow seemed far from unattainable.

A crowded church, a decided hold on the affections of his congregation, large collections whenever he pleaded the cause of charity, a general and growing impression that he was a superior man; preached from the heart and to the heart—were, in the opinion of the masses, so many indications of future eminence and usefulness.

Delusive all! The promise seemed fair. But a blight was at hand: and fatal.

A passion for the society of the titled and the wealthy—a desire to mingle in circles far above him—involved this unhappy man in debts which his stated income was inadequate to defray.

His necessities suggested a base expedient, and his impatience of his situation, and eagerness for preferment led him to adopt it. A vacancy occurred in the Rectory of Saint George's, Hanover Square—the position was influential, and the income large; could he but secure it, his pecuniary difficulties would be ended. Repeated musings on this point, issued in his adopting the strange and culpable idea, that a bribe might procure him the coveted preferment. A letter was written to the lady of the lord chancellor, in which the sum of three thousand guineas was offered her if she would use her influence to secure the nomination of a certain party to the vacant rectory.

Incensed at this attack on her probity, the chancellor's lady submitted the letter to her lord. The chancellor read it, and viewed its contents with kindred feelings of indignation. The proposal he regarded as an attempt to induce him to tamper with the patronage and privileges of his high office. Steps were taken forthwith to detect the offender; they were successful. The letter was read to Dr. Dodd. To mark the sense which the sovereign and the government entertained of his conduct, his name was at once erased from the list of the king's chaplains. Merited and public opprobrium overtook him. From its expression he shrank, went abroad, and for sometime sojourned with his pupil at Geneva. From him he, ere long, received the living of Winge in Buckinghamshire.

Would that by the diligent discharge of his duties, as a country pastor, the remainder of his checkered life had been alone distinguished.

Undeterred by the warnings of the past, fresh schemes for raising money—alike foolish and criminal—were resolved upon. Forgetful of his position—of the force of his example—of the degradation he would bring upon his order,—of the slur he would cast upon religion—he forged a bond purporting to bear the signature of the Earl of Chesterfield.

Consequent upon this act are the following proceedings. Soon after ten o'clock on the morning of Saturday, the 22nd of February, 1776, the judges, Gould, Willes, and Perryn, and aldermen to the number of sixteen, being seated, Dr. Dodd was placed at the bar of the Old Bailey. He was led into court by his curate and intimate friend, the Rev. Mr. Butler; and, shortly after his reaching the dock, read a paper to the following purport.

He submitted to the judges that Mr. Robertson, the stock-broker, who was committed with him as a principal, had, by an order from the Court—surreptitiously obtained—been conveyed before the Grand Jury, to enable them to find the bill. This he (the prisoner) was informed was a thing unprecedented. He therefore prayed that he might, by counsel, be heard upon this point.

Messrs. Howarth, Cooper and Butler then distinctly objected to Robertson's evidence; and cited cases in support of the view they severally took of its inadmissibility. Their objections were replied to by Messrs. Mansfield and Davenport.

Mr. Baron Perryn expressed his regret that so much time had been needlessly wasted. Unjudged lenity had been shown to the prisoner. The baron was of opinion either that a new indictment should be preferred, or that the trial should proceed upon the indictment as at present found. If the latter course was taken, then in the event of the conviction of the prisoner, that the point raised in his favor be left to the determination of the twelve judges.

The prisoner's counsel elected that the trial should proceed. The indictment being read, the Earl of Chesterfield was the first witness called in support of the prosecution. But as it was necessary to prove a release from Mr. Fletcher to his Lordship, before his evidence could be received, Mr. Manly was sworn, and produced the said release.

The earl was then examined.

He declared most solemnly on oath that neither the signature to the bond nor the receipt for the money, were written by him: in fact, that both signatures were forgeries.

His lordship's gentleman usher swore that the signatures—that to the bond and that to the receipt—were neither of them in the hand writing of his lordship.

Mr. Manly was then called.

He gave in evidence a minute and succinct detail of the whole transaction, from the period the bond came into his hands up to the time of the commitment of the prisoner. He averred that the bond had been in his possession from the 4th of February up to the morning of the trial: that the blot by which the forgery was discovered appeared to him not to have been done by accident, but purposely with a pen; that, entertaining doubts whether the bond was a good one, he applied to Mr. Fletcher to advise him what course to take; that he likewise waited on Lord Chesterfield, who denied all knowledge of the bond; that on going to Sir Charles Raymond's, the banker, Mr. Robertson accidentally came in, and was immediately taken into custody; that subsequently he proceeded to Dr. Dodd's residence, having previously stationed Richmond, the Bow-street officer, at a house close at hand: that on seeing Dr. Dodd he told him his business, and asked him "how he could be guilty of such an act?" That the doctor seemed much shocked, and as soon as he could recover himself, said "Urgent necessity was the cause." That the witness then asked the prisoner if he had any of the money left, as "restitution would be the only means of saving him?" To this inquiry Dr. Dodd made answer, that he had six drafts on Sir Charles Raymond of £500 each; that he had also £500 in the hands of the bankers, all of which he would willingly give up. That he, the witness, then asked Dr. Dodd if he would give a bond in judgment upon his furniture and personals for the remainder, to which Dr. Dodd replied, "That, or anything else." Mr. Manly further added he had been told that another execution had been in the prisoner's house, but had been withdrawn. He believed there was sufficient to answer the demand.

Mr. Innes, who accompanied Mr. Manly to the prisoner's residence, corroborated the evidence of that witness as to what passed during the interview between Dr. Dodd and Mr. Manly. He also read, from notes taken at the moment, Dr. Dodd's confession before the Lord Mayor, and his unqualified declaration that Mr. Robertson was innocent. The notes given in payment of the bond were next produced.

These Mr. Fletcher swore were the identical notes paid.

Mr. Leacroft was called to prove the hand-writing of the prisoner. In this he failed. He could not swear to Dr. Dodd's hand-writing positively.

Mr. Neale, treasurer to "Society for the Relief of Small Debtors," was next called to the same point. He swore, unhesitatingly, that the signatures "CHESTERFIELD" and "WILLIAM DODD," which occurred both in the bond, and also in the receipt were each and all were in the hand-writing of the prisoner. On being asked by the judge how he "could be so positive?" he replied, "from his long and intimate acquaintance with the character of Dr. Dodd's hand-writing, and from having so repeatedly seen him write."

Mr. Robertson deposed to the prisoner's bringing the bond to him, in the first instance, unsigned—that he next day brought it signed "CHESTERFIELD," and "WILLIAM DODD;" that he, the witness, also signed it, received the money and paid it over to Dr. Dodd. Being asked if it was "usual for him to sign a bond without seeing the principal sign it," his reply was "sometimes."

No witness being brought forward to give testimony in favor of the prisoner, or to throw any further light on the transaction, he was called upon for his defence.

That was to this effect.

He said he "was fully sensible of the heinousness of the crime of forgery, but presumed the guilt solely centred in the intention. He called God to witness that he meant no injury to any one, and that he should have been able to replace the money—which was his real intent—within a very few months; that this was a most cruel prosecution, inasmuch as Mr. Manly had given him hopes, if he made restitution, that no further notice would be taken; that he considered a person committed as principal, and subsequently admitted as evidence against him, as without precedent in law: as constituting, in fact, an entirely new case, and therefore it afflicted him the more; that life to him, after being exposed to shame, was of no value, he would willingly resign it—but he had a wife."

Here tears flowed from his eyes, and, with few exceptions, all that crowded court shared visibly in his emotion. After a pause he begged pardon of the court and jury for this weakness, and proceeded.

"A wife with whom he lived for seven-and-twenty years in the most perfect conjugal felicity, for her he felt; his creditors must, likewise, be sufferers in the event of his conviction, and, as restitution had been made, he hoped the court and jury would consider all these circumstances and acquit him."

Mr. Baron Perryn summed up the evidence with great minuteness.

He said that the gravamen of the indictment was this:—That the bond was forged by the prisoner with intent to defraud Lord Chesterfield and Mr. Fletcher. If the jury believed it was done to defraud one or other of the parties, it mattered not which, then they must bring in the prisoner guilty. As to the defence set up by the prisoner, the only point for their consideration was, whether the forgery was committed with an intent to defraud. If they thought not, then they must acquit him. With regard to the other points of his defence, it could have no weight with them. For if such a defence was listened to in this case, not a criminal brought to that bar but would resort to similar extenuation.

The jury then retired.

They were absent twenty minutes. On their return they brought in a verdict of GUILTY.

Subsequently these gentlemen drew up a strong memorial, recommending the unhappy prisoner to his majesty, as a fit object for the exercise of his royal mercy. This was signed by the jurymen, without exception, and presented to the Court, who received it favorably.

Mr. Robertson was ordered to be kept in custody till the jail delivery.

The bond question was for the sum of £42,000; the trial lasted seven hours.

This melancholy affair thus progressed towards its close. On the 18th of April, the judges, eleven in number, Lord Chief Justice de Grey being the sole absentee, met in chambers, at Serjeant's Inn, to discuss the legality of Robertson's evidence against Dr. Dodd. The decision arrived at, by their lordships, was that Robertson's evidence ought to be received.

On the 13th of June, the sheriffs, attended by the City Remembrancer, presented to his majesty the petition of the City of London in favor of Dr. Dodd. Another document, with the like prayer, from the Magdalen Charity was submitted to the queen; together with one from the wife of the unhappy man, presented by herself in person. Subsequently, another petition, urging the same suit, was tendered by Lord Percy, signed by upwards of 20,000 of the inhabitants of Westminster.

In vain. On the 27th of the same month, Dr. Dodd, attended by the Rev. Mr. Vilette, the ordinary, and the Rev. Dr. Dobe, a personal friend, quitted Newgate, and was conveyed in a mourning coach to the place of execution.

On reaching it, Mr. Vilette and Mr. Dobe quitted the carriage, and went with Dr. Dodd into the cart, where they prayed by him with great earnestness. They ceased, and after some further interval devoted by the unhappy criminal to fervent prayer apart by himself, he took a final and affectionate leave of his compassionate companions, the clergymen above mentioned.

He then put on a cap, pulled it over his eyes, and submitted himself without remark to the executioner. Another convict suffered with him.

The entire period spent by the ill-fated man in the cart was about half an hour. He conducted himself throughout with becoming fortitude.

A frightful termination to a popular career! He dies away, and apart, and unheeded by those who had thronged him in his prosperous hours, had flattered him, feasted him, and all but worshipped him. His noble pupil too—whose attachment to him was said to have been so deep and so decided, and who virtually put the hangman's noose about his neck—where was he? What were his feelings on that sad memorable day? Was he rejoicing over the blow he had struck at religion, in thus degrading her minister?

But, though sunken, humiliated, fallen, there were some still true to him. His fellow-laborers were neither ashamed nor unmindful of him. Of these, two, undeterred by the bitter humiliations of his position, with noble courage clung to him to the last. For them the gaping crowd, and the callous hangman, and the clanking fetters, and the ignominious cart, had no terrors. A penitent brother was draining the last drops of the cup of sorrow; and owning allegiance to one and the same mighty MASTER, they adhered to the dying man, and soothed him, and consoled him, and whispered into his failing ear words of truth, and might, and peace, undismayed by the horrors of the scene around him.

But touching him as a MINISTER, but one conclusion can be drawn—popularity was at once his snare and his ruin.

The injury he inflicted on religion, they will admit, who hold with the exemplary Skelton, that, "A minister by preaching twenty years with the tongue of an angel, shall not edify his hearers so much as he shall corrupt his seers by one material slip in his conduct."

Yet he was truly penitent; and when one reads his "Prison Thoughts" and "Prison Prayers," the frame of mind which they portray, recalls the profound conclusion of the celebrated Bishop Sherlock:

"The pain and grief of mind which we suffer from having done ill, flow from the very constitution of our nature, as we are rational agents. Nor can we conceive of a greater argument of God's utter irreconcilableness to sin, than that he has given us such a nature that we can never be reconciled to it ourselves."—Scenes where the Tempter has Triumphed.

HINTS ON CATECHISING.

(From Bather's Hints on the Art of Catechising.)

SHOWING HOW THE CATECHIST MAY TURN TO ACCOUNT THE BLUNDERS WHICH THE PUPILS MAKE IN THEIR ANSWERS.

This is the hardest part of the catechist's work, and that in which his skill will be most required and best discerned. In a former part I have supposed the questions to have been put so as to lead the pupils to give satisfactory answers in the main: now I shall assume that the answers have been mostly wrong in some manner or degree.

1. Blunders through giving more particulars in the answer than the question called for.

Luke xviii. 10. Where did these two men go?—Into the temple, to pray.—I did not ask you what they went to do, but only where they went: where was that? Into the temple.—What did they go into the temple to do? To pray.—You told me two things when I asked only for one, which shows that you did not attend to my question.

2. Blunders about the meaning of words.

Example 1. "Prevent us, O Lord, in all our doings with Thy most gracious favor." What is the meaning of the word "prevent?" Help or assist us. Do you help or assist a man who has not put his hand to his work, or one who is beginning to work? A man who is beginning to work.—You cannot help a man who is doing nothing; but you can stir him up to begin, I suppose? Yes.—Can we begin to work of ourselves or by our own strength? No.—Then we want something from God before we begin, do we not, and while we are doing nothing. Can this be called help, strictly speaking? No.—You have already said that you cannot help one who is doing nothing; and that we of ourselves can do nothing: from whence then must we get the inclination to work? From God.—Then God does something first, does he not? Yes.—When, therefore, we pray

"Prevent us, O Lord, in all our doings," we mean, Go before us; stir us up, and set us to work. When we have prayed for this, what do we ask for besides, in the words of the collect? "And further us with thy continual help."—Then you here see the difference between helping and preventing. God prevents or stirs us up, and goes before us when we are doing nothing, and, having thus set us to our work, then he helps us to continue in it.

What does the Tenth Article say? "The condition of man, after the fall of Adam, is such, that he cannot turn and prepare himself by his own natural strength and good works to faith, and calling upon God; wherefore we have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will."

Did not certain persons come to Peter, to ask whether his Master paid tribute? What did Peter do upon this? He went in haste to Christ, to tell him about it.—Did Christ wait to be told? No.—What is it said he did? "Jesus prevented him;" that is, he went before him in what he had to say and to inquire, and he anticipated him. He chose to speak first, and put the question to him, "Of whom do the kings of the earth take tribute, of their own children or of strangers?" "Of strangers," says Peter.—"Then," replies Christ, "are the children free."—(Matt. xvii. 25.) This settled the point as to right. Christ was the Son of the King of kings; tribute could not be exacted from Him; nevertheless it might be expedient for Him to pay it under existing circumstances, and he anticipates Peter upon this head also: "Nevertheless, lest we should offend them, go thou to the sea, and cast a hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up; and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money: that take, and give unto them for thee and me."

Example 2. What is a publican? One that keeps a public-house (a boy laughs).—What do you laugh at Sam? Jack made a very good answer.—A publican is one that keeps a public-house. Mr. Roberts, of the Bowling Green—do you not sometimes call him Mr. Roberts, of the public-house, or Mr. Roberts, the publican? Yes.—Is the house he keeps a private one? No.—If it were, you would not call him a publican; but as it is a public-house, you do call him a publican. The word publican being, as you appeared to know, derived from public. Thus you see the boy had a little glimpse of truth, which my Master, Herbert, directs me to cherish and make the most of. And now see whether I shall not be able to make him build more truth upon it.

You say, one who keeps a public-house is for that reason called a publican: might not a man possibly have to do with other public concerns; and, if he had, might not he on that account be called a publican? Yes.—Then there may be more sorts of publicans than a public-house keeper.—Where did Christ find St. Matthew? At the receipt of custom.—What is custom? Tribute or taxes.—What do you mean by the receipt of custom? The place where the taxes were received.—And what was he actually doing when Christ met with him? Receiving those taxes.—Who paid the taxes? The public.—And for whose benefit were they to be laid out when paid? That of the public.—Then, if St. Matthew was receiving the public taxes, what might he very well be called? A publican.—Was that the name he actually went by? Yes.—Then if an innkeeper may be called a publican, a tax-gatherer may be called a publican just as well. Then what is the meaning of a "publican," as used in Scripture? A tax-gatherer.

Example 3. Who were the Pharisees? "A sect of the Jews who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others."—Let us see whether this is a sufficient answer. What is a sect? A religious party.—Well! the Pharisees were a sect: but is not there another sect often mentioned? Yes; the Sadducees.—Now I know that the Pharisees were a sect, but I want to have them distinguished from other sects. What have you told me about them in order to distinguish them? That they trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others.—But other people might do that, might not they? The Sadducees, or any body.—Again; it was common with the Pharisees, but was it universal? No: there were Pharisees who did not do so.—Was not St. Paul a Pharisee? Yes.—What does he say in the 23rd chapter of the Acts? "I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee."—Did he do so? No.—What does he say of himself, comparing himself with others? "I am less than the least of all saints." (Eph. iii. 8.) And when he talks of his works, does he take any glory to himself? No: he says, "Yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me." (1. Cor. xv. 10.) Then your definition is insufficient. Can you not gather from Scripture anything which distinguishes the Pharisees from the Sadducees? Yes: in the 23rd chapter of the Acts, we are told, that while "the Sadducees say there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit; the Pharisees confess both."—And what does St. Paul himself say about the sect to which he belonged? He calls it "the most straitest sect of our religion." (Acts xxvi. 5.) And do not many passages in the New Testament show this to have been the case? Yes.—Then, now let me hear who were the Pharisees? A sect who professed the greatest strictness of life, and who believed in the doctrine of the resurrection, and in the existence of angels and spirits.

3. Blunders about phrases.

Sometimes you have to set the teacher of the class right. I went into the school one day, and found the teacher questioning on this verse: "When the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof," &c. (Gen. iii. 9.) Teacher: What was the tree good for? Food.—What else? To make one wise.—To make how many wise? One.—What, (said I,) only one? It did make the woman wise did it not? Yes.—Did it make Adam just as wise? Yes: "The eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked."—Then, in fact, there were two made wise, and there might have been twenty; and so might it not have been said that the tree was good to make people wise? Yes.—Then what word may one stand for there? People.—Then what is the meaning of the phrase, "a tree to be desired to make one wise?" A tree to be desired to make people wise, or anybody wise that took it.

4. Blunders about the main subject treated of.

"When the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons." (Gal. iv. 4.)—What is the main subject here treated of? The fulness of the time being come.—Let us see if that be the case. When the fulness of the time was come, what did God do? He sent forth his Son.—Then the fulness of the time being come is a circumstance relating to God sending forth his Son, is it not? Yes.—What does it tell you? When He sent Him.—Are there any other circumstances mentioned about it? Yes.—What are they? How God sent Him, and why He sent Him.—So you are told three circumstances about his sending Him forth, are not you?—Yes.—And to how many things do all these circumstances refer? To one.—What is that? To God's sending forth his Son.—Is it, then, a particular circumstance, or that matter to which all other circumstances relate, that forms the principal subject of a discourse? That to which all other circumstances relate.—And what is that in the text we have been considering? God's sending forth his Son.

PRIVATE JUDGMENT.

"Judge not, that ye be not judged," was the solemn caution of our Blessed Saviour in His first Gospel sermon. Our Divine Lord directed this impressive monition only against unauthorized judgments. He pointed His rebuke against those who impiously presume to exercise a prerogative which belongs to God alone, or to man as holding that power which is ordained of God.

In the heading of this article, we have no reference to the vexed question of man's right to judge for himself, what is, and what is not, truth. The private judgment we here refer to, is that which pronounces its decisions, not against abstract doctrines and opinions, but against individuals, and those often the superiors of the self-constituted judges. This is the private judgment condemned by the Eternal Judge in that plain caution, "Judge not, that ye be not judged."

Although this solemn announcement was left upon everlasting record for our instruction, and although we live in days when men boast much of their love for evangelical truth, our Christian times are strangely notorious for this kind of judgment. The world and the Church seem now to be wholly composed of judges! Judges, all judging one another! In fact, every man, woman, and child in the community is a judge, ready to pronounce at any time either temporal or eternal judgments. And in this singular administration of justice, the order of things is completely reversed. The child judges the parent, the private citizen judges the magistrate; while often in the Church the layman judges the minister, and the subordinate ranks in the ministry judge their superiors, the Deacon the Presbyterian, the Presbyter the Bishop.

We have been led to these reflections by recent events.

Some time ago, in an editorial on "newspaper proprieties," we defined the rule which should govern us in cases where the official action of our ecclesiastical superiors, or Bishops, were concerned. As they were amenable to a regularly constituted authority, and as the Editorial chair was not above the Episcopal bench, we made it our rule never to sit in private judgment over their official acts. In carrying out this principle, we have refused the admission into our columns, of articles severely commenting upon the action of Bishops, from whose views we widely differ. Indeed, no opinion can justly be formed of our estimate of the views held by a Bishop, because of our firm adherence to this rule in his case. Such a course, in our esteem, is the legitimate consequence of sound Church principles. He must be a poor exponent of sound churchmanship who reverses the order of rule which God has established. We trust, therefore, that neither the fear nor favor of man will be able to drive us by reproaches, nor beguile us by gentler persuasions, into a departure from this rule.

Our strict application of it to the case of Bishop Ives' Pastoral Letter, has drawn upon us no little reproach. We have been accused of evasion, of "want of courage," of "lack of frankness," &c. &c. The most bitter and ill-tempered of these reproaches come from THE CALENDAR. Indeed, there is a degree of injustice in the remarks of that journal, of which we would hardly have supposed the Editor capable. We have no disposition to renew the unpleasant discussions forced upon us by our duty, in vindicating the Church, and one of her institutions, against a charge, for the support of which no sufficient proofs have ever been afforded. We have no desire to engage in any controversy with any of our brethren, on this or any subject. Life carries its sad experience full enough of sorrow, without increasing the weary burden by self-inflictions.

We are compelled, however, in self-defence, to deny the truth of the Calendar's statement, which declares us to be "sympathizers" with those who are said to be guilty of "Romanizing." We have not, and we never professed to have, any sympathy with those who are not satisfied with the Church as she is, in her present doctrines, discipline, and present usages. We desire no developments, no changes, no approximations to Rome or Geneva. While we do not stand ready to pass sentence upon Bishops, we are prepared plainly and manfully to declare our opinions. If the Calendar will recur to our editorial remarks on Dr. Seabury's able pamphlet, there will appear no hesitating or evasive declaration with respect to "Auricular Confession," &c. Whenever and whatever "the end" may be to which the Calendar refers, we fear not "the retribution" with which he threatens us. We would far rather incur the reproach of being a "sympathizer" with an erring Brother, than become liable to the fearful penalty attached to that solemn command—"Judge not, that ye be not judged."

The following editorial, which we take from the Christian Witness, states some facts which may certainly be classed among "the signs of the times."

The Sign of the Cross.

Time and intelligence are making sad havoc with Puritan prejudices. To oppose what the Church practised, and to reject the signs and symbols, which she allowed, constituted a marked feature in the religionism of our forefathers. Hence, it seemed to be a matter of grave importance with them to be as unlike the Church as they could, even at the expense of propriety and convenience. The English establishment had magnificent cathedrals and costly churches; they had large and expensive organs; they had a form of prayer, and they observed festivals. The Puritans would, therefore, have plain barn-like structures for churches; they would not tolerate such a thing as an organ, nor allow a prayer to be read; they repudiated Church fasts and feasts, and made it a crime to observe the nativity of the Saviour. Expensive churches were regarded as sinful extravagances, and crosses as signs of Papery.

When, therefore, we recall the history of the past, we can hardly believe what our eyes now behold. Many of our readers know very well how much the Episcopal Church has been assailed in this country, because it had an educated ministry, and used forms of prayer, and erected Gothic churches, and employed the sign of the cross. Of all the denominations, our Methodist brethren were the most severely plain, even to the article of dress. They now have in this city one of the most showy and costly Gothic churches in the country, with one of the largest and best organs. Their church has a cross on it. The same may be said also of the Baptists, only their church has a quadruple cross. The denominations who once ridiculed the idea of an educated ministry, now have more colleges under their control than the Church. They who would not have even the humblest instrument of music in their places of worship, now chant very finely indeed with the organ. Some ministers have put forth forms of prayer, and some have put on clerical robes. And as to the cross, which was once regarded as the symbol of Romanism, and which has frightened so many good people out of their propriety, they seem to entertain quite a partiality for it, if we are to judge from the prominence which has been given to this symbol of the Christian faith, in the churches of the Unitarians, Methodists, Congregationalists, and Baptists.

We noticed last week, in an exchange paper, that a Baptist church in Pittsfield, in this State, was ornamented with a gilt cross, surmounting the tower or steeple.

The following paragraph is from the North American Review:

"Going to a Unitarian church in Portland, he was naturally surprised to see a 'gilt cross placed over the altar,' as he remembered that our Protestant ancestors held this sign in great detestation. Obstinate persisting in their view of it, as a symbol only of Popery and not of the affecting event to which it owes its whole significance, and which is so intimately connected with the doctrines of the atonement and imputed righteousness, that it would seem the cross ought to be held in as great favor by Calvinists as Papists.

"But the casual association, as often happens, has nearly destroyed the natural and legitimate one, and the crucifix is regarded by more than half the Protestant world with as much horror as the Fetish of the African savage." But reason is at last beginning to dispel this silly and inconsistent prejudice; and if Sir Charles Lyell had gone a little farther into Maine, he might have found the once hated symbol frequently introduced among the rich decorations of the richly finished chapel of an orthodox college."

If our denominational brethren would command their patience sufficiently to restrain their spirit of opposition against certain things in the Church, which they now condemn, perhaps a few years of progression would save them the trouble of arguing against the expediency and apostolic authority of her institutions.

THE CHURCH IN IRELAND.—The gross income of the Irish clergy per annum is £453,094; but the nett income is proved to amount only to the sum of £369,360; from which is to be deducted the poor-rate, amounting to £64,243, leaving £306,116. The sum paid to curates out of this fund amounts to £56,708: so that the nett income of the beneficed clergy is thus reduced to £249,408. This sum being divided among the Irish clergy, independently of curates, gives an average of £172 16s. 6d. for each. This seems no very enormous endowment; not at all inadequate, when it is considered that, according to the last official census, there was an average of 500 members of the Church of England for each clergyman.—Episcopal Recorder.

CRISES.

From the same paper, we take the following extract of an editorial on the above subject. From the fears expressed by some, we might suppose that the Almighty had no care over His Church, and that her very existence depended upon man.

"But really, we should think that our beloved brethren would get quite weary of these anticipated crises in the Church of England. There was the rise of Puseyism and that was to be a crisis; the apostasy of Mr. Newman, and that was to be another; and the defection of Mr. Baptist Noel, another; and now the decision of Sir H. J. Faust, to be another crisis, which is to lead, it 'may be,' to an explosion which is to cast the whole 'Evangelical' body of ministers and laymen out of the Holy Catholic Church, archbishops and all. Well, what have all these crises amounted to? have all good churchmen in England been poisoned with Puseyism? have they followed Mr. Newman to Rome? have they gone with Mr. Noel to the Baptists? O no,—Mr. Pusey and his doctrines have seen their day; Mr. Newman is hardly heard of; and Mr. Noel and his book have made pretty much all the noise they ever will, and the Church of England is the Church of England still;—never stronger, never more prosperous than now. And who, we would ask, has left the Church, or will leave it, in consequence of Mr. Faust's decision?

"We have had crises in this country; great fears have apparently been entertained by our brethren of other denominations, as to the unity and purity of our Church. But these crises have come and gone, and yet the Church goes on increasing, day by day. She has fearlessly exercised discipline, when it was called for, she has had severe and protracted trials, yet her unity has not been broken. Those who are most divided and separated in their opinions, do not leave her pale, for they know that the truth is with her, well hedged in by her Articles, Liturgy, and Standards. The fact that the Episcopal Church in this country and the Church of England do pass so easily and so triumphantly through these trials of their faith, a tithe of which would be sufficient to 'explode' the strongest of the religious societies both here and there, may well excite the inquiry, among the denominations, why it is that churchmen, even those who fraternize most with them, and sympathize in some of their doctrinal views, cannot be driven from the fold, but continue in the Church, holding the faith once delivered to the saints, from which nothing within can force them, and nothing from without can attract them."

THE ENGLISH POST-OFFICE CONTROVERSY.

The subject of Sunday labour in the Post-office has for some time past excited much attention and interest in England. We give below the proceedings of a late public meeting, and preface it with the following remarks by the London Guardian of the 10th ult.

The Post-office controversy continues and increases. No less than six public meetings were advertised in the Times of Monday, as having been or about to be held, for the purpose of opposing the intended change; and in the majority of cases the meetings were influential, both in the numbers and position of the parties concerned.

There seems, in short, to be a thorough distrust of the present Government on all questions relating to religion. Nothing else could account for the universal feeling of suspicion which has been generated by a proposal, which, in the letter of it, does not imply any greater, or so great, an infringement upon the Lord's-day as is now practised in the Post-office establishment, taking the whole country together. Even Lord John Russell's warmest political supporters—and that too not always or alone his Dissenting supporters—share in the general mistrust. Lord Ashley and Sir Fowell Buxton might have been expected to take a lead in such a movement as this; but when we hear of such men as Sir James Duke heading and leading it, it is clear that the suspicion is general. Nor is it to be wondered at. We have had several of what the ministerial papers call "inadvertencies" on religious subjects lately. First, there have been the new coin—from which the accustomed solemn recognition of the True Source of all legitimate power has now, for the first time, been omitted. Then, there has been the omission to appoint a fast. Then, again, the systematic encouragement given to the German and Rationalistic school of divines—if school they can be called, who are each for himself, and agree in nothing but opposition to positive teaching of our own or any other Church—in the distribution of the Government patronage. And, lastly, the evident tendency of the ministerial policy to the same lax and miserable end, in their conduct of the Court arrangements on religious subjects. No wonder that her Majesty's Ministers are misunderstood and misconstrued. They must expect to be so.

We gave an account, in last week's Postscript, of a meeting of merchants, &c., in the Hall of Commerce, Sir James Duke, the Lord Mayor, in the chair, to memorialise her Majesty's Government against Sunday labour in the Post-office. We supply one or two details unavoidably omitted in our hurried account. The following is the letter of the Premier, read by the Lord Mayor:—

"Woburn Abbey, October 1.

"My Lord—In reply to your lordship's letter of the 29th of September, respecting a rumoured intention to open the Post-office on Sundays, I can state that there is no such intention. The change actually proposed by the Post-office authorities has been announced in the newspapers; and your lordship will be enabled by that announcement to judge of its probable bearing and effect.—I have the honour to be, &c. "J. RUSSELL.

"The Lord Mayor."

Mr. Masterman stated that he also had communicated officially with the Post-office authorities on the subject. Lord Clanricarde had replied with the following note:—

"Portumna, Ireland, October 1, 1849.

"Dear Sir—There is not the slightest truth in any manner of our intention to establish a delivery of letters on Sunday in London. The consequence of the measure lately adopted will, I trust, be to very much diminish Sunday labour in the post-offices throughout the United Kingdom, and likewise to put a stop to much letter-writing on Sunday in private establishments.—Sincerely yours, "CLANRICARDE."

Mr. Labouchere read the following comparative statements of the Post-office duty as it is performed now, and as it would be performed under the new arrangement.

"MORNING DUTY.

"Now—A portion of the bags containing mails from the out-ports, in number 30, come into the London Post-office on Sunday morning early. These are all opened at present, for the purpose of taking out the letters for Government offices; a practice first established in time of war, employing 26 persons of all grades, there being but five clerks among them.

"By the proposed arrangement—650 bags will arrive early on the Sunday morning; 742 persons will, in their turns, have to attend on that day in order to open, sort, and despatch the country letters. Mr. Hill proposes for this additional duty 25 men only; a force wholly insufficient even to perform the first details of the duty.

"AFTERNOON AND EVENING.

"Now—12 bags arrive on Sundays at two P. M.; and the same operation of selecting official letters is performed as in the morning, by eight persons, of whom two are clerks.

"By the proposed arrangement—In addition to this duty on Sunday afternoon, an evening duty will be performed from five to eight P. M.; when the country letters which arrive in the afternoon in sacks from all Ireland, all Scotland, and the principal towns in the North of England, will, in addition to those that remain over from the morning, have to be stamped, sorted, and despatched in 650 bags to the various post-towns of the kingdom; involving the attendance in their turns for Sunday duties of the above-mentioned 742 persons."

As a banker, and as one therefore of a class who have the very largest pecuniary interest in the honesty of the post-officials, Mr. Labouchere opposed the demoralising Sabbath desecration of the proposed plan.

The Rev. Dr. Croly alluded to the cholera visitation, and asked, "Would it not be a most unwise and ungrateful return for recovered power, if, just when their minds were beginning to cease from trembling, they should employ their renewed strength in the desecration of God's day?"

Mr. Howard Hinton, a Dissenting preacher, answered for the whole class to which he belonged—that they would cordially support the object of the meeting. The other speakers maintained a similar tone, and the whole proceedings were characterized by much warmth of feeling.

Several other meetings have since been held in the metropolis, and great unanimity of feeling expressed against the proposed alterations. Lord Ashley took the chair at a crowded meeting, on Monday, of the inhabitants of Marylebone and Westminster, at Freemason's Hall. The proceedings having been opened with prayer by the Bishop of London, the Chairman addressed the meeting, viewing the question in two aspects—religion and labour. Dwelling more particularly upon the latter, he said—

"I ask those parties who produce these measures to show cause why they should, in this period, when we are upon all hands making great efforts to reduce the hours of labour in all the various departments of industry—in the mills and in the factories; when we are labouring in this great metropolis and elsewhere to obtain an early closing of all the shops engaged in the retail trade; and when we are finding out, from bitter experience, that over-toil in overcrowded and heated apartments is productive of the worst effects upon the sanitary condition of the human frame—that, if it does not actually beget, does invite and localise epidemics such as that which has lately ravaged the metropolis. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) I say, look at it in that light, and ask why it is that, at this period, we should violate every principle of that which we consider essential to the sanitary condition of the people for the purpose of imposing additional labour to the over-wrought clerks during six days of the week, and take from them the hours they are yet allowed to enjoy upon the mornings of the Sabbath?"

Admitting for the sake of argument there was inconvenience in the present system, he contended the clerks had the right to their full Sabbath as well as thirteen Ministers of State, two Secretaries, and a Postmaster-General. They were told if they would but consent to victimise these five-and-twenty men—who, by-the-by, it is said are all to be volunteers—there could be great relief in other places:—

"It may be that the service is to be voluntary; but bear this in mind—preferment and patronage will be voluntary also, and woe be to those men, who, from any motive whatever, refuse to enrank themselves in the list of volunteers. But we are told that this measure will greatly relieve the pressure upon the provincial offices, and that we ought to be exceedingly gratified that so much relief is offered by the additional labour of five-and-twenty men out of two thousand engaged in the various offices. I am delighted to hear that any alleviation of labour whatever is offered to those men; and I say, 'Go forward, and relieve them to the utmost possible extent, but not at the expense of the five-and-twenty clerks in the London office.' If you are sincere in your desire to relieve the labourers of the provincial offices, I will tell you what to do. Close the offices upon the Sabbath. (Great cheering.) That will test your sincerity, and it will give effective and permanent relief."

The Bishop of London moved:—

"That this meeting has heard with equal surprise and regret of the intention of the authorities of the General Post-office, to commence the receipt and transmission of mails from and to all parts of England on Sundays as on the other days of the week, and it desires to express its unfeigned sorrow that the first public act of the Government, immediately following the recent heavy visitation, should involve an open violation of one of the plainest commands of Him 'in whose hand our breath is, and whose are all our ways.'"

The Right Reverend Prelate dwelt at some length on the observance of the Sabbath being a peculiar characteristic of Christian England. He had appealed to the Premier against the measure, and received "an answer courteous and kind, as every communication proceeding from the noble lord was sure to be;" (1) but holding out no hope of the reversal of the decree: and he had in consequence determined to publicly protest against the measure:—

"The last few years had seen a growing feeling of the importance of the Sabbath; and he thought it right to remind the meeting that, to a great extent, its desecration was the result of compulsion. From personal inquiries he knew there were hundreds and thousands of persons in the metropolis who would gladly spend Sunday as it ought to be spent if their employers would permit them. Many workmen, he knew, would be delighted to be spared to rest upon the Sabbath, which was their indefeasible Christian inheritance; and there were hundreds of tradesmen who would be happy to close their shops upon the Sunday provided others would do the same. This was a kind of compulsion. He would not go so far as to say it was a kind of compulsion to which they ought to yield. It was one, however, to which they had a strong temptation, and to which the infirmity of human nature must be expected to yield in many cases. He was not, however, one who thought that legislative enactments, or municipal bills, could enforce the devout and proper observance of the Sabbath; but at least such laws ought to be passed as would prevent one class of men compelling another class to desecrate the Lord's day. But if we were not prepared to go so far in the way of onward legislation, let no retrograde step at least be taken. The present was one step in a retrograde direction; and, if it were finally adopted, it would be impossible to see how soon others might follow—but they certainly would follow speedily. Once admit the principle now contended for, and there would be a general delivery of letters upon the Sunday—a general interruption to the special work of the Sabbath—and a declension in the national character for religion which we had hitherto upheld. No doubt some were present who, in their own persons, or in their families, had felt the effects of the recent heavy visitation with which we had been afflicted. If that visitation were not the result of God's anger against a sinful people, it was, at least, the result of his providence. Surely, then, this was not the time to open a subject which must necessarily lead to a desecration of the Christian Sabbath, on the observance of which the religious character of the country in a great measure depended. This thought, he was sure, could not have occurred to the minds of those who had sanctioned the proposed regulations; but if it had any weight in the minds of the meeting, he trusted it would animate them to continued exertions in opposing the measure. He could only say, in conclusion, that after most careful and dispassionate consideration, he was satisfied that the regulations about to be enforced were nothing more or less than a sacrifice to mammon." (Cheers.)

The resolution was seconded by Sir J. H. Maxwell, and the chairman declining to allow Mr. Webb, a surgeon, to move an amendment, the meeting being called for a special purpose, that gentleman withdrew, and it was carried unanimously. Mr. John Dean Paul moved the following resolution, which was seconded by Mr. Pownall, chairman of the Middlesex magistrates, and carried unanimously:—

"That in subjection to the Divine commands, the main rule of conduct for a department like the Post-office would seem to be the public convenience; and the best mode of ascertaining that convenience would appear to be by listening to the petitions of the people, expressive of their wants and wishes. But in the present instance, for some reason which this meeting cannot understand, the authorities of the Post-office seem to think it to be their duty to do all that the people request not to have done, and to leave undone all that they pray to have done. Tens of thousands of her Majesty's subjects have been praying for years past for an entire cessation of all Post-office work on the Sabbath, in the country as well as in London. These prayers have been disregarded. But now that which no one has asked, no one has desired—the receipt of mails from London on the Sabbath day—is determined upon, and not the most earnest and most unanimous entreaties of the people have yet prevailed to alter this intention. So that it would appear as if the Post-office was conceived to be, not an office for transacting an important branch of the public business in such a way as the wishes and the convenience of the people would dictate, but one in which one or two individuals assume the right of overruling the expressed desires of the whole people, in a matter in which the people themselves must necessarily be the best judges."

The Rev. Charles Baring, rector of All Souls, Marylebone, moved the adoption of a memorial to the First Lord of the Treasury and the Secretary of State for the Home Department, founded upon the resolutions, and that it be presented by Lord Ashley. The Rev. Dr. Beaumont seconded the motion, and it was unanimously carried. On the motion of General Maginnis, seconded by the Rev. J. T. Baylee, a vote of thanks was presented to Lord Ashley for his conduct in the chair; and after his lordship's acknowledgment the proceedings terminated.

The same afternoon the Bishop of London took the chair at a meeting of the parishioners of St. James's, Westminster. In the course of his opening address the Rev. Prelate said—

"He felt discouraged when he saw a measure of this kind emanating from such a source as those who were in authority in this Christian country—(cheers)—and if it were persevered in he could not but anticipate the greatest danger to the institutions of the country. He regarded the matter in two ways—as a question of principle, and with regard to consequences. No important principle in government or religion could safely be violated. Injurious consequences must follow; and when he reflected on the consequences that must follow the regulations which were about to be introduced in the Post-office, unless the almost unanimous voice of the people of that metropolis of Christendom should defeat them, he owned that his heart almost sank within him, because the very first result would be desecration and further desecration. No person could pretend that it would not lead to still further change. It was said, indeed, that this was but a small change—that it was an innovation upon an insignificant scale; but let the principle be once introduced, that it was lawful to employ the clerks in the Post-office on Sundays, and an extension of the principle must inevitably follow at no distant period. There would come a general delivery on Sunday, and a consequent employment of clerks in those hours which ought to be devoted to the preservation of the health of the body, and to the improvement of the soul. He regarded the observance of the sabbath as a great security for the maintenance of our holy religion. It was a standing memorial of the attestation to the truth of the Gospel borne by thousands and tens of thousands of assembled Christians in the Lord's house on each returning Sunday. Every diminution of that observance of the Sabbath was so much injury done to our holy religion: everything tending to weaken the reverence felt by the people for the Sabbath day was an injury done to the cause of that religion. He greatly feared that, in practice, this would be one step in that downward path, which, if followed out, would lead us down to a level in religious character with the nations of the Continent. Unless the good sense and sterling piety of the people be opposed in successful resistance to such an innovation as at present was proposed, the time might come—but God forbid it should—when they would see the Christian Sabbath in this country differing in nothing from other days in the week as regarded observance of its sanctity, but to a certain extent passed in the same manner as in Paris. If once the sanctity of the Sabbath was violated by the authority of Government, what would there be to check the tide of desecration which would follow such an example?"

Similar resolutions were then moved and carried, the principal speakers being the Rev. J. Jackson, rector of the parish, Mr. Thos. A'Beckett, Sir W. Farquhar, the Rev. Mr. Storke, Mr. Geesin, one of the churchwardens, and Mr. Olliver. The latter gentleman stated, on the authority of the Morning Herald, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had had an interview with Mr. Rowland Hill and Colonel Maberly, and had declared that, notwithstanding the extraordinary opposition which had been manifested, the new regulation should come into force on Sunday next. A Mr. Garret volunteered a statement on behalf of Mr. Rowland Hill, whom he had visited just prior to the meeting, that he might be able to afford them information on authority. He said—

"Mr. Hill assured him, as a man and a gentleman, that thousands in the country would be relieved by partially employing twenty-five in London on Sundays, before nine in the morning and after five in the evening.

"Sir W. Farquhar—But did he tell you what was the connexion between the relief to those persons and the employment of the men in London?

"Mr. Garrett said that Mr. Rowland Hill stated that there were cross-road mails that regularly ran on Sunday, which were not able to come to London in consequence of the Post-office being closed. These cross-road mails would be relieved: they would not be continued, and that alone would be the means of relieving a large number of hands. Again, Mr. Hill said the second delivery in the country would be discontinued. He (Mr. Garrett) asked if this could not be done without the proposed alteration, and Mr. Hill replied that it could not: that the post which went out with the second delivery took those cross-road mails to be delivered on Monday. Then with respect to foreign letters, it had been said that the London merchants were opposed to this alteration; but if that were the case, Mr. Hill said it was a fact that if in Liverpool and Manchester they did not get their letters by many hours as soon as London merchants they were placed at a decided disadvantage, and that, of course, must be a consideration. Mr. Hill further stated that there were at present, and had always been for the last thirty years, from twenty-five to thirty clerks employed on Sundays in the Post-office, and must necessarily be so employed to forward letters for the members of her Majesty's Government. He (Mr. Garrett) asked why so many had to be employed for this purpose, and in answer to that Mr. Rowland Hill said that it was necessary to sort the whole of the letters in order to see which were to be forwarded. The increase of men employed, Mr. Hill stated, would be only twenty-five, and he told him (Mr. Garrett) that he might state, with perfect confidence, relief would be given to thousands in the country by employing those twenty-five persons. He (Mr. Garrett) avowed that he regarded the Sabbath with as much reverence as even the Right Reverend Prelate in the chair, or the Reverend Rector who had addressed the meeting, and he would do as much as either to relieve persons from Sunday toil; but having doubts whether such would really be the case in this instance, he had gone to Mr. Rowland Hill and asked him the questions he had just detailed before appearing at that meeting. If the case were as Mr. Hill stated, it appeared that they would be going up a step, and not down, by the proposed alteration; and therefore, instead of condemning, they ought to eulogise the principle."

The resolutions, embodied in a memorial to the Lords of the Treasury, were carried all but unanimously, amidst loud cheering, Mr. Garrett's hand being the only one held up against them.

Joseph Wilson, Esq., Secretary of the Society for Promoting the Due Observance of the Lord's-day, has addressed a letter to the papers, setting forth the following "Nine Facts" of the case.—

"1. That in the morning of Sunday 650 bags will arrive from the country, the contents of which, in addition to any foreign mails, must be stamped, sorted, and despatched to Ireland, Scotland, and the north of England. 2. That in the evening 650 bags will also have to be despatched from London, containing the remainder of the letters from the morning, and all that will arrive in the middle of the day, in 250 bags, from the principal towns. 3. That the French and Belgian mails will be despatched, both morning and evening, as on other days. 4. That in the event of any foreign mail arriving in the course of the day, the whole of the contents will undergo the necessary operations, and be forwarded to the country as on other days; and that if, as happened yesterday, three foreign mails arrive, the correspondence will be so immense as to compel the attendance of the officers during the whole of Sunday. 5. That to even commence the ordinary Sunday duty as proposed, at least five times the number of men stated by Mr. Hill must be employed, and that an equal number must again attend in the evening for the despatch of mails. 6. That at present, in every town in the kingdom, the Post-office is already closed during the hours of Divine service, excepting where mails arrive, so that the relief stated by Mr. Hill to be given is perfectly insignificant. 7. That hardly any towns have now more than one delivery of letters on Sunday, and that in no manner whatever can the closing of country offices on this day be facilitated by the employment of the London officials at that time. 8. That the greatest possible public scandal will be occasioned by the arrival and departure of mail-carriages on the morning and evening of the Lord's-day, and that the same scene of bustle and activity will take place in the yard of the Post-office on that as on ordinary days. 9. That nearly eight hundred men, who at present are able religiously to observe the Sunday, will, in their turns, be compelled by the Government to violate one of the greatest of the Divine commandments, 'Thou shalt keep holy the Sabbath-day.'"

The Earl of Winchelsea has addressed a letter to Lord John Russell on the same subject, hoping that, though differing widely in politics, they are still united by the same sense of duty towards God. His lordship says—

"When we dwell upon the awful judgments which have fallen upon our land by the fearful pestilence, which has removed, and is still removing, from us thousands and tens of thousands of our fellow-countrymen, surely we must all feel and exclaim, 'our national ingratitude and sins have found us out, and the sword of the Almighty has left its scabbard to bring us to national repentance.'"

"Amongst these national sins there are three which, in my humble opinion, stands prominently forward:—

"1. The engrossing love of filthy lucre, which has of late years so strongly characterised our country by the worthless gambling speculations in railroads, and which has entirely engrossed all public thought and feeling.

"2. The fearful increase of the desecration of the Lord's-day by Sunday travelling, promoted by steam navigation and railways.

"3. The awful neglect on the part of the Legislature of this great Christian country (upon which God has poured every earthly blessing), in not having long ago met the religious wants of millions of our fellow-countrymen, and, in having allowed great masses of our manufacturing population within our land to live and die as heathens; which state of things, if allowed much longer to continue, will assuredly, if there is one word of truth in God's word, bring utter ruin and desolation upon our country.

"Fervently do I hope and pray that, as the Minister of this highly favoured land, you will regard it as the first of your duties, at whatever cost (and believe me you will find the feeling of the country to be entirely with you), to lose no time in meeting these religious wants, and by so doing remove from us, as a nation, what has long been a great stigma and reproach to us."

ENGLISH CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint the Lord Bishop of Chester, Clerk of the Closet in Ordinary to her Majesty, in the room of the late Lord Bishop of Norwich, deceased.

The Right Rev. Dr. G. J. Spencer, one of the oldest Colonial Bishops, has intimated his intention of no longer presiding over the diocese of Madras, in consequence of his impaired health. The Venerable Archdeacon Dealtry, who for some years held the Archdeaconry of Calcutta, and succeeded the Rev. Baptist Noel at St. John's Chapel, Bedford-row, has been nominated as the successor of Dr. Spencer, and will proceed to his distant diocese in the course of a few weeks.

Alarming accounts had been received, relative to the health of the Bishop of Llandaff, and much apprehension had been occasioned amongst the friends of the Right Rev. Prelate.

The Bishop of Exeter had been dangerously ill, but had so far recovered as to be able to fix his next general ordination for the 21st of October.

BISHOP ELECT OF NORWICH.—A correspondent of the English Churchman says:—

Sir,—At a time when every appointment in the Church is canvassed by the earnest-minded because men's minds are anxious and doubtful, it may probably be satisfactory to your readers to have a brief outline of the career of the Bishop (Elect) of Norwich. Most Anglo-Catholics would agree, in part, with the judgment passed on the appointment by the Morning Herald,—"It is not the best;" but I cannot agree with the doubtful expression, "nor is it the worst." Now, Sir, I would maintain that it is a better appointment than we had a right to expect from a Whig Government—as good as we could expect from a Conservative Government in these days—nay, better than many of their appointments; and this I hope both you and your readers will acknowledge before I have finished.

Dr. Hinds is a Liberal in his opinions; but he is no political nominee, and therefore he does not owe his preferment to what he may have said on the hustings, or maintained in pamphlets. He is by birth a Barbadian—hence his close intimacy and long friendship with Bishop Hampden. At an early age he was sent to England, and placed at school with a Mr. Phillips, near Bristol—(Dr. Whately was, I believe, educated by the same gentleman,)—from whence he proceeded to Oxford, where he distinguished himself by taking not only honours, but the Latin Essay; he was then ordained, by the Bishop of London, (Dr. Howley) Deacon and Priest, previous to his return to Barbadoes as a Missionary of the Society for the Conversion of the Negroes. So satisfactory was his conduct in this cause, that, on the resignation of the Principal of Codrington College of that situation, the Bishop of London, (Dr. Howley) unsolicited obtained for him the appointment,—at that time a very valuable one. The climate of the West Indies not agreeing with him, he was obliged to return to England, when Dr. Howley offered him a most important situation, which he was forced to decline on the score of health. In fine, to show the unvarying estimation in which he was held by one now gone, whose praise is in all the Churches, it is notorious that two, if not more, Colonial Bishoprics were offered him through the interest of the same constant patron (Dr. Howley,) and declined on the score of health. During this time he had returned to Oxford to become Vice-Principal of St. Alban Hall, where his old friend, Dr. Whately, was then Principal.

When Lord Grey appointed Dr. Whately to the See of Dublin, Dr. Hinds accompanied him as Private and Examining Chaplain; but this he was forced soon to resign on account of ill health. Soon after his return to England from Ireland, he was appointed by the Bishop of Llandaff to the Vicarage of Yardley, in Herts. The Bishop of Lincoln immediately made him a rural Dean (a permanent officer in that Diocese;) and so great was the Bishop of Lincoln's sense of Dr. Hinds' zeal and ability, that he did all that he could to retain him in that Diocese when he heard he was again about to return to Ireland, whither he was called on his appointment to the living and stall of Castleknock. Here commenced his acquaintance with Lord Besborough, who appointed him his domestic Chaplain, contrary to usual custom, that office having been always held by the senior of the Chapel Royal.

On Lord Clarendon's appointment, Dr. Hinds was continued as first Chaplain, and on the death of the Bishop of Cork that See was offered him, and refused by him as he considered it would be better that an Irishman should be appointed! This conduct led no doubt to his appointment to the Deanery of Carlisle, and may also account for his present higher preferment. The Bishop (Elect) is, I should say, to judge from his writings, a moderate High-Churchman. I know him to have been a most active Missionary, and a most devoted Parish Priest; he has been throughout life a most strenuous advocate for a large extension of the Episcopate; and he holds, I believe, as firmly as any Anglo-Catholic, the doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration. I may add that, wherever he has lived, his influence, gained by great ability, accompanied with quietness and humbleness of manner, has extended far and wide. Clergymen of all parties joined in the warmest feelings of regret when he left Dublin for Carlisle, and this has been the case whenever he has left one locality for another. I could have extended this outline very considerably, but I feared trespassing on your space; I trust, however, that the above facts will disabuse the minds of those who may look upon him as an "unmitigated Whig Bishop."

October 1, 1849. I am, Sir, yours faithfully, A. C.

THE CHURCH ADVERTISER.

Such is the title of a new Paper, published in Maryland, for gratuitous distribution to every churchman in the diocese. The copy sent to us was mislaid, or it should have received our earliest notice. This Paper will have many advantages over its larger cotemporaries. It will not be troubled by delinquent subscribers. It need fear no competition, as few will be found to furnish a paper on such easy terms. As it will have no space for controversy, it may study to be quiet; and as it has no room for other people's business, it will be compelled to confine itself to its own.

We need not wish it success, as it has already secured that by its terms of publication.

The Rev. Mr. Unonius speaks in warm terms of the kind reception which he has met with from the clergy and laity of Philadelphia and its vicinity, and the liberal contributions he has received for his Mission. He will preach in St. Stephen's Church, on Sunday afternoon next, and present a statement of the interesting object of his visit.

We learn from the Churchman of last week, that Bishop Southgate preached at the British Embassy, Pera, on the 5th Sept., and confirmed two persons. He was expecting to leave Constantinople on the 19th Sept., and hoped to reach the United States some time in November.

Another reply to "O," by an able correspondent, has been received; but, owing to peculiar engagements this week, we have not been able even to read it. The same apology, we hope, will be accepted by "Hal," "M.," and one or two others

For the Banner of the Cross.

"CONSUBSTANTIAL."

"The right faith is, that we believe and confess, that our Lord Jesus Christ the Son of God, is God and Man. God of the substance of the Father, begotten before the worlds, and Man of the substance of his Mother, born in time."

Athanasian Creed.

So, and so only, is the "homo-ousian doctrine" delivered by the Athanasian creed; and the extracts from Athanasius, presently to follow, will show that the above "accurate and admirable poising," as 'O' seems to consider it, deserves its position in a confession named after the great defender of the Nicene Symbol.

In 'O's' review of Archdeacon Wilberforce's work on the Incarnation, there are many passages which it is painful to read. There is in them a degree of ridicule, or, as he calls it, "pleasantry," which would seem to be out of place in any discussion of so sacred, so awful a subject. He even indulges his taste, or his humor, so far as to give nicknames to the view of the Gospel inculcated by Archdeacon W. I do not know how other readers of the 'Banner' may have been affected by 'O's' article; but, I must say, that my sensibilities were shocked to a degree that I pray God I may not soon experience again. Even at this present writing it is with difficulty that I can endure the distress which a second reading has caused. It is only by great effort, under a sense of duty, that I have forced myself to compose a reply.

"The overwhelming mass of objections" which 'O' flatters himself he has brought to bear upon the "theory" defended by Archdeacon W., all seem to hinge upon the meaning he has attached to the word consubstantial. As 'O' uses it, it means, if I may coin a word for the nonce, co-atomic. This is obvious from his illustrations: "The body is but partially consubstantial with the food eaten yesterday. . . . No one regards an animal as consubstantial with a tree or with the butt-ends of grass, that has furnished it nutriment," &c. In such a sense, consubstantiality between any two subjects is an impossibility—is nonsense; and 'O' might therefore have inferred, that neither Wilberforce, nor the ancient Catholic doctors whom he follows, attribute any such meaning to the word. 'O' might also have taken it for granted, that those doctors well understood the meaning of the language they used, while expounding the Faith.

The question I propose to consider is, what is the theological word 'consubstantial?' One should think it is intimated clearly enough in the passage from the Athanasian Creed, placed at the head of this article—"God from the substance of his Father begotten—Man from the substance of his Mother born." It is true that the word in question, homo-ousios, is not in this passage, but rather ex eius essentia—ex substantia; but the sense is the same according to Athanasius, as will appear from what follows. Basil of Ancyra and his followers, while objecting to the Nicene definition, homo-ousion, were willing to confess of the Son, that "He is of the substance of his Father begotten." Athanasius replied, that, by confessing so much, they accepted the meaning of the Nicene Symbol, and therefore were inconsistent in halting at the word. "It is but consistent," says Athanasius, "to attach the same meaning to both expressions as applied to the Saviour, and not to interpret 'offspring' as is fitting, and 'one in substance' otherwise. . . . For, as the Son is the Father's Word and Wisdom, and the offspring of the Father is one, and proper to his substance, so the sense of 'offspring' and 'one in substance' is one, and whose considers the Son as an offspring, rightly considers him also as one in substance." Oxford trans. of his treatises, p. 141. Again, "if the Word be a work, and foreign to the Father's substance, so that He is separated from the Father by difference of nature, He cannot be 'one in substance' with Him; but rather is homogeneous in nature with the works. . . . On the other hand, if we confess that He is not a work, but the genuine offspring of the Father's substance, it would follow, that He is inseparable from the Father, being connatural [ὁμοφύη], because He is begotten from Him." Ib. p. 148.

The readers of the 'Banner' are well aware, that the Nicene definition, homo-ousion, "one in substance," was directed against the Arian heresy. The position assumed by the Arians was, that the 'word is not the genuine Son of the Father, but a creature foreign to the Father's nature, and called Son, only in a putative and accommodated or figurative sense.' The Catholic doctrine on the other hand is, that He is really all that He is called in Scripture, the "only begotten Son of the Father." Hence the phrases, "Son of God," "God from God," when honestly interpreted, accurately declare the whole doctrine concerning His divinity. But when it was found that the heretics were willing to accept these phrases in a sense different from that intended, saying, e. g. that "the Son is from God, because all things are from God;" the Nicene Fathers were forced to adopt a term which would effectually resist the Arian purpose of reducing the Son to the category of created things, or "things generate," as they chose to call them. "The Fathers perceiving their craft," says Athanasius, were forced to express more distinctly the sense of the words 'from God.' Accordingly they wrote [at first] "from the substance of God," [as in the Athanasian Creed] in order that 'from God' might not be considered common and equal in the Son, and in things generated, [i. e. things which came to be]; but that all others might be considered as creatures, and the word alone as from the Father." Ib. p. 32. It was found, however, that even this definition did not quite baffle all the guile of the Arian party; "for when the Bishops said, that the word must be described as the true power and image of the Father, like to the Father in all things and unvarying, and as unalterable, and as being always, and as in Him without diversion, . . . the party of Eusebius were caught whispering to each other, that 'like,' and 'always,' and 'power,' and 'in Him,' were, as before, common to us and the Son; and that it was no difficulty to agree to these. But the Bishops discerning in this too their simulation, were again compelled to concentrate the sense of Scriptures, and to re-say, and to re-write what they had said before, more distinctly still, namely, that the Son is one in substance with the Father, by way of signifying, that the Son was from the Father, and not merely like, [as he says elsewhere, e. g. as tin is like silver, or brass like gold, or a pigeon like a dove,] but the same in likeness; and of showing, that the Son's likeness and unalterableness was different from such a copy of the same as is ascribed to us." Ib. pp. 34, 35.

Such was the origin, and such is the Catholic and theological sense of the term homo-ousion—consubstantial, as given by him who, of all men that have written, is best entitled to be heard on the subject. From him we learn, that the expression 'His Only Son' in the Apostles' Creed, and that in the Athanasian, 'of' or 'from the substance of the Father,' and those from the Nicene, 'God from God,' and 'consubstantial with the Father,' all mean precisely the same thing. The expression, homo-ousion, does not contain a doctrine developed out of the earlier creed, as Newman would have it; it only defines a term in the Apostles' Creed and in Scripture; and brings out the Scriptural sense, as declaring the true meaning of Son to be 'genuine offspring connatural to the Father.' That it implies, as 'O' says, that the Godhead is "one in substance undivided," is very true; but the other equivalent terms imply that also, and quite as fully. The Apostles' Creed confesses one undivided God as perfectly as the Nicene; but it is not so well guarded against Arian interpretations of the Sonship as the latter. It follows then, that 'O' is not justified in so giving and limiting the meaning of the term consubstantial, as to say that it teaches simply the indivisibility of the Divine Nature; and then arguing from this assumption that Christ is not consubstantial with us, because human nature is, or, if it pleases 'O,' better, mankind are divisible. The assumption is false, and the conclusion from it worthless.

The whole Arian controversy is reducible to the single question, of the generation of the Son of God. The Arians endeavored to throw ridicule upon the Catholic doctrine of this mystery, by involving it with carnal ideas. They attacked it with the reductio ad absurdum. They appealed to "ever triumphant common sense" against it. They accused it as a "superlative." They applied their logic to the word Son, and argued, "if a Son, He was begotten; if begotten, He had a beginning of existence; if a beginning, He had his subsistence out of nothing." A formidable Sorites truly! What judgment might be passed upon it in the forum of common sense, I do not know; not being accustomed to refer Divine mysteries to that tribunal. On the other hand, Catholics being disposed to receive Scripture with faith, as an honest Scripture, understood the words Son, and only begotten, as real words, meaning not less than they said. They argued, if the Word is Son, He is connatural to the Father; and therefore, as to His nature, entitled to all the predicates which are made of the Father, except this one—Father. If the Father is true God, the Son is true God; if the Father is Eternal, the Son is Eternal, and so on to the end. But the same honest Scripture declares God to be one Being, individual, numerically one. Catholics submitted to the mystery, in spite of the logic of "ever-triumphant common sense," and believed Father, and consubstantial Son, and the co-eternal Spirit, to be that One Individual Being. They never argued the indivisibility of the God-head from the consubstantiality of Father and Son. So far from it, they were obliged to defend the Nicene definition from the charge of implying divisibility in the Divine Essence. Athanasius e. g. says, "Is there any cause of fear lest, because the offspring from men are one in substance, the Son, by being called 'one in substance,' be Himself considered as a human offspring too? Perish the thought! Not so, but the explanation is easy. For the Son is the Father's Word and Wisdom, whence we learn the impossibility and indivisibility of such a generation from the Father." Ib. p. 140. The argument is, that the title Word corrects and guards against the error which logic might deduce from "Son consubstantial with the Father." For as in the generation of mankind, there is a transmission of substance from parents to children, so, an Arian might argue, there is a transmission of substance from the Father to the Son, and therefore, the Divine Essence is partitive, divisible. But Athanasius replies, that the titles Word and Wisdom, exalt the mystery of the Divine genera above all such low and carnal conceptions; and suggest the ideas of immateriality and indivisibility of the Divine nature. "Uniting the two titles, Scripture speaks of Son, in order to herald the offspring of His substance natural and true; and on the other hand, that none may think of the offspring humanly, while signifying His substance, it also calls Him Word, Wisdom, and Radiance; to teach us that the generation was impassible, and eternal, and worthy of God. What affection then, or what part of the Father is the Word, Wisdom, and Radiance . . . why speculate they about passions and parts in the instance of the immaterial and indivisible God, that under pretence of reverence, they may deny the true and natural generation of the Son." Orat. 1, §28.

It should be added, that after the word homo-ousion was adopted against Arius, it was found to be effectual against Sabellius also. It was observed that while one portion of the compound, ousios, indicated community of nature, the other, homo, implied the difference of persons, or hypostases. But if 'O's' sense of the word were right, it could not have been directed against Sabellianism; rather would it have led headlong into that heresy. 'O's' interpretation of homo-ousion makes it synonymous with syn-ousion or tanto-ousion, both of which terms were understood to be symbols of Sabellianism. Epiphanius (ap. Petav. de Trin. iv. 5.) says of the former, "it signifies confounding of persons;" of the latter, "we use it not, lest it should lead to the Sabellian dogma."

Having convicted 'O' of a misinterpretation of the word "consubstantial," and shown his argument therefrom to be nothing, I have confuted the main portion of his article with something more than an "overwhelming objection." I might go on and prove, that he has no such conception of the "theory" advocated by Wilberforce, as enables him to exhibit it, much less to overthrow it. His game must be in sight before he can strike it. But I have done enough, at least for the present. I have shown that no one ought to allow his judgment of Wilberforce's work to be influenced by anything that 'O' has said against it. Unlike 'O,' I urge every one not to "peruse the deep current by its surface," but to "take note of things occult," to study the Hidden Wisdom which was ordained before the world, for the glorification of mankind with the glory of God.

NEW JERSEY.

BURLINGTON COLLEGE.

At the annual meeting of the Trustees of Burlington College, held on Friday last, the Rev. James W. Bradin, A. M., was appointed Rector of the College, Marcus F. Hyde, A. M. Professor of Ancient Languages, and Jacob Zehner, A. M., Professor of Mathematics; the Bishop of the Diocese being ex-officio President. The College classes are now all organized, embracing 126 students. The next term will commence on the 1st day of November. The closing exercises of the late term at St. Mary's Hall were held on the same day; the examination having occupied several days.

Those celebrated institutions not only maintain their accustomed reputation, but are growing into public favor, as they grow older. The personal attention of Bishop Doane is devoted exclusively to their oversight, their usefulness, their welfare: and where qualifications so thorough, experience so comprehensive, and devotion so entire, are found united in a single mind, it would indeed be extraordinary, if a successful career were not to be the result.—Burlington Gazette.

NEW YORK.

The following is the Summary of Bishop Whittingham's Services in the Diocese of New York, taken from his report to the late Convention.

The sum of these services is as follows:—I have examined and ordained twelve Deacons and eleven Priests, at one stated and seven special Ordinations; have consecrated five churches, and laid two corner-stones of churches; have confirmed thirteen hundred and fifty-eight persons, at eighty-nine administrations of the rite; have administered the Holy Communion twenty-five times; have preached one hundred and two times, and have delivered eighty-eight other addresses. In order to attend these ministrations, I have travelled about three thousand six hundred and fifty miles.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

PASTORAL LETTER.

To be read in the Congregations of the Diocese of South Carolina.

BRETHREN OF THE CLERGY AND LAITY:—Recent circumstances naturally remind us of the teaching of the Holy Scripture on the subject of gratitude to God—of the reproof by our Lord of those nine persons whose prayer had been granted, and yet they did not give him thanks; and of his commendation of the individual, who, "when he saw that he was healed," separated from his unthankful companions, and "turned back and with a loud voice glorified God, and fell down at his feet giving him thanks."

The wise and holy Church, as you are aware, which has set forth "Prayers upon several occasions," has also set forth corresponding "Thanksgivings."

Having sometime since recommended to you the use of a prayer, in reference to the grievous sickness then prevailing, and it having been mercifully averted from our city and vicinity, and removed from our country in general, it becomes my duty to ask of you the use of the following thanksgiving; and may it be permitted me respectfully to suggest, that alms for the relief of our suffering Missionaries, in and out of the Diocese, would also be a scriptural token of Gratitude to the great Giver of all that we have and hope for.

I remain, with affectionate consideration,

C. E. GADSDEN,

Bishop of the Diocese of South Carolina.

St. Luke's Day, 1849.

THANKSGIVING to be said in our Congregations, immediately after the "General Thanksgiving," and it is also suggested for private and family worship.

OUR FATHER in heaven, we Thy sinful children, unworthy of the least of all Thy mercies, now desire to offer our thanks, with great gladness, for Thy late signal mercy, in removing from our land, and averting from our city and neighbourhood, the grievous sickness lately in our very borders, for which Thy people had humbled themselves before Thee, with fasting and weeping, and mourning, confessing their sins, and supplicating pardon and deliverance. In vain are the labours of love and the skill of science, without the blessing of Thy divine Majesty. "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto Thy name, [we] give glory for Thy mercy, and for Thy truth's sake." Thou only "art the Giver of life, of health, and of safety." Oh may we cherish a deep and abiding sense of all Thy mercies; love Thee with all the heart, and mind, and soul, and strength; and live, more and more, for our highest welfare; for the welfare of our brethren of mankind; and for the advancement of Thy glory, through Jesus Christ our Lord—to whom, with Thee, O Father, and Thee, O Holy Ghost, be ascribed all might and dominion, forever.—AMEN.—*Charleston Gos. ILLINOIS.

EPISCOPAL VISIT.

The Apostolic rite of Confirmation was administered in Trinity Church, Jacksonville, by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Chase, to eleven persons, on Sunday the 14th inst., in the presence of a large congregation. After it, about forty persons received the Communion of the Lord's Supper.

The whole service was exceedingly solemn; and it is hoped, had a happy effect upon all who were present. It carries us back to the days of the Apostles, when Peter and John went down to Samaria, (as we read in the 8th Chapter of Acts,) to see this venerable successor to their office, lay his hands on the heads of the previously baptized persons, and pray to God to strengthen them with the comfort of the Holy Spirit, and with the gifts of grace.

The Bishop is in good health. He has gone hence to oversee and confirm in the churches at Carlinville and Chesterfield.—The Morgan Journal.

AN OPPONENT DISARMED.

Who has not heard of John Brown of Haddington? His system of Divinity, his Dictionary of the Bible, but most of all his Catechism, have made him widely known, especially among Presbyterians. Though advanced in after years to the post of Professor of Divinity in the Theological Seminary of the Associate Synod of Scotland, his greatness was not so generally acknowledged in his early ministry.

His first call, while yet a licentiate, was to the church in Haddington. It was opposed by a minority of one, but as it sometimes the case, that one was a host in himself. His wealth, station and influence made him an object of fear to the majority, who anticipated trouble from him in the settlement of Mr. Brown.

Previous, however, to the ordination, the young preacher was providentially brought in the way of his formidable opponent. Nothing daunted or disturbed, he took him by the hand and the following dialogue ensued:—

Brown. Pray tell me, Mr. Stuart, what you have against me.

Stuart. I'll be as frank as yourself, Mr. Brown: and must say I have a very strong reason for voting against you; and it is just this,—I don't think you a good preacher.

Brown. Ah! so I thought: but my dear sir, you and I are perfectly agreed in this matter. I know it as well as you do; but the people, you see, differ from us both. Now where is the use of our setting up our opinions and views against those of the whole parish?

A pause—and then a hearty laugh succeeded, and Mr. Stuart, with a hearty shake of the hand, responded: "I begin to be of your opinion, Mr. Brown; you shall find in me, henceforward, not an opposer, but a faithful friend."

And so it proved. Mr. Brown, from that period had no warmer friend in the parish.—N. Y. Presb.

Selections.

From the Churchman's Companion.

THE SCOTTISH CHURCHMAN.

M'Farlane (which was the name of the invalid whom Vernon was called to visit,) was a Scottish Churchman, of great intelligence of mind, and great consistency of Christian character. Like many members of that heretofore oppressed and persecuted branch of the Catholic Church, he was thoroughly versed in the reasons of his attachment to her, and all the temptations to schism to which he and his household were in no ordinary degree exposed, were altogether ineffectual to move them from the steadfastness of their principles. In the township in which he resided there was very seldom any of the ministrations of the Church, except such occasional service as could be rendered by Mr. Broughton, whose parish bounded it on the one side; or by Vernon, whose mission joined it on the other. The farm on which M'Farlane lived was about fifteen miles from the nearest of Mr. Broughton's churches, and perhaps sixteen or seventeen from those of Vernon. Around him, on all sides, were the meeting-houses, or, at all events, houses where meetings were held by numerous Dissenting Denominations; for the population of the township being of a very mixed character, false doctrine, heresy, and schism, were rife within its bounds. Whenever the roads and the weather would permit, M'Farlane would put his horses to the wagon, and putting as many of his large family into it as it could contain, would betake himself to one or other of the churches, according as the hours of service afforded him the time requisite to travel the distance above named. When the season or the roads prevented his doing this, he used to assemble his family, and with them would go reverently through the appointed service for the day. He seldom interfered with the religious views or practices of others, and, indeed, he knew little of them, for he never entered their places of worship, nor would allow his family to do so.

Such a course of conduct, as may be easily supposed, drew upon him a good deal of attention on the part of those who consider it the height of Christian charity and liberality to profess no distinctive opinions, and who are ready to go anywhere to "hear the Word of God preached."

That he was a most worthy man, who paid much attention to what he regarded as his religious duties, no one could deny; but this fact only rendered his conduct more inexplicable to them. Much was said of his bigotry, his benighted state, and so forth; but then it was a fact well known to the settlement that his integrity was spotless—that his word was always to be unhesitatingly relied upon—that his house was consecrated by daily prayer—and that no one was more ready to do a kindness to his neighbour, if in any perplexity or trouble.

Such was, in brief, the character of the man who was now laid upon a bed of sickness, and who sought from the hands and from the lips of the Church's minister the blessed consolations of the faith.

The twilight was passing into darkness ere the sixteen miles were passed that intervened between Vernon's dwelling and his destination. On his arrival he was warmly and gratefully welcomed by the family, and found, upon inquiry, that though the old man had been suffering a good deal he was now much easier, and was in perfect possession of all his faculties. It was a rude and homely log-house, but everything within was neat and scrupulously clean. An air of anxiety was visible on every face, for serious apprehensions were beginning to be entertained lest he whom a married daughter spoke of as "the head of the house," should be taken from them. The aged wife of the sick man was evidently bowed down in spirit under the prospect of the trial that appeared about to fall upon her; and when Vernon was shown into the room of the sufferer, he found him the most composed and cheerful of the whole party.

"I'm vera glad to see ye, Maister Vernon," said the old man, speaking in his strong Scottish dialect, and shaking our hero's hand warmly—"I tak' it vera kind o' ye to come sic a lang gate to see a puir auld man like me; but I ken'd ye wad come if ye were able, and I wad be real glad to partake in the holy Sacrament once mair, before I gang the way of a' flesh."

"I am very glad you sent for me," replied Vernon; "and it will be a great pleasure to me if I can afford you any comfort under the trial which God has seen fit to lay upon you."

"I'm vera thankfu' to you, sir," answered M'Farlane, "The callant that cam for ye wad tell ye that I had sent owre for Maister Broughton, for I ken that if we i' this township belang to onybody, it's to him; but he wasna at home, and he'll no be back till the night, and this mornin' I didna think that I'd be living noo."

"Your messenger told me that you had sent for him, and as he can't be sure that you would send for me, I think it very likely that he will be here early to-morrow. You seem much better now, and as there is no immediate danger, I think that, in every respect, it will be better to wait till the morning, and see whether he comes or not, before administering the Holy Communion."

"Just as you please, sir," said M'Farlane. "I'm vera much easier noo, thank God; and if I hae a quiet night I'll maybe be fitter for't in the mornin'."

A long conversation followed, of the most pleasing character, but which of course, it is unnecessary to detail at length. Notwithstanding his moral and blameless life, and great attention to his various duties, social and religious, his mind was filled with deep humility, and sustained by a quiet, simple, unwavering faith in the blood and merits of the Redeemer.

"I was brought up in the fear o' God, sir," said he; "and I've tried to serve Him frae the time I was a bairn; and though by His grace I've been kept frae open sin in the sight o' men yet ma ain heart condemns me; and when I think o' ma shortcomings, I'm whiles feared o' what's afore me. But still I ken in whom I have believed, an' I'm persuaded that He is able to keep ma soul, which I have committed to Him, against that awfu' day when we shall a' have to stand afore Him, to answer for the things done in the body."

He afterwards spoke of his family, and the many temptations to neglect their religious duties to which they were exposed.

"I've tried hard, sir," he said, "baith by precept and as far as I could, by setting them a good example, to bring them up to obey God and His Church; and I trust that after ma departure, if it be the Lord's will to tak me awa at this time, that tha'll walk in the way their forbears have walked before them for mony generations."

"You have every reason to trust in the faithfulness of the Divine promise," replied Vernon. "Having trained up your children in the way they should go, you may humbly hope that when they are old they will not depart from it. Still," he added, "situated as your young people are, far from the ordinances of the Church, there is great danger of their being led, first to attend, and finally to join, some of the numberless schismatical bodies by which they are surrounded."

"None o' them has ever yet attended the meetings that are held a' round us; and as long as I'm maister o' the house, I couldna allow it,—for if I was to let them do wrang, how could I account to God, now that I'm gaun into His awfu' presence, for neglecting to use the authority over them which He has given me for their gude?"

"I wish your views of the responsibility and authority of parents were more general," answered Vernon. "That filial disobedience, which is a crying sin in this country, arises as much from parents neglecting to teach their children to obey them, in their early days, as from any other cause. I trust, however, that your family are restrained from what is wrong, not only by the force of your authority, but by their own convictions."

"I hope and believe so," said M'Farlane; "at any rate, as regards the sin of countenancing separation frae the Church. They're weel grunded in the reasons o' their faith, for I never could see anything in the Bible but Episcopacy, as far as the government of the Church is concerned; besides, schism gangs sic lengths here that it works its ain cure. There's about us here three or four kinds o' Methodists, and three or four kinds o' Presbyterians, and four or five kinds o' Baptists and Unitarians, who profanely ca' themselves Christians, an' I ken na how mony mair. They're aye splittin' up into different societies, and tearing iither to pieces. Noo, I've been always showing ma young folk frae Holy Scripture, that the Church of Christ is one, and that its just clean impossible that thir bit sects that spring up the day and split up the morn, can belong to the one Church o' Christ which He Himsel' planted eighteen hundred years ago, and which is to continue even unto the end of the world."

"These truths appear so evident, both from Scripture and common sense," replied Harry, "that the only wonder is that men can deny them."

"It's just a mystery to me," returned the old man; "if there's one thing in Holy Scripture that's clear to the plainest body that reads it, it's the unity o' the Church. There's some differences, nae doubt, in the opinions o' some o' the folks belonging to it; and for a' that, her ministry, her creeds, her sacraments, and her prayers, are a' one and the same, wherever they're to be found."

The conversation on these and kindred topics continued for some time, until the invalid began to show signs of weariness and exhaustion. Vernon then read to him some of the most devotional and suitable passages of Holy Scripture, pausing now and then to dwell upon some portion of peculiar beauty or fitness to the sick man's case.

"Noo, sir, if ye please," said M'Farlane, on Vernon's making a longer pause than usual,—“let us have the Evening Prayer. O, sir, I love the Evening Prayer."

"Certainly," replied Vernon; "but would you not prefer uniting in the Office for the Visitation of the Sick?"

"I'd like weel to hae them baith, sir," answered the sick man; "but as I'm getting vera weak, it'll maybe be better to hae the Visitation Office; but," he added, "I'd be thankful if you'd read some o' the collect, sir; I love the collect of the Evening Prayer."

The household were accordingly assembled, and after having reverently joined in the devotions which were offered by his bedside, the old man sunk into a peaceful sleep; and all, save one who watched beside him, betook themselves to the adjoining apartment.

During the remainder of the evening, Vernon listened with much interest to many details connected with the Scotch Episcopal Church with which the family were able to furnish him. They spoke with the greatest reverence of many of the bishops and pastors, especially of Bishop Jolly, whom they had known.

"His time," said a son-in-law of old M'Farlane, "was spent either in study or prayer. He went regularly to the church, morning and evening, and spent a good while in prayer; and when he was in his own house he was mostly at his books or on his knees. He was an auld man, and had little duty to do, and this was just the way he passed his days."

"Heh, sir, if ye'd only hae seen him in his robes inside the communion rails," said old Mrs. M'Farlane, "ye wad na hae forgotten him for a while; he was very tall, and sae thin that he looked as if he'd got nae flesh upon his bones; his head was quite bald, and the skin o' his head and face was so white that ye could scarce see the fringe o' snaw-white hair that cam round the back o' his head to his temples; his eye was clear, and his thin lips were bright red; and I'm sure when I used to see him reading the Communion Service, I used to think he was na' human."

"And his death was vera wonderfu'," said one of the daughters, an expression of awe coming over her face.

"Deed, ye may say that," replied the old woman: "he lived alane, and naeboddy except a young man he was preparing for the ministry cam' near him. One night he went to his bed as weel as he was in ordinar' and took some gude book that he was readin' wi' him—he locked the door, which was his way, and when the young man cam' next mornin' the door was still shut, an' nathing to be heard. The door was forced, and there lay the gude bishop dead and cauld; he was lying on his back as straight as if he had been laid out; his book was closed by his side, his hands were crossed upon his breast, and a white napkin was drawn over his face. Noo, sir," added Mrs. M'Farlane, "it wasna in human nature to do sic a thing as that, and it's hard to believe ought else but that the angels laid him out."

These and many other minute details, told with a simplicity, and at the same time an earnestness, that showed how deep a hold they had upon the memory and affections of the several speakers, caused the time to pass swiftly; and at rather a late hour Vernon retired to rest. When alone he reflected on what he had that evening witnessed, and felt that he was beneath the roof-tree of a family among whom the fear of God was a powerful and ruling principle. There was a quiet staidness, and a due subordination and regularity about the whole household that struck him much, though it would have been most difficult to describe; and the declaration of Holy Scripture came strongly to his mind, that God hath chosen the poor in this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom of heaven.

At a very early hour next morning, Mr. Broughton, according to Vernon's anticipation, rode up to the door. He had arrived at home, late on the preceding evening, and on learning that M'Farlane was very ill, he rose as soon as it was light, and rode fast, fearing he would be too late. The invalid who still continued easy, was much gratified by his arrival, and shortly afterwards preparations were made for the administration of the Holy Communion. While they were going forward, Vernon and his friend walked out alone; and the former expressed the gratification he had experienced from his visit.

"He is, indeed, a most excellent old man," said Broughton, "and I am so glad you were able to come and see him. When I arrived at home last night and heard of his illness, my regret for it was much increased by the fear of his dying without his seeing a clergyman,—a circumstance which he would regard as a very great trial."

On their return to the house, they found everything in order. The whole family had made some change in their dress, and looked clean and tidy, and each member of it was present. On entering the sick man's room, every preparation was made for the decent administration of the holy rite. It was a homely apartment. Three sides were formed by the rough logs of which the house was built, while the other consisted of the board partition which divided it from the common room which answered the purpose of kitchen and sitting-room together.

The rays of the morning sun were streaming brightly through a window that looked towards the east. In the middle of the room stood a table covered with a fair linen cloth, on which the elements were placed. Across one end stood the bed of the invalid, his white head propped up by pillows and his hand grasped in that of his aged and afflicted wife. Round the room, the family, who were all grown up, and who were eight or nine in number, had ranged themselves with noiseless reverence—their Prayer Books open at the Communion office, and ready, with heart and voice, to join in the sacred ordinance.

The service commenced; and Broughton's impressive tones added to the solemnity of the scene. Soon, however, the voices of the assembled household rose, as the voice of one man, in the deep and reverent response; or, if one tone could be distinguished from the others, it was owing to the greater fervency of the sick man's petitions. The priests having received, the sacred elements were distributed to the communicants in order; not one among that well-trained household held back. The left hand of each was opened, and across it was laid the right hand, "in" the palm of which they received the consecrated bread, and reverently bent the head over it to consume it. Last of all, the sufferer partook of the blessed memorials of his Redeemer's dying love—the succeeding prayers were said—the hymn of praise and thanksgiving was offered with united voice—the blessing was solemnly pronounced—and the holy rite was over.

Vernon had seldom been so impressed. He had supposed the age when such scenes were beheld had long since passed away, and that ere it would return long years of labor, teaching, and self-denial must necessarily elapse. He little thought to find the realisation of what he sometimes thought might, perhaps, be hereafter, if God's servants were faithful to the cause of truth, in a neglected township in Upper Canada; and he thanked God from his heart for affording him so striking and encouraging an example of what is meant by "the communion of saints."

About the middle of the day Vernon was obliged to bid the aged patriarch farewell. He saw his face no more; but he had abundant testimony to show that "his end was peace."—Sketches of Canadian Life.

BE CAREFUL HOW YOU SPEAK.

Hush!—why should you speak against the character of a female? It is all she has to depend upon in this world. Just give the impression wings, that she is not so good as she should be, and it will fly to every nook and corner of the town. The story you whisper will return in tones of thunder, to astonish even yourself, who was the first guilty wretch to repeat so base a story. A word has often proved the ruin of a virtuous soul—a word thoughtlessly spoken, it may be—but reported by an evil mind. Suppress any thought, which, if uttered, might injure the character or feelings of another. A thought may be stifled at its birth, but a word spoken may never be lost. Weigh everything you utter, so that none may misconstrue your language or receive a wrong impression. Above all, never, even in jest, whisper words, which if true, would throw a blight upon a spotless reputation.—Olive Branch.

THE CHURCH'S DOCTRINE OF BAPTISM.

The following able and valuable letter, from the Rev. Dr. Beaven, is one of a series which lately appeared in our excellent Toronto contemporary, The Church.

To the Editor of the Church.

REV. AND DEAR SIR.—Having shown that the Articles of the Church of England teach the regeneration of those who are rightly baptized, I come now to the proof from Holy Scripture.

Dissenters say that we can establish a most successful proof of the doctrine, so long as we confine ourselves to the formularies of the Church of England, but that when we come to the Bible, our proofs fail. I trust in this and subsequent letters, to prove that this is not the case. There are, however, two great impediments to a conviction which I am desirous of removing before I come to any argument.

The first impediment is the taking for granted that what is commonly called the Evangelical system of doctrine is the true one, and thus beginning with a prejudice which prevents the mind from apprehending or understanding the evidence presented to it. So long as that prejudice remains unshaken, it will be useless to argue. It is like arguing with a Romanist, who cannot eject from his mind the belief that his Church is the Catholic Church; say what you will of its corruption of doctrine or practice, you make no way. So if it be regarded as undoubted, that the Evangelical system is true, every passage of Scripture will have a meaning hostile to the doctrine of regeneration in Baptism, and therefore to quote Scripture will be to no purpose. It therefore becomes necessary for any person not holding that doctrine, (if he is ever to give a candid attention to the Scriptural arguments we bring forward) to consent to think that his whole system of doctrine may be unfounded, so far as it bears upon the point in question, or any point related to it. If this be not done, the obvious meaning (to them) of almost every passage of Scripture I shall adduce, will be unfavourable to my argument.

I mention this because I can remember what was my own case; and how great was my surprise to find such interpretations attached to passages of Scripture as I had never conceived of, and such as (with my then views) appeared arbitrary and unspiritual.

A second impediment to be removed is the notion that every individual is (with prayer and reliance on the Holy Spirit's aid) to be his own interpreter. The New Testament has now been read in the Church for nearly 1800 years; and it is surely the extreme of presumption to suppose that God will impart to every individual a special assistance of his Holy Spirit to understand the Scriptures, without making use of such aids to their interpretation as already exist and lie within his reach. What does any educated Clergyman, who can read the original, think of the illiterate man who, without being able to understand even the language of the English Bible, presumes to rely upon the Holy Spirit's guidance, and decides that infant baptism is unscriptural and schism no sin, and that the Holy Spirit has so taught him? And yet perhaps this poor man's error is the same as that of this Clergyman who reads his Greek Testament without inquiring what meaning Ignatius, or Justin Martyr, or Irenæus, or the whole ancient Church attached to its words. Has the Spirit been reserved to these latter days? Had the Holy Martyrs and confessors of old no portion of it? Did they not pray for the Spirit? Did God not hear their prayers? Is there no agreement or consent amongst them as to the meaning of the Word of God? And is it possible that (when they do agree) they should be wrong, and the whole body of the present Church wrong with them, and a small section of the Church in these latter days the only portion of it that has understood the Scriptures aright?

The ancient Church had at least as much piety as the modern, and its members had, more nearly than we have, the same kind of mental training as the original writers of the New Testament. They lived in the same part of the world, under similar institutions, with similar social customs, and read the Old Testament habitually in the same language. With the same piety, the same habits of prayer, the same aid of the Holy Ghost as the best of us; had they not better means of understanding the New Testament than we? What is our boasted learning, but an imperfect substitute for that knowledge of the language of the New Testament which the most of them drew in almost with their mother's milk?

Besides all this, they had a current system of doctrine delivered to them, and habitually taught and referred to by them, which had been communicated to them by the Apostles directly and systematically: a "form of doctrine," as St. Paul calls it, in which truth was stated positively, and not incidentally or controversially, as it is in so large a portion of the New Testament. This system is referred to in the New Testament itself; and it was one and the same to a very great extent amongst all who continued together in union and communion with each other; so that it was easily ascertained in the earlier ages, and must have been a most powerful help to the understanding of the Scriptures.

Nor need any person who is simply seeking for truth be alarmed at the notion of oral tradition. It should never be forgotten by any honest mind, that all sects and parties have their oral tradition; and very few persons are there who do not, as a matter of fact, interpret the Scriptures according to the oral tradition to which they have been accustomed. But our modern oral tradition is manifold and contradictory; that of the primitive ages was, on all important parts, one and the same. They might not agree in their interpretation of the Old Testament, but they did, for the most part, agree in the interpretation of the New; and at all events they held one unvarying system of doctrine. Can any serious minded person suppose that minds distracted by varying systems of doctrine, such as we are condemned to hear, can be so well qualified to understand the Bible as those who were trained in a system which was uniform and consistent? Unless, indeed, any one is prepared to assert that the system, delivered by the Apostles, vanished from the earth with them, and that it was left for a few persons 1500 or 1600 years after, in a different country, speaking a different language, to extract this lost doctrine anew from the writings of the Apostles, composed in a foreign tongue, and that a dead one, newly and imperfectly recovered by a few learned men,—if such hypothesis as that is supposed credible, I have nothing more to say.

But some may say that the minds of the Primitive Christians were warped and perverted by previous prejudices. Granted; most freely granted. They were perverted by all sorts of former prejudices. One, previous to his conversion, was a Sadducean Jew, another a Pharisaic Jew, another an Essenian Jew; others were worshippers of fire or of the stars, or believers in two eternal principles; others were Epicureans or Stoics, or Platonists, or Academics, or Eclectics; others again were Druids, or worshippers of Thor and Woden; some were rhetoricians, lawyers, soldiers, philosophers, courtiers; others were illiterate idolators. And yet with all these various and contrary prejudices, when they became Christians they received an uniform unchanging scheme or form of doctrine; uniform, that is, and unchanging on certain material and fundamental points. And what could have produced this uniformity, but child-like faith receiving Apostolic truth?

I have no hesitation in confessing that as this fact opened gradually to my mind, I was constrained to say—However plausible or apparently spiritual the modern interpretations of Scripture, and however estimable the persons who have taught them to me, and however difficult it may be to see at first how the ancient interpretations are consistent with the apparent meaning of other parts of Scripture, my mind cannot resist this overwhelming fact; that there is but one interpretation of certain passages of Scripture in the ages nearest the Apostles, and that interpretation is at variance with the doctrine which in modern days claims to be evangelical. I therefore first received those interpretations upon trust, upon the authority of the Primitive Church, as I had equally received my original views upon trust from my early instructors; but I must equally say that at present I receive them, because they are, to my apprehension, the plain and obvious doctrine of the Word of God.

But whilst myself convinced that it is the doctrine of the Word of God, I yet doubt my power of convincing any person that it is so, who has become established in the contrary opinion, so long as it is a question merely between his understanding of the Bible and mine. He will be apt to think his interpretation quite as good as mine, and there will still remain the need of some authority, to enable the mind to determine which is right and which is wrong.

With this warning and protest I come to the New Testament.

The first passage I select is that which must suggest itself to every Churchman, because quoted in that beautiful service, by which we dedicate our children to God: I mean that which is contained in the 3rd chapter of St. John's Gospel, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the Kingdom of God." The time was when the only meaning of these words to my mind was, "Except a sinner be converted from the error of his heart, he cannot enter Heaven." I had then no conception of regeneration as distinct from a change of the heart and affections. But how does our Lord explain these words? "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God." Now, can any person specify any method by which a person can be born of water and of the Spirit, unless in baptism? Does not the Church of England expressly quote this very passage at the commencement of the Baptismal service, as a proof of that regeneration which she declares to be "by baptism?" Supposing, then, that there is another meaning to the phrase—to be born again—supposing that it may be applied to a different spiritual change, it yet appears that to be baptized and to be born again are the same thing; or, at all events, that it is in the water of baptism that we are to look for regeneration by the Spirit.

Some, indeed, would make the word "and" explanatory, and equivalent to even; as though our Lord had said, "Except a man be born of water, even of the Spirit." But (not to dwell on the unnaturalness of such an interpretation) when our Lord spoke of his disciples being "baptized with the Holy Ghost and with fire," does any one suppose that he made fire equivalent to the Holy Ghost? Were they not baptized both with the Holy Ghost and with fire?

Some, again, separate the two, and teach a regeneration with water, and a regeneration with the Holy Ghost, taking place, in most instances, at separate times. But is there a single trace of any such doctrine in the New Testament or in the early Church? Does the Church of England in any of her writings, even in the popular and less studied style of the Homilies, ever teach a regeneration by water? Is washing with water ever spoken of as a regeneration of any kind? Is the body anywhere spoken of as being capable of being born again without the soul? The whole man must be born again, or the whole man remains out of the Kingdom of God. Water, without the Spirit, cannot regenerate. The soul must be born again of the Spirit, or the body remains dead along with it in the sight of God. It is by the quickening of the soul that the body must be restored to life in God's sight; and the soul can be quickened by nothing but the Holy Spirit.

All this appears to me self-evident. If it is not so to others, I will simply add that the writers of the Primitive Church, nay, I believe of the whole Church of Christ down to the time of the Reformation, uniformly and with one consent, and in passages without number, interpret this passage of baptism, and of baptism alone. They do occasionally (but very rarely) use the term regeneration (with an "as it were" at first, and afterwards without it) to express a change of heart or of conduct; but such instances, as I have said, are very rare; nor does this affect the fact that they interpret this passage of baptism, and of baptism alone. If any person has any doubt upon the subject, I can only wish that he may search for himself. There will be very few persons indeed, so entirely wrapped up in the prejudices of a lifetime, as to come to a different conclusion. But, as I have already said, it appears to me entirely unnecessary for any person who will allow his own mind fair play, to have recourse to any interpreter. The passage itself is transparently clear.

Taking this passage, then, in its plainest sense, our Lord's conversation with Nicodemus is easily understood. He comes to Jesus by stealth, and yet as one who thought he was doing him an honour by visiting him. He comes, of course, with the Jewish notion, that he is already one of God's people and children, and that when "the Christ" comes, he in common with all his countrymen, will have a share in the Kingdom of God; that is, in the revival of the temporal kingdom of David and Solomon under the Christ. He sees in Jesus a teacher come from God, and desires to consult him in regard to the Kingdom of God, and therefore commences by paying him the compliment of acknowledging his miracles and Divine commission. In a moment Jesus sees through the state of his mind, and brings him to the point much more speedily than he expected, and in a very different way. He desires at once and effectually to remove from his mind the delusion as to the earthly nature of God's Kingdom and his own natural right to share in it. He gives him to understand that his natural descent from Abraham is not sufficient,—that his qualification is yet to be obtained—that he requires a second birth—that it is spiritual and must come from God—that it is to be obtained by an external ordinance, and consequently by an outward public profession. "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the Kingdom of God." "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God." His natural birth leaves him still carnal, but the new birth will give him a spiritual life, which will fit him to enter into a spiritual kingdom. "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is Spirit."

But Nicodemus does not understand. Although the Jews baptized proselytes with water and then reckoned them newly born, even this does not give him a glimpse of our Lord's meaning. Well might Jesus remonstrate, "Art thou a Master of Israel, and knowest not these things?"

And how well does this suit with our Lord's intimation that what he was now saying was comparatively "earthly!" For St. Paul himself reckons "the doctrine of baptisms" among "the first principles of the doctrine of Christ," and teaches that we must get beyond it, in order to "go on to perfection;" and so Jesus intimates that there were "heavenly things" which he would impart to Nicodemus when he should have mastered the "earthly things" he was teaching him.

And how well again does the spiritual birth in baptism bear comparison with "the wind, which bloweth where it listeth;" which we can trace with certainty only in its effects; which varies from the gentlest and most imperceptible movement to the most powerful agitation; whose effects are qualified by the more or less yielding character of the matter upon which it operates, and the source and origin of which, as well as its ultimate products, no human skill can investigate: "we know not whence it cometh and whither it goeth."

I find that my thoughts on this text have become sufficiently copious for this letter; I must therefore beg your indulgence and that of your readers, and reserve for a future occasion what more I may have to say.

I remain, Rev. and Dear Sir, faithfully yours,
Toronto, June, 1849. J. B.

ON THE CHURCH CATECHISM.

THE CHRISTIAN NAME.

No doubt many of the young persons who repeat the Church Catechism, Sunday by Sunday, either to their parents or teachers, or in the Sunday-school, think it "very dry;" which means, that they find very little in it to interest them; and, probably, most of them are very glad when it is "done," and never think of it again till the next Sunday comes.

The writer of these papers once thought so too, but being now of a very different opinion, is anxious to help others to like it also. May God, for his dear Son's sake, give his Holy Spirit both to the reader and the writer, that it may be the means of leading our thoughts to Jesus, not only on Sunday, but every day in the week!

The very fact of bearing a "Christian name" ought to help us to do this; and the very first question you are asked in the Church Catechism shows that you are yourself interested in it all. It does not begin with a history of the creation of the world, or of some one you never heard of, but it asks you a question about yourself.

"What is your name?"

Yes; it is of very little use, as far as religion is concerned, to know about other people and other things, unless we account each one for ourselves before God. So the Church of England takes every individual separately, and bids each one look to himself. There is amazing force in this appropriation. It brings each soul to look to its own personal standing before God,—before that Omnipotent Being who declares, "I know thee by name!" (Exod. xxxiii. 12.) The "name," the character, and the circumstances, every one of us is placed in, are all alike known to this all-seeing God.

This is a very terrible thought to those who do not love God. Like Adam and Eve in the garden, they would be very glad to hide themselves from Him if they could. But God knew all about Adam when he was trying to hide behind the trees; and he heard God calling him by his name, and no wonder he was "afraid." (Gen. ii.) What must Saul, too, have felt, when he was on the road to Damascus, and heard that voice from heaven, calling,—"Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" How terrified he must have been when he found that the God he was persecuting thus knew his name and all about him!

But those who love God like to hear Him speaking to them. How happy Mary was when she heard that well-known voice, calling,—"Mary!" How instantly she recognised it. (John xx. 11—17.) And God speaks to little children too. Four times over in one night He called—"Samuel, Samuel;" and little Samuel jumped up every time and said, "Here am I," even before he knew who it was that was speaking. (1 Sam. iii.; see, also, Luke x. 41, 42.) Have you ever heard the voice of God speaking to you? It is the Good Shepherd, calling his own sheep by name. (John x. 3; Is. xlii. 1; xlv. 3, 4.) And remember, that even the lambs in Christ's flock know His voice and follow Him. (John x. 4, 27.)

The Church of England would have us reminded of Him, and of our relation to Him, every time we hear ourselves called by our Christian name. The very term—"your CHRISTIAN name," involves in it a profession of Christ! It was given you on a very solemn occasion; and if you bear a name which does not belong to you, you are a hypocrite and a traitor! If you have a "Christian name" you ought to be a Christian. It is a dreadful thing to be baptized in the name of Christ, and then betray him, as Judas did. And although you may deceive your fellow-Christians for a long time, as that traitor deceived the other apostles, you cannot deceive God, who knows thee all the while, and has your name written in His Book, by which you will be judged at the last day.

Many of my young readers are acquainted with "The Young Cottager." One day, when the Rev. Legh Richmond went to visit her, amongst other questions, he said to her, "Jenny, you can repeat the Church Catechism?"

"Yes, Sir," she replied; "but I think that has been one of my sins in the sight of God."

"What! repeating your Catechism a sin?"

"Yes, Sir, in such a way as I used to do it."

"How was that?"

"Very carelessly, indeed, Sir. I never thought about the meaning of the words, and that must have been very wrong, Sir; the Catechism is full of good things, I wish I understood them better."

Perhaps some of my readers wish so too. Endeavour then, with the help of God, to understand it better, and to think more about "the meaning of the words" as you read these little papers, that you may not have to look back upon your way of repeating the Catechism as a sin, if you should ever be ill, as she was.

"O Lord, thy love to me impart,
And seal my name upon thy heart;
Seal me upon thine arm, and wear
That pledge of love for ever there."
Exod. xxviii. 12—20.

COMMENTARY ON THE NINTH COMMANDMENT.

At the examination of the children of the Windsor Infant school, on Wednesday week, a little boy was asked to explain his idea, of "bearing false witness against your neighbor." After hesitating, he said it was "telling lies;" on which the worthy and reverend examiner said, "that is not exactly an answer; what do you say," addressing a little girl who stood next, when she immediately replied, "It was when nobody did nothing, and somebody went and told of it." "Quite right," said the examiner, amid irrepressible roars of laughter, in which he could not help joining, the gravity of the whole proceeding being completely upset.—Liverpool Mercury.

DISCRETION AND CUNNING.

Discretion points out the noblest ends, and the most proper and laudable methods of attaining them. Cunning has only private, selfish aims, and sticks at nothing which may make them succeed. Discretion has large and extended views, and like a well formed eye, commands a whole horizon. Cunning is a kind of short sightedness that discovers the minutest objects which are near at hand, but is not able to discover things at a distance. Discretion, the more it is discovered, gives a greater authority to the person who possesses it. Cunning, when detected, loses its force, and makes a man incapable of bringing about even those events he might have done, had he passed only for a plain man. Discretion is the perfection of reason, and a guide to us in all the duties of life; cunning is a kind of instinct, that only looks out after our immediate interest and welfare. Discretion is only found in men of strong sense and good understanding; cunning is often to be met with in brutes, and in persons who are the fewest removes from them. In short, cunning is only the mimic of discretion, and may pass upon weak men, in the same manner as vivacity is mistaken for wit, and gravity for wisdom.

The cast of mind which is natural to a discreet man, makes him look forward into futurity, and consider what will be his condition millions of ages hence, as well as what it is at present. He knows that the misery or happiness which are reserved for another world lose nothing of their reality by being placed at so great a distance from him. The objects do not appear little to him because they are remote. He considers that those pleasures and pains which lie hid in eternity approach nearer every moment, and will be present with him in their full weight and measure, as much as those pains and pleasures which he feels at this very instant. For this reason he is careful to secure to himself that which is the proper happiness of his nature, and the ultimate design of his being. He carries his thoughts to the end of every action, and considers the most distant as well as the most immediate effects of it. He supersedes every little prospect of gain and advantage which offers itself here, if he does not find it consistent with his views of an hereafter. In a word his hopes are full of immortality, his schemes are large and glorious, and his conduct suitable to one who knows his true interest, and how to pursue it by proper methods.—Reformed Presbyterian.

BUSINESS FIRST, THEN PLEASURE.

A man who is very rich now, was very poor when he was a boy. When asked how he got his riches, he replied:

"My father taught me never to play till all my work for the day was finished, and never spend my money till I had earned it. If I had but half an hour's work to do in a day, I must do that the first thing, and in half an hour. After this was done, I was allowed to play; and I then could play with much more pleasure, than if I had the thought of an unfinished task before my mind. I early formed the habit of doing everything in its time, and it soon became perfectly easy to do so. It is to this habit that I now owe my present prosperity."

Let every boy who reads this, go and do likewise, and he will meet with a similar reward.—Wright's Casket.

FIT THOUGHTS.—Let your thoughts be fit or suitable to the subject. Every day have high thoughts of God—lower thoughts of self, kinder thoughts of your brethren, and more hopeful thoughts of all around you.

RELIGIOUS TRAINING.

Such is the important subject of "A charge to the Clergy of the Diocese of Western New York, delivered August 15, 1849, at the opening of the Convention in Trinity Church, Geneva, by WILLIAM H. DE LANCEY, D. D. L. L. D., Bishop of the Diocese.

This is a well chosen subject for these times, and it is discussed, as such a theme should be, in a practical manner, setting forth, with clear arrangement and minute detail, the particulars of the duty devolving upon all who undertake to carry out this great end of the Church. We feel satisfied that this Charge, wherever it is read and rightly digested, will prove eminently useful, in stirring up the minds of the clergy to a stronger sense of their duty, and in designating the manner in which their high obligations should be performed. The Bishop thus introduces his subject.

"Two systems in the process of religious education or instruction have existed:

"One may be called the system of excitement.

"The other, the system of training.

"The former supposes the baptized individual to be incapable of religious or spiritual action, until he is, at some period of life, early or late, awakened, impressed and changed by the Holy Spirit; with a view to whose action upon him it is necessary that human means should be used to arrest, disturb and excite his mind on the subject of his salvation. Prior to this period he is in sin and apathy. At this period he is converted. Before this period he is incapable of any religious action acceptable to God. Prayer cannot be made: or if made, is an abomination. Praise is hypocrisy. Attempted obedience is utter failure or unacceptable. The Deity is an object of disregard or aversion, and moral holiness is repudiated. Spiritually he is asleep, and must be awakened. He is in apathy, and must be aroused. He is dead, and must be quickened. Hence, for his religious preparation, he must needs submit to a system of excitements.

"The latter—the system of training—supposes the individual to be capable of religious exercises from the earliest period of intelligence, not by nature, but in virtue of imparted grace pledged by covenant to him; by means of which, as he is empowered for moral action, so moral action is required, and may be acceptably rendered by him. Hence he is to be taught religious duties which he is to perform: he is to be taught religious doctrine which he is to believe: he is to be swayed by religious motives to which he is accessible: he is to be led to moral obedience which he can render: he is to share in Christian ordinances which are profitable to him. He is to be TRAINED in knowledge, holiness, virtues, graces, spiritual duties, doctrines, ordinances; and in all of faith, holiness and grace that may attest his conformity to the will of God, and secure through Christ, as its meritorious origin, his everlasting salvation.

"To develope, to explain, to apply and to guard this latter system, as the true and best system for the clergy to pursue for themselves and in their parishes, and the laity in their individual and domestic relations, will constitute the design of the Charge."

It is then shown with great force and conclusive proofs, that "the training system is the system of common sense, the system of analogy, the system of the Church, the system of the Gospel, the true system."

The claims of this system having been thus asserted, the charge next proceeds to the inquiry, "how is it to be applied in the Church?" This inquiry is answered, by showing the manner of its application to the three classes in a congregation, children, youth, adults.

"I. In regard to the CHILDREN of the congregation, it is to be applied in four ways.

By the agency of Sunday Schools:

By catechising:

By personal intercourse and friendly conversation:

By Parochial Schools.

"II. With respect to the YOUTH the modes by which they are to be trained in knowledge and holiness, are these:

By Lectures and Sermons especially applicable to them:

By intercourse and conversation:

By books:

By Classes for Confirmation.

"III. The application of this system to ADULTS, composed of communicants and non-communicants, is thus treated of.

Now, the modes by which both these classes, needing, you will at once perceive, very diversified instruction, are to be trained in the ways of God are these:

The Pulpit:

The Lecture:

The Press:

Personal intercourse:

The sustaining of Church Institutions:

And the cultivation of a devotional character among them."

As we shall draw largely from the matter of this important Charge, whose practical character and application we have shown to our readers, for the present we must content ourselves with this analysis of its contents.

We have been struck with the fact that the same mail which brought this testimony from Western New York, brought also in the Missionary, a discourse on the same subject, from the Bishop of New Jersey. The title of the latter is, RELIGIOUS TRAINING, THE HOPE AND BLESSING OF THE STATE.

This discourse is a pointed and forcible development of those words of Scripture, "that our sons may grow up as the young plants, and that our daughters may be as the polished corners of the temple." It is directed to the enforcement of the "Religious Training" of children, by Christian education; showing the means to be employed, the ends to be aimed at, the blessings to be secured, in this great work. It is a large discourse in few words; there is in it more of thought than language; and all that is said with so much point and conciseness is enforced by the great experience of the writer. There is much of truth compressed in the following brief extract.

"Need it still be added, that, of such a work, the power and the glory must be God's. It begins in holy Baptism which is God's ordinance; when the child of sin is new-born, and becomes the child of God. It receives its full supply of grace, in Confirmation, which is God's ordinance; when the Holy Ghost, so the young heart be meek and gentle, like the dove, which is its emblem, descends upon the brow, on which the Cross was traced, to be its Guardian and its Guide, its Teacher, Comforter and Sanctifier. It is admitted to the stores of heaven in spiritual nurture and salvation, at the Holy Supper, which is God's ordinance; when He, who gave Himself upon the Cross to ransom souls from everlasting death, again bestows Himself, in Bread and Wine, which he hath blessed, and called his Body and His Blood, to feed their souls for everlasting life. It is directed and instructed by the Holy Bible, which is God's ordinance; and which is made the rule of faith, and plan of life, and mirror of all godliness. And it is carried on, advanced and perfected in the Holy Church, which is God's ordinance: a home for nurture, a school for training, and a fold for shelter, to the dear lambs, for which the Shepherd gave His life. These are the outlines and the great way-marks, of Christian Education. To fill them up would be beyond our purpose, and your time. You, that have children, begin with them, at the beginning, the Sacred Font, in which the wave of life from the pierced side of Jesus ever springs; and go from that to follow out, by your own constant care and pains, and by the constant care and pains of those whom you shall call in aid of such a work, the teachings of the Prayer Book: and you shall win, from God, in answer to your prayers, and realize, in those sweet pledges of your love, dearer to you than your heart's blood, the prayer which David offered for the children of his care: 'your sons shall grow up as the young plants, and your daughters shall be as the polished corners of the temple.' Leave them to themselves, unbaptized, unconfirmed, unfed, at the dear Board, which Jesus set, to do the way of their wild will; and ripen in their souls, the seed of that old curse which fell upon our nature in the fall: and briars and brambles, bound in bundles for the burning, and ruins in which owls hoot, and bats whirl, and snakes crawl, and toads squat, will be transcendent beauties, and ineffable delights in the comparison."

We rejoice that this most important subject is engaging so largely the attention of our Bishops. We rejoice that so many are engaged in carrying out the theory here presented, into practice. We esteem Religious Training, not only as "the hope and blessing of the state," but we see no other hope for the Church.

It is only by the faithful training of the young, that the Church can hope for members who will be steady and faithful champions of her glorious principles, who will be unaffected by changes, unswayed by errors. Among those who have been faithless to the Church, who have been led by ignorance, pride, or self-will, to a desertion of her safe shelter, few or none will be found who have been from early life, trained up in her system. Gradual growth in knowledge seems essential to a sound and healthy state of mind in religion. Those who have been the subjects of sudden impressions, whose religious views have been changed, at a mature or late period of life, have been too often unstable and wavering in their whole after course. It seems almost necessary that the truth to which the mind is to cling, should grow with our growth. The purer affections of early life, its more guileless devotion, must be fixed, to sustain the temptations to which our faith is exposed.

It is a fact to be supported by easy demonstration, that almost all of those who have been tempted to abandon the Church, have been trained from early life in a false system, either within or without her fold. The promise is, the only sure one, "train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." We cannot, therefore, wonder that those who, as children, are not trained up in the way they should go, are so often found departing from the right way. If the Church wishes to keep her members from following those who have gone, or may be going, (the sooner the better, if their hearts are so inclined) to Rome or to Geneva, let her look well to the RELIGIOUS TRAINING of the young. Let her make this her HOPE, and God will make it her BLESSING.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

The Editor of the Banner acknowledges, with great pleasure, the receipt of $17 55, for the Swedish and Norwegian Church, being an offering from St. John's Church, Knoxville, Tennessee, by the hands of the Rector.

An unsolicited donation, coming from unknown friends at such a distance, has been peculiarly gratifying to Mr. Unonius, in whose hands we have placed this liberal contribution. We have always regarded it as a great practical end of a Church Journal to stir up the hearts of its readers to works of love, by presenting cases which justly appeal to their charity. A reference to the acknowledgments of the Banner will show that it has accomplished something in this way. We take the liberty of publishing the following extract from the letter, conveying the above contribution, and we assure our friend that these are results which afford infinitely more satisfaction than any other praises which our humble efforts may secure. It is not, surely, by the provocations of controversy that we best discharge our duty to God and man. That high end is best attained by provoking one another to love and to good works. With this feeling, we make the following extract from our correspondent's letter.

"I may add, for your satisfaction, (for it is pleasant to us to know that we are instrumental in bringing forth good works in others,) that your statement in the 'Banner' of the case of Mr. Unonius and his flock, attracted the attention and excited the sympathies of one of your subscribers in this place, who is an excellent female communicant of the Church; and thus led, through an expression of her desire to contribute in 'this behalf,' to the collection."

THANKSGIVING DAY.

The Governor of Pennsylvania has appointed Thursday, the 29th of November, to be observed as an annual Thanksgiving Day in this state. In publishing the following proclamation of our Chief Magistrate, we feel compelled to express our regret that it contains no distinct mention of the peculiar motive which, at this time, should stir the hearts of our people to more earnest praise and thanksgiving. We are quite sure that this was no designed omission. But surely great as the other blessings may be with which our citizens have been so abundantly favoured in the past year, there is one which holds preeminence among them all. The distinguishing mercy of this year, over which, in many portions of our land, the gloomy shadows of death have brooded, is the loving kindness with which God has blessed the people of this State in preserving the health and lives of its citizens.

Our principal cities have been most mercifully spared, while in many towns, and in a large portion of our wide boundaries, the Pestilence has not been a visitor. When we remember the gloom and terror which overspread our land, in apprehension of the Destroyer's approach, our hearts should now be moved to praise Him whose mercy has averted or withdrawn the cause of our dread.

In this connection we may add, that there is quite a general desire expressed that the President of the United States, who so wisely recommended a National Fast, should also appoint a National Thanksgiving, having special reference to this great mercy. If there was then cause for a Nation's Prayers and supplications, surely there is equal reason for our united Thanksgiving.

In the name and by the authority of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, by WILLIAM F. JOHNSTON, Governor of the said Commonwealth,

A PROCLAMATION.

A beneficent God has blessed the people of this Commonwealth with health and abundance. The fields have yielded bountiful returns to the labours of the husbandman. The enterprises of the citizens, in all branches of industry, have been appropriately rewarded. Peace with all nations has been vouchsafed to the country. Civil and religious liberty, under the institutions of free government, have been preserved inviolate, and the largest measure of earthly happiness has been graciously dispensed by an all-wise and merciful Providence.

These blessings demand our gratitude to Him, in whose hands are the issues of life and death—who controls and directs the affairs of men—whose will is Omnipotent to save or destroy, and who mingles in the justice of His judgments the attributes of His mercy—before whose power nations are exalted or cast down—and they call upon us as one people, to unite in solemn Thanksgiving—in humble supplication and praise to the Almighty Author of every good and perfect gift, for these, his undeserved blessings, to his weak and sinful creatures. They require the profound reverence of penitent hearts, sensible of the unworthiness of humanity, and of the enduring mercy of a righteous God.

Believing these solemn truths—deeply impressed with the duty of devout adoration and humble prayer, in compliance with a venerated custom, and the desires of the great body of the people, I, William F. Johnston, Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, do hereby appoint and designate Thursday, the 29th day of November next, as a day of General Thanksgiving throughout the State; and I hereby recommend and earnestly invite all the good people of this Commonwealth to a sincere and prayerful observance of the same.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State, at Harrisburg, this twenty-fifth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-nine, and of the Commonwealth the seventy-fourth. By the Governor,

TOWNSEND HAINES,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

CITY MISSION CHURCHES.

If our Correspondent "Hal" will again recur to our Editorial, he will see that we had no reference to Parish Churches, like St. John's, in the Northern Liberties. Although the seats are free, and we esteem the fact honorable to Rector and people, that parish is expected to sustain itself by the voluntary contributions of its members. We only referred to Churches placed in the midst of the most destitute portions of our population, and supported as Mission Churches, by the charity of the wealthier classes. We would be the last to do any wrong to the esteemed Rector of St. John's. We should have made another exception however. And that is, the CHURCH OF THE CRUCIFIXION; and we hope its self-denying Rector, and the devoted friends of this admirable mission, will excuse our forgetfulness.

MISAPPREHENSION.

If our Correspondent from Raleigh will refer to our Editorial he will find that we did not, by any possible construction, apply the term "Judge Lynch" to the action of "the North Carolina Convention." We were speaking of the violent attacks and fierce condemnations of their Bishop, in newspaper articles. Although we differed in the view we took of its action, we were disposed to speak only in respectful terms of the Convention of North Carolina. And we are quite sure that this body, which has always been distinguished for its advocacy of sound Church principles, are as anxious as we are to defend their Bishop against injurious and unjust assaults.

The documents referred to, have already appeared in the Banner.

THE CHURCH AND DISSENT.—The London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, an able Dissenting paper, is obliged to confess that "the Church is very active now; in fairness it may be said to be acting with as much energy as any Dissenting body." The writer becomes a little more particular, and says—"The dullest individual who walks the streets may note it, that all the external characteristics of a London Sunday, in so far as Divine worship is concerned, is in favor of the predominance of the Establishment. In all the suburban districts, not even excepting Hackney, noted of old as the peculiar habitat of Dissenters—in Brixton, or Clapham, or Newington, or Highbury, or Islington, where merchants, stock-brokers, and tradesmen now reside—new district Churches start up almost daily, and these are almost invariably crowded. I simply state this as a fact. I cannot shut my eyes to the palpable evidence which every Sunday affords, that, with the middle and upper classes, the Church is more popular, or at least more attended than Dissenting Chapels. More than once I have made it my business to note the congregations of people pouring out of Churches and Chapels, that I might try to ascertain, so far as externals go, the character of the classes who attend them; and I repeat, though the assertion may wound the self-love of sincere and ardent Dissenters, that the evidence afforded by a London Sunday is decidedly in favor of the predominance of the Church amongst the middle and upper classes of the metropolis. From St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey—from the aristocratic parish church of St. James's to the plainest suburban Chapel of Ease—there is palpable demonstration in favor of this conclusion; and though Surrey Chapel, where Rowland Hill once held forth, usually contains its three thousand auditors, and though crowded congregations may attend the ministrations of a Binney, a Cumming, a Leifchild, a Burnett, or others of the able men who adorn the Dissenting body, it is not possible to impugn the fact that the Church more than keeps its place, if we take mere numeration and appearance as our guides."

New Publications.

THE REVELLERS, THE MIDNIGHT SEA, AND THE WANDERER. Three Allegories. By the Rev. Edward A. Munro, M. A. Perpetual Curate of Harrow Weald, Author of the "Combatants," "Dark River," &c. Prot. Epis. S. S. Union. New York.

HELEN MORTON'S TRIALS. By Cousin Alice. With engravings, executed by William Howland, from designs by C. May. General Prot. Epis. S. S. Union.

We have received these two works from Mr. H. Hooker, Agent of the S. S. Union in Philadelphia. They are exceedingly attractive little works, in outward form: appropriate and tasteful gifts for the young. We have not had time to examine their contents, but their publication by the Sunday School Union is, to us, a warrant of their excellency. This judgment is confirmed by the following testimony of the Editor of the "True Catholic," good authority, we think. Speaking of the former, he says:—

"Mr. Munro's reputation is so well established by his former allegories, that it is only necessary to assure our readers, that these, although not, in our opinion, equal to "The Dark River," are quite worthy of the author, and entitled to rank in the very first class of books for Christian young people. The moral inculcated in "The Revellers" is watchfulness and self-denial; that of "The Midnight Sea," self-distrust and reliance on the Saviour. The same moral is repeated in "The Wanderer," which is a very pretty amplification of the parable of the lost sheep, coupled with the description of the Good Shepherd."

Of the latter, the same Editor thus bears the following witness:—

"We learn from the "Short Letter of Introduction," that the full name of "Cousin Alice" is Alice B. Neal. It is one which will not soon be forgotten, for we hope that the beautiful tale which she has produced may be only the first of a long series. We can assure those who are interested in the welfare of children, and looking round for "Christmas presents," that they will not readily find one which a Christian friend or parent ought to prefer to "Helen Morton's Trial."

MY MOTHER; or Recollections of Maternal Influence. Published by William H. Hyde, New York, and for sale by H. Hooker.

We cannot speak with the same confidence of this book, though it may be more attractive for some even within the Church. The mother whose history is given may have been a worthy one, but she was not trained according to the system of the Church, as she was not "converted" "till at about the age of seventeen." In other respects this book may be useful, as every work must be whose tendency is to impress the world with a due sense of the importance of maternal influence.

A KEY TO THE PRAYER BOOK of the Protestant Episcopal Church, &c., by the Rev. Robert Whitehead, A. M. Revised, and adapted to the American Prayer Book, by the Rev. James Fowles, Rector of the Church of the Epiphany; Phil. R. E. Peterson, Fifth and Arch Sts. This is the book first published, and then suppressed, by the Evangelical Knowledge Society. As we gave our readers a full account of it before, we need say nothing more now. We fear they will hardly be able to unlock the treasures of the Prayer Book with such a Key ZETETIC METHOD.—"Progressive French Translator. Historie Sainte, in three parts." This is a French and English version of the Historie Sacra, by A. A. Roux, Professor, &c., and "Author of the Zetetic Method." What that method is we have not the advantage of knowing, nor the time to inquire. We suppose, however, it is some telegraphic line of learning. Those who wish to follow it will find "the Progressive Translator" at R. E. Peterson's, Fifth and Arch.

HUME'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND, VOL. IV. Having already spoken of this excellent republication, we need only now add the following "special notice" which accompanies this volume.

"The present volume forms the fourth one of Hume's History of England. As previously announced, the unabridged work will be comprised in six volumes; the last volume of which will contain a complete Index of the whole work. Although attended with considerable additional expense, yet the publishers deemed this an indispensable feature, in making it a convenient work of reference for the period of history which it embraces.

WINDINGS OF THE RIVER OF THE WATER OF LIFE.—In the development, discipline, and fruits of faith. By George B. Cheever, D. D. New York, John Wiley, 161 Broadway.

The fanciful title of the Book is a true index of its contents. The practical truth which it contains, and there is not a little of this, is overshadowed by the mystical clouds rising from a mind which rejoices not in the plain sunshine of Evangelical truth. The soul might easily be lost in such "windings," the light of immortal truth be quenched in "the water" of the meandering "river." We would rather follow the direct "path of life" which the Church marks out, than risk the dangers of these "windings." To others this book may present "the line of beauty," which is said to be a crooked one.

LIFE, HEALTH AND DISEASE.—By Edward Johnson, M. D. Author of "Hydrophobia," &c. New York: John Wiley.

This is a book to point us to "the water" of physical life. It seems to be a plain and sensible treatise upon its important topics, and contains many important directions and much wise counsel on the best method of preserving health. Its motto is certainly a good one. "The pith of nearly all that has been written on the prevention of disease might be included under two heads, almost in two words—TEMPERANCE AND EXERCISE." As far as we are able to judge, the Discourse is worthy of this text.

THE AMERICAN QUARTERLY REGISTER AND MAGAZINE.—We have received the first number of the third volume of this able periodical. For varied information, and for the amount of its interesting and instructive reading, we know of no publication of the kind more desirable. It is alike useful to the man of letters, the man of business, the mechanic and the farmer. If it has not already, it deserves a wide and extensive circulation, as eminently suited to the peculiar wants of the people of this country. It is published by the proprietor, Judge Stryker, No. 520 Chestnut Street.

GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—The proceedings of the Board at their Stated Annual Meeting in June 1849.

We have received this Journal, printed in very attractive form, and learn from it that during the last year, there were 58 students, 24 of whom graduated. Notwithstanding the fact that there has been a falling off in the number of Theological Students, not only in the Church, but among all denominations in the country, the accession to the Seminary this year is as large as usual. The Report of the Dean for the last year concludes in these words:

"The undersigned desires to put on record here, what he has had occasion to say publicly elsewhere, that in his deliberate judgment, the internal condition of the Seminary has never been so sound, since he has known it, as it is at the present time; or that the students have never been more diligent in attention to their studies and other duties, nor more dutiful and deferential to legitimate authority."

TWENTY-FOURTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOARD OF MANAGERS OF THE PRISON DISCIPLINE SOCIETY, BOSTON.

THE PENNSYLVANIA JOURNAL OF PRISON DISCIPLINE AND PHILANTHROPY.—Published quarterly under the direction of "the Philadelphia Society for alleviating the miseries of Public Prisons," instituted 1847.

We have received these interesting journals relating to a charity interesting to every follower of Him, who shall say in the last day, "I was sick and in prison and ye visited me."

A proper notice of them, would occupy more space than we can now give, but as they relate to a subject in which we feel much interest, we shall give them further attention.

THE VALUE OF RELIGION.

If religion did possess sincerely and sufficiently the hearts of all men, these could need no other restraint from evil. This doth not only give life and perfection to all endeavours, where-with it concurrereth; but what event soever ensue, it breedeth, if not joy and gladness always, yet always patience, satisfaction, and reasonable contentment of mind. Wherefore it hath been set down as an axiom of good experience, that all things religiously taken in hand are prosperously ended; (Psalm i. 3;) because whether men in the end have that which religion did allow them to desire, or that which it teacheth them contentedly to suffer, they are in either event unfortunate.—HOOKER.

God knows us better than we know ourselves; and sees better than we can which is the surest path to happiness—whether through the enjoyments or through the troubles of life. If He appoints the latter, we may be assured that, however rugged the way may be, it is the right way, and the same hand which puts us in it, will support us in it, if we will follow and rely upon Him: the good Christian follows it with cheerfulness; and under the same guidance, which led the holy children through the fiery furnace unscorched, he walks steady and superior through afflictions, because God and his Redeemer are his support, and "his heart is fixed where true joys are to be found."—DR. STEBBING.

THE CATHOLIC FAITH.—Since the whole Church in all ages is but one, it can have but one faith; and that cannot be one faith, which has not been the faith of the whole Church.—DEAN SHERLOCK.

THE OBJECT OF PREACHING.—John did not preach so much to please as to profit. He chose rather to discover men's sins, than to show his own eloquence. That is the best looking-glass, not which is most gilded, but which shows the truest face.

THE BELL OF THE FLOATING CHAPEL.

RECENTLY PRESENTED BY THE SUNDAY SCHOOLS OF CHRIST CHURCH PARISH.

BY THE REV. EDWARD C. JONES.

Ring out its peal, and as the cadence floats
Far o'er the azure waters, men shall pause,
While like an angel's tongue those silvery notes,
Speak to the heart of Jesus and his cause,
Invite to prayer, and Zion's holy strain,
And welcome to the fold poor wanderers of the main.

Ring out its peal, 'twill tell of children's love,
Tell of the generous warmth which fills the breast,
The glow of feeling kindled from above,
Ere the young soul by earth has been possessed:
Yes, let its changes wake the sleeping air,
While rugged seamen weep, and think who placed it there.

List to its voice—at first the gentle swell,
Then the full burst so joyous and so clear,
Ah, how it speaks of Heaven—that thrilling bell,
Until the inmost spirit wakes to hear;
While he who tosses on the briny sea,
Feels in his heart—that bell is calling me.

Sons of the Church! shall childhood bring its gift,
And will ye not be roused to double life?
Yes, pour the offering with unstinted hand,
Here be competitors—'tis holy strife;
Give—give the Gospel—can ye heed the cost?
When ye yourselves are safe—can ye forget the lost?

Chime on sweet bell, may thousands heed thy call,
Turn from the spoiler's path, and weep for sin,
Then strong in Faith before the footstool fall,
Invoking grace the victor crown to win;
And when the sailor's latest hour has sped,
Strike on his ear once more; and tell of "land ahead."

FREE CHURCHES.

In the Banner of last week, the leading editorial article states that "there is not a single City Mission Church in Philadelphia. There are two or three Missionaries laboring in this vast field. But they have no place to which they may invite the poor, and say Come, without money, and without price. We venture no rash assertion when we say that there are thousands in this very city, who spend the Lord's day in that idleness which too often leads to vice, because they have no place where they feel they can go without intrusion, to worship Almighty God. The floating church is the only exception, and that is filled to overflowing."

Now, Mr. Editor, I hope that you will allow me room to correct the erroneous impression that may be created by the foregoing paragraph. It is, or ought to be, a well known fact, that for ten years past, or thereabouts, St. John's Church, Northern Liberties, has been a free church. During that period its doors have been open to ALL who desired to worship there; and all proper measures have been taken by the Rector and Vestry to inform the people of Philadelphia that there was a house of God where rich and poor alike could freely enjoy the ministrations of the Sanctuary without being compelled to purchase or hire the right, and without becoming intruders on the property of others. This circumstance has been well known to the clergy and to many of the laity in this city; and to the shame of some of them be it said,—they have not only not given their good influence to this undertaking, but have used strenuous efforts to compel its abandonment. Others, rightly valuing a return to primitive practices, have freely given their blessing and aid.

Until St. John's is filled with devout worshippers,—and there is yet abundant space for many more,—let it not be said that the church in Philadelphia does not offer accommodations to the poor, without money and without price. For at St. John's, at least, they will not intrude, but be gladly welcomed.

"THE KING'S MESSENGERS."

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

Among the many excellent and instructive little books which have been published by the "General Protestant Episcopal Sunday School Union," there is not one, of the same class, which I have read with more satisfaction, and I would even hope with profit—than the beautiful Allegory, "The King's Messengers."

The object of it is to excite sympathy for the poor, and to commend the much neglected, but most excellent duty, Christian charity. It is written in the style of an Allegory, yet its teaching is so plain, so upon its surface, that it cannot be overlooked or mistaken by the most superficial reader.

In the Christian code there is no duty more prominently set forth, nor more enjoined by our Divine Lawgiver, than that of ministering to the necessities of the poor. He that feedeth the hungry, feedeth Me. He that visiteth the sick, visiteth Me. He who giveth even a cup of cold water in My name, shall in no wise lose his reward. They who do these things shall be admitted into the Kingdom of His Father, in that day when He shall divide the good from the bad, and assign to each their everlasting portion.

* Published by the "General Protestant Episcopal Sunday School Union," Daniel Dana, Jr., Agent, 20 John street, New York. For sale by R. S. H. George, 16 South Seventh street, Philadelphia.

This duty of charity, although required by such authority, and stimulated by such incentives, is nevertheless, more indifferently performed, as I believe, than almost any other Christian virtue.

If we had a proper sense of that Divine precept and injunction, "whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them;" and if the responsibilities of the stewardship committed to those on whom our Heavenly Father has bestowed wealth, that they might show their gratitude to Him, by dispensing it to those who have need, were more fully realized, how much of human suffering would be relieved; how many who are now destitute and in misery, would be sought out, be clothed and fed, be comforted and consoled.

They, who having the ability thus to minister to their fellow-creatures, do it in the name of Him who left his command that it be done as His legacy to the poor, will hereafter find written against their names in the volume of His will, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye have done it unto Me. And these shall go away into life eternal."

The little book which has elicited these remarks, and which I commend to all your readers, professes to relate the history of four brothers, whose father has just received the mandate of the Great King to leave his possessions, and give an account to Him who alone "giveth power to get wealth," of the use he had made of the treasures committed to his charge.

I will not, however, impose upon you any more words of mine, but proceed to my purpose, which is to give you the following extract from the work before me.

In the city of Metoccia dwelt four brothers, Philargyr, Megailles, Euprepes, and Sophren. At the period at which I commence their history, the sentence of exile had lately been pronounced against their father. He had been a merchant of enormous wealth; and as, in accordance with the law, he was allowed to take nothing for his own wants, the whole of his vast possessions had fallen into the hands of his children. They had met in order to divide them. The room in which they assembled for this purpose was filled with the most costly furniture. The floor was covered with cloth of gold, which was now partially concealed by bales of yet more valuable merchandize, and heaps of precious stones, which had been placed there, to await the choice of the brothers. Two sides of the apartment were hung with the most gorgeous tapestry; on the third was a window commanding an extensive view towards the west, while the wall opposite to the window was entirely covered by a spacious mirror, which reflected the various objects in the room itself and the street beyond.

But, in the midst of all this external splendor, a cloud sat on the countenance of each of the brothers. The departure of their father was too recent to allow them to forget the transitory character of the treasures which they were about to share. Let a few years pass, and each in his turn would be compelled to leave them, and go forth without money, without home, and without friends, into the dreary desert that lay around the city.

It was these thoughts which rendered them sad. They had never before felt the full burthen of the law of exile; they had been aware of its existence, for no citizen could be ignorant of it; but hitherto they had seen it, as it were, in the distance. It now seemed to meet them directly in their own path, and to force itself on their attention; so that the eldest brother did but echo the feelings of the rest when he said, "Of what profit is this enormous wealth? In the day of our banishment it will not purchase for us the delay of a single hour. How gladly would I barter the whole of it for some quiet dwelling-place, where we might remain in security for ever!"

He had not yet finished when his eyes were attracted by the mirror, which I have described as covering one side of the room. Some image appeared to be moving across it, which was not visible in the apartment itself. He pointed it out to his brothers, and it was clear from their anxious looks that they beheld it also. It was as the form of an old man. There was nothing in his appearance to excite terror, but every object as seen in the mirror was changed by his presence. His feet trod on the cloth of gold, and it became mouldering and worm eaten: the hem of his garment swept against a table of solid ivory, and it fell crumbling into dust: while the bales of merchandize and precious stones lost their richness and splendour, as his cold eye rested upon them. The brothers watched these signs with a sensation of chilling fear, and the eldest already repented his hasty words. For, in truth, in his inmost heart, he deeply loved the glittering wealth, and he was afraid lest the mysterious stranger might take it away, and give him in its stead the quiet dwelling for which he had asked.

At length it seemed to them that the image of the old man thus addressed them:—"Children, your wish is vain. You must not speak of bartering these treasures for a lasting home. They are not really yours; they belong to the Great King, whose subjects you are. Restore them to Him now, and he will keep them for you, and in the day of your exile give them to you again. In this city they are worthless. See how even my slightest touch causes them to decay. But in the King's palace they become incorruptible. I have no power over them there."

The brothers were yet more troubled at his words. They knew well that all the riches of Metoccia belonged to the Great King; but they were disquieted at the thought of restoring them to Him again. A vague fear arose that the sentence of exile was about to be pronounced against themselves; and all, in some degree shared the apprehensions of Philargyr. The old man appeared to read their thoughts, and thus replied to them:—

"Fear not; I am not now come to deprive you of your wealth. Hereafter, indeed, I shall return with the regal mandate, but in that hour you will both see and feel that I am near. To-day my voice comes to you from a distance, and it is but my reflected image that you behold. Yet I bear you a message from the Great King. You have wished to purchase for yourselves a lasting home; I have said that you cannot purchase it, because your riches are not your own; they belong to the Great King. You must trust them freely to his Messengers, without asking for a return; and he will store them up for you in his own palace; and when you are driven from home, will suffer you to dwell with his children in a Glorious City where the law of exile is unknown.

"But beware lest you neglect this warning, and defraud the Great King of the riches committed to your trust; for if you refuse to give them to his Messengers, and either hoard them up or spend them on yourselves, you will have no treasures laid up for you in the Regal Palace, and the gates of the Glorious City will be closed against you for ever."

Now, there was nothing really new to the merchants in the old man's warning. The royal offers of pardon, and the dangers of the neglect of them, were well known in the city. But the inhabitants seldom spoke of them to one another, because they loved their riches, and were unwilling to render obedience to the King's commands. The brothers had hitherto shared in the general feeling; and it was, perhaps, only because the remembrance of their father's departure was weighing heavily upon them, that they had so long listened to the voice which now addressed them. It did not, indeed, seem to pass through their ears at all, but to fall at once inwardly in their hearts, and for the present they could not help regarding it. Yet all shrunk from asking in what way they were to send their treasures to the Regal Palace. They were not, however, left in doubt. The reflection of the street in which their house stood, was, as I have said, visible in the mirror. The figure of the old man pointed towards it; and as he did so, the young merchants heard distinctly the words, "Behold the Messengers of the Great King."

They followed the direction of his finger, and it seemed to them that the approach to their luxurious dwelling was now crowded with every form of disease and want. The poor, the maimed, and the blind were there. Men who seemed stimulated to madness by famine, and little infants who could scarce crawl upon the ground, formed part of the same vast concourse. Still, as the old man pointed, their numbers went on increasing in every direction, until, as far as the eye could reach, every sign of wealth and luxury had disappeared, and in their stead was one universal scene of misery. Presently the shrieks of the dying, the cries of orphans, and the wailing of widows, rose in the air; and then, out of the tumult, the low solemn voice of the old man fell once more on the hearts of the brothers.

"These," he said, "and such as these are the Messengers of the Great King. Numerous as they are, they will come to you in secret, and one by one. Trust them with your treasure, and it will be safe; they will bear it for you to the Regal Palace. The journey thither is long and dangerous; but if you are sincere in your wish to send it, the Great King will not suffer it to be lost. Only do not cause them to linger needlessly within the city walls; and let their departure be secret, lest the King's enemies should impede them on the way."

The form of the old man gradually disappeared as he ceased speaking; and the signs of his presence passed away; the ivory table, the cloth of gold, and the heaps of precious stones, resumed the beauty and splendour which they had lost. The brothers once more breathed freely. Hitherto their eyes had been riveted by a kind of fascination on the mirror. They now looked anxiously around the apartment itself; but it had undergone no change. If the old man had trodden upon it, not one trace of his footsteps had been left. They then turned their eyes towards the window. The street presented its usual appearance; there was the busy throng hurrying hither and thither, and splendid equipages, and wagons laden with merchandize. But they saw nothing to remind them of the view presented by the mirror, save some few beggars who chanced to linger at their door. As Philargyr threw open the sash to inhale the fresh air, they eagerly asked the young merchants for alms; and there was not one who at that moment could refuse to give them; for the words of the stranger were fresh in their memory, and they felt every poor man to be a Messenger from the Great King.

Should the foregoing extract obtain your favour, Mr. Editor, as I certainly think it will command the approbation of your readers, I may possibly send you a further extract from the same work.

THE "STOOP" OF A HOUSE.

MR. EDITOR:—

Will you admit into your valuable paper a small piece on a small point of nomenclature? It may be a respite for the minds of your investigating readers from the tension of theology.

A stooping house is unsightly, and the deformity may betoken its speedy fall, and so make it dangerous to inmates and visitors. But the "Stoor" of a house is a very different entity, as some of our Banner friends may know by report; though to many of them this word, in the meaning here intended, may be a novel utterance. The "Stoop" of a house is always in place, and always in the right place and the due position; which is more than can be said of all things, or of all men. Sometimes it is a handsome handiwork; and at plainest, it has the good appearance of congruity and obvious utility. And instead of forbidding approach by indicating peril, it invites all who wish to enter the house, and makes their ingress easy and respectable,—no jumping or climbing. It may be flat or elevated, lowly or lofty, humble or ostentatious, a few bricks duly laid, a flag-stone, a wooden platform, a marble structure, or one from the lapicide, carved or unchiseled, with seats or without them, railed at the side or open,—still the genus is one,—whatever the variety, you there behold a "Stoop"—not when most fanciful aspiring above its condition, and as little 'stooping' below it. A very accurate thing, though infinitely diversified is a "Stoop."

Conversing once on small matters with a friend, he inquired of me the authority for the use of this term in the sense here given it; and to gratify him, I scribbled, according to my poor information, the following memorandum. There may possibly be others, to whom a glance at the petty document will not be unacceptable.

The word "Stoop" is constantly used in New York for the step or steps at the front or back door of a house,—the stoop, "the front stoop," "the back stoop." The diphthong is pronounced short, as in "foot;" not long, as in the verb "to stoop," and its noun: if marked for pronunciation according to Walker, it would have, like "foot," his third sound of u, as in bull. It is thus a distinct word from "stoop" in the ordinary sense.

Being a New York (and probably East Jersey) expression, it is naturally traced to the Low Dutch language. And in W. Sewel's Dictionary, (Amsterdam, 1749,) the word "Stoop" is defined, "The stones or pavement before the threshold; the steps at the entrance of a house;" also, the phrase "Een hooge stoep" [a high stoop] is explained, "A masonry of several steps raised before the door of a house." New York, therefore, has the authority of its first mother-tongue for its use of the word "Stoop." The Dictionary (p. 33,) says that the Dutch "OE" is pronounced as OO in English. For the English word "step" it gives "stap," &c., not "stoep."

Nor is this word "Stoop" (perhaps it were better written "Stoep," the oe sounding much as in canoe and shoe, a superfluity in our language. The accommodations for the entrance and the exit of a house require a specific designation. To call them "steps" is vague; any two or three steps within the house, any such rise under the dignity of stairs, is so termed; but the "Stoop" is an affair of itself, and a very important one. And to apply to the convenience for entrance or exit the word "porch," is to claim for it a grandeur unknown to ninety-nine houses in a hundred,—the grandeur of "a roof supported by pillars before a door,"—all this, when the word is not applied to the mere "entrance" or door-way: the name is too large to fit. The one appellation is scant and slender, the other, magniloquent; and I believe there is no other in general or wide use. Why not adopt fully, then, the word "Stoop," in the sense here noted? It comes from a language kindred with ours, and which has already furnished us with nouns and verbs. And it has prescription of some two centuries in the now largest city in our land. Not a few French words have been adopted for less cause. I am not partial, indeed, to the naturalization of alien terms, when "the well of English undefiled" can supply an equivalent; but we have no really equivalent appellation for the thing meant by the Dutch word "Stoop," and the New Netherlands word "Stoep."

The Dutch Dictionary mentioned descended to me with my name, but I do not understand the language.

I do not remember to have heard the expression before us applied to the entrance of a church. Such buildings were often arranged with the floor on a continuous gently rising level with the exterior site. Sometimes, churches have grand porticoes; sometimes, a handsome porch; not unfrequently there is a vestibule, an unequivocal vestibule: all which absorbing features engross the idea of steps. A special term, therefore, is seldom required. Few houses, however, have these adjuncts, while they nearly all have "Stoops." That word, beyond question, is wanted. And we may rightly accept it at the hands of the Knickerbockers.

Philadelphia, Nov. 1, 1849. Bishop Onderdonk.

WILBERFORCE ON THE INCARNATION.

MR. EDITOR:—

In the Banner of the 20th ult., there are "A few observations" of your correspondent "O." upon the above work. A number of engagements has prevented my noticing these "observations" until now.

I. "O." appears not to believe in the "actual existence of human nature," or "the reality of human nature, as a thing existing in the external world," (p. 48, Inc. of Christ,) for he says: "to give what is called human nature its hyperbolic effectiveness in the Christian economy, all these things are predicated of it," &c. Accordingly, "O." has started divers objections to the doctrine, and used some argument to show, that the term "organization," as applied to the subject, is "utterly, mournfully visionary!"

It is no part of our intention to notice these objections of "O." nor the arguments adduced, because we find this very doctrine of the reality of human nature broadly laid down, and recognised as an existing fact in the Scriptures, and, being found there, all objections and all opposing arguments are shut out. Upon this point Mr. Wilberforce remarks: "But, for the proof that men are really associated by this inexplicable law, we can refer only to Holy Scripture, as being the sole document, which professes to give us an authoritative explanation of man's nature. Now, to what purpose is the history of the race traced to its earliest origin, unless its fortunes were regarded as a whole, and it must stand, or fall, together? Again, what means the statement, that 'by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin,' unless there be some real connection between the sons of men, whereby the acts of one affect another? For the Apostle expressly observes, that his statement is not confined to those whose voluntary acts might have been imitations of their predecessor. This explanation might, perhaps, be alleged as a ground for the sinfulness of responsible agents. But, are not sin and death inseparably united? And how, then, do we account for the sufferings and death of unconscious infants? 'Nevertheless, death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over those that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression.' Again, the same truth is alluded to, when the Apostle tells us, that 'as I may so say, Levi also, who received tithes, paid tithes in Abraham. For he was yet in the loins of his father when Melchisedec met him.' The introduction shows, indeed, that the statement is used in the way of illustration. Yet, there must be a reality which it is intended to illustrate. That reality lies in the actual connection, by which the parties described were bound together. Had there been no such actual connection, the expression had been forced and hyperbolic. The use of so strong a term shows that we are dealing with the case of things which are not only associated together so that we can refer them to the same class, but which are united by some actual bond to one another. There is set before us the case of a great family, commencing from the earliest period of recorded time, and extending throughout all portions of the earth. It has an actual reference to one common ancestor, and its connection is analogous to that interdependency of structure which unites the different portions of an organic agent into a co-ordinate whole. Now, into this family it was that Christ our Lord was pleased to enter. When He took man's nature, He vouchsafed to ally Himself to all members of this extended series, by the actual adoption of that transmitted Being which related Him to the rest. He not only became like men and dwelt among them, but He became man itself—an actual descendant from their first progenitor. He was made man." (pp. 53-4.)

And again, "What Christ associated to Himself, therefore, was no individual man, but that common nature, of which Adam was the first example. 'It was not any human person in particular,' says Bishop Beveridge, 'but the human nature which He assumed into His sacred Person.' 'The word' (saith St. John) 'was made flesh and dwelt in us.' The Evangelist useth the plural number, men for manhood, us for the nature whereof we consist, even as the Apostle, denying the assumption of angelical nature, saith likewise in the plural number, 'He took not angels, but the seed of Abraham.' It pleased not the Word or Wisdom of God to take to itself some one person amongst men, for then should that one have been advanced which was assumed, and no more; but Wisdom, to the end that she might save many, built her house of that Nature which is common unto all—she made not this or that man her habitation, but dwelt in us. The seeds of herbs and plants, at the first, are not in act, but in possibility, that which they afterwards grow to be. If the Son of God had taken to Himself a man now made and already perfected, it would of necessity follow, that there are in Christ two persons, the one assuming, and the other assumed; whereas, the Son of God did not assume a man-person unto His Own, but a man's Nature to His Own Person, and therefore took semen, the seed of Abraham, the very first original element of our Nature, before it was come to have any personal subsistence." (pp. 56-7.)

To this may be added the testimony of our own Church. The Collect for Christmas-day directs us to pray: "Almighty God, Who hast given us Thy only begotten Son to take our Nature upon Him," &c.

The Collect, for the 4th Sunday after the Epiphany, thus: "O God, Who knowest us to be set in the midst of so many and great dangers, that by reason of the frailty of our Nature," &c.

The Collect for the 1st Sunday after Trinity: "through the weakness of our mortal Nature," &c.

Art. IV. "Pertaining to the perfection of man's Nature," &c.

Art. IX. "The fault and corruption of the Nature of every man"—"And, this infection of Nature doth remain," &c.

Such being then the testimony, both of the Scriptures and of the Church, to the reality of Human Nature, it is conclusive against any difficulties or objections, however ingeniously they may be urged. This Human Nature, therefore, being the common property of all mankind, (the whole undivided substance being possessed by each member of the human race) it follows, that there is a community of Nature among mankind; and, whether we call this community of Nature an 'organization,' or a 'consubstantiation,' (for we must use words, however imperfectly, to avoid the concealment of truth,) it matters not, so long as the thing itself is really held and certainly believed.

II. "O." says, "Organization and consubstantiality, however, are predicated of 'human nature,' to give form and stamp to the theory of an interwoven quasi-aural connection, through that 'nature' between Christ and men; more crudely, 'God-head entered manhood, that it might leaven the whole lump'—the lump of manhood, (250.) This leading notion of the reintegration of 'human nature' is the key to Mr. W.'s book."

But this doctrine "O." repudiates. He says, "The doctrine of the Incarnation is one thing: that its benefits come to us through the pervasive 'organized' action of the 'entity' of Christ's divinized 'human nature,' is another thing. The one is vital, the other visionary."

We shall now permit Mr. Wilberforce to speak for himself: "That exhaustless grace which was to be the principle of life to the whole renewed family, had its fountain and well-head in the manhood of the Son of God, before it was portioned out to the innumerable generations of His spiritual progeny. And thus 'being made perfect, He became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey Him.' To this end was His man's nature so sorely exercised, that it might be the seed of life to all His members. So much He Himself tells us respecting His human nature, declaring that He purified it, that it might be a fit source of grace for all men: 'For their sakes I sanctify myself, that they also might be sanctified through the truth.' And this sanctifying truth is no other than that Divine Being, Who applies the virtue of His own manhood to His servants: 'Sanctify them through Thy truth, Thy Word is truth.' So that by union with His humanity does He bestow upon all the members, in their degree, that which pertains perfectly to the Head of the body by nature. As St. Athanasius expresses it, the Eternal Word was not weakened by taking a body, as though for Himself He needed to receive grace, but rather He deified that which He put on—nay, He graciously bestowed it upon the family of men.' Thus did His humanity become 'the leaven of the whole lump,' that through itself it might 'sanctify the whole race of men.'" (pp. 235-6.)

And again, "Thus, then, was there 'one Mediator between God and men, the Man Christ Jesus.' There was one common Bond, by which these two infinitely distant parties might be united. And this common term of union, required to be truly and really joined to each of the extremes, which it was to couple to one another. It was truly joined to Godhead by that Personal union whereby Christ our Lord was very God of very God. The very nature of Godhead—whole God—was in the Person of the Son of Mary united to our flesh. 'God was manifest in the flesh.' All glory, purity, perfection, power, of which Godhead could not be emptied, were enshrined in a human frame. Thus was there sown a seed of life and immortality, which was to interpenetrate and pervade the whole Nature of mankind." (Pp. 318-19.)

Upon this vitally important point, then, Mr. Wilberforce and "O." are fairly at issue: Mr. W. declaring it to be Scriptural truth, whilst "O." pronounces it 'visionary.' Now it is obvious that, in this question, everything depends upon the character of the union which exists between Christ and the believer; because, if that union exist in an actual incorporation of the Human Nature into that of Christ, it is manifest that that Nature must partake of the Life which is an essential property of His; and thus it will prove true, as St. Paul asserts, that the "second Adam was a quickening (or life-giving) Spirit," through Whom our birth in the first Adam is corrected and replaced by our birth of God in Christ.

In this, no more than in the former case, is it our intention to answer the objections which "O." has urged against this doctrine, because, if the Scriptures plainly declare it, objections have no weight.

For our Nature to be incorporated into Christ, so that it becomes actually one with His Body, it must be in Him. Now, how is our Nature in Christ? By what means has it become in Him?

Mr. Wilberforce says: "We are told in plain and indubitable terms that Baptism and the Lord's Supper are the means by which men are joined to the body of Christ, and therefore by which Christ our Lord joins Himself to that renewed race, of which He has become the Head. So that, as St. Leo expresses it, 'He that is received by Christ, and that receives Christ, is not the same after the laver of Baptism as he was before it, because the body of the regenerate person becomes the flesh of the crucified One.' Now, these facts we learn from the express statements of St. Paul, 'For, by one Spirit are we all baptized into one Body.' And again, 'We, being many, are one bread and one Body, for we are all partakers of that one bread.' Herein, it is expressly declared, that the one and the other of these Sacraments are the peculiar means by which union with the Body of Christ is bestowed upon men. They are the 'joints and bands' whereby the whole Body, in its dependence on its Head has nourishment ministered. So that it is in the Church that union takes place with Christ, the new Adam, or Representative of our race; and it is by this actual union with the new Adam that the whole family of renewed men have that collective being, whereby is derived to them their spiritual life." (pp. 314-15.)

St. Paul says, "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus." (Gal. iii. 27, 28.) Several things are here apparent: 1st. When we are baptized, we are baptized into Christ; 2d. To be baptized into Christ is to put on Christ; 3d. To put on Christ is to be in Christ; 4th. Those who are thus in Christ are made members of His mystical Body, where all distinctions of nation, sex, or circumstances are so completely obliterated that 'in Him' they become one being (115).

Obituary.

The summer now passed has brought sadness every where to human hearts. And the deadly arrows still are falling, with unusual force and frequency. In our own immediate circle, two most estimable ladies have left vacancies which never can be filled. Mrs. WALLACE, the widow of the late John B. Wallace, Esq. was a Christian lady of surpassing excellence, of the elder courtesy and hospitality, of singular intellectual powers and attainments, and a Churchwoman of the true sterling stamp. Miss MARTEL, well known by the vast circle, which revolves about the venerable Mrs. Bradford, whose constant companion and friend she had been for more than thirty years, was originally of the Church of Rome; and, for "the truth as it is in Jesus," gave up her country, home and friends. She was constant in her friendship, unwearied in charity, and of exemplary devotion to the Church of her choice and of her confidence. The Honorable Judge FORB, long a pillar and ornament of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, was, for seventy years, a Presbyterian. A thorough examination of the claims of the Church, by a mind accustomed to the closest scrutiny, and the most impartial decision, brought him to her altars, and kept him steadfast in her faith. The Honorable DAVID B. OGDEN, a Jerseyman, by birth and education, and in affection, had long been among the leaders of the New York bar; and foremost of the Counsellors of that diocese, in the General as well, as in the Diocesan Convention. A nobler soul beat not in a tenderer breast. The Rev. JOHN CROES, son of the Venerable Bishop Croes, held for many years some of the chief trusts and highest offices of the diocese. And, now more recently, JOHN PORTER, Esq., the founder and munificent patron of Trinity Church, Princeton, has entered into his rest, at the patriarchal age of eighty-five. A man of singular enterprise, of unblemished integrity, and of the kindest affections. He was buried, from Morven, the residence of his son-in-law, Commodore Stockton, on the 27th day of October; the Bishop of the diocese, and the Rev. Mr. Patterson, the Rector of the parish, performing the service. A gathering of leading Jersey-men, from every part of the State, attested the estimation in which he was held, as a worthy citizen, and as a chief promoter of public works, which are a blessing and an honor to the State.—Missionary.

Died at Geneva, N. Y., on the 23d, ult., DAVID B. DOUGLASS, Esq., LL. D. Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in Geneva College. On taking his first degree at Yale, in 1813, he joined the army as lieutenant of engineers, and won distinction at Lundy's Lane and Fort Erie. After the war, he took a leading part in reorganizing the Military Academy, and remained a professor there until 1830, since which he has been extensively employed in civil engineering on some of the principal works in the United States, and was for several years acting President of Kenyon College. He prepared the plans and estimates of the Croton Aqueduct. He was a gentleman of great worth, of polished manners, and sincere piety, and his death is sincerely mourned by many kindred minds.

PASTORAL LETTER.

To the Clergy and Congregations of the Diocese of Pennsylvania:

DEAR BRETHREN:—At the last annual meeting of the General Board of Missions of our Church, resolutions were unanimously passed, recommending the FIRST SUNDAY IN ADVENT as a proper time for receiving offerings in behalf of Domestic Missions, and the FIRST SUNDAY AFTER EPIPHANY for contributions in behalf of Foreign Missions. I ask the special attention of the Clergy and Laity of this Diocese to these recommendations. The claims of both departments are sacred and urgent. The expenses of the Board have recently been much reduced; but the sum still due to missionaries in the Domestic field is deplorably large, and winter, with its increased hardships and expenditure, is at hand. A united and earnest effort made now, will acquit the Church of its obligations for the past and present year, and will be a source of inexpressible relief both to the Committees and to their Missionaries. The subscriber will not permit himself to doubt that, in this Diocese, that effort will be made.

He would add, that it is his intention to issue soon a Pastoral Letter, recommending stated and simultaneous efforts on behalf of the several charities, General and Diocesan, to which the Church stands expressly pledged; and he hopes to suggest a plan which will secure general approbation and co-operation, and be permanent. A part of this plan will be the designation in each year of the Sundays above named for considering the claims of Domestic and Foreign Missions. So much of this plan, therefore, he now recommends for immediate adoption.

In cases where the existing arrangements of a parish do not admit of collections being publicly made in church the present year, on the days and for the purposes just specified, the undersigned would still recommend that on the first Sunday in Advent the attention of the congregation be distinctly called, by a sermon or address, to the claims of Domestic Missions; and in like manner, on the first Sunday after Epiphany, to the claims of Foreign Missions. TO DO GOOD AND TO DISTRIBUTE, FORGET NOT, FOR WITH SUCH SACRIFICES GOD IS WELL PLEASED.

ALONZO POTTER,

Phila., Nov. 12th, 1849.

Bishop of the Diocese.

NEW JERSEY.

On Sunday evening, 11th inst. (twenty-third after Trinity,) in Trinity Church, Princeton, the Rector, the Rev. Mr. Patterson, read prayers, and the Bishop preached and confirmed nine persons.

MR. EDITOR:—Will you allow me through the medium of your columns, to present to the sympathies of Churchmen of Philadelphia and elsewhere, the case of St. Paul's Church, Paterson, New Jersey. Some sixteen months ago, it pleased the Almighty to permit the edifice in which we worshipped, and which recently had been much enlarged, to be destroyed by fire. At the same time also, one of our most worthy and efficient members, perished in the ruins. Undismayed however, by this double calamity, we resolved to rebuild, and by God's grace, succeeded so far, that the walls of a neat and commodious stone church were erected; and we fondly hoped that in no long time the entire building would be completed. But the measure of our affliction was not as yet full. In the violent storm which happened during the past week, the entire front of the edifice was blown down, and the labor and expense of many days rendered, in a moment, utterly fruitless. Under these circumstances, will not our more prosperous brethren do something in our behalf? I am aware that the sympathies of the Churchmen of New York are so often appealed to, that they run the risk of being somewhat blunted. But ours is really a peculiar case. We have here a large manufacturing population, many of them English by birth, and who are baptized members of our Church. For their sakes, the Vestry determined that when the Church was restored, it should be unincumbered by debt, and upon the free system; and so become in reality the poor man's home. But now, after our second misfortune, we hardly know which way to turn. To stop, would be unfaithful to God and his Church; to proceed at the hazard of incurring a debt, would violate the terms of all our previous contributions and donations. The fire left us with nothing save our lot. The moneys which we have collected, would hardly have sufficed for enclosing the building under the most favorable auspices, and are of course now utterly inadequate. We seek aid therefore, not only for ourselves, but also for the Church's poor; believing that to such who give, the Saviour will strictly apply, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." It will require about four thousand dollars of additional aid to fit the building for consecration.

Any donations will be thankfully received by Messrs. Stanford and Swords, Broadway; or by

J. ELLIOT THOMPSON,

Rector of St. Paul's, Paterson, New Jersey.

DIOCESE OF NEW YORK.

The Rt. Rev. the Bishop of New Hampshire reached New York on Thursday the 1st inst., to enter on the performance of Episcopal duties in the Diocese, under the invitation of the Standing Committee.

On Friday, the 2nd, in the presence of three presbyters, at the request of the Standing Committee, he displaced from the Sacred Ministry, Richard C. Shimeall, Presbyter, who had declared his renunciation of the Ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and his design not to officiate in future in any of the offices thereof, which declaration had been duly recorded.

On Saturday, the 3d, the Bishop left the city for Monticello, Sullivan county, where he officiated in St. John's Church, twice on Sunday, the 4th, in the presence of very large and attentive congregations. The rite of confirmation was administered in the morning to 15 persons, and the Lord's Supper celebrated. This occasion was one of deep interest to the faithful and self-denying Rector and his zealous flock. Six years had passed since they had been gladdened and refreshed by the presence of a Right Reverend Father, and enjoyed the benefits of his counsels and prayers. Warm was the Bishop's welcome—and lasting we trust will be the effects of the impressive services of the day.

The Bishop returned to New York on Wednesday morning, for a visitation of several of the parishes in Westchester county, beginning at Peekskill.

It is expected the Bishop will consecrate the following Churches during his visitation: St. James's, Newtown, L. I., Nov. 15th; All Angels, Eighty-fifth Street, between the 7th and 8th Avenues, near the Upper Reservoir, New York, Dec. 1; St. George's, Stuyvesant Square, New York, Dec. 4; Christ Church, North Brooklyn, Dec. 6.

John Frederick Schroeder, Jr. A. B., of Columbia College, has been admitted a Candidate for Holy Orders in this Diocese. The Rev. T. Jarvis Carter, and the Rev. Charles Reynolds, Deacons, have been recommended for admission into the Priesthood.

A Letter Dimissory to the Diocese of Connecticut has been granted to the Rev. F. W. Coit, D.D.

Chas. King, Esq., late editor of the Courier, has been elected President of Columbia College, vice Dr. Moore, resigned.

We are happy to announce that the Rt. Rev. Bishop Southgate, with his family, arrived safely at this port, on Tuesday the 6th inst., in the steamship Washington, from Southampton.

The Governor has issued his proclamation for the observance of Thursday, 29th inst., as a day of Thanksgiving.

For the following summary of the Journal of the late Convention of New York, we are indebted to the New York Churchman.

We have received, from the excellent Secretary, the Journal of the late Convention, which makes a handsomely printed octavo pamphlet of 105 pages. Its publication at this early date is highly creditable. We published last week part of the elaborate and valuable Report of the Standing Committee, with the interesting statement of the services of the Bishop of Maryland. The Diocese has been much indebted thus far, during the oppressive sentence of its lawful Diocesan, to the kind and most satisfactory ministrations of the Bishops of Michigan, Western New York, Pennsylvania, and Maryland; and every true Churchman cannot but feel the deepest gratitude to those eminent prelates.

The report of the Committee, which we this week conclude on our first page, shows that they have performed their duty in the most faithful and efficient manner; and their re-election without the shadow of an opposition, in spite of a little verbal carping, shows most conclusively the high estimation in which their administration was regarded by their constituents.

The following summary of STATISTICS is appended to the Journal:

Number of Clergy present in the Convention, 151; absent 25. On the roll of the Convention, 176. Not entitled to seats, 71. Number of Clergy belonging to the Diocese, 247. Candidates for Orders, 35.

PARISHES.—Number of Churches and Chapels represented, 139; not represented, 57; entitled to representation, 196; not in union with the Convention, 8. Number of churches and chapels in the Diocese, 204.

Seven Churches were admitted into union at this Convention.

Ordinations—Deacons, 12; Priests, 11;—23

Churches—Corner-stones laid, 2; consecrated, 5.

The Rev. Thomas F. Fales has resigned the charge of St. Paul's Church, Brunswick, having accepted that of the new Church at Waltham, in Massachusetts. He has been succeeded at Brunswick by the Rev. Andrew Croswell.

On Sunday, the 28th ult., Mr. Fales took leave of his people, and administered the Holy Communion. In the afternoon of the same day, the Rev. Mr. Croswell read prayers and preached; and in the evening, the Bishop, who had during the day officiated at Bath, preached a sermon appropriate to the occasion, and confirmed two persons, who desired to add this proof of the fruitfulness of patient and affectionate labor on the part of their departing pastor.—Witness.

The following melancholy intelligence was received by Messrs. Tucker & Co., of the Tremont House, Boston. The unfortunate gentleman whose fate it records, was a son of Sir Thomas Strickland, Bart., of England. He had been travelling in this country about six months, in company with a younger brother, who had embarked for home in the steamer which left Boston a fortnight since, with the intention of returning here in a few months. The deceased brought letters of introduction of the most favorable character to several of our families, and had produced the impression of a gentleman of high cultivation, much devoted to literary and scientific pursuits, and of unexceptionable character.

MOUNT WASHINGTON HOUSE,
White Mountains, N. H., Oct. 21st, '49.

J. S. Tucker & Co.—Dear Sir:—An Englishman by the name of Frederick Strickland, who said he had been stopping at your house, came to the White Mountains, and arrived at the "Notch House," kept by Thomas J. Crawford, Thursday, the 18th inst. On the 19th he left the Notch House in company with another Englishman and a guide, to ascend the mountains. When they reached Mount Pleasant, the other gentleman wished to return, there being considerable snow on the mountains. He (Mr. Strickland) gave up his horse to the guide, and proceeded on foot for the summit of Mount Washington, intending to come down my bridle path. The guide and the other gentleman returned to Mr. Crawford's. Mr. Crawford sent the baggage of the gentleman who had ascended the mountain to my house, but as he did not come that night, I thought perhaps he returned to Mr. Crawford's. The next morning Mr. Crawford came along and inquired for him, I told him he was not here. We immediately started in search for him. We found his track on the mountain and followed that until night overtook us, but found only some parts of his clothes.—To-day we started in larger numbers, and about 10 o'clock found him dead. He missed the path and was lost. His body is here at my house,—I wish you to have a notice of the facts published in the papers; also if you learned anything of his friends while at your house, notify them of the facts. He was a tall, slim young man, some 25 or 30 years of age. Registers his name, Frederick Strickland, Alford Club, London. He had but little money with him after paying Mr. Crawford's bill at his house. Six dollars and twenty-seven cents was all. I presume he kept a deposit in Boston, in fact he told Mr. Crawford as much. I will see him decently buried to-morrow, in such a manner that he can be taken up if his friends wish it.

AMERICAN BIOGRAPHY

The life of Ashbel Green, V. D. M., begun to be written by himself in his Eighty-second Year, and continued to his Eighty-fourth. Prepared for the press at the Author's Request, by Joseph H. Jones, Pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. New York: Carter & Brothers.

It is a fortunate circumstance that the late venerable Dr. Green of Philadelphia left this full autobiographical volume. It exhibits to us the man more naturally, and with more of character than the most successful biographer could attain; and preserves to us many incidental anecdotes and recollections of his times, which are worthy to pass over to history, and which no biographer could have recalled. The general picture presented to us in this volume recalls the memoir of Dr. Milnor, of this city, published by the American Tract Society during the last season. Both go back to Revolutionary times; the families of each were of the same grade; they appear to have been at Philadelphia in similar scenes of the pestilence; their general attainments, moderation of character, clerical position, their participation in religious societies, with other traits, suggest a striking parallelism.

Dr. Green was born in 1762, of high-toned Puritan descent, at Hanover, N. J. His boyhood was, therefore, thrown among revolutionary scenes, both by his age and the locality—New Jersey affording its full quota of anecdotes of the war. At the close of his life, in his seventy-eighth year, Dr. Green recalled his recollections of these times in a series of letters to his son. They were afterwards interwoven with a continued autobiography, and form the most valuable and attractive portions of the present volume. They appear to us to be of the first importance, as historical materials, by their vivid presentation of the period, and undoubted accuracy. The public events are mingled with others of equal interest, in the development of the country, its finances, &c. Thus we have a brief notice, in connexion with the then new planet of Herschell, of

DR. RITTENHOUSE.

"This planet was discovered by Herschell, in the time of our revolutionary war, when we could have no direct communication with Britain. The first information in detail of this discovery came to the United States by way of France. Dr. Rittenhouse told me, that when he had obtained the French statement, he was able to point his telescope, so as to take the planet into its field without another movement; that at the first look his eye was on the planet. His familiar knowledge of the starry heavens was wonderful. Nor was this his only attainment. He was among the first astronomers, natural philosophers, mathematicians and mechanics of his age. Nothing in mechanics has, I believe, exceeded his orrery. Yet he was perhaps the most modest man I have ever known. He was one of my parishioners, and a regular attendant on public worship, as often as his feeble health would permit. I attended his funeral and spoke at the grave. The remains were deposited under the pavement of his observatory, in his garden. At the request of his widow, I furnished her with a copy of my address at his interment, a part of which I afterwards found was published in Rees's Cyclopædia; but not, I think, exactly as I wrote it."

There is more than ordinary minuteness in what is said of the Whig and Tory printers of New York:—

HOLT AND RIVINGTON.

"Holt's paper was headed with the picture of a snake, cut into thirteen distinct sections, and each section bearing upon it the name of one of the thirteen colonies, which then professed allegiance to the King of Great Britain. As soon as our independence was declared, all the sections of the snake disappeared, and his whole attitude was changed. His tail was brought round and inserted in his mouth, or placed by its side, and his whole body was formed into a regular circle, the head and the tail being at the top of the paper. This snake-picture made so deep an impression on my youthful memory, that I retain it very distinctly to the present hour. This paper of Holt's had great influence throughout the whole wide region of its circulation, and its editor was considered as a public benefactor. He and Rivington, of course, pelted each other incessantly and severely, each endeavoring to sustain his cause by all the facts and arguments he could muster, and by some falsehoods too. Rivington remained in the city of New York after it was abandoned by the American troops, and became king's printer during the whole of the ensuing war, and nothing could exceed the violence of his abuse of the rebels, as he delighted to call the Americans, and the contempt with which he affected to treat their army, and Mr. Washington its leader. It was, therefore, a matter of universal surprise, on the return of peace, that this most obnoxious man remained after the departure of the British troops. But the surprise soon ceased, by its becoming publicly known, that he had been a spy for General Washington, while employed in abusing him, and had imparted useful information, which could not otherwise have been obtained. He had, in foresight of the evacuation of New York by the British army, supplied himself from London with a large assortment of what are called the British classics, and other works of merit; so that, for some time after the conclusion of the war, he had the sale of these publications almost wholly to himself. Amongst others, I dealt with him pretty largely; and with nothing else to make me a favorite, the fulsome letters which he addressed to me were a real curiosity. He was the greatest sycophant imaginable; very little under the influence of any principle but self-interest, yet of the most courteous manners to all with whom he had intercourse. You, I believe, have read the two pieces of satire in which Dr. Witherspoon has gibbeted him and Benjamin Towns, another printer, who served the British while their army held Philadelphia, and remained there when they left the city."

A curious account of Washington's inoculation of the army for the small-pox, at Moristown, in 1777, is preserved, with some mention of the quartering of the officers and soldiers in that district, which proves that the warriors of the Revolution were much like other troops, and with Uncle Toby's battalions in Flanders, "swore terribly." A compliment to the ladies of the Revolution, is worthy the attention of Mrs. Ellet:—"I do believe that a known Tory, or a reputed coward, would have been hard set to find a reputable wife among the whole feminine community of our country, while our war with Great Britain continued." A statement is new to us (p. 87) that General Washington's face bore traces of the small-pox. A glimpse of Baron Steuben is highly imposing. The narrator, Dr. Green, was serving against Knyphausen's invasion of his native state:—"Here, for the first time, I saw the Baron de Steuben, the great and efficient disciplinarian of the American army. He rode up to our encampment, and requested to see our commanding officer. And never before or since have I had such an impression of the ancient fabled god of war, as when I then looked on the Baron; he seemed to me to be a perfect personification of Mars. The trappings of his horse, the enormous holsters of his pistols, his large size, and his strikingly martial aspect, all seemed to favor the idea." There are many remarks on incidental points, as Washington's want of resources, the cruelties of the war, the choice of Revolutionary office-holders, which will render this a work of standard historical reference.

To the militia scenes succeeded, in Dr. Green's life, a college course and tutorship at Nassau Hall, with recollections of the adjournment of Congress from Philadelphia to Princeton. He was subsequently Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick to preach in 1786, when he entered upon an associate pastoral charge in Philadelphia. We quote a few historical anecdotes of the period:—

A JEST OF WASHINGTON'S.

"It was the usage, while Washington was President of the United States, for the clergy of the city to go in a body to congratulate him on his birthday: and on these occasions he always appeared unusually cheerful. The last time we made such a call, which was about ten days before his retirement from office, he said with singular vivacity, 'Gentlemen, I feel the weight of years; I take a pair of sixes on my shoulders this day.' This great man was not in his proper element when he attempted a pleasant conceit. I never witnessed his making the attempt but on this occasion; and if his allusion, as I suppose must have been the case, was to the fifty-sixes used in weighing heavy articles, it was surely far-fetched, and not very obvious. He entered his sixty-sixth year at this time."

RHODE ISLAND ANTI-COMMERCIAL.

"Congress had in vain endeavored to persuade the several States to cede to that body the exclusive right of raising a revenue by a tariff on importations. It was manifest that unanimity in this matter was essential; since a free port in any one State of the Union would render the whole plan abortive. Rhode Island incurred much censure by an obstinate refusal to make the requisite concession. A merchant said in my hearing, that when a stranger wished to be introduced to him, he asked at once—'Are you, sir, from Rhode Island?' and if the answer was affirmative, he refused to take him by the hand, or to have any intercourse with him—an extreme case, certainly, but marking a feeling in which many, in different degrees, participated."

A TITLE FOR THE PRESIDENT.

"At the period we contemplate, I made a part of a company, in which a conversation took place, the report of which I think you will receive with some interest. Dr. William Shippen, the first professor, and for a long time an eminent one, in the Medical School of the University of Pennsylvania, had for his wife a lady of Virginia. It was, I suppose, in consequence of this, that when the Virginia delegation to the first Congress arrived in Philadelphia, on their way to New York, he invited some of the members of that delegation, or perhaps the whole of them, to a dinner at his own house. I remember the names of Madison, Page, and Lee, and I think there were one or two more. Chief Justice McKean, afterwards Governor of Pennsylvania, and Mr. William Bingham, subsequently a member of the United States Senate, were likewise invited guests; and as the doctor was a member of my congregation, he also honored me with an invitation. Soon after we had taken our seats in the drawing-room, before dinner, the Chief Justice said to Mr. Madison—'Have you thought, sir, of a title for our new President?' Madison's answer was in the negative; and he added, that in his judgment, no title, except that of President, would be necessary or proper. 'Yes sir,' replied McKean, 'he must have a title; and I have been examining the titles of certain princes in Europe to discover one that has not been appropriated. Most Serene Highness, I find is appropriated; but Serene Highness, without the word most, is not appropriated; and I think it will be proper that our President should be known by the style and title of His Serene Highness the President of the United States.' This elicited an amicable controversy, which continued for some time, Madison and his colleagues opposing, and McKean maintaining the propriety of conferring the title he had proposed on President Washington."

(To be Concluded next week.)

PRAYER, A GOOD TO ALL.

On others what more easily, and yet what more fruitfully bestowed than our prayers? If we give counsel, they are the simpler only that need it; if alms, the poorer only are relieved; but by prayer we do good to all. And whereas every other duty besides, is but to show itself as time and opportunity require, for this, all times are convenient; when we are not able to do any other thing for men's behoof, when through maliciousness or unkindness, they vouchsafe not to accept any other good at our hands, prayer is that which we always have in our power to bestow, and they never in their's to refuse.—HOOKER.

SLEEP IN JESUS.—How soft a name is given to the Christian's death; and how lovely a notion of the present state! "They sleep in Jesus."

"They sleep." Why do you mourn as if they were annihilated and utterly lost?

"But they are lost to me!"

"Not forever; not for a very long time." "Yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come, and not tarry."

We can never be where God is not, and where He sees, and loves and upholds us not. He is our Father and our God forever. He takes us from earth that he may lead us to heaven—that he may refine our nature from all its principles of corruption, share with us his own immortality, admit us to his everlasting habitation, and crown us with his eternity.

RELIGIOUS TRAINING.

FROM BISHOP DeLANCEY'S CHARGE.

After showing that "the training system is the system of common sense, the system of analogy, the system of the Church, the system of the Gospel, the true system," the Bishop proceeds to show how it is to be applied to the children of the congregation. The means to be employed are, Sunday Schools, the Catechism, Pastoral Intercourse, Parochial Schools. These means are thus presented to our regard:

SUNDAY SCHOOLS.—Sunday Schools originated in the Church of England, and were primarily designed for the children of the poor, who, having no access to schools during the week, Raikes, a layman of the Church, sought to draw together and instruct on Sundays, before or after the services. From this origin they gradually extended to all classes in society, and have become the great agency for the religious instruction of children in all denominations.

The views which prevail within the Church, regarding these institutions, differ somewhat from those without. With us, the Sunday School is considered as part of the Parochial cure. It is not an independent institution in the Parish, over which the minister has no control. He is responsible for its conduct and its instruction. The lambs of the flock are intrusted to him with the other members of the fold. All who teach are his assistants. All that is taught must emanate from him, and be regulated by his counsels and guidance. The Word of God is the standard of his teaching, and the authority of the Church, which gives him his commission, controls him in the discharge of his duty as of others. He cannot surrender his Sunday School to extraneous authority, without violating his ministerial and parochial engagements. He is called by Christ to minister, under the express and impressive commission, "Feed my sheep—feed my lambs." He is sent by the Church as a minister, "to teach, and to premonish, to feed and to provide for the Lord's family; to seek for Christ's sheep that are dispersed abroad, and for his children that are in this naughty world, that they may be saved through Christ forever." He is employed by the parish under an engagement, "faithfully to feed that portion of the flock of Christ entrusted to him," "to be diligent in instructing the children in the Catechism," to take the oversight of the Parish in all its departments of spiritual instruction. In no view of his ministerial relations, can he disconnect himself from the guidance, regulation and instruction of these schools.

The schools comprehend two classes of pupils: those directly connected with the families of the parish, and those who are gathered from families exterior to it—from the broad field of neglect, irreligion and sin, which spreads over so wide a surface all around us. Both classes present a most impressive claim upon the Pastor's care and attention. You must be often in the schools, and see that sound and faithful instruction is imparted. Conduct, as frequently as may be, the opening and closing devotions. Select the books for your schools. Look to the libraries. Examine the children—catechise them—address them—speak to them in their classes—hear them recite their lessons to the teachers—drop to them a kind word, a restraining counsel, an encouraging remark, an approving look, an affectionate smile, a kind inquiry; that they may always look up to you with filial eye as their chief teacher, pastor and friend—as God's minister to them for good. Enquire after them in your parochial visits; as far as possible, know them when you meet them, and manifest an interest in their week-day associations, schools and occupations.

For counsel and direction, let the superintendents and teachers, look to you as the father of the flock. They are your aids in this pastoral employment; acting for and from you; organized, if organized, to assist you, their Pastor, in this portion of your duties. Meet them often; guide, instruct, animate them by your presence, intercourse, advice and example, that they may not lag, and weary, and grow impatient, and withdraw from duty, under the discouragements, tardy progress, irregular application, distracted attention, and slow expansion of the infantile minds which you have employed them to guide.

The exhausting labors of the minister on Sunday are greatly increased, I am aware, by this demand upon him; and it is on this account, as on many others, that I urge the employment of Deacons in our larger parishes as assistants, who may share with the Pastor a portion of this duty.

Rightly organized and conducted, the Sunday School is no interference, but a great help in the parochial duties of a minister; a well regulated transfer of some portion of the load from his own shoulders to those of others, without the absence of his superintending eye and guiding hand. In our larger parishes, they may be made most instrumental in advancing the growth, the stability, the permanency of a congregation. In our more rural parishes, composed of scattered members and thinner congregations, the care and regulation of them is more difficult. Still more so in our missionary stations, where the clergyman attends but on alternate days: but even there, when faithfully, carefully, and zealously guided and regulated, they are of momentous value to the growth of the Church, and to the spiritual and eternal welfare of the young themselves.

THE CATECHISM.—Faithful instruction of the children in the Catechism is the next step in the pastoral training of the young.

Catechetical instruction—instruction by questions and answers—is as old as the necessity of imparting knowledge; and, as you know, constituted one of the Socratic arts of logic, or reasoning.

In the early ages of the Church, the catechumens—the persons subjected to a course of religious instruction—are well known as a distinct class connected with the Church. Some of the brightest names of the Reformation have urged this practice. A long line of the most eminent sons of the Church of England distinctly advocate and enforce it. "With respect to the catechetical instruction of youth," says Bishop Jebb, "I would remind you that it was the primitive method, employed by the Apostles and their immediate followers, and in after ages by the whole succession of the Catholic and Apostolic Church, for training up and organizing the community of Christians in sound principles of faith, in the love of God and man, and in purity of life and conversation. It is observable, accordingly, that in exact proportion as catechising has been practised or neglected, the public faith and morals have been seen to flourish or decline;" "and it is not too much to say, that next to an established liturgy, and beyond all prescribed confessions of faith, the single ordinance of catechetical instruction has, under Providence, been the great stay and support, throughout Christendom, of orthodox, unwavering Catholicity."

"Now it has been very much the complaint," says Bishop White, "of judicious divines and others, that sermons have too much superseded the old and useful expedient of catechetical instruction. But by this term they mean the repeating, over and over, of the same primary truths of religion, until they are made familiar to the minds of the instructed: a work much more useful to them than what is understood under the name of preaching; although not opening a like field for the ingenuity or for the eloquence of the teacher."

"The instrument before us is called 'A Catechism;' this is to say, for so the definition continues, 'An Instruction to be learned by every person, before he be brought to be confirmed by the Bishop.' In what way is it to be learned, whether by the ear from the mouth of the minister, or through the medium of a written or printed form, is not specified. Accordingly, the words should be considered as applying to both these ways. The attending to this circumstance is of some importance. The word 'catechism' comes from a Greek word, which signifies to teach by sound. From some remains of catechetical instruction in the Primitive Church, we learn that it first passed from the catechist to the catechumen; who was afterwards examined on the purport of what had been delivered. The reason of this was partly in the scarcity of books, before the discovery of the art of printing; and in the comparatively small number of persons qualified to use them. Even when our Catechism was drawn up, at the eve of the Reformation, it would have been useful but to few of those for whom it was designed, otherwise than as proceeding from the lips, and taken in by the ear. These remarks are made with a reference to any persons who, at the present day, have not had the opportunity of learning to read. Any such persons, on notifying their cases to their ministers, would be attended to in the only way in which they can be furnished with the instruction in contemplation. We can never be sufficiently thankful, for the benefit reaped in various ways, and in this way in particular, by the general possession of the art of reading, and by the cheapness of needful books. But this blessing, enjoyed by the community, ought not to throw the few deprived of it out of the reach of the knowledge essential to Christian faith and practice. Besides the loss here referred to, of persons not taught to read, there is another, affecting the same persons in the difference of extent of catechetical instruction, as practised in the Primitive Church and at present. St. Augustine may be supposed to have given a specimen of catechising as practised in his day. It comprehended the whole thread of Gospel history, and was executed by persons devoted to that employment."

But it surely cannot need, at this day, a vindication of this part of the Church system.

Catechising the children of a congregation by its Pastor, is a duty never neglected without a violation of clerical obligation on the one hand, and a positive injury to the parish on the other. Of the times and occasions for discharging this duty, of the best modes of fulfilling it, of the additional catechisms to be used, of the combination of oral with the printed questions—all these are points for the responsible judgment of the Pastor under the control of his obligation to Christ and to the Church.

But the adoption and practice of this part of the system of training, I hold to be essential to your success as Pastors of Parishes. You cannot reach the young without it. You cannot frame their characters and views according to the scriptures, without it. You cannot mould them on the model of Christ's Church, without it.

PASTORAL INTERCOURSE.—Equally important in the training of the children of a parish, is the system of pastoral intercourse with them, as parts and portions of the flock. In your visitations, let them always be objects of attention, inquiry, and interest. Know them individually, by name, in their schools, and studies, and occupations. Never stand aloof from them; never repel them by look or word; when they approach you, counsel them with kindness and fidelity. Whatever be their position, high or humble, refined or unrefined, children of the rich or poor, roughened by labor or softened by ease, struggling in poverty with their parents for their maintenance, or nurtured by wealth in the halls of education—they are all alike, lambs of your flock, to be guided fed, and cherished—immortal spirits, entrusted to you for preparation for heaven—souls, for whose salvation you are to labor, and are, more or less, responsible—entitled to your interest, regard and prayers, your exertions, counsels and encouragements, in the thorny path of an earthly probation. Win them to regard you as their spiritual father, affectionate, forbearing, attentive, considerate, seeking their good, here and hereafter.

On entering the church-yard at Cooperstown, I was struck by an elevated and plain monument, bearing the inscription of a name which still delights the ear of multitudes of mature and aged, once children of his pastoral care, and which beautifully illustrates the kind of character and intercourse I now urge—FATHER NASH.†

* Bishop White's "Lectures on the Catechism," pages 2d and 3d.

† NOTE.—It is reported of the venerable FATHER NASH, that one of his habits was, when he visited a Church family, to

This frequent intercourse and association with the young members of the flock, identifying yourself with them, knowing them personally and by name, conferring with them on their studies, their engagements, their reading—counseling with them on their plans and prospects—interrogating them on matters connected with religion, the Church, their growth in grace, knowledge and principle—are points so obviously necessary in the due training of a parish, and for the maintenance and exertion of the true ministerial influence among the people, for guiding them in the paths of Christian holiness and the ways of God, for strengthening their attachment to the Church, and securing their steady adherence to its worship, its principles, its usages, doctrines and ministry, that they hardly need any further enforcement than thus briefly to name them.

PAROCHIAL SCHOOLS.—Another most important point connected with the training of the children of a parish, is the system of Parochial Schools, on the threshold of which the Church is now standing.

By Parochial or Church Schools, we mean the identification of religion, as the Church holds it, with education; educating our children as children of the Church, in schools of the Church; providing each large parish, if possible, with a school of its own, where the children connected with it may be taught by competent, religious teachers connected with the Church, who will make religion as the Church holds it, not only the basis of all instruction, but the pervading principle and influence running through all its parts and progress, imbuing the mind with the knowledge of it, warming the heart with the love of it, and moulding the intellect and habits to its devotions, worship, doctrines, liturgy and usages.

Some, you know, hold that religion and education should stand apart from each other. Others teach that morality only should be allied to education. Others, again, that only a general and abstract view of religion should be associated with education. Others, again, put forth their views in the form that education is to be unchurched: "Education without a church," is the principle claimed and avowed to be the right principle.

In opposition to such views, the true theory of the Bible and the Church is, that Religion is the foundation of all sound education; that the God who gave the mind should govern the mind; that the expansion and training of the intellect should ever be according to, and in association with His laws, influence and grace; that to mould the intellectual habits without reference to the Deity and His laws, His institutions and His spirit, is in direct hostility to man's true interest, duty and responsibility; and hence, that over the union of religion with education, we are bound to pronounce the solemn declaration, "what God hath joined together let no man put asunder."

Now this can only be carried out by Church schools and Church colleges, which shall unite, avowedly, religious instruction with literary instruction; which shall connect Church worship, Church doctrines, Church usages, Church feelings, Church principles, with the daily business of education; which shall daily present the great and glorious God before the mind, humble it on the knee of confession to Him, raise it in supplication to his throne, inspire it by the melody of praise to Him, and send it forth in the feeling of utter dependence on His infinite mercy for existence, faculties and knowledge; for redemption, grace and glory through the mediation of His blessed Son, and the power of His Holy Spirit.

The Parochial School system keeps constantly before the eyes of both children and parents, the Authority to which both are responsible. In its practical exhibition, it is presented to view in some such form as this: The children, assembled for receiving instruction, begin by calling upon God in prayer, and singing to His praise. Those prayers and hymns are from the Prayer-Book; the very services, in part, in which they are accustomed to unite on the Lord's day in the sanctuary, with their parents and friends. Sunday is thus carried into the school. They see that religion is not merely for the Lord's day, or for the Church, but is something for every day; that it mingles with their learning and their business; that God is to be served, thought of, worshipped, obeyed and loved in the school, as well as elsewhere.

A reference to God's will is intermingled with all their learning. His doctrines are inculcated; duties to Him are enforced; the worship of Him is practised. Dependence on His Spirit for strength, on His blessed Son for pardon, on his Holy Word for light and guidance, is constantly presented to the mind. The holy warnings, the earnest counsels, the warm appeals, the affectionate interest of a Divine Saviour, are brought to their view. In the principles, the grounds, the usages, the doctrines, the ministry which God has established, they are instructed by the minister himself. In the nature, character and claims of the holy and spiritual kingdom which Christ established, and taught His disciples to pray for in the daily petition, 'Thy kingdom come,' they are instructed; why we adhere to its constitution as Christ gave it to us; why its liturgy was adopted; how it conforms to Holy Scripture, and has for ages edified His members; in what relation they stand to the Church; how and why it should never be deserted, or discounted, or shunned.

Among the facts evidencing the importance of Parochial Church Schools, I may name to you, that the system has been distinctly recommended by the Presbyterian General Assembly, and is, I understand, in process of gradual adoption in the congregation of that large and influential body of our Christian brethren, to train and indoctrinate their people. As another fact of the same import and character, take the circumstance, that at this time more than sixty colleges in the United States are under the control of the same religious denomination.

In the same language speaks to us the increase of schools, academies and colleges, among our Baptist and Methodist brethren. The Lutheran system is a signal illustration of the same principle. I am not acquainted with any literary institution of any kind, established by any denomination of Christians, in which the religious views of that denomination are catechise the children. Many baptized by his hands in infancy, and catechised by his faithful tongue as children, now adorn our Church in this diocese by the lustre of piety and faith.

suppressed, and the pupils taught according to other views. Directly or indirectly, their own are inculcated. A proselyting spirit may not be evinced in the case; but the prevailing, predominating, moulding, ever-felt influences arising from usage, manner, phraseology, tone, example, worship, converse, is always on the side of the denomination which sustains the institution; and believing, as they do, that they hold the truth of God in their respective systems, neither reason, justice nor conscience, would authorize it to be otherwise.

THE CHURCH IN HUNGARY.

According to Csaplovics*, who says that his computation is the fruit of very careful research and inquiry, the inhabitants of Hungary, if classed according to their creeds, exhibit the following numerical proportions:

Roman Catholics	4,817,413
Protestants of the
Lutheran Church	1,308,264
Reformed Church	857,003
On the frontiers	10,574
	2,175,841
Eastern Christians	1,729,808
Greeks	629,284
Jews	166,174
Armenians, about	1,000
	9,519,520

These were the estimated numbers in the year 1829; but the returns collected for the year 1847, which can be, however, accepted as approximate only, in the absence of any public census, state them to be as follows:

Roman Catholics	5,753,757
Greeks in
Græco-Romanists	750,000
Pure Greeks	1,330,000
	2,080,000
Protestants in
Lutherans	785,060
Helvetic Conf.	1,570,000
	2,355,000
Jews	222,000
	10,410,757

The Romanist population is dispersed over the whole face of the country; the Protestants are found in every county (commitat), except those of Waradin and Kreuz, which are the south-westernmost. The Greeks have no followers in eight out of ninety-eight counties; but the Jews are scattered over the land, with the exception of four mountain-counties, whose local prejudice against their cunning operates so strongly as to exclude them from admittance within their borders.

The Protestants consist chiefly of the more affluent among the Magyars, "whose arrows flew from the east and fell upon the land in the ninth century," Slavonians, and Germans. The sovereign and many of his grantees profess Romanism; but the great mass of the aristocracy, the Protestant faith; the mercantile community are principally of the Greek church; and the peasantry, of the Græco-Romanist, or United Greek.

The Romanists have three archbishoprics (Gran, Erlau, and Kalocsa), and sixteen bishoprics, besides sixteen titular bishoprics, whose residences are in Turkey! And the Græco-Romanists have four bishoprics, at Munkacs, Eperies, Grosswardein, and Kreuz.

The Protestants are under the jurisdiction of eight superintendents, four Lutheran and four reformed of the Helvetic confession. The Greeks have an archbishopric at Kasowitz, and seven bishoprics.

M. von Schwartner estimates the proportion of the whole clergy to the population at 1 in 565, which is much greater than it is either in England, France, Bavaria, Denmark, or Sweden. The Protestants seem to have the smallest proportion of clergy; for the same writer states the Helvetic to be but 1 to every 927 souls, and the Lutheran but 1 to every 1,585. The Romanists have the largest; viz., 1 in every 500. The average proportion of the flocks to the Priests is 1,022 souls in each.

The stipends or incomes of the clergy are most unequal; for, while the archbishop of Gran, who is prince-primate, high chancellor, legate by office of the papal see, and governor of the province, has a revenue of 1,500,000 florins (more than £130,000 a-year), many a Protestant pastor in the rural districts has not more than 20 florins, nay even as little as 10. No Romanist pastor has less than 300 florins, or about £30 "congraid," or yearly income, besides surplice fees and "lerticule," or offerings in kind, which are required from every new-married couple. The Greek clergy have unequal incomes; some arising from fees, which are taxed at a high rate, and others from the "bir," a species of tithe collected partly in kind and partly in money. The arch-prelate (proto-presbyter or protopop) receives from each priest in his diocese either a certain quantity of corn or two guldens (about 3s. 6d.) as an annual contribution. He claims a fee, too, upon every marriage: and in the dioceses of Pakraez and Karlstadt, the bishops claim from their clergy a certain yearly fee for each house in the parish. The Greek dioceses have two other fixed sources of income, called "conventia" and "sydonia." The former is composed of about 3d. on every house, and of about 0½d. from every dealer and handicraftsman in every gulden of taxes which he may pay. The "sydonia" is drawn from the parish minister only, who is obliged to pay about three halfpence for every house in the parish. The pastor's induction fee is not less than tenpence for every house, but the bishop seldom claims more than £5 in any case. If the pastor die without heirs, his property accrues to his bishop; but he is allowed to leave bequests to the extent of one-third of his possessions; if he exceed that proportion in his will, the whole mass passes into the bishop's hands. The arch-prelate requires a fee of £40 to £80 for every episcopal investiture; and both he and his subordinate bishops have a fundus instructus, to meet the expense of their residences, libraries, habiliments, church-furniture, &c.

From "Gemalde von Ungara." Two vols. 8vo. Pesth.

Of all the churches in Hungary the Romanist is most abundantly provided with means; consequently it excels every other in the splendour of its fane, the pomp of its ceremonies, and the luxurious adornment of its ministers. The Protestant is far behind it in all these respects, for its rule is simplicity; the Greeks yearn after greater display, but are without the wherewithal to gratify their yearning.

In the Eastern or Greek churches the male part of the congregation stand next the chancel or "ikonostas," and occupy the few seats placed along the walls. The further end of the nave, which lies next the entrance, and is called the "paperta," is parted off from the other portion of the church by a low wall, or deal partition, breast high. This space is appropriated exclusively to the female sex, where they perform their devotions standing! In the Jewish synagogues the men sit promiscuously with their hats on their heads; their wives are in concealment behind a screen of thick wicker-work, away from all contact with their yoke-fellows; but unmarried females are not permitted to accompany them, or even to cross the threshold of the synagogue.

Not only the bishops, but all abbots, priors, and members of chapters are included in the class of prelates, and enjoy all the privileges and immunities which the constitution accords to the nobility; and as landed proprietors, as well as nobles, are liable to the civil and criminal laws of the country: in case of public need, too, they are bound to serve in the "insurrection," or levy in mass, and draw their swords in defence of the state. Many such served in the Magyar ranks during the late intestine commotions; but their appearance in arms was much more common in former times. In the sixteenth century field-marshal Tormori, who commanded the "insurrection" on the field of Mohacs, on the 29th of August 1526, was archbishop of Kalocsa, and was slain on the spot, in the company of six other bishops. The chapters are a high legal authority in Hungary: all contracts and wills must be executed before them, all protests must be deposited with them; they have the appointment of advocates, legal agents, &c. They are the keepers of the provincial records and titles affecting all landed property; an institution which has proved a great public as well as private benefit.

There are theological seminaries in every Romanist diocese, in which candidates for orders are required to pursue a four years' course of study in ecclesiastical history, exposition of the scriptures, dogmatics, morals, pastoral theology, and canonical law. The bishop is uncontrolled director of these establishments, and appoints all teachers in the national schools, which are found even in every village. The Protestants have schools also in all parts where there are a minister and a flock; and in all large towns they have good grammar schools, and high schools, or gymnasia, in Pressburg, Eperies, and four other places, where the pupils are taught the classics, mathematics, and physics, natural history, physic, philosophy, and the various branches of theological science, according to the pupil's destination. But the members of the Eastern churches are so wretchedly cared for in educational matters, that the more intelligent and wealthy send their children to the Protestant schools, as an antidote to the neglect of their own clergy.

STARTLING FACTS.

In a brief notice of the report of the proceedings of the Board of Trustees of the General Theological Seminary, we casually adverted to the fact that there was a general decrease of Theological students throughout this country among its various religious bodies. A friend has called our attention to this startling fact, who has an opportunity for wide and extensive observation. Although we are not yet furnished with full and precise statistical information on this subject, we have sufficient to demand the earnest attention of all who agree with us in regarding this matter as one worthy of thoughtful attention. In the growing extent and fast increasing population of this country we might well suppose there would be greater need of Christian Ministers. It is indeed a startling fact to find that so far from their increase keeping pace with the demand, there is reason to think that their number is beginning to decrease. While other professions are crowded with numbers which more than meet the wants of the community, that which is to answer the deepest necessities of mortal need is falling off. Lawyers, to take care of men's temporal affairs, are multiplying. Doctors, to cure, and sometimes to kill, the body, are pouring forth in crowds from our Medical Schools; while our Theological Seminaries are sending forth, in diminished numbers, those who are to minister to man's spiritual need, and care for him when the Lawyer's counsel and the Physician's care are unavailing!

The following proofs will for the present show that this is the fact. In the "Thirty-third Annual Report of the Directors of the American Educational Society," we find the following declaration, pp. 17, 18. "In turning attention to the means employed at the present period for securing a supply of Ministers of the Gospel, the painful fact is forced upon our notice, that there has existed for some time a material diminution in the number of those who are preparing for this work. The churches were for a long time slow to admit a tendency to this result. But the result itself can no longer be disguised. An absolute decline in the number of Theological Students has been regularly going on from year to year; until the means of comparison is furnished, which places this matter beyond a doubt."

"In 1841, the six Theological Schools in New England and the Middle States, connected with the Congregational and the New School Presbyterian Churches, contained an aggregate of 501 Students.—But the falling off which has since been realized, has amounted to not less than two-fifths, or forty per cent of the whole number; reducing it, in these Institutions, to less than 300."

This report shows also that in the Old School Presbyterian Church, the fact stands out upon the records of their General Assembly, that for the last few years, "the number of candidates for the Ministry has been diminishing." The same fact is also shown by the records of the Evangelical Lutheran Church.

If we take the two most important Seminaries of our own Church, from their records we gather the same fact. In the Journal of the last Convention of the Diocese of Virginia, we find the following statement from the Board of Trustees of the Virginia Seminary. "It is, however, a subject of deep regret and painful anxiety, that so few students are now connected with our Theological Seminary. Its present number is but 25. A few years since, and its average number was scarcely ever less than 40."

In the last catalogue of the General Theological Seminary we find the following.

ANNUAL COMPARISON.

"In 1829, the Seminary numbered 26 Students; in 1830, 25; in 1831, 23; in 1832, 42; in 1833, 49; in 1834, 65; in 1835, 80; in 1836, 90; in 1837, 86; in 1838, 74; in 1839, 66; in 1840, 74; in 1841, 70; in 1842, 67; in 1843, 70; in 1844, 69; in 1845, 65; in 1846, 66; in 1847, 61; in 1848, 64; in 1849, 62."

The number this year is 50. We must state, however, that this year's deficiency is owing more to the small number which entered last year. The class admitted this year numbers 18. Now some may attempt to account for this diminution in various ways. It may be thought by those who would have it so, a proof of the general decline of these various bodies. But this supposition cannot be maintained, for they have all been increasing in other respects.

Again it may be said that the past supply of Ministers has been too large for the demand. This is equally untrue. The Report to which we have alluded, shows that "there cannot be less than seven or eight hundred Congregational and Presbyterian Churches in this country now, which are not supplied with stated preaching." And in our own Church, "the laborers are few" compared with the extent of the harvest.

Nor can it be urged, in our church at least, that this diminution is only in the number attending the Seminaries named, and thus to be regarded as a proof of their loss of confidence. These two appeal to the sympathies of all classes in the church. And the report to the Virginia Seminary says, "This diminution of numbers is by no means peculiar to our Seminary. The number of those who are now looking forward to Holy Orders, is but a small part of the number, who, a few years since, were pressing into the Ministry." And the Journals of our Conventions establish this melancholy truth.

How then is it to be accounted for? What other cause can be assigned than A GROWING SPIRIT OF WORLDLINESS in the Church, an increased devotion to the things of earth? Is it not a practical illustration of that plain truth announced by our Lord, "ye cannot serve God and Mammon?"

This evil spirit operates in two ways to prevent the increase of the Ministry. In the first place, it hinders the gifts of that true hearted devotion, by which alone the Ministry can be supported in numbers sufficient to meet the growing need. They that preach the Gospel must live of the Gospel. If men's hearts are so set upon the world that they will bestow their substance chiefly to buy for themselves perishable goods, while they grudge the meanest gifts to the service of God, it requires little skill in numbers to show that they will soon reduce the number of the Ministry by starvation.

Again, this spirit of worldliness leads Christian parents to direct the thoughts of their children to professions in which they will secure more worldly gain and more gratify their worldly ambition. It also tempts the young to prefer the present offers of Mammon, to the future blessings promised in God's service. So many inviting paths are now opening, with rich promises of worldly blessings, so many ways of acquiring riches, and heaping up treasures on earth, that the world has now a strong hold upon the hearts of the young. They load the ships and swell the pilgrim trains that hasten to the mines which glitter with earthly treasures, so that fewer are found to enter the less inviting paths wherein poverty and want and privation threaten them, and their only promise is in the hope of future, but eternal, gain. Oh, when we look abroad upon the earth, so cursed with sin, so little blessed as yet with the Gospel's rich mercies, what Christian heart can refuse obedience to that command of a Saviour: PRAY YE THEREFORE THE LORD OF THE HARVEST, THAT HE WILL SEND FORTH LABORERS INTO HIS HARVEST. And let those who wish to do their part to prevent a diminution of the Ministry, answer the following appeal.

DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

We insert by request the following eloquent and soul-stirring appeal of the Domestic Committee of the Board of Missions. Is there a heart that can read it unmoved?

CHURCH MISSIONS, DOMESTIC COMMITTEE,
NEW YORK, October 15th, 1849.

REV. AND DEAR BROTHER:—

"The Committee for Domestic Missions," beg to present to you the wants and claims of the vast field under their charge; and to intreat your zealous influence with your congregation, to obtain proportionate relief.

We are "servants for Christ's sake" of the Church, placed under the anxious responsibility of paying, from her bounty, the salaries of our hundred missionaries.

They are men poor in this world's goods; living on means reduced to the lowest limits; oppressed by privations, and struggling under anxieties. As a body, they are self-denying, faithful, and successful: sustaining the Church among the scattered homes of the West, planting it firmly in many a growing village, and pressing on with its blessings to the remotest parts of our wonderful land. The Church by her united voice, has promised to sustain them. She has authorized her Missionary Executive to make this promise specific to each one of this pioneer band. She has assured the Bishops of the organized Dioceses, and the Missionary Bishops, that the pledges made in the Diocesan distribution of the funds, shall be sacredly met. By every claim of honor, fidelity, and Christian love, is the Church bound to redeem these constructive pledges.

The Domestic Committee can act in these matters, only as the Agent of the Church. They receive and distribute the means placed in their hands. More they cannot do. In making appropriations for the year, the Committee is obliged to act in faith; but, at the same time, is directed in the amount, by the sober facts of the past, the expressed wishes of the Board, and public opinion in the Church, as far as it can be collected.

We begin this year with an amount of indebtedness, which, although reduced from the past, is fearfully great. On October first, a year's salary was due to nearly all the missionaries, and an aggregate of obligation pressing upon us, of twenty thousand dollars.

The expenses of management have been abated for the current year, to their minimum; and the whole salary, with the traveling expenses, of the Secretary and General Agent is saved, by the voluntary labor in rotation, of the Clerical Members of the Committee. The aggregate of appropriations for the present year, to October 1850, has been formed of the lowest amounts, consistent with any honest regard to the expectations and wants of the respective Dioceses, and Missionary Bishops; and with just confidence in the expressed love and duty of the Church. All has been done to execute our anxious trust with rigorous economy, scrupulous impartiality, and effective results. An expenditure of nearly ten thousand dollars less than that of the past year has thus been secured. But with all this, the sum of FORTY-TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS is demanded, in order that, at the meeting of the next General Convention, the Church shall have redeemed the pledges made to her Bishops and Missionaries.

The Domestic Committee, in this matter, is powerless. The money must be given by the Church, or the faith of the Church be dishonored; and a record made of disappointment and suffering in the sighs and tears of our ministers and their families which it is bitter indeed to imagine. Already is despair doing its work and missionaries are leaving stations of importance and promise, compelled by starving necessity to seek some other place of labor. Should this proceed, the capital of the past invested there is sunk, and the foothold lost, which has been fairly gained, and manfully held.

Foreboding as our situation may be, there is in it nothing hopeless. United conscientious effort can lift the burthen and honorably do the work. The Church, if heartily challenged, will never repudiate the debt. In this conviction we appeal earnestly and personally, Rev. and dear Brother, to you. We pray you in your place and influence as a Minister of the Church thus crying for aid—by your vested interest in her wide well being—by your obligation to extend her swelling borders—by your sympathy, perhaps through kindred trials of your own, with the suffering—we pray you to lend your pastoral aid in one united effort to meet this year of crisis in our Missionary work.

Direct resolutions of the Board of Missions, sanctioned by our Right Reverend Fathers in God, have made the "FIRST SUNDAY IN ADVENT" the appropriate period for these collections. We venture, in consequence, to present that season as the time for yours, but with respectful deference to your own judgment and inclination. We equally beg for this collection, whether the parish is large or small, strong or weak. The aggregate will tell effectually; and the influence of an earnest, loving appeal in behalf of the broad missionary travail of our Church, will produce results valuable beyond the present, in which there may be blessing for the Giver as well as for the recipient.

We ask your prayers in our behalf as your commissioned Agents in this sacred trust, and with respect and love, Rev. and dear Brother,

Subscribe ourselves in behalf of the Committee,
Your fellow laborers in the Gospel,

ANNIVERSARY OF CHURCHMEN'S ASSOCIATION FOR SEAMEN.

The Second Anniversary of the Churchmen's Missionary Association for Seamen of this Port, was held in St. Luke's Church on Tuesday evening, 30th ult., when the Right Rev. Bishop Potter, President of the Association, took the chair. After a short introductory service, in which the Rev. Joseph Wilmer officiated, the Annual Report of the Board of Managers was read, detailing the completion of the church and its consecration, and announcing the successful establishment of the mission. The Report concluded with an earnest appeal to the friends of seamen, to sustain the mission by stronger efforts than have yet been made. Rev. Dr. Howe followed, with some excellent remarks on the great importance of the mission, not merely as a direct benefit to seamen, but through them to the missionary cause generally throughout the world. The Rev. R. S. Trapièr, missionary to this station, then read his Annual Report, which not only exhibited in a graphic sketch the success which had attended his labors since the commencement of the year, when the church was first opened for divine service, but portrayed in lively colors the claims of seamen to the warmest sympathies of Christians. His earnest appeal to those who desire to see the Gospel freely extended to seamen, and spread throughout the globe, seemed to find a response in the bosoms of all who were present. We devoutly hope that he may be spared to continue the work so successfully begun, and that Christians will not suffer this noble undertaking to languish.

After the Report, the Right Rev. Bishop Eastburn addressed the meeting at some length, congratulating the citizens of Philadelphia on the success of the mission, and eloquently setting forth the peculiar adaptation of our Liturgy to the wants and tastes of seamen. The Right Rev. Bishop Potter concluded with a few remarks on the importance of the mission, stating that he was both surprised and grieved to learn, that unless prompt relief were afforded the Association by systematic contributions, the mission must be abandoned. After a commencement so successful as it had been, and in a field of labor so promising as this, he should regret to see the undertaking suspended or even diminished in efficiency, much less abandoned altogether.

At the close of the meeting, a collection was made, amounting to about $100, and the Board of Managers elected for the ensuing year.

Owing to the unavoidable absence of the Editor from the city, during the first part of this week, several notices and communications have been of necessity postponed. We have received some NEW PUBLICATIONS, which we will notice next week.

THE REV. PROFESSOR OGILBY, of the General Theological Seminary, sailed this week for St. Croix. Strong hopes are entertained that his health may be restored by God's blessing, through the influence of a milder climate.

THE SCHOOLS AT BURLINGTON.

We have great pleasure in stating that BURLINGTON COLLEGE AND ST. MARY'S HALL have opened for a new term with their usual success. At this early period more than two hundred pupils have entered.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"C(arolina)," "Shem," "W," and "W," (Obituary) are in type and will appear next week.

Foreign Intelligence.

The English Church Papers, by the Cambria, bring little intelligence of general interest. We gather the following items. Lord Auckland is to have the see of Llandaff, in exchange for that of Sodor and Man. The mitre, so glorious on the head of Bishop Wilson, seems to be easily laid aside, by successors unworthy to follow him. Dr. Tait, Head Master of Rugby School, is appointed Dean of Carlisle, vacant by the promotion of Dr. Hinds. Mr. Milman is promoted to the Deanery of St. Paul's.

From the Guardian we take the following account of Rome.

ITALY.—It appears that expectations are rife of the speedy return of the Pontiff to Rome. Every thing smacks of reaction. General Rostolan has ordered that none should appear in public with arms, and, in fact, that all offensive weapons shall be given up to the soldiers and police.

The intelligent correspondent of the Times has returned to Rome and, amuses his readers with the following account of an Amazonian rebellion:—

"We have had another attempt at revolution in Rome, but it has been put down by what I may well call the gallantry of the French army. The quarter where the attempt was made has hitherto been most pacific, but the spirit of resistance to authority has been engrafted on all classes by the late republic, and one must not be surprised to hear that in the Eternal City the very lambs have been turned into lions. To explain this affair in a proper manner I must state that the immense hospital of Sans Spirito, which is perhaps the most richly endowed public charitable establishment in the world, has attached to it a foundling institution, in which the stray gifts of love, poverty, or crime, have been at all times received and no questions asked. A cradle, turning on a pivot, was open every night, and the female child of sin or sorrow, deposited there was, on a bell being rung, duly taken care of, provided with a nurse, and brought up in a Christianlike manner. Large funds were at the disposal of the institution, so much so, that not only were all the expenses attending the rearing and educating these deserted creatures paid, but a certain sum was given to each as a dowry in case of marriage; and, as I am told, the bachelor peasantry of the vicinity of Rome, have, in numerous instances, abandoned their village loves, and selected a good looking maiden, with a comfortable share of scudi, from the many here offered to their choice. There were various advantages attending this operation; the wife could never insult the husband by pretensions of superior birth, and all the plague of mothers-in-law and sisters-in-law, was forever provided against. From time out of mind this hospital has been superintended by French Sisters of Charity, being nuns, and under their holy care it was managed admirably; but when the republic prevailed, the French nuns were expelled, and the principle of self-government being proclaimed there as well as at the Capitol, the foundlings undertook to govern themselves, and to eat up the revenues in a manner much more satisfactory to human nature than that which the rigid rule of the Sisters of Charity permitted. When the republic was put down, and the Apostolic Triumvirate established in the Quirinal, the Foundling Hospital, and its ample funds was not forgotten, and an order was at once given to restore the ancient system, and to place a certain number of Sisters of Charity—some being French, and the rest Italians—at the head of the institution.

"The day before yesterday was appointed for the installation of these ladies; but, in the meantime, the inhabitants of the hospital settled it otherwise; and, as there are no less than 600 to 700 great and small orphans, of all ages and of all sizes, on hand, it was determined by them that the reintroduction of the old regime should be resisted vi et armis; that is to say, with tongues, nails, tongs, poker, shovel, and brickbats. The messengers of love from the Quirinal were sent back in the most insulting manner; and when it was hinted that force would be resorted to, the heads of the republic raised a cry of war, the doors were strongly barred, and provisions for a fortnight's siege having been secured, the red flag was literally hoisted, and no surrender proclaimed. A provisional government was organized, and the young and active mounted on the roof, wrenched out the stanchions and iron bars from all the windows, and, stripping the adjoining building of its tiles, stood womanfully on the defence. In vain envoys of peace presented themselves—in vain offers of a 'transaction' were made; the blood of the daughters of unknown mothers was up, and an iron crowbar or tile hurled at the head of the Papal deputy was the answer. Only imagine, fair maidens of England, 600 or 700 of your Italian sisters in open rebellion against the laws; and judge what might be done by them in the energy of their despair. You have tongues—so have the Roman ladies. You have nails at your fingers' ends—so have the children of Cornelia. You can scream, kick, and squall—so can these models of a classic race. Proud, no doubt, would many an ancient Briton be of your valor and love of justice, if your anger were once aroused; and so, no doubt, would the fathers of these heroines feel, if we only knew who the gentlemen were. But history on that head must be forever silent, and even the actions of these champions of self-government would remain unknown if the Times had not sent 'its own' to the scene of action, and opened its eternal pages to the only account ever to be published of this extraordinary event. The Apostolic Triumvirate, baffled in all its attempts to bring to reason the refractory garrison, called on the French military authorities to assist them, and as the compact of the Holy Alliance cannot be evaded or refused, a regiment of infantry was formed into column of attack, and directed against the convent. To the honor of the colonel commanding he disarmed all his men, with the exception of twenty-five, who were to be employed in keeping off the crowd, and in overawing the male population out of doors, should it venture to interfere; and thus the column advanced with no other arms than those which nature gave, and, after having invested the place, summoned the garrison to surrender. The garrison replied by a shout of defiance, and every maiden, standing on the house-top, prepared to hurl down the brickbat, tile, or iron bar with which she was provided; but the commander-in-chief warned them of the fatal consequence if a single man was hurt, and the up-lifted weapon was never launched. It was a fine sight to see so many Amazons, hair dishevelled, dress disordered, with classic arms upraised, poising some deadly weapon, and glorious to hear their screams of rage and storm of imprecations when the order was given not to fire (for 'fire,' read 'fling'). A parley then took place, but no terms would be listened to, and the elderly ladies declared they would set fire to the hospital rather than yield. The French authorities were at their wits' ends—their position was becoming ridiculous—as the crowd began to laugh. So that, after another summons, which shared the fate of all the rest, was given, a battering-ram was levelled against the gates, and in a moment the column of attack made a lodgement within the walls. The crash of the broken door was answered by a scream of rage and terror from the roof, and quick as thought the outer defences were abandoned, and the whole troop of furies came rushing down the stairs, imprecating every imaginable curse on the French army and nation, and threatening to scratch out the eyes of the soldiers who came within their reach. The vocabulary of bad language is abundant at Rome, and, considering the religious education these ladies had received, it was wonderful how they came possessed of so large a portion of it; but every possible word that could be applied was made use of, and oaths and curses fell like hail. Fancy some hundred furies let loose from hell, and you have an idea of the picture that presented itself—hair streaming—dress torn—the person exposed—and every restraint of decorum laid aside; and then imagine that mass of living rage screaming and bellowing imprecations, and you may have a notion of what was going on. Every now and then a rush was made by the leading files, and an array of nails exhibited, but the French Commander swore that every woman who used her hands should have her arm broken in twain, and this threat, which of course would not have been carried into execution, alarmed the Amazons so much, that no act of violence took place, and the tongue did all the execution. The most violent hurricane will exhaust itself, and so will woman's rage, and so some of the fair creatures having dissolved in tears, others having taken to hysterics, whilst a few ran to their cells, abandoning themselves to despair, authority regained its influence, and by degrees the revolt was put down. How this result was obtained is still a mystery to me—some say the ladies gave way, others that the men were subdued."

The correspondent of the Daily News gives the following account of Dr. Achilli:—

"Giacinto Achilli was born in Viterbo in 1803, and educated in the Jesuits' College until the year 1819, when he assumed the garb of the Dominican monks. Having repaired to Lucca in 1821, for the prosecution of his theological studies, he received priest's orders at the court of the Duke Carlo Lodovico. He continued his studies in Rome in 1824, and was elected Professor of Philosophy in the Lyceum of Viterbo in 1826, which situation, together with the chairs of Sacred Scripture and Theology, he occupied until 1833, and only left them on being appointed Prefect of the studies, by the General of the Dominican order, and Head Professor of the Minerva College in Rome. Being also offered a professor's chair at Macerata, and at the Collegio Romano at the same time, he was undecided which to accept, but finally undertook the office of Visitor of the Dominican convents in the Roman and Tuscan states. In 1835, during Lent, he preached at Capua, at the request of Cardinal Serra, and subsequently, being desirous of leaving the order of Dominicans, obtained his secularisation from Pope Gregory XVI. by a decree of the Congregation of Discipline, and lived at Naples as a simple priest, engaged in theological and scientific pursuits. In 1841 Dr. Achilli came to Rome, where he had some trouble with the Inquisition, inasmuch that, weary of the Roman Catholic priesthood, he solemnly renounced all the honors, charges, and privileges which he had hitherto enjoyed, and obtained from the Inquisition a decree of dismissal, complete and perpetual, from his ecclesiastical ministry. In 1842 he left Italy and repaired to the English dominions, and occupied himself with teaching the different branches of science and literature, especially at Malta, where he was employed as professor in the college until the month of February in the present year, when he returned to Rome, but took no part in the political events then going on. Being furnished with a regular passport from the Governor of Malta, he had no hesitation in remaining in the city, but on the 29th of July he was arrested in the name of the French Prefect of Police, and conducted first to the dungeons of the Inquisition and subsequently to the Castle of St. Angelo."

It is stated that Prince Satriano, a man who "will govern on enlightened principles," will accept the chief direction of affairs at Naples.

For a copy of the following letter and resolutions we are indebted to "the Selma Reporter," an Alabama paper.

To the Vestry of St. Paul's Church, Selma.

GENTLEMEN:—Circumstances connected with the personal comforts and support of my family require that I should exchange my present field of labor, for one of larger scope, one which will enable me to support them with greater comforts to them and less difficulty to the Church. I assure you it is with pain and reluctance that I separate from you; I never expect in the providence of an all merciful God to be associated with persons whom I esteem more, or with whom my relations have been of a more pleasant character. It is a matter of eminent gratification, a reflection which I will bear with me, to my distant home, that our intercourse with you has never been marred by any circumstance in the least unpleasant. I entertain feelings of the greatest personal kindness and the greatest personal respect for each and all of you individually. I leave you with no feelings of unkindness. I leave you with feelings of gratitude for the uniform personal respect which you have exhibited, with kindness for the uniform good feeling which you have unwaveringly manifested, in all the intercourse pertaining to our relations, personal and official. I pray Almighty God to bless each and every one of you, and so to govern, severally and collectively, your interests and affairs, both spiritual and temporal, that you may so pass the waves of this troublesome world, as finally to come to the land of everlasting life. With an invocation of the blessings of God, upon you, individually and corporately,

I am fraternally yours,

J. H. LINEBAUGH.

Rector of St. Paul's Church, Selma.

Whereas, The Rev. J. H. Linebaugh has announced to us his intention of resigning the Rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Selma, Alabama;

And whereas, we believe that his services in this parish have been in the highest degree useful to the Church, and eminently acceptable to the community at large;

Therefore be it Resolved,

1st. That it is with the most painful feelings that we accept his resignation of the Rectorship of the Church, and witness his departure from this field of usefulness.

Resolved 2d, That since his residence amongst us, that new life and energy have been imparted to the Episcopal Church in this section of the country, by the earnestness and activity with which he has devoted himself to the cause of its interests.

Resolved 3d, That by his removal from us, the community has lost an useful citizen, society an elegant and accomplished man, learning and scholarship a true disciple, Religion an able advocate, and the Ministry an active, zealous, faithful and eloquent representative.

Resolved 4th, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished to the Rev. Mr. Linebaugh; and also that a copy be furnished to the Selma Reporter, the New York Churchman, and the Banner of the Cross, Philadelphia, for publication.

ST. TIMOTHY'S HALL.

We take the following from the Church Advertiser. We are most happy to learn, on such good authority, that this school is so successful. If our humble commendation can add anything to the measure, we most heartily accord our heartiest good wishes to this effect.

ST. TIMOTHY'S.—We are happy to learn that the Fifth Session of St. Timothy's Hall has commenced very encouragingly. A larger number of students have entered than at any previous session, and it is quite probable that there will be more applicants than can be accommodated, notwithstanding the extensive addition to the buildings, made this Fall.

This fact alone is the best comment upon the popularity of this Institution, and the ability of its teachers. Its advertisement will be found in another column; and did we think anything we could say, would add to its high reputation, or exhibit its merits and its claims in clearer light, we should not fail to speak warmly and loudly. Such Institutions are blessings to both Church and State.

We shall refer again to this Institution in connection with the educational system in this Diocese, as soon as time and space will permit.

Clerical Changes.

Rev. John M. Forbes, D.D., has resigned the Rectorship of St. Luke's Church, New York, and preached his farewell sermon on Sunday, the 28th ult., under a Roman phrenzy.

Rev. T. N. Benedict desires his letters and papers to be directed to New Hartford, Oneida county.

INCARNATION—REPLY.

MR. EDITOR:—

Your correspondent "Leo" thinks that my late notice of Archdeacon Wilberforce's book is overturned by my alleged misconception of the word "consubstantial." He is much mistaken. Were that the only comprehensive term employed by Mr. W., it might be regarded as mere hyperbole, or magniloquence, or as a peculiar way of speaking, often allowed to able writers, or as a particular phraseology in more general service. But other pregnant words are linked with this one. The creative law of generic similarity, "human nature," he calls an "entity," an "organization," as well as a "consustantial" fusion together of all the progeny of Adam. And here lies the difficulty. In the frank communication of thought, cumulated strong expressions are understood as reflecting intensity on each other; so that none of them can be reduced in meaning. Which rule presents here to us "human nature," not as a "consustantialness" merely, but as a "consustantial organized entity," giving the oneness of such mutual "entity" to our whole race. That is the theory of Mr. W.'s volume. It is physical language, and implies, at the very least, a quasi-physical view of the benefit he ascribes to the Incarnation. And it precludes the appeal to "the theological word 'consustantial':" for I apprehend that Leo must travel far ere he will find another distinguished theologian who propounds concerning "human nature" a cumulation of this intensity. It is an example of what I called piling thought upon thought. Athanasius, it appears, and doubtless others, held the offspring of men to be "consustantial" with the parents. Well; men are connected by "human nature;" and "consustantial" means "of one substance;" and "organization" may be predicated of living "substance;" while beyond all question "substance" is an "entity:" there we have it all,—"human nature is an entity, organized, substantial, consustantial." No, not exactly; Mr. W. has not (I believe) called "human nature" a "substance." But he must do so, or else he must establish the incongruity of a medium of consustantialness! (would not that be a phenomenon?) yea, of an unsubstantial medium of consustantialness! Without waiting to do this, he constructs the ideal pile, and a very tower it is.

That ομοουσιος, consustantial, ought not to be used in theology of the relation between progeny and ancestor, results from its higher appropriation in the Nicene Creed, and is clear from the difficulty into which Athanasius himself (as quoted by Leo) is brought. To remove the "fear," lest applying this word to the human "offspring of God," should compromise the ineffable relation of the Divine Offspring, embodied in the Creed, he resorts to the terms "Word and Wisdom," belonging to the Second Person, and from them proves the eternity of the inscrutable generation. These unquestionably are one proof; but the scriptural doctrine (not phrase) "consustantial" is another and an independent proof. If the old defenders of our faith illustrated the mysterious oneness of the Father and Christ by the oneness of Adam and Seth, by the oneness of my grandchildren with my grandsire,—then, we say peremptorily, (but without disparaging their general desert,) that they handled orthodoxy with slippery fingers. Mankind are one in nature, not in substance; the Divine Three are One in both nature and substance: and it is mere speciousness, to argue differently because the Greek word ομοια has the twofold signification; essentia, natura, substantia. The Creed called Athanasian, carries far higher authority than Athanasius and any or all of the Fathers; and that Creed makes fundamental the article, "not dividing the substance:" which Leo ought to have quoted with the other passage at the head of his paper, as vital in the definition of the homoousian faith: "so," i. e. according to his extract, but not "so only," is the Catholic doctrine of the "one substance" presented in the Athanasian Creed.

Using the word metaphorically, "co-atomic" would be equivalent to "consustantial," as applied to the Godhead: it is probably the nearest term that could be brought into physics for "indivisible." The figure would be catachrestic, not untrue. Leo offers the adjective, not I. But creatures are not indivisible; "atoms" are out of reach: and therefore we stop at their palpable "substance," and say that a bar of iron, a block of wood or of stone, a body with its head and limbs, are "consustantial." Cancel their respective unity however, and they are "consustantial" no longer. If, beyond the Creed, the patristic philosophy "attached the same meaning to both expressions,"—"offspring," and "one in substance,"—while we accept their orthodoxy as immaculate, we offer truer philosophy and a firmer bulwark for scriptural catholicity, in the foregoing accurate and obvious discrimination. Nor can I see a more probable motive, however unconsciously or innocently operative, for adhering to the scant patristic notion of ομοουσιος against this thorough definition, then a passion for the Fathers, and particularly for the notion of a quasi-physical union with Christ through the quasi-physical "organized entity, human nature:"—which passion thus affords, alas, alas! another example of making the deepest and most vital truth bend to that fancy. Such illusions in religion are very "sorcery." How they can overcome good men and sane minds, (thorough-bred Churchmen above all,) except ephemerally, is to me incomprehensible.

For Leo's "pain" and "distress" on my account, I return him my thanks. That his "sensibilities were shocked to a degree" &c., by the "ridicule" in my paper, is not of me, except the one "pleasantry" concerning "hobby theology;" it comes of the substantially, grossly, philosophically "ridiculous" nature of the hypothesis he admires. His rejecting "common sense" in the investigation of "Divine mysteries," I regard as a misfortune; for, while studying them, I find no better servant of Scripture, and no better mutual friend with whom to visit the Fathers. And the denial that I have a due "conception of the 'theory' advocated by Wilberforce," is no more than I have predicted several times since my remarks on it appeared in the Banner: sure I was that the Celestials of the Flowery Empire of superlatives would hold me an Outside Barbarian.

P. S. The whole argument of Leo is, I believe, answered. And, unless new matter be offered by him, there can hardly be necessary a further interposition of my pen.

WILBERFORCE ON THE INCARNATION.

To persons unaccustomed to the peculiar phraseology of scripture, it may appear of small moment to be designated as being "in Christ"—which many would be inclined to look upon as only a figurative expression; but, upon examination, it will be found that the phrase "in Christ" is one of deep significance, and connected by St. Paul, throughout all his writings, with our Christian privileges. The following are a few instances of this kind: "there is, therefore, now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus," (Rom. viii. 1.) "so we, being many, are one body in Christ," (Rom. xii. 5.) "to them who have been sanctified in Christ Jesus," (1 Cor. i. 2.) "in Christ Jesus have I begotten you through the Gospel," (1 Cor. iv. 15.) "as in Adam all die, so, in Christ shall all be made alive," (1 Cor. xv. 22.) "if any be in Christ, he is a new creature," (2 Cor. v. 17.) "but, if seeking to be justified in Christ," (Gal. ii. 17.) "in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision," (Gal. v. 6.) "to the faithful in Christ Jesus," (Eph. i. 1.) "according as He hath chosen us in Him," (Eph. i. 4.) "He hath made us accepted in the Beloved," (Eph. i. 6.) "in Whom we have redemption," (Eph. i. 7.) "in Whom also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed," (Eph. i. 13.) "for we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus," (Eph. ii. 10.) "but now, in Christ Jesus, ye who sometimes were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ," (Eph. ii. 13.) "in Whom ye also are builded together," (Eph. ii. 22.) "to all the saints in Christ Jesus," (Phil. i. 1.) "and be found in Him, not having mine own righteousness," (Phil. iii. 9.) "salute every saint in Christ Jesus," (Phil. iv. 21.) "to the saints and faithful brethren in Christ," (Col. i. 2.) "that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus," (Col. i. 28.) "the dead in Christ shall rise first," (1 Thess. iv. 16.) "hereby know we that we are in Him," (1 John, i. 5.) "we are in Him that is true even in His Son Jesus Christ," (1 John, v. 20.)

These are but a few of the large number of instances where the phrase "in Christ" is used in the Apostolic writings. Now it must be obvious to the most casual observation, that a phrase which is so often used, and under such a variety of circumstances and modifications, by the Holy Ghost, must have a real meaning, and have been used with design. But, however varied its use, it still points out the alone method by which divine blessings and graces flow to us, by our being "in Him," Who is the Fountain of life and hope and peace to the believer. What emphasis does this give to the ardent wish of the Apostle that at the Resurrection, he might "be found in Christ!" "In Thee, O my Saviour," (might we suppose the Apostle to exclaim) was I incorporated by Baptism; that union, by faith and feeding upon Thy precious Body and Blood, I have until now preserved; and I account everything as utterly worthless, so that I can preserve that union with Thee unto death, and at the resurrection be found in Thee, where my Baptism placed me."

Such is the union which the Scriptures set forth between Christ and our regenerate Nature: an union so close, that the regenerate man becomes absolutely one with His Redeemer—identical with Him; so that every act of the one is predicated of the other. Did Christ die? We co-died with Him, (οὐρανὸν θάνατον, 2 Tim. ii. 11.) Was Christ crucified? We were co-crucified with Him, (οὐρανὸν σταυρῶν, Rom. vi. 6.) Was Christ buried? We were co-buried with Him, (οὐρανὸν ἔσθην, Rom. vi. 4.) Was Christ raised from the dead? we were co-raised with Him, (οὐρανὸν ἔσθην, Eph. ii. 6.) Was Christ made alive from the dead? we were co-quickened with Him, (οὐρανὸν ἔσθην, Eph. ii. 5.) Does Christ sit on the right hand of God? He hath co-seated us with Himself in Heavenly places, (οὐρανὸν ἔσθην, Eph. ii. 6.) A great number of similar instances might be added; but these are sufficient to show how absolutely is the identification of our regenerate Nature with the Nature of Christ; and fully authorizing the strong language of St. Paul, that we are "members of His Body, of His Flesh, and of His Bones"—a true native extract out of His Own Body, as Eve was out of the body of Adam. And if the mere Baptism of Jesus in the river Jordan forever sanctified the element of water, what must have been the effect upon our mortal nature by His indwelling? Nothing short of its entire regeneration.—The Scriptures seem to labour, by the strongest and most emphatic figures and language, to impress upon us this great truth of the absolute identification of our regenerate human Nature with the manhood of Christ; that this regeneration is effected by that identification, and that whilst we are all members of Him, we, at the same time, are members of each other. The xii. chap. 1 Cor. is full to this point. We are "one body;" "one bread;" branches of the Vine, into which we have been grafted, and partake of all the fatness of the Root—the life-giving Spirit of Him in Whom the Spirit dwelleth. "For, in the new, as in the old creation," (says Mr. W.) "is He the first born of every creature," "the beginning of the creation of God." All its subsequent ramifications are but the result of the impulse which in His incarnation was bestowed. For, "He is the Head, even Christ, from Whom the whole body fitly joined together, maketh increase to the edifying of itself in love." Whereof, that men "might be made partakers of the Divine Nature," is the wonderful result. This work, therefore, follows from union with Him, in Whom originated the new creation of God. It began with the Head, it extends itself to His members; it began with the new Adam, it reaches on to all His brethren. Thus is He in truth "made a quickening Spirit." Thus are we all "complete in Him." (pp. 331. —2.)

To the more reasonable interpretation given by "O," to the phrase "one Body," we reply in the words of Mr. Wilberforce, "Yet why should it be called the Body of the Lord?"—And again: "Now since the mention of 'Body' leads us plainly to the human part of our Lord's Being, (for God is a Spirit,) therefore, whatever relation is implied in the application of this term to the Church, must plainly connect it with our Lord's human Nature. And the manner in which St. Paul transfers what is applicable to Our Lord's actual Body to His Body mystical, implies that the one of these is truly dependent on the other." (p. 244.)

The doctrine of our Church concerning our actual (not moral) union with Christ is very plainly set forth, as likewise the effect of that union:

In the Communion Office we pray: "Grant us, therefore, gracious Lord, so to eat the Flesh of Thy dear Son Jesus Christ and to drink His Blood, that our sinful bodies may be made clean by His Body, &c."

How are our bodies made clean by His Body? What mean these awfully mysterious words? Is it not a particular application of the very doctrine contended for by Mr. W. of the reintegration of our human nature by the hallowed Nature of Christ entering therein? Assuredly.

Again, in "the Invocation" we pray, that we "may worthily receive the most precious Body and Blood of Thy Son Jesus Christ, be filled with Thy Grace and heavenly benediction, and made one Body with Him, that He may dwell in them and they in Him."

Again we are taught to thank God, that, in consequence of our having eaten of His Body and Blood, "we are very members incorporate in the mystical Body of Thy Son, which is the blessed company of all faithful people."

So strongly do both the Scriptures and the Church bear their testimony to the truth of the doctrine, which this book of Mr. Wilberforce has so ably set forth.

III. But, notwithstanding this testimony, "O" is apprehensive lest the doctrine may prove of dangerous tendency. He says, "These are startling positions: for, though they presume the mediation, the atonement, regeneration, renewal, sanctification, they disparage them by overcasting those clear principles with the veil of an imaginary penetration of Christ's 'Nature' into 'human nature.'—And, a future generation may be so strenuous, so 'one-idea'd' for this consanguineously diffused 'Incarnation,' as to accept the Cradle and the life for the Cross and the death, and thus discard the Altar of Calvary, on which the Incarnation itself, and all Christian truth and hope are built, &c."

But how can this be? Is not the Incarnation closely allied to the cross? Is it not by Baptism that the blessings of the Incarnation are first sealed to us? Does not Baptism by exhibiting the burial of Christ, point to his death? And does not Baptism derive all its efficacy from its relation to the Cross of Calvary? What is the water of Baptism, seen by faith, but Blood flowing from the pierced side of our Redeemer? How, then, is it possible, that a firm belief in the doctrine of the Incarnation should "disparage" those of the Mediation, the Atonement, and other doctrines of grace?

"What sparkles in that lucid flood
Is Water, by gross mortals eyed:
But, seen by Faith, 'tis Blood
Out of a dear Friend's side."—(Keble.)

IV. "O" asks, "And why, as frequently in this work, disparage 'natural religion,' which is sound knowledge when soundly held, by opposing it to Christianity, by making it a nickname, or term of depreciation, for all direct communication with God or the Spirit, for all communication with or from them, not resolvable into the mediation of a medium."

We had always been under the impression that to the fallen race of Adam, there could not be any "direct communication with God, or the Spirit," except through the "mediation of a medium;" and had supposed, that even the prayers of the virtuous heathen could not reach the ears of the Lord of Hosts, unless through the Intercession of Him Who tasted death for every man, although many whom He died to save are still ignorant of Him. But the question is so important, that we shall permit Mr. W. himself to answer it:

"For what renders man's responsibility so great is, the greatness of the gift which is offered to his acceptance. To careless men this is the great argument against the Church-system: they would rather live at a lower stage of accountableness—they shrink with horror from the real indwelling of this Holy God. But, it will be otherwise with devout minds. Let them once feel the reality of Christ's presence and they will not again take up with a religion of shadows. All which is needful for such persons is, to understand that to admit the Church or Sacramental system, is only to believe the reality of these acts whereby the God-man discharges His work of mediation. However jealous they are of the formalism of their own hearts, and however watchful against spiritual carelessness, they cannot be afraid of resting too much on the mediation of Christ, and of esteeming too highly His Presence by the Spirit. For the Holy Ghost, as he came at Pentecost with power, and as His dealings by grace are discriminated from the general actings by the great Spirit of the Universe has a peculiar function and office in the Gospel Covenant. And since it has been His will, that those gracious strivings, whereby He renews all hearts, should be consequent on the mediation of Christ, therefore to leave out of account that perfect manhood whereby the new Head of our race acts upon His members, is to dispense, also, with the specific operations of the Blessed Comforter. So that the whole system of mediation would be passed by in this method of approach, as though the spirit of man could by direct, self-originating, immediate impulse, commune with the Almighty. If men say that what they trust is not their own spirit, but something bestowed upon them by God, yet still it is something within themselves—something,

"Which, if heaven gave it, may be termed their own," for they look to some chain of intercourse, which, starting from themselves, communicates directly with the Most High. What is this, in truth, but to fall back upon those endowments of man's spirit which he has by Creation—upon the natural powers of the soul—and thus to pass by Christ the Mediator in our access to God." (pp. 257-8.)

When any system of religion leads to such terrific consequences as these, we think it high time to draw the line broadly between Natural and Revealed Religion.

V. "O" asks again, "Have we a right to make a motive to piety, by crowding into scriptural truth the supreme improbability of an immaterial organized, consubstantial, active human Nature, not to call it an absolute impossibility? And what beyond the allegation that it presents such a motive, can be plausibly adduced for the hypothesis?"

To these questions the answer is very plain. It has been abundantly shown that the doctrine objected to, (though not the precise terms as "organization" and "consubstantiation," by which Mr. W. has illustrated it,) is set forth in Holy Writ as an article of belief, not in one instance, or two, but, plainly, boldly, prominently; and that our Church has borne her testimony to its objective existence by incorporating it into her liturgy. The fact that the doctrine is so prominently set forth in the Scriptures of Truth rendered it the duty of the Church to set it forth in her teaching, as a means of God's appointment, by which her members may be enabled to embrace and ever hold fast the blessed hope of everlasting life, which our merciful God has given us in our Saviour Jesus Christ.

Right glad were we to find that an edition of this valuable work had been issued by the American press, and trust it will not be long before a second shall be called for. Sure we are, that no one can rise from its perusal without having the sphere of his religious knowledge enlarged, his faith strengthened, and his gratitude heightened whilst contemplating the infinite condescension of Him, Who for us men, and for our salvation, came down from heaven, and was Incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary.

DALETH.

SIX HUNDRED THREE SCORE AND SIX.

MR. EDITOR:—

"A strange caption surely!"—some of your readers will exclaim, upon reading the title here given.—"What is he going to make out of this?" Just this, my dear reader: that I shall neither ape the commentator, nor the critic; that I shall neither attempt to penetrate into the mystery contained in the prophecy, nor trouble you with a tedious and frigid enumeration of the several investigations respecting the nature of "the beast," but simply remark, that it is curious to observe to what lengths the fanciful ingenuity of some active minds will at times lead; and shall attempt to illustrate that fact, by citing a few examples of this fatuity from "ancient authors," taking for my subject that with which I began: "the number of the beast, for it is the number of a man; and his number is six hundred three score and six." (Rev. xiii. 18.)

You are certainly aware that history, secular and ecclesiastical, abounds with instances of the well nigh infantile excogitations of sprightly brains, more intent upon the development of a pleasing fancy, the creation of an apt device, or variation of anagrammatic multiforms, than upon the legitimate exercise of the intellectual faculties. The length of this communication precludes the possibility of citing, to any extent, examples to this fatuity.* We shall content ourselves with that which we intend to illustrate.

Octavos have been written upon this subject alone, the mystical "number" of the more mystical "beast," bi-horned and vocally draconic. Brains, clear and muddy, have been puzzled and confounded in the endeavour to ascertain the individuality of the prophetic monster, and the applicability of the prophetic number. Scarce a commentator passes by the vision without a display of his knowledge of the subject; and scarce a schoolboy, in privileged or in stolen liberty, but who traces upon his oft-rubbed slate the transformations and mutations suggested by his fertile imagination, while endeavoring to penetrate into the depths of the mystery. So many and varied have been the annotations, that of their sage authors we again and again exclaim, in the hackneyed words of the Roman poet,

"Non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis."

Rome, pagan and papal, the Latin man and the Latin church, Geneva, Luther, Calvin, and Knox, by sundry uncouth and uncomfortable configurations have severally suffered from the scrutiny! Each has been, in turn, dear reader, rather unamiably distinguished by the "number six hundred three score and six." But all cannot be right, and none have been found worthy of the mathematical distinction "Q. E. D."† and therefore we beg leave to use our discretion to receive or reject, each and singular as the case may be, the corollaries established by such sagacious investigators. Holy Scripture still will retain its holiness and verity, notwithstanding all the discordant scholia of injudicious, uninformed, or of even erudite critics.

But that we may assent to or dissent from their conclusions at pleasure, let us view the process by which these learned gentlemen have attained the satisfactory results of their lucubrations; and we may state at the outset that the modus operandi by "cipher," is the most prolific with startling results. This is the track first trodden with trembling feet by the holy St. Irenæus.

The other methods of arriving at the solution of this more than Gordian difficulty, are the one by ascertaining the time of the rise of the "beast," a number which counted from a given period in prophecy, may very nearly point out the time when this wild beast shall arise.‡ But whether the personality of the monster has been ever found by this mode of calculations, the differences of results will prove a sufficient answer. The other method is by "square root"—don't laugh, dear reader,—a manner of proceeding which certainly looks more demonstrative, although it may not have so good authority as the preceding. At any rate, both kinds of calculations will assuredly lead you to Rome!§ Tendimus in Latium.

And now, disregarding for obvious reasons these avenues to the eternal city, we shall probably find our way by "ciphering." And in the first place, we conceive that although St. Irenæus, who was instructed in holy mysteries by the pupil of St. John himself, did offer the word ἑξαεὶς the Latin one, as his conjecture upon the prophetic beast—the sum of the numerical values of the several component letters of which is 666—he offered it with such a want of confidence in its correctness, that it effectually destroys the modern notion, that he received it from the venerable apostle whom "Jesus loved." We say that St. Irenæus offered it as a conjecture, and as a conjecture only; and we base this assertion in the first place, upon the express words of the holy Bishop of Lyons himself, who gives as a reason for his diffidence his supposition that if it were necessary to be known, St. John would have revealed it more clearly.

* Instances crowd upon the memory, the best of which are of the following nature. The font of St. Sophia at Constantinople has this inscription: Νέστον ἀνομιῶντα μὴ μόνον ὄνειν, Wash your sins and not your face only; which reads the same backwards and forwards. Also the response of the evil demon to the exorcist:

"Signa te, signa, temere me tangis et angis Roma, tibi, subito motibus ibit Amor;"

which also reads both ways. Also that which is referred to by Eusebius, (in Orat. Constant. quam libris de Vita ejus adjunxit;) and by Augustine, (de Civit. Dei. lib. 18;) the Oracle of the Erythrean Sybil concerning Christ—ut initis literarum init. legantur hæc verba Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, Θεὸς υἱὸς, Σωτὴρ, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, Saviour, the initials of which arbitrarily make up the word ΙΧΘΥΣ a fish, a term which early Christians were wont to use to designate their relations to the waters of holy baptism. See Tertull. de Bapt. c. i. Optatus cont. Parmen. lib. 3, p. 62, folio, Paris 1631.

† Q. E. D., Quod Erat Demonstrandum.

‡ The learned Grotius seems to have had such a method of counting this number; for he says, "Qui sapit, notet tempus idololatriæ animos et vires resumentis; ubi id evenit, apparebit Christi præsencia." Whitby.

§ This "square-root" is thus made out: as one hundred and forty-four thousand, the mystical number of Christ's kingdom is an exact square raised from twelve as a root, so "six hundred three score and six" gives as the nearest root twenty-five, the exact square of which is six hundred and twenty-five, near enough to six hundred and sixty-six! These describe the Papacy in many of its essential points! "Q. E. D.!"

And not only so, but also produces two other instances in which the same phenomenon occurs, and evidently it is on this account that others, imitators, take the liberty to strike out new conjectures for themselves, which would not be done, had St. John authorized the above interpretation of Irenæus.

The holy Bishop in his onset against the soul-destroying heresies of his day, applies the mystical number to the heathen power of Rome, then holding sway, finding it to exist in the word ἑξαεὶς; but at the same time he is evidently puzzled when "ἑξαεὶς," and "ἑξάς" show the same power.

Leaving the conjectures of this ancient writer for what they are worth, we find that others discover in the name of the Emperor DIOCLES. AVGVSTVS the bestial personage in Roman computation; and also, by Greek computation, in the name of the Emperor TRAJAN OTAPHIOS Ulpus, by adding up the value of the component letters, in both instances, but in that of the former, only the large capitals.

Again, we profit by the learning of the celebrated Dautz, for he finds the "beast" in the person of Rome, in the Hebrew language, for רומית ROMITH contains the same wondrous property, valued in Hebrew enumeration.||

To come nearer home, a common Latin inscription, said to be engraved upon the frontlet of the Papal tiara,|| is so common a place that it is known to every schoolboy, and which proves, without contradiction, that he who wears that triple crown, must fulfil the prophecy in his own office! Credat Judeus Apella—in the vernacular, "Tell that to the marines."

And forsooth, the game turning on the other side, Cardinal Bellarmine, the great defender of the highest and lordliest claims of the Papacy, pretends, as a sort of Roland for an Oliver, to trace the lair of the "beast" to Saxony, and to fix upon Luther the stigma of being the identical monster, merely because the word ἑξαεὶς THE SAXON, is said to contain the numerical property of "Six hundred three score and six." And, mirabile dictu, this is demonstrated another way! For Gerebrard and Lindanus, Roman writers of course, have both employed the Latin name of that zealous enemy of the Roman schism for the same purpose, and have succeeded—in changing his name to Luderus! But Feuarentius clinches the nail by claiming, as the original name of Luther, "MARTIN LAUTER," and by some means or other "ciphered" out the "number of the beast." It would be as useless as tiresome to go on and show how the two-horned monster has been discovered somewhere secreted in the "Scotch Covenant;" or to attempt to proceed any further than to say that some have sagaciously thought that JOHN KNOX might be the name, or possibly JOHN SMITH! We shall therefore conclude, after shifting our latitude to another "nation and people," and introduce to your notice the famous oriental impostor, who, by a slight change of name, has been classed among the "beasts." MOHAMMED is transposed into MOAMETTS, and then, by enumeration, a "beast," whose number is "six hundred three score and six."

Such, my dear reader, are some of the amusements of learned men, who in the vain attempt to explain a mystery, which for wise purposes God has concealed, have wandered from their usual path of wisdom into childish puerilities. "Quandoque bonus dormitat Homerus," will well apply to them, as to the worthies who lived in the days of Augustus. It would be well for all such, whether they may strike out new paths, or be content to follow the track of their predecessors, to remember the truthful words of the lyric poet:

"Prudens futuri temporis exitum
Caliginosa nocte premit Deus;
Ridetque, si mortalis ultra Fas trepidat."

Rev. J. A. Merrick

|| Thus $\aleph 400, \iota 10, \rho 10, \delta 40, \gamma 6, \zeta 200$, summed up, is 666. Feuarentius in his Annotations on Irenæus against heresies, gives the following twelve curious examples: "Græcis characteribus restitimus ἑξαεὶς ejus elementa sigillatim sumpta, numerum ab Irenæo quaesitum faciunt, E 5, v 400, α 1, υ 50, θ 9, α 1, ε 200, summa 666.

To the Clergy and Laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the City and County of Philadelphia.

BRETHREN:—There has been, for some time, a growing feeling among the Clergy and Laity of this city, that our Church is bound to make more specific and more ample provision for destitute orphans. As lambs of Christ's flock, deprived of their natural guardians, and cast upon the world poor as well as parentless, they present an object which ought to move every Christian heart and awaken a ready and generous liberality. At a recent meeting of a large number of the Clergy of Philadelphia County, I was unanimously requested to present this subject to the favourable consideration of the Church, if in my opinion it was proper and expedient. I take an early opportunity to discharge the duty. I yield but to my own earnest convictions, as well as to the suggestions of my respected brethren, in commending to your affectionate regard this most interesting and much neglected charity; and I would respectfully request, that the Clergy having charge of congregations in the City and County of Philadelphia do, at no distant day, bring its claims to the notice of their respective parishes. A HOME FOR DESTITUTE AND ORPHAN CHILDREN, adequate in some measure to our wants, and corresponding to the obligations and resources of the Church—may it soon rise to proclaim our gratitude to God for his mercies, our tender care for his helpless little ones, and our fervent desire, through the lips and lives of infants, to glorify his name.

At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, holden on Tuesday, the 6th inst, testimonials were signed on behalf of James Rawson, M. D., a candidate applying to be recommended for admission to the Holy Order of Deacons.

And at a special meeting had on Wednesday the 14th, testimonials were signed on behalf of the Rev. Thomas B. Lawson, Deacon, applying to be recommended for admission to the Holy Order of Priests.

Also, on the same day, Mr. Alexander Janney applied to be recommended for admission as a candidate for Holy Orders.

DIOCESE OF NEW JERSEY.

PASTORAL LETTER.

To the Clergy and Laity of the Diocese of New Jersey.

Beloved in the Lord, the Governor of the State has recommended that Thursday, the twenty-ninth day of November, be observed as a day of "Prayer and Thanksgiving to Almighty God, for the fruits of the earth, and all the other blessings of His merciful Providence." It becomes us, as Christian citizens, cheerfully and devoutly to observe his religious ordinance; and I earnestly recommend a hearty compliance with his request. In addition to the Form set forth in the Book of Common Prayer for that observance, I advise the use of the Thanksgiving "For Deliverance from great Sickness and Mortality," as our dutiful acknowledgment of His preserving mercy, who "stood between the living and the dead, and the plague was stayed."

There is no fitter accompaniment of thanksgiving than the giving of alms. When Naaman was cleansed of his leprosy, he would have the prophet take a blessing of his servant. A happy occasion presents itself to us to offer gifts with our giving of thanks; to send up our prayers and our alms, as Cornelius did, "for a memorial before God." At the late Annual Meeting of the Board of Missions, it was unanimously resolved, that contributions be asked, in all our churches, in aid of DOMESTIC

MISSIONS, on the first Sunday in Advent, which will come on the second day of December, the Sunday following the day of Thanksgiving. I affectionately request that this "reasonable service" be cheerfully rendered in all the congregations of the Diocese. Think what that Advent brought us! Think, with what an offering, more precious than of gold or silver, its blessings were procured for us! Think to how little purpose, if we "have not charity!" "Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another."

Affectionately and faithfully your Bishop and Servant, for Christ's sake,

G. W. DOANE.

EDITOR OF THE BANNER—REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

The few Church folks in this place have been much encouraged by a visit from our beloved Diocesan. We are indebted to him not only for official acts, but for personal visits to almost all our families.

On Sunday, the 4th, the Church of the Nativity in this town was consecrated to the service of Almighty God. The sentence of consecration was read by the Rector, Rev. H. C. Lacy, who was assisted in the service by the Rev. J. M. Robertson. The Bishop preached upon the duty and the privilege of "assembling ourselves together." In the afternoon three persons were confirmed.

We do not pretend to any ecclesiological science in these western regions, but we do thank God that by His grace we are permitted to dedicate to him a house which is neat, handsome, and comfortable, and in which all things may be done decently and in order. The church cost $6,500, and is paid for.

The Bishop was accompanied on his visit by H. A. Taylor, Esq., who was appointed at our last Convention, agent for the Episcopal Fund. The Church is greatly indebted to him for devoting his time and energies to this purpose. The present system of taxing the parishes yearly a certain amount for the Bishop's salary, is found to be troublesome and vexatious. So far it has always been raised, but under other circumstances it might be a very uncertain mode. Our object, then, is to procure a permanent fund of $25,000, the interest of which is to support the Episcopate.

It was understood at the last Convention, that so soon as any parish raised a sum, the interest on which would equal its annual assessment, that parish should be released from any further tax. So far Mr. Taylor has met with very encouraging success. In Huntsville there has been subscribed nearly twice the amount necessary to release the parish from further contribution. We trust that every Alabama Churchman will contribute according to his ability to this object. Nothing is better calculated to give permanence and respectability to the Church in this Diocese. We bespeak for Mr. Taylor, a hearty welcome wherever his voluntary mission calls him; and, without boasting, we would call the attention of our brethren in the southern part of the state, to what we have done, as proof that we are not insensible to the interests of the Church at large.

Very respectfully,

(Southern Churchman please copy.)

CONNECTICUT.

PASTORAL LETTER.

To the Clergy and Laity of the Diocese of Connecticut.

DEAR BRETHREN:—The Domestic Committee of the General Missionary Society of our Church, have addressed the subjoined letter to all the Clergy within the same, and have requested my official sanction and recommendation of their appeal, within the Diocese of Connecticut. With this request I most cheerfully comply. In doing this, I feel that I can add nothing to the force of the considerations set forth by the Committee themselves. The appeal comes obviously from their hearts, and it is addressed directly to the hearts and consciences of Churchmen. I have to request that the letter may be read in every Church in this Diocese, on the Sunday previous to the proposed collection; and I trust that no parish will feel itself too poor, or too indifferent to the general welfare of the Church, to contribute according to its ability.

The members of the Domestic Committee have given a proof of their own disinterestedness and zeal, which it well becomes the Church to acknowledge and to imitate; and I beg it may be borne in mind, also, that the contributions now called for, are not to encourage any enterprise of doubtful expediency, but to assist our own destitute Brethren scattered along the frontiers of our country.

Commending the object to your liberal support, and yourselves to the protection and blessing of the great Head of the Church,

I remain, Dear Brethren,

Your affectionate Pastor,

T. C. BROWNELL,

Bishop of the Diocese of Connecticut.

AMERICAN BIOGRAPHY.

Dr. Green was a member of the Synod, after the revolution, engaged in arranging the constitution of the Presbyterian Church. His "reminiscences" are succeeded by a New England Journal of travel in 1791, prefaced by a curious string of resolutions, which display the writer's character in an interesting light. At Boston he made an excursion in the harbor with Governor Hancock.

From 1792 to 1800, Dr. Green was Chaplain to Congress, and we have various instructive anecdotes of the interval. In the last-mentioned year there is an excursion to the Warm Springs of Virginia, where our journalist met a notorious gambler, of whom we have this life-like account:—

MAJOR WILLYS.

"He had been an officer of the regular revolutionary army of our country, but had, if I remember right, left the army at the early part of the war. He was remarkable for the size of his body, as well as for the peculiarities of his mind. He was weighed at the Sweet Spring, and I was careful to enter in my lost miscellany the result. He was certainly the largest and heaviest man I have ever seen, tall and well proportioned, but exceedingly fleshy. He had acquired a considerable degree of liberal knowledge, and was a wit and a mimic. He was at the head of all the gamblers of Virginia. When I heard of his coming to the Warm Spring, where I had got the company to treat religion respectfully, I said to a serious man who was well acquainted with Major Willys, that I was fearful he would give me trouble. 'That,' said the pious man, 'is an unnecessary fear; the Major values himself on being a friend to the clergy, and although he is dreadfully profane, he never swears in the presence of a minister of the Gospel of whatever denomination.' This testimony I found to be strictly true. He not only attended public worship, but was an advocate for asking a blessing and returning thanks at our common meals. He left the Sweet and returned to the Warm Spring before I left the former, and the report was, that at the latter place he asked a blessing and gave thanks himself. This I could easily believe, when I was credibly informed, that at the Sweet Spring he said to a circle of his gambling friends, 'Gentlemen, you may think of it as you please, and laugh at it as I know you will, and yet it is strictly true, that I never close my eyes till I have committed myself to the protection of my God.' He was dreadfully afraid of death.

"On one occasion while at the Sweet Spring he was taken with a fit of fever and ague in the night, and was greatly alarmed lest it should prove mortal. Hearing of it, I visited him in his hut the next morning. But I found him surrounded by his gambling friends, so that I had no good opportunity to address him seriously. He launched out himself into a bitter denunciation of the character of a gambler. 'Doctor,' said he, 'I have two daughters whom I love dearly, and if any man should ask me for the hand of one of them in marriage, be his character in other respects what it might, if he gambled, I would most assuredly refuse him my consent.' I immediately said, 'Major, if such are your real sentiments, why do you not quit gambling for yourself?' He made me no other reply than this, 'Alas, Doctor, I have dipped, and I must go through.' After some time he got up and went to the spring, and took a tumbler of water and then came up and addressed a company that gathered around him: 'Gentlemen,' said he, 'these sick turns that a man has, do him a good deal of good. They make him a sincere penitent for all his sins.' I stepped up to the circle that was listening to his harangue, and said to him, 'Major, I think I must take an exception to the doctrine that you are inculcating.' 'How so, Doctor?' he replied, 'I thought you would second me.' I answered, 'it seems to me a palpable absurdity for a man to say that he is a sincere penitent for his sins, while at the very time he says so, he determines to go on and commit the very same sins for which he avows his penitence.' 'You allow, then,' replied the Major, 'that for the time being it makes him a penitent.' 'That reminds me,' said I, 'of the following anecdote. A Clergyman in New England, had a negro by the name of Jack, who had a deadly quarrel with a neighboring negro by the name of Cuffy. Jack fell dangerously ill, and his master urged him to forgive Cuffy. Jack said that Cuffy was a very bad man, and he could not forgive him. 'I tell you Jack,' said his master, 'that you must forgive him, or God will not forgive you.' 'Well, massa,' said Jack, 'if I die I forgive him, but if I live, Cuffy take care.' I never saw the Major so much confounded, as by this anecdote. He arrived at the Sweet Spring before our company. The number at this spring was much more multitudinous, than at the Warm Spring, and I was fearful that if I did not break the ice at first, I should fail to do it afterwards. I got into the wake of Major Willys as we were struggling through the crowd, on our call to dinner, and said to him 'Major, will you do me the favor to call this large company to order that I may ask a blessing before we dine?' 'To be sure I shall,' replied Willys. Accordingly he made his way to the head of the table, and with a large carving knife, he struck it repeatedly, and stamping with his foot at the same time, vociferated 'silence,' which, when he had completely obtained, he turned to me, and said, 'Now, Doctor, you will please to ask a blessing.' This man, if a report I have heard be true, died a real penitent."

In 1812, Dr. Green was elected President of Princeton College, an office which he held for ten years, the great insubordination and revival being the chief incidents of his service. He subsequently returned to Philadelphia, where he died in May, 1848, having nearly completed his eighty-eighth year.

In his religious and social character he appears to have been constantly sincere, active, and urbane; one of the men who wear well, and attain and secure the confidence of the community. He was thrice married. A well finished portrait is prefixed to the volume (an unusually well printed octavo in large type) sustaining the following

PERSONAL DESCRIPTION.

"When in his prime, he was as conspicuous a person as walked the streets of Philadelphia. His features were strong, his nose aquiline and prominent, but the great feature was his eye; it was very dark, piercing, and imperative; in my youth, I thought it the most formidable I ever saw. The prevalent expression of Dr. Green's face, as of his general manner, was that of honest, fearless determination, and assurance. It took but little to make this a forbidding frown, but it could also relax into a pleasing smile, in which the twinkle of the eye was very engaging. In later years, the latter greatly predominated; but in my childhood, in common with other young persons, I looked upon him with fear. Dr. Green and Dr. Livingston wore the last of the clerical wigs which I remember. Dr. Green's was large and spreading down to his shoulders, with heavy curls; it was always powdered in the day when powder was worn. Conforming, however, to the change of mode, Dr. Green gradually reduced the dimensions of his wig, till at length it had little that was distinctive. In the pulpit, his form and face naturally acquired more dignity and energy; indeed, these were very great, so that his more finished sermons were delivered with a bodily vehemence, or what Cicero calls the sermo corporis, much beyond anything we now observe in our pulpits. On these occasions his eye was penetrating and alarming. I have often seen him, however, subdued into the gentlest modes of human aspect."

CONCURRENT TESTIMONY OF HOLY SCRIPTURE AND THE CHURCH CONCERNING THE TRAINING OF CHILDREN.

FROM BISHOP DE LANCEY'S CHARGE.

The training system is the system of the Church.

The view of the Church is to be learned from what she imposes upon those to whom she commits the spiritual charge of the newly baptized infant, received into her fold. Hear her address to the sponsors who present the infant at the sacred font—

"Forasmuch as this child hath promised by you, his Sureties, to renounce the devil and all his works, to believe in God, and to serve him; ye must remember, that it is your parts and duties to see that this Infant be taught, so soon as he shall be able to learn, what a solemn vow, promise, and profession he hath here made by you." [&c. &c. . . . See the Office.]*

In carrying out this system of training, she provides a Catechism, to be learned by the young, brief but comprehensive, and admirably adapted to infix the principles of Gospel truths upon the mind.

Thus she enjoins upon the ministry their duties in this matter:

"The minister of every parish shall diligently, upon Sundays and holy-days, or on some other convenient occasion, openly in the Church, instruct and examine so many children of his flock sent unto him as he shall think convenient, in some part of this Catechism."

Thus she speaks to fathers and mothers:

"And all the fathers and mothers, masters and mistresses, shall cause their children, servants and apprentices, who have not learned their Catechism, to come to the Church at the time appointed, and obediently to hear and to be ordered by the minister, until such time as they have learned all that is here appointed for them to learn."

In the provisions of the Church for the confirmation of her baptized children, the same principle is taught. They all suppose and imply the training of the young in the ways of God:

"So soon as children are come to a competent age, and can say the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments, and can answer to the other questions of this short Catechism, they shall be brought to the Bishop. And the minister of every parish shall either bring or send to the Bishop in writing the names of all such persons within his parish as he shall think fit to be presented to the Bishop to be confirmed."

In the Confirmation preface it is declared that

"The Church hath thought good to order, that none shall be confirmed but such as can say the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments; and can also answer to such other questions as in the short catechism are contained; which order is very convenient to be observed, to the end that children, being now come to the years of discretion, and having learned what their Godfathers and Godmothers promised for them in baptism, may themselves with their own mouths and consent, openly before the Church, ratify and confirm the same; and also promise, that, by the grace of God, they will endeavor themselves faithfully to observe such things as they, by their own confession, have assented unto."

The prayers at Confirmation imply the same system of training: "That they may daily increase in the manifold gifts of grace"—"daily increase in the Holy Spirit more and more:" That God would "so lead them" in the knowledge and obedience of His word, that in the end they may obtain everlasting life; and direct and sanctify and govern both their hearts and their bodies in the ways of His laws, and in the works of his commandments.

The same application of a training system is observable in the office for adult baptism. Thus reads the rubrical law on the subject:

"When any such persons as are of riper years are to be baptized, timely notice shall be given to the minister; that so due care may be taken for their examination, whether they be sufficiently instructed in the principles of the Christian religion, and that they may be exhorted to prepare themselves, with prayers and fasting, for the receiving of this Holy Sacrament."

Among the promises which they make is this—"That they

* In order to save room we have in some cases given only references where full extracts are made in the Charge itself. We hope our readers will search for them, as materially conducing to the force of the Bishop's arguments.—EDITOR.

will, by God's help, obediently keep God's holy will and commandments, and walk in the same all the days of their life."

The sponsors are enjoined "to call upon them to use all diligence, that they may be rightly instructed in God's holy Word; that so they may grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ; and live godly, righteously, and soberly in this present world."

And they are themselves impressively exhorted in these solemn terms:

"And as for you, who have now by Baptism put on Christ, it is your part and duty also, being made the children of God, and of the light, by faith in Jesus Christ, to walk answerably to your Christian calling, and as becometh the children of light: remembering always, that Baptism representeth unto us our profession; which is, to follow the example of our Saviour Christ, and to be made like unto him; that as he died, and rose again for us, so should we, who are baptized, die from sin, and rise again unto righteousness; continually mortifying all our evil and corrupt affections, and daily proceeding in all virtue and godliness of living."

In the same spirit the Rubric declares, that "it is expedient that every person thus baptized should be confirmed by the Bishop, so soon after his baptism as conveniently may be, that so, he may be admitted to the Holy Communion."

The principle of religious training is equally implied in the exhortations and prayers of the Holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. When the minister giveth warning of the celebration of the Holy Communion, he solemnly announces, after naming the time—"My duty is to exhort you in the mean season," [&c., &c., see first exhortation]. In the same spirit speak the other exhortations. [Which see.]

Thus also we offer ourselves to God in that solemn Sacrament:

"And here we offer and present unto thee, O Lord, ourselves, our souls and bodies, to be a reasonable, holy, and living sacrifice unto thee." [&c., &c., see Prayer of Confirmation ad finem]

And so, in conclusion, we pray that we may be guided and trained in the ways of holiness: [See the same prayer]. In this explicit and emphatic language speaks the xxxviiith Canon of the General Convention:

"It shall be the duty of ministers to prepare young persons and others for the holy ordinance of Confirmation."

"The ministers of this Church who have charge of parishes or cures, shall not only be diligent in instructing the children in the Catechism, but shall also, by stated catechetical lectures and instruction, be diligent in informing the youth, and others, in the doctrines, constitution, and liturgy of the Church."

But, although common sense may dictate the system of training, analogy from a thousand directions be found to sustain it, and the offices and prayers of the Church imply it, yet, in order to have our full reliance on its wisdom and need, we must find a sanction for it in the Word of God.

To this, then, we turn our inquiries; Does the Word of God enforce religious training upon men, or does it command a system of excitement?

Among the positive and explicit directions of the Old Testament, is the adage of the highest wisdom in the counsel of Solomon: "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." (Proverbs xxii. 6.) In the same way, Moses enjoined upon the Israelites, the faithful and persevering inculcation of the Statutes and Ordinances of God: (Deuteronomy vi. 6-9; vi. 20-25.) To train the people in the ways of God, to execute the offices provided by the law, to illustrate, guide and teach, was, as you know, in part the duties not only of the official messengers and Prophets, whom God raised up and sent among his people, but also of the tribe of Levi, separated for the service of the Jewish Priesthood. (Numbers xviii. 6.)

The Priests and Levites are called the teachers, the Ministers of the people.

With awful emphasis the Prophets denounced upon both priests and people the judgments of God, for their neglect and sins, their disregard of the statutes and ordinances of God, and exhort them to renewed obedience and holiness: (Isaiah i. 16, 20; Jeremiah vi. 16; Isaiah xxviii. 10; lviii. 1; Deut. xxxii. 46; Psalms lxxviii. 1-9.)

A similar and more emphatic system is presented to our view in the New Testament, where the duties of the Ministry, increasingly urgent and absorbing, are most impressively affirmed; and the views with which the Ministry are to be estimated by believers, are affectionately and plainly stated.

Surely I need not cite to you at full length the injunctions and exhortations in the New Testament on the subject, to enforce upon you the necessity and duty of careful, continuous, increasing, faithful instruction, guidance and training of the people in the usage of God, and of most untiring diligence and perseverance on their part in the holy work. Christian parents and Clergy are alike invoked in some of these passages: (Ephesians vi. 4; 2 Peter i. 5, 6, 7, 8; 2 Peter i. 12; Jude, 20 and 21; St. John vi. 27; 1 Peter iii. 15; St. Mark iv. 23-25; 1 John iv. 1; Hebrews ii. 1, 2, 3; 1 Thessalonians v. 4-8; Ephesians v. 15, 47; vi. 10-21.)

IGNORANCE AND CRIME.—In Preston jail, on an examination of the prisoners, more than sixty per cent. of all persons committed, including adults, were unable to name the months in the year. The same average could not tell the name of the reigning sovereign of the country. Nearly sixty per cent. had no idea of such words as "vice" and "virtue;" they were unfamiliar with them, and knew not their sense. Thirty-seven per cent. were ignorant of the Saviour's name. Fifty-five per cent. were unable to repeat correctly the Lord's Prayer, even by rote, and many who could repeat it did not understand its meaning. One woman of 33 read the second clause, "A'll be wed i' thy name." Of sixty who professed to know it and to be able to write, on being asked to set it down without copy, one only did it correctly; twenty-two produced imperfect versions; fifteen exhibited gross ignorance of the text, and twenty-two were barely intelligible. And these, be it remembered, were nearly all adults! In the case of youth the ignorance is, if it can be, still more profound.—English Paper.

POLYCARP AT PRAYER.

A Church Ballad.

By THE REV. EDWARD C. JONES, A. M.

Polycarp was Bishop of Smyrna, and had been a disciple of St. John; sought by his persecutors, he was at last discovered in the evening. He simply requested at their hands permission to pray one hour; which being granted, he prayed most fervently, so that those who were present were amazed. Brought soon after, before the Tribunal, he nobly refused to reproach his Saviour, and suffered martyrdom with unflinching fortitude. A.D. 167.—Palmer's Church History.

The eve of martyrdom—he knows it well,
For those gaunt messengers their errand tell:
The fiery baptism is his birthright now:
And shall he crouch in fear, or tamely bow
In servile awe, because a despot's rod
Becomes the rugged mean to speed his flight to God?

Grant him one hour for prayer—one little hour,
And heaven's sweet influence shall his soul empower;
And visions of his rest, his destined home,
Shall to his withered heart like sun-beams come:
Then will he rise to quit him like a man,
And follow, strong in Faith, where Stephen leads the van.

That hour of prayer—that calm, that hallowed pause,
Around his soul Devotion's curtain draws,
And John's disciple, like his Teacher blest,
Pillows his griefs upon a Savior's breast:
In high communings loses sight of time,
And own's no power but God's, and feels that power sublime.

Then the Tribunal comes—how cunning Art
Would wrench the breast-plate from the hero's heart;
"Reproach the Christ!"—no, sophistry of Hell!
Thou hast for Polycarp no wizard spell:
For six and eighty years he keeps the vow,
And could he—dare he thus blaspheme that Maker now?

Bring out the victim—prayer has made him strong,
Your faggots kindle—he will wake the Song;
The Cup of Christ!—to him the draught is sweet,
Who hears the echoes of seraphic feet:
What though by man a fiery chariot's given,
If those sweet angel bands convoy him safe to Heaven?

'Tis o'er—a life of service and of care,
And Smyrna's Bishop, with the snow-white hair,
Is on the list of Martyrs—heaven is won,
And John's disciple is as blest as John;
A Savior's smile o'erpa's a Despot's frown,
Forgot the scathing flame, when gained the radiant crown.

DEATH.

Yea, Lord! though soon my weary feet
Through the dark valley's shade shall tread,
I will not fear, if thee I meet:
No harm nor evil will I dread,
For thou, my Saviour still art near;
Thy rod and staff, they comfort me,
Thy presence shall my spirit cheer,
Thy love my strong support shall be.

Thus, at the last and solemn hour,
May I in Jesus fall asleep,
Secure that His almighty power,
Will still my soul in safety keep;
Then, "through the grave and gate of death,"
My spirit, freed from sin shall soar,
Borne on the angel wings of faith,
To dwell with God for evermore.

COLLEGES OF WHICH OUR BISHOPS ARE ALUMNI.

MR. EDITOR:—Perhaps your readers may feel the same interest with myself, in learning to what colleges we are indebted for the early education of the Bishops of our branch of the Church. As far as I can ascertain they are as follows:

Yale.—Bishops SEABURY (1748), Jarvis (1761), De Lancey (1817), and Gadsden (1804).

Harvard.—Bishops Bass (1744), and Parker (1764).

Pennsylvania.—Bishop WHITE (1765).

Dickinson.—Bishop McCoskry (1821).

Union.—Bishops Brownell (1804), Doane (1818), and Potter (1818).

Cambridge U. (Eng.)—Bishop Smith, of S. C. (1753).

Marischal, (Scotland).—Bishop Kemp (1786).

Charleston.—Bishop Bowen (1794).

Princeton.—Bishops Claggett (1764), Hobart (1793), Meade (1808), and M'Ilvaine (1816).

Columbia.—Bishops Provost (1758), Moore of N. Y. (1768), H. U. Onderdonk (1805), B. T. Onderdonk (1809), and Kemper (1809).

It may be that those who have better opportunities of getting the requisite information will complete the list.

Two Bishops, Whittingham (1825) and Lee (1837), received their theological training from the General Theological Seminary; and two, Bishops Polk (1830) and Boone (1835), graduated at the Theological Seminary of the Diocese of Virginia, while the remainder had the benefit of practical training under parochial incumbents, or received their first lessons in divinity in seminaries not of the Church to which they subsequently conformed.

NORTH CAROLINA CONVENTION.

MR. EDITOR:—

You were right in thinking that the article from your correspondent C (Arolina), last June, in reference to the proceedings of the North Carolina Convention, "was written with a friendly intention," and it is not his fault that anything done at that Convention, as appears from subsequent revelations, was not done in good faith. The more shame, say we, to any of the parties concerned!

The writer was well aware, indeed, that the members of Convention generally, partly from misapprehension, probably, of their Bishop's teaching, partly from his unfortunate connexion with a Tract, circulated under the same cover with his Pastoral letter on the Priestly Office, which Tract he afterwards declared, in "the Churchman," to contain "a false and deceptive view" of the Anglican doctrine of Confession—had come together from all parts of the Diocese in a spirit of distrust and dissatisfaction. Confidence, the bond of unity, was weakened. But after the Report of the Committee on the state of the Church, referring to the "agitation and alarm" of the Diocese, without the least personal "insinuation," after the Bishop's charge to the Clergy based upon that Report, and the sanction of that charge by the Convention of Clergy and Laity, the writer, a lover of things that make for peace, fondly hoped that all were again united, as in one faith, so in one heart. He wrote not as the organ of any party—(there is not and cannot be party in North Carolina)—but entirely without the knowledge of any one else, out of the genuine feelings of his heart. He might have sent you much Conventional gossip, but he chose rather, for your grave and reverend page, what he foolishly thought to be the happy results of unity in the Diocese. He was not prepared again to hear angry words; he calculated too confidently on the absence of foreign or extra-diocesan influence.

You grievously err, therefore, Mr. Editor, when you say "that having given what is esteemed the statement of one side, you feel bound to present the Bishop's own account." My letter was a statement of both sides, cast in the mould of Charity, "that hopeth all things."

At this point, let the writer make a remark, explanatory of his position, in penning this communication for your columns. He does not write in the character of a censor of the late Pastoral Letter of his Bishop. He trusts he feels more of filial regard for one who is over him in the Lord—something, at least, of the spirit of Mark, we may suppose, towards Paul; and he thinks that he is not presumptuous in answering thus far in the name of all the Clergy in North Carolina. We all love our Bishop. But when a "letter" (however called) or any document professes to deal with facts, in which the conduct and character of others are concerned, then thus, so far, it ceases to be an official authoritative document. The question then is fairly open for discussion. Are the alleged facts true facts? Is no injustice done by any personal statement?

With these views (most just, they seem) I propose to extend my remarks.

The Convention held at Salisbury, one of the important towns of the State, comprised an unusually full clerical representation—as appears, from the list in the Journal before me, that out of the 36 parochial clergy resident in the State, and entitled to seats in the Convention, 22 were present. There are (about) 48 parishes assessed, of these 27 are recorded in the Journal to have appointed their lay delegations; 13 parishes were actually represented in Convention.

I. "Report of the Committee on the state of the Church." That the bare mention in this Paper of a fact, mentioned simply, as such—viz: "the existence of alarm and agitation in the Diocese, arising from the impression," &c., should be construed into an "insinuation," is totally unfair. The Convention received that Report without dissent; they did so in good faith; they accepted "insinuation" against no man, least of all against their Bishop. The fact of "agitation and alarm," perhaps all unfounded, was undeniable. The Committee stated "as their full conviction, that whether the case be so or not, the far greater part of the Clergy are entirely opposed to any such departure from the doctrines of the Church"—opposed to what departure? evidently such as not really existed, (the Committee did not affirm that)—but which were supposed to exist, whether truly or not. The insinuation perception must be peculiarly sharpened that can detect innuendo against particular persons in such language as this. That the Committee on the state of the Church had a perfect right to state, as a fact, what every member of Convention already knew, the existence of alarm and agitation, is too plain to be seriously argued. Our Bishop's charge to the Clergy was grounded on that very statement—in the course of which occurs the following admission—"In respect to a particular question which has agitated the Diocese of late, the question of auricular confession, I may here express," &c.

II. "The Preamble"—adopted by Convention, authorizing publication. We must quote the Preamble in full, in order to present the force of a few remarks that will follow—"Whereas, in the Report of the Committee on the state of the Church, mention is made of certain rumours of doctrines and practices not in accordance with the principles of the Protestant Episcopal Church;—and whereas, while in the opinion of this Convention, the Church encourages her members to seek, whenever necessary, the godly counsel and advice of her pastors, yet she no where requires the practice of auricular confession and private absolution—and whereas, in the language of Bishop Hobart," &c. But it is needless to extract farther. The crime, if any, must be contained in these words. The "Pastoral" has made a false issue with this act of the Convention—as if that Body had attempted "to define the belief of the diocese"—had published the authoritative judgment of what the Bishop and his Clergy are to teach, and the people of the Diocese are to receive.

Now, the present writer boldly challenges the discovery of any such judicial determination, as alleged. Simply, is there no difference between the expression of an opinion, which shall have all the moral weight of a respectable Body as in the present instance, without dissenting voice, and that judicial determination of doctrine made by canonical tribunals, and which is binding on the conscience? Has the Convention attempted anything more than such expression of opinion? There is not a point insisted upon in the "Pastoral," as to authoritative judgment, which has not been a truism in the Diocese from time immemorial. The Convention studiously and of set design, inserted the words, "in the opinion," in order to avoid the assumption of judgment binding on the conscience. But that its opinion is entitled to no moral weight, the churchmen of North Carolina have yet to learn.

The present writer, you perceive, Mr. Editor, has dealt only with facts, involving the conduct and character of others. He agrees with you—"that in respect to the views of doctrine and discipline set forth in the Pastoral, their soundness or unsoundness, the wisdom or indiscretion of their publication, it is not our office to speak."

But others will in due time handle this matter more at large.

Your correspondent must say, in conclusion, that he refrained, with others, from voting for the Preamble. He thought the Bishop's charge to be given in good faith, and to be sufficient to calm agitation, not too unreasonable. He thought any subsequent action unnecessary and inexpedient. But the right of any deliberative representative Body to express an opinion entitled to all its moral weight and influence, he never for a moment questioned either in Church or State—nor does he suppose that any man would do so, if the proposition were fairly put.

THE MARYLAND CHURCH.

The following fragments of the old Maryland Church having come into my possession, they are sent for publication, that they may be the better preserved. The first is the confirmation certificate of the person named, who died recently in Baltimore, "in communion of the Protestant Episcopal Church."

"I hereby certify, that on April 27th, 1794, in the Parish Church of King and Queen, St. Mary's county, I confirmed Elizabeth Wilden, according to the form prescribed by the Protestant Episcopal Church, which will further appear by referring to the Records of said Parish Church; and I humbly implore Almighty God, that she may continue a faithful Disciple of Jesus Christ, and never forsake the communion of the said Church in which she has been incorporated, and by her own act and deed freely chosen in the presence of God and his Church.

"THOS. JNO. CLAGGETT,

"Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Maryland."

"Test: Chas. Smoot."

There also died in the few last months, Genl. Stansbury, an old gentleman who had reached some 90 years. The writer of this called to see him to obtain some information as to the site of the first church of St. Paul's Parish, a church which was the only place of worship for Baltimore County during a considerable time. The general said, that "old St. Paul's Church stood about 30 or 40 yards this side of where the Sollers Point Road leaves the North Point Road on the left hand side. It was built of brick: in 1745, Rev. Mr. Burdillon officiated as Rector; in 1765 it was in ruins, and the bones of the people were removed to Baltimore town. Genl. Stansbury went to school in the Vestry room attached. All the inhabitants of Patapesc Neck were Episcopalians. There was a spring near the church." The writer, in the month of October last, visited the spot. A beautiful site for a church, but the plough had left not a trace, unless a few English bricks. The spring, however, bubbled up freshly as ever, the only memento of "the fresh springs" which the Psalmist said were in his Zion. The General mentioned several things of the parsons of that day; one at Spesutia, one at Joppa, which was the county town, and another named Dean; but with the church's decay their memories had better be forgotten. At present, Methodism has overrun that section, and there is no Episcopal Church for miles. Hefurther stated, that a Methodist preacher attempted to administer Baptism to infants, but his superiors threatened him with suspension if he did so. The General himself was a Methodist, and I could not avoid thinking if the preachers by their own admission had no right to administer the Sacraments then, where do they get the right now? Perhaps it is proper to mention that the Episcopal Church was not so bad as report says, for one evil minister will be remembered when twenty good ones are forgotten. The General, to show the laxity of religious practice, said he had an uncle who had charge of him, and who one day said, "Tobias, do you know the Creed? Yes sir. Do you know the Lord's Prayer? Yes sir. Do you know the ten commandments? Yes sir." "Then," says the uncle, "I have done my duty." On telling this to a friend, he replied, "Well, that is more than many parents now do."

MR. EDITOR:—The following paragraph, from "The Parish Choir, or Church Music Book," now published in London, Eng., appeared in the number for June 1849, and I think it so well worthy of publication in this country, that I feel constrained to copy it for your admirable Paper, not without the hope that it may be attended with profit.

"REV. W. ROMAINE ON CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

"The neglect of it (singing of Psalms) as an ordinance, has led many people entirely to neglect it. I have scarce ever seen a congregation in which every one joined in singing. This is a very great abuse, because it is defeating the end of God's ordinance. He commanded Psalms to be sung for mutual edification. It was to be the service of the whole Church. All were to join: whereas amongst us it is performed by some few, and they are sometimes set by themselves in a singing-gallery, or in a corner of the church, where they sing to be admired for their fine voices, and others hear them for their entertainment.

This is a vile prostitution of Church Music, and contrary to the letter and spirit both of the old Testament and also of the New."

THANKSGIVING DAY.

In prefixing a few remarks to the following communication, we disclaim all attempt to speak with greater "authority," or in a "way" more "happy" than our well-known correspondent. The articles of "D." need not be leaded to give them weight. Still, most happy shall we be, if we can in any way further the practical object proposed. It is "a suggestion," we think, which carries the authority of truth with it, and must commend itself to every Christian heart.

Surely, when the multitude of God's mercies calls us to His Holy Temple, our hearts should be moved to show the reality of our gratitude by something more than words. Christians seem now, in a great degree, to have lost sight of the fact, that the consecration of our substance is as much a part of worship, as the offerings of our lips. Yet how strongly is this truth impressed in the teaching of Revelation, both in the Old and New Testaments. This is the inspired call—"Give unto the Lord, O ye kindreds of the people, give unto the Lord glory and strength. Give unto the Lord the glory due unto His name: bring an offering, and come into his courts." And the son of David, with wisdom inspired from on high, gives this charge, which the Church places first among the scriptural lessons in the Service for Thanksgiving Day—"Honour the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thine increase; so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine." And so under the Gospel dispensation, an angel announces from heaven to Cornelius—"Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial before God."

It is in accordance with this evident scriptural truth, and taught by God's own Word the manner wherein He would be honoured, that the Church has made the offertory a part of our most solemn act of worship. But there is peculiar appropriateness in making this a part of our Thanksgiving service. And there is equal propriety in the application of these offerings as suggested by "D." If our hearts are truly warmed with gratitude to God for His rich mercies, we must be ready and willing to share His bounty to us with those less favoured. In giving us more than others, He gives us an opportunity of showing our love to Him by dispensing freely to others. In remembering the poor, let us not forget the claims of the poor missionaries, whose need will appeal to the thankful and charitable spirit of the Church on the Sunday following Thanksgiving Day.

A SUGGESTION.

MR. EDITOR:

Next week, (Thursday, the 29th of November,) we are called upon, by the proclamation of the Executive of the Commonwealth, to observe a day of THANKSGIVING. No doubt, the "venerated custom," in compliance with which His Excellency has been led, among other praiseworthy reasons, to appoint this day of jubilee, will be generally kept. Secular business will be extensively suspended; the places of worship, almost universally, will be opened for Divine service; and devout prayers, and praises, and thanks, will go up to the Eternal Throne from thousands of pious and grateful hearts. All this will be well. But allow me to suggest something more. We have passed through a most anxious season. In many parts of our country a frightful pestilence has prevailed, sweeping hundreds and thousands into the grave. The metropolis of our own state has suffered with the rest, and contributed to meet the demands of the destroyer. And, yet, we have been most mercifully dealt with. Our city and its districts suffered comparatively little, losing not more than about one thousand of their inhabitants. Almost the whole interior of our state was entirely exempted from the disease; and so gently were we visited, that there were whole congregations of our Church in this city, from which not an individual was removed by cholera. Indeed, very few of our city churches lost any of their members by the epidemic; and not one has lost its pastor. Surely, this is a signal mercy which calls for grateful recognition, and which seems deserving of being acknowledged in some special manner. Why, then, should this not be done? Why should there not be, in all our churches, on that day, special "THANK-OFFERINGS" presented to the Lord for his gracious remembrance of us who survive, during the prevalence of the fearful disease which has taken away so many? In some parts of our country, and especially at the eastward, it is universally the custom to make collections in the churches, on Thanksgiving Day, for the poor. In some of our churches in this city this has been the practice for some years. Allow me to suggest that, this year, IT BE DONE IN ALL, and that our people be allowed the opportunity and the privilege, on "Thanksgiving Day," of presenting special "thank-offerings" for their deliverance from the ravages of the late pestilence. These grateful offerings will, of course, be liberal, and, in many cases, large; and will enable their pastors most materially to relieve the wants of the poor and destitute, at a season when their privations and sufferings are always peculiarly severe. And, besides the poor who suffer bodily privations that may thus be relieved, how many objects of religion are there that may be aided by the funds thus given, and that may most appropriately be remembered at such a time by grateful piety and Christian faith! Mr. Editor, will you not second the suggestion, and say something with editorial authority and in your usual happy way, to have it acted upon? Surely, it is one to which no reasonable objection can be made. D.

TRINITY CHURCH, PITTSBURGH.

We are happy to learn, from the following notice in the (Pittsburgh) DAILY CHRONICLE, that this Church is now restored. Instead of suffering by the fire, which nearly consumed it, this House of Prayer has risen from the ashes, with new beauty. So is it ever with THE CHURCH. What man deems calamity, God converts into a blessing. Like "the bush" in the desert, it may even be "burned with fire," and yet it is not consumed. We trust this liberal and energetic congregation may worship, with increased devotion, in their beautiful sanctuary, and that new blessings and new mercies may be poured out upon Pastor and People from Him, to whose honour and glory they have consecrated afresh this Holy Temple.

Trinity Church.—This fine building, which has always been considered an ornament to our city, but which was unfortunately much damaged by fire some time since, has undergone complete repairs, and both externally and internally it has been vastly improved.

The plan of the repairs is by Mr. Marshall, of the house of F. H. Eaton & Co., and does much credit to his judgment, taste and skill in architectural matters.

The chief alterations in the external architecture of the building are a flat slate roof, and the raising of the tower several feet higher. The tower is now of stone, finely built in consonance with the general architecture of the church, which is Gothic in style. It is surmounted by nine small spires of cut stone about 16 feet high, which give a substantial and beautiful finish to the structure. The stone work is by W. W. Wallace.

The style of the inside of the building strikes us as being very elegant, and peculiarly appropriate for a house for religious worship.

The roof is flat gothic. The design is plain, but there is a richness about it which is more pleasing than more profuse ornament would have been. The paneling and ornaments around the desk are in similar style. The work is executed in a thorough and substantial manner, by Mr. John Chambers. The whole is painted to imitate oak, by Mr. Thompson, and he has succeeded in making a job, such as we have never seen surpassed by any of its kind. The colors are rich and agreeable to the eye, and the imitation almost perfect.

The windows back of the desk and in the front, are glazed with stained glass of different colors, manufactured by Messrs. Hannen & Co., of this city. It is rich and beautiful in appearance, and adds much to the appearance of the church. The windows on the sides of the building are also in part glazed with the same kind of glass.

There is no pulpit. On a raised platform are placed two Lecterns, or reading desks, which are splendidly carved from original designs, by Mr. Hogan, of this city. They are painted in imitation of black walnut. They occupy but little space, and strike the eye at once upon entering the building as being among the neatest of the arrangements. They are draped with red velvet trimmed plainly with gold cord. On one lies the Bible and the Prayer Book, and the other is barely large enough for the speaker to handle his notes conveniently upon it. The Communion Table, with similar beautiful drapery, stands at the back of the platform, which is raised sufficiently to give the speaker a full view of his audience. At the back of the platform, two white marble tablets, engraved by Lawton, with passages from Scripture, relieve the eye.

The entire aspect of the Church is pleasant, yet grave. The coloring is not too dark, yet sombre enough combined with the tinted light from the stained windows, to strike the mind of all who enter, with the idea that it is a sacred place.

The Rev. Dr. Upfold, has himself personally superintended the improvements, and to his well known taste many of their beauties are attributable. For many years he has been the Pastor of Trinity Church, and he now has done his congregation a service which we think they all will have the taste to appreciate. All that which tends to produce in the human breast feelings of purity and holiness, or even that which drives away worldly thoughts and leaves the mind in a quiescent mood—apt to receive the teachings of truth, is surely desirable in a House dedicated to the worship of the LIVING GOD from whose hand goodness, beauty, truth and all true pleasures come. Fine architecture, sacred music, beautiful paintings, are adjuncts to devotional feeling, which, with propriety, may be gathered around a place of worship. They render the House of God a pleasant place—

"Mee"—aye, beautifully meet for the pure prayer."

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.—The Editor acknowledges the receipt of "$20 for Domestic Missions, sent to the Editor of the Banner by one of its Readers." This contribution has been forwarded to the Treasurer of the Domestic Committee.

The Vestry of Christ Church, Green Bay, Wis., gratefully acknowledge the receipt, through their Rector, the Rev. Mr. Hommam, of Five Dollars, from Mrs. E. Kohne, towards the establishment of their Parish Library, and the completion of their Communion set.

PRESIDENCY OF COLUMBIA COLLEGE.

The Trustees of Columbia College by an almost unanimous vote, have elected Charles King, Esq., to fill the important post of President of that Institution. No better selection we are sure could have been made. Adding to high attainments and large experience, great dignity of character, Mr. King is eminently qualified for such a post. He will be sure to command the respect of those he governs, and equally certain to secure confidence and raise the character of the College over which he presides. The press, with which he has been so long and honorably connected, regrets his loss, as one who never forgot that he was a gentleman as well as an editor, and proved to the world that it was possible to unite both in one.

We commend the following caution to those who get rid of troublesome applicants by recommending them to their neighbours. It is easy to give a letter of this kind, but hard to recall it. It may be a cheap method to the donor, but it is a dear one for others!

Letters of Recommendation.—The willingness of many clergymen and others to give letters of recommendation to persons of whose personal character they know little or nothing, is a great evil. No person should give to another the sanction of his name simply because he brings testimonials from others; neither ought a recommendation to be given without a thorough knowledge of the character of the individual recommended. Caution in this respect, would prevent frequent gross impositions.—Portsmouth Journal.

MR. DANA'S LECTURES.

We have great pleasure in complying with the request to publish the following notice, written by one well qualified to judge, of Mr. Dana's Lectures. We have heard from friends in Boston and New York, that these Lectures not only fully sustain the high character of their Author, but that they convey, in a most interesting manner, the profoundest lessons of practical wisdom. Mr. Dana is a devoted Churchman, as well as a Poet and Philosopher, and deservedly holds the first rank among the literary men of our country. We feel confident that these Lectures will secure deserved attention in this city. Our correspondent thus speaks in their behalf.

MR. DANA'S LECTURES.—Richard H. Dana, Esq., of Boston, delivers a course of Eight Lectures on Literary subjects, at the University of Pennsylvania; beginning on Tuesday evening next. This celebrated writer not only occupies a position of the first dignity in literature, but in spirit and in principle is a churchman of the highest and truest stamp. His philosophy receives from her guiding light a purer ray, and his genius ever yields earnest homage to her system and her truths. These lectures are acknowledged to be the ablest and most finished of his productions. Your city readers will doubtless avail themselves of the opportunity of hearing them.

To the above we add the following correspondence.

Philadelphia, Nov. 1st, 1849.

To RICHARD H. DANA, Esq. of Boston.—Sir:—We have heard, with interest, that it is your intention to pass a part of the coming winter in Philadelphia; and the hope has been encouraged, that it would be a not unwelcome occupation of a portion of your time, to read publicly the Lectures on Shakespeare, which, elsewhere given, have conferred distinction on the National Literature.

Will you give us leave to say, on behalf of this community, that the visit of a gentleman, whose literary genius has secured for him far more admirers than acquaintance, will be received with lively pleasure; and that we shall consider that an honor is done to our city, and a valuable advantage offered to its citizens, in the delivery of discourses admitted to combine the highest intelligence with the most refined taste, for the illustration and recommendation of moral truth.

If you shall finally decide to deliver these Lectures, and will be good enough to communicate your wishes as to time and other circumstances, arrangements shall be made here, adapted to relieve you from trouble.

We are, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servants,

Signed by Bishop Potter, and a number of the Clergy and Laity of this city.

To which Mr. Dana thus replies:—

Boston, Nov. 6th, 1849

GENTLEMEN:—Your letter inviting me to read my lectures in Philadelphia during my intended visit this season, is exceedingly gratifying to me. Coming from gentlemen so distinguished, nothing seems left to me but compliance. I am encouraged in this by remembering that those who are best qualified to judge in matters of literature, are generally the least exacting.

If consistent with your arrangements, I shall be glad to begin the course early enough to finish before Christmas.

With great respect, your obliged and humble servant,

RICHARD H. DANA.

THE CHURCH ADVERTISER.

How often do we see a large spirit in a small body. Indeed, it is generally remarked, that those who are small in size have most of what is commonly called "spunk." Our cotemporary proves that this is true also of newspapers. Hereafter, we shall not so much as hint that there is any thing small about this fast growing paper, which has doubled itself in the second number, and seems equally ready to double its fists at all who do, or do not, speak of it. The way we happened to overlook it for a week, was simply as follows. It fell into the close embrace of a large Methodist paper, and was completely enveloped in the folds of its affectionate friend. Not having occasion to open the latter for a week, and having no idea of the treasure it contained, we were so long unconscious of its existence. And when we found it, we tried to greet it with pleasantry, but, it seems, put a little too much spice into the compound. We hope this will make amends. In truth, we highly approved the plan of this paper, and meant to say so. We will now let it speak for itself.

OURSELVES.—In these days of Giants, we should not have been at all surprised had our Lilliputian sheet been overlooked altogether by our illustrious cotemporaries;—as it is, we are rather gratified than otherwise, at the notice we have received at their hands: and regard it as an earnest, on their part, of future kindly treatment, for which we shall always be duly grateful.

The Gospel Messenger, after announcing our advent, proceeds very deliberately, to appropriate almost our "entirety," with evident satisfaction.

The New York Churchman, finding us in this situation, identifies us as a distinct entity, and notifies us of the fact by crediting its extracts to The Church Advertiser in Gospel Messenger.

The Banner of the Cross, after "looking" for us about a week, "finds" us, and gives us a very gently sarcastic lecture for being so peculiar and so small—while The Episcopal Recorder looks on and says nothing, regarding the whole matter, we suppose, of "no consequence."

Now of all this we do not complain—nay further,—we are satisfied.

We have no objection to "The Messenger" swallowing us altogether, provided it will allow us to feed upon it. We have no objection to "The Churchman" recognizing us, even through the medium of a third body, provided it does not turn its ponderous battery against us; and we have no objection to "The Banner" being as epigrammatic and as spicy as it pleases—provided, always and nevertheless, it is so in the same spirit.

To those who have not, as yet, noticed us, we would merely remark, that we have doubled our size in one month, and we have an idea that we shall live long enough to grow into notice.

THIRTY-THIRD REPORT OF THE FEMALE EPISCOPAL BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.

Although the past year has been one of great suffering to many in our community, your managers have to acknowledge, with devout thankfulness to the Giver of all good, that the objects of your benevolence, though feeble and aged, have all escaped from the ravages of the pestilence. Yet the hand of the destroyer is ever nigh, and four of our pensioners have been gathered to their rest through maladies incident to their condition. Mrs. Cook, who had partaken of your bounty during more than a quarter of a century, had reached the age of ninety; Mrs. La Roux and Mrs. Shearer had each attained the three score and ten years allotted to man. Mrs. Splane had also reached a good old age. Twenty-five yet remain to look to you for sustenance; and as the winter approaches, other applications for admission may be expected. We pray you, therefore, to impart liberally to them of that substance which has been freely bestowed upon you by Him who is, in a peculiar sense the God of the widow.

One of your managers, too, known and beloved by all, has been called away from us in her prime of life and usefulness: thus adding another to the manifold, the silent admonitions of daily occurrence, to "work while it is yet day"—and to do with all our might whatsoever our hand findeth to do.

THE OTHER SIDE.

Perhaps some of those whose "little faith" makes them "fear" because a few, of small influence, threaten to leave the Church to go to Rome or Geneva, may find encouragement by placing the following facts alongside of the testimony of "One of Three Hundred" from Geneva.

From the Protestant Churchman.

CONVERSIONS FROM ROMANISM.—A clerical friend, to whom we are indebted for the subjoined extract, accompanies it with the following remark: "The following gratifying piece of intelligence I have extracted from the columns of the Londonderry Sentinel of October 5th. Few persons are aware in this country of the success attending the exertions of the Irish Episcopal Clergy in winning their countrymen from the deadly errors of Romanism. Upwards of ninety Priests, and many thousands of the Laity have, within the last few years, been led to embrace the doctrines of the Established Church."

A Confirmation was held at the parish Church of Kilcommon-Erri, Diocese of Killala, on Friday, the 21st ult., when upwards of 150 persons, principally adults, and converts from the Church of Rome, were confirmed by the Lord Bishop of Tuam. The Church was crowded to excess, and the large assemblage was addressed by his lordship, in one of the most feeling and truly instructive discourses it has ever been our privilege to listen to. On the subsequent Sabbath, the Bishop again preached in the Church of Belmullet, on points principally connected with the Romish controversy, and we feel assured the plain, practical discourse and admonitions of his lordship, so admirably suited to the capacities of the numbers who hung with profound attention on his words, will be blessed with the happiest results, not only in confirming the minds of those who dare to think for themselves on the most momentous of all subjects, but in stimulating the exertions of such of his Clergy as are laboring to rescue souls out of the darkness and error of Popery, and lead them into the glorious light of the Gospel and the truth as it is in Jesus.

DISPLACED FROM THE MINISTRY.—Bishop Chase reached New York on the 1st, and on the 2nd, says The Churchman, "in the presence of three presbyters, at the request of the Standing Committee, he displaced from the Sacred Ministry, Richard O. Shimeall, Presbyter, who had declared his renunciation of the Ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and his design not to officiate in future in any of the offices thereof, which declaration had been duly recorded."

The Standing Committee are entitled to credit for their prompt attention to this duty. Let us hope that they will be as prompt in the cases of the gentlemen who are journeying towards Rome.—Protestant Churchman.

We would go a step further, and hope THE CHURCH will communicate all who thus violate their solemn vows to God and man, and set at naught her high authority. They are guilty of encouraging these wicked acts who lead others to take low views of the power which God has committed to His Church on earth. She is faithless to her trust when she does not use this power in vindication of her right. If she fears to exercise her discipline, none will fear to insult her authority.

"O," in reply to "Daleth," is received, and will appear next week.

CLARKE MISSION.

We direct the attention of our readers to the admirable and most interesting communication on this subject.

We hope our Kentucky friend will soon resume his travels, and always let us hear from him.

We have received a notice of a meeting of the congregation of Grace Church, Philadelphia, held on Monday evening last, in relation to the ORPHAN'S HOME. This, and a communication on the same subject, shall appear in our next.

Five of the Bishops have united in requesting a meeting of the House of Bishops, and it now becomes the duty of the Senior Bishop to call such meeting. The Bishops requesting, are Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, New Jersey, and Western New York.—Church Advertiser.

New Publications.

FIRST PRINCIPLES OF THE DOCTRINE OF CHRIST: in a series of Discourses, delivered in the Parish of Trinity Church N. Y. By the Rev. M. P. PARKS. Philadelphia, H. Hooker, corner of Eighth and Chestnut.

We have read this unpretending little volume with great interest, and we trust, profit. Truly these are days when men sadly lose sight of the first principles of the doctrine of Christ. In a nervous style, and with great force and clearness, the author holds up these great truths to our notice, and impresses them by a reiteration which does not weary. We have never seen the "two opposing and contradictory systems of Theology" which obtain in the Church more clearly defined, and the true one more strongly enforced, than in the first of these discourses. In his most affectionate and warm-hearted dedication to his first parishioners of Christ Church, Norfolk, Va., the author truly states the real excellency of his work. Speaking of his discourses he says—"If they possess any merit, I suppose it to consist in this, that they press home, in a more plain and practical way than is common, the doctrine of baptism upon the consciences of parents." We have marked some extracts, for which we cannot find room in our present paper, and which will show the style and tone of the book. We earnestly commend the work to the attention of Christian parents and Christian teachers, as setting forth with a strong and commanding voice, and with the earnestness of thorough conviction, the first principles which form the foundation of the glorious Gospel system.

CHRISTIANS AND THEIR OFFSPRING, A HOLY PEOPLE: A Sermon, by the Rev. G. Emlen Hare, D.D., Principal of the Academy of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the City of Philadelphia.

This is an excellent practical discourse, upon a subject akin to that of the work noticed above. The text is Deut. xiv. 2. "Thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God; and the Lord hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto Himself, above all nations that are upon the earth." The three points of the discourse are: I. That a people, after this manner holy, existed before the time of Moses, and still continues to exist; II. That to this covenant people, the offspring of its members are entitled to belong by birthright, being by birth partakers of its sacredness; III. That this offspring forfeit their high and blessed privilege, unless betimes it be assumed for them by means of the appropriate sign of the Covenant?

With the first and third parts we fully agree, and rejoice to see the importance of Baptism so strongly inculcated by one, who by his great success as a teacher, and the important position he holds, has an opportunity of exercising so wide an influence. The second point of the discourse might mislead, if it were understood to teach that the children, even of Christian parents, inherit by birth aught but a corrupt nature. Guarded by the third point, we do not understand this to be the intention of the author, as this declares that baptism alone confers the real blessing. Again, this point might lead some to suppose that none have "a right" to belong "to the sacred community" but those who had a natural "birthright" as children of Christian parents. The Church holds that every child of Adam, because of its fallen nature, has a birthright title to baptism. And because they are by nature unclean, "children of wrath," therefore the necessity of the cleansing ordinance in which their sins are washed away, and they are "made members of Christ and children of God." The baptismal service teaches this truth most clearly. "Dearly beloved, forasmuch as all men are conceived and born in sin; and our Saviour Christ saith, none can enter into the Kingdom of God except he be born anew of water and of the Holy Ghost, I beseech you to call upon God the Father, that of his bounteous mercy, He will grant to this child that which by nature he cannot have." It is in no captious spirit that we make these remarks, but because we think truths of such importance should be carefully guarded against misapprehension.

SWORD'S POCKET ALMANAC AND CHURCH REGISTER. 1850. This is one of the sure signs that the year is waning. All who would be prepared for a new year, should provide themselves with this admirable and well arranged Almanac. It is too well known in the Church to need any introduction.

We have also received from G. S. APPLETON, who keeps them for sale, the third number of Phillips, Sampson & Co.'s beautiful reprint of Shakspeare. When complete, it will certainly be the finest and cheapest edition of this great writer's works ever published in this country.

From the same publisher we have received a new and beautiful edition of Watts' "MORAL AND DIVINE SONGS" with 24 illustrations. Also, as a set off to their harmony, the "CITY CRIES" with colored wood cuts. Both are favorite books with our little friends.

BY THE LAST STEAMER.

Dr. Ollivant is to be nominated by the Crown to the Bishopric of Llandaff. The Doctor is Prebendary of Brecon, Canon of St. David's, Regius Professor of Divinity, Cambridge, and Rector of Somersham, Huntingdonshire. He was formerly Vice-president of Llampeter College, in which many of the Welsh clergy have been educated. Though not a native of Wales, Dr. Ollivant must be, from his former position, and from his long intercourse with the Principality, thoroughly conversant with the Welsh language.—Ministerial Paper.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has recently been applied to by a Dissenter, who complained of the conduct of a clergyman, the Rev. Henry More, curate of Lowestoft, for refusing to bury the children of Dissenters, on the ground of their being unbaptized. The following is his Grace's answer:—

"In reply to your letter, I write to say that the curate of your parish is obliged to bury with the usual forms the corpse of a Dissenter, provided that the Church service is not objected to. The only exception is, in the case of persons dying unbaptized. These, the Rubric expressly excludes; and the Rubric differs from the Canons in being established by act of Parliament, so that a clergyman is under the necessity of conforming to it. I agree with you in the opinion that when the non-baptism is not notorious and patent, as it is in the case of the Baptist children, no curious inquiry should be made. A clergyman may be indicted for violation of the canons; but the earlier ones to which you allude, are superceded by the Toleration Act."

To this Mr. More is stated to have replied:—

"I suppose a clergyman's obligation to conform to the Rubric is to conform to them as they stand in the Prayer Book, for they have no other existence. Now the rubrical direction that the burial service 'is not to be used for any that die excommunicate,' remains in the Prayer Book unaltered. Either, therefore, the Rubric should be altered, or consistent rubricists should conform to it as it stands, and refuse to bury any Dissenter, &c., who, by the law of the Church, is held to be ipso facto 'excommunicate.'"

An anecdote is in circulation in an adjoining county, relative to the Bishop of Hereford, which we give on common report. It had been announced that Bishop Hampden would preach at Abergavenny, at which place he recently officiated for the late Bishop of Llandaff, who was unable, owing to illness, to go through the duties of an ordination. The announcement drew numbers of Dissenters to church "to hear," so they said, "their Bishop;" when, to their astonishment and infinite annoyance, his lordship preached on the sin of schism. Since this occurrence the Dissenting party call Dr. Hampden a "Tractarian."—Gloucestershire Chronicle.

ENGLISH CONFIRMATIONS ABROAD.—The Bishop of Guiana, attended by the Rev. George G. Gardiner, of Bath, has returned from his official visit to the Continent, which he undertook at the request of the Bishop of London. His Lordship administered the rite of Confirmation at Bruges, Brussels, Frankfurt, Bonn, and the Hague. The number of candidates admitted was 274:—101 males, 173 females. The Bishop, in the course of his tour, preached five times on behalf of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and the amount of 74l. 8s. 6d. was contributed. His Lordship was every where received with marks of respect and esteem; and at Rotterdam an address was presented to him previous to his departure for England.—Colonial Church Chronicle.

CELEBRATION OF THE THOUSANDTH ANNIVERSARY OF ALFRED THE GREAT.

We find in several Papers, a full account of this interesting celebration. A peculiar interest is given to this occasion, from the fact that it was improved for the great and holy purpose of strengthening the bonds of fellowship between all who speak the Anglo-Saxon language. In particular, the strongest expressions of good fellowship were made in reference to America, and one of our American Clergymen seems to have taken a large share in the proceedings. We will give a full account next week.

For the Banner of the Cross.

THE CLARKE MISSION.

A desire to communicate to others what has produced pleasure to myself, is the sole cause of this my first appearance in the columns of the Banner as a correspondent.

Finding myself lately in St. Louis, with more leisure, perhaps, than I shall soon again enjoy, and cherishing a desire to see more than I had yet seen of the vast and splendid region lying above St. Louis, known as the Upper Mississippi River Country, I determined, partially at least, to gratify that desire.

Many months might the observant traveler delightfully employ in exploring this wilderness empire, in studying its physical advantages, its capabilities to sustain populous states, and to give birth to mighty cities whose names are yet unknown to the most local maps.

The rapid sweep of affairs out here in the Northwest, in the formation of states, in the increase of population and political power, cannot be at all appreciated by those who have not made themselves eye-witnesses to the changes wrought. It is an animating subject for contemplation to the mere patriot and statesman. What should it be to the thoughtful Christian—what to the Catholic Church of God?

However sublime and stirring may be the thought, that in our time and in our land, nations do spring up around us in a day, our joy thereat must be incomplete unless we know that the Church is making exertions commensurate with the demand, to give them unto the Lord "for his possession." Have we a right to joy and peace with ourselves in this matter? What is the Church doing for the wilderness now beginning to be animate with multitudinous human life?

I heard "the voice of one crying in the wilderness, prepare ye the way of the Lord." So sweet a sound won my ear, and I resolved to visit the spot in the wilderness where that voice is raised—where it is raised by a child of the Church, by the Clarke Mission.

This Mission, your readers know, was planted by the Bishop of Missouri. It is one hundred and fifty miles above the city of St. Louis, and six miles west of the Mississippi River, in the county of Marion. This Mission has a place very near the Bishop's heart, and deserves it, too. It has been planted and nourished, and hitherto upheld by his constant prayers, and by no ordinary personal exertions.

Having been prevented from visiting it heretofore this year, by his hard and perilous duties in St. Louis, during the dreadful pestilence just past, I found he had lately determined to make a visitation to his forest child, and I was more than willing to embark on a boat bound for the "settlement" above, that I might see the mission while he was there.

Leaving St. Louis Thursday night, about eight o'clock, we arrived next afternoon about four o'clock, after a most pleasant trip, at a landing the nearest to the Mission. Hence we procured conveyance in a small two-horse hack to Palmyra, a pleasant interior town of Missouri, near which the Mission is planted.

A little delay in getting our conveyance, and the very merciful disposition of the driver to his horses, belated us; and it was not until after nightfall that we reached the village,—and still later that we rested at the Mission. Having heard of the Mission, and possessing a great curiosity to see and know as much of it as possible, I willingly accepted the invitation to make it my home during my stay. I found its hospitality quiet, but cordial and generous; and I shared enough of the firesides and tables of Palmyra to find that there too all was kind hearted and liberal.

Our untimely arrival at the Mission was not long felt. The excellent old lady, the housekeeper, soon had us a cheery supper of corn-cakes, fresh milk and butter, and tea if we desired it; and in the enjoyment of these bodily comforts, and the rapid asking and answering of questions, and miscellaneous chatting which the advent of such a party would naturally give rise to, we were soled, and soon forgot the joltings and other tribulations of our hack ride. We had in our company a youth, (son of an army officer,) who was going to the Mission to take up his abode there. He was the eighteenth then lodged in the Mission home.

After supper the hour of prayer arrived, when at the signal of a bell we proceeded to the school-room, now used also as a chapel, where we found the boys all in their places. They rose and stood, as the Bishop passed along up the aisle to the teacher's desk, and their faces grew brighter as they recognized and greeted the good man who cared for the young, and was providing a home where the poor and friendless could be sheltered and taught.

The services for the night were short and appropriate, and taken entirely from the Prayer Book. The Psalter instead of being read, was chanted by the boys, the whole family of them joining in with a readiness, accuracy, and unction that surprised us, and took our hearts completely. I had never heard the Psalter chanted before, and I confess to a silent prejudice imbibed against it, I know not how, but can only guess. Perhaps because it was a novelty, for with us poor short-lived creatures, all things are called novel, no matter how old they are, if so be we have not heard them before.

I say I did have a prejudice. But oh, how that prejudice tumbled down, and how my heart mounted up as those boys broke forth as with one voice, and hymned the glory of God in words of the sweet Psalmist of Israel, and in strains that have rejoiced the hearts of "saints in all ages." Would that every churchman and friend of God, in our land, could hear one night service at the Clarke Mission. Not for all the wealth that lies in gold would they wish it ill, or deprive those poor boys of their songs, their "songs in the night."

Prayers being ended the school soon went to rest, for they could say, as they had sung, "I will lay me down in peace and take my rest; for it is thou, Lord, only that makest me dwell in safety."

Saturday was spent by us in taking a careful survey of the Mission grounds and improvements, and in examining into its economy and discipline. The ground lies to the north of Palmyra, gently sloping toward it, so that nearly the whole may be taken in at one view from the town. As to improvements, the Mission is yet in its infancy. The ground when obtained for the Mission, had a double wooden cottage. That building at first served the various purposes of boarding-house, dormitory, infirmary, and, I believe, school-house. By great exertion the Bishop has now erected a brick house of moderate dimensions, with two stories. The lower story is used as the school-room and chapel. It is supplied with neat, durable and convenient benches and desks—one desk for every boy in front of his seat. Against the walls are black-boards, and two large maps; and above the teacher's desk a chronometer, the workmanship of a worthy member of the Church, and devoted friend of the Mission. The upper story is finished for and used solely as a dormitory for the boys. The attic, (so economical have they to be of house-room,) is plastered neatly, and furnishes comfortable lodging for a few sleepers. Adjoining the wooden cottage, a little frame addition has been built for the reception of the library, already very large and valuable. Unfortunately, this little room is inadequate and unfit for the purpose of its erection. Such a library should not be thus housed. But owing to the inadequacy of the building fund, nothing better can be done at present. The school-room just erected with so much difficulty and painful anxiety by the Bishop, is even now filled with the Mission boys, and day scholars from the country around, who are beginning to love and give their young hearts to "order" and the "beauty of holiness."

The teachers at the Mission are the self-denying Presbyters, Messrs. Wm. B. Corby and Geo. P. Comings, assisted in the English department by Mr. Joseph Corby. They work with their hands in addition to teaching and preaching without remuneration save their subsistence. They built the library-room I have just spoken of, and we found them engaged during our recent visit, in painting the wood-work of the new school-house—the paint for the purpose having been contributed by some good friends in St. Louis.

The Clarke Mission is designed to be a church-school, for the rearing and educating of boys for the Christian ministry—particularly the poor and friendless orphans, and other destitute, whose gratitude for so noble a "nursing mother," will most strongly lead them to such a dedication of themselves. It is designed to be, and with God's help will be, head-quarters and a radiating point for missionary operations, and a home and resting point for missionaries while planning and preparing for their work. I know of no place possessing equal advantages for the efficient prosecution of these several works. Living for the school is incredibly cheap. Wild fowl is abundant, and at certain seasons, I was told, is brought in by the wagon load. The best of beef can be had at the door at three cents a pound, and breadstuffs proportionably low. Milk and butter almost without price. While from its convenience to navigable rivers, all points are readily and quickly accessible. Where, then, can money be placed which will produce so large and so speedy results?

Saturday evening we saw Mr. Comings mounted on a horse and leaving the Mission grounds. We learned he was going to Hannibal, a missionary station some twelve miles distant, to preach the ensuing day. Mr. Corby preaches regularly in Palmyra.

On the next day (Sunday) the Bishop preached and administered the Holy Communion; and in the afternoon baptized one person and confirmed five, one of them a boy in the Mission. After the services he catechised the boys of the school and the children of the parish.

Monday morning your correspondent left the Mission, well-pleased and thankful, and returned to the bank of the great father of floods, to go on his way of sight-seeing, leaving Bishop Hawks among his warm-hearted friends and co-laborers, where he purposed to remain a few days longer.

The only sorrow my trip has given rise to is, that I have not some money, a few thousand dollars even, to bestow upon the Clarke Mission—this quiet, modest Child of the West, which unnoticed, unhonored, and unsung, bath in solitude and comparative neglect, though not repining, done what she could in the vineyard of the Lord. A chapel, a large school-house, and a good library-room are among her more immediate wants. Possibly while others are more clamorous, demanding even to share the vintage, this modest gleaner will be observed, and have many bunches of grapes left her, even bunches like unto those of Eschol.

LIGHT FROM A DARK PLACE.

MR. EDITOR:—

A few days ago a number of the New York Herald of 25th October was placed in my hands, containing the following extraordinary document. Thinking it a pity it should be lost, or that the Church should be deprived of the valuable information it contains, I concluded to send it to the Banner for republication.

It appears that the Presbyterians have lately been engaged in "endeavouring to trace to its fountain head" their own history, and have made the astounding discovery that Presbyterianism has no less than 480 mothers, and that these 480 mothers are "480 synagogues!" As we have repeatedly endeavored, but without success, to find the "Fountain Head" of Presbyterianism in the New Testament, this announcement was a great relief to our mind. Who the Father of Presbyterianism is, these deponents say not, perhaps the less said on this point the better. Nevertheless, something is gained by knowing who is its mother. Nobody will suspect hereafter that it was the "Mater Dolorosa;" nor, that there is any affinity between it and Rome. It seems the relationship between the Presbyterians and Jews is of the closest character: that the Jews have an "immense and increasing influence" in the Presbyterian Church; and that both, in their "faith and spiritual offices," the Presbyterians are "united to them by strong and pleasant ties." It appears, moreover, that "the love of Christ" has not constrained the Presbyterians to establish "two Presbyteries in China," but "love to the God of Israel," who deny the Divinity of the Lord Jesus. It further appears that the revelation of the "day of prophetic promise" depends upon the Jews getting upon a better footing with the Presbyterians.

Solomon says, that there is nothing new under the sun. But if what this address sets forth be the truth, Solomon was no prophet.

There are various other points of especial interest in this address, which we would fain point out, but do not wish to occupy too large a space in your valuable journal. The facts however, that Christian Churches are only "baptized synagogues," that the synagogues were raised up by Almighty God to take the place of the Jewish Temple; and that the Presbyterian ministers are "Angels," are things too important to be passed over.

As the Presbyterians are so deeply engaged in tracing their own history to "its fountain head," we live in hope that they may yet discover their Father. To find one's Father among 480 synagogues is no easy matter; still, it is worth the trial. Perseverance can accomplish wonders, and sometimes has removed mountains. The lantern of Diogenes might be found of service. Oil is cheap—camphine cheaper. In so sacred an undertaking as looking for one's Father, no pains should be spared, and expense should not be thought of. Japhet did not search for his father in vain, nor will the Presbyterians, if they use the like industry. The fact that they have found their Mother, after a search of three centuries, is encouraging.

THEM.

We have only room for the following extract from the address above alluded to.

ADDRESS OF THE PRESBYTERIAN SYNOD OF NEW YORK TO THE ISRAELITES WITHIN THEIR DISTRICT.

Brethren, "beloved for the fathers' sakes:"—

In taking the usual step of presenting a formal address to you, we introduce ourselves as an ecclesiastical body, embracing nine Presbyteries, six of which are in New York city and the vicinity, and two in China. The ordained ministers of these Presbyteries, who, for the most part are pastors settled in churches, and the lay delegates from our church sessions, are, according to our constitution, the members of our body. We come together annually as a Synod, and our chief object is to devise and carry out the best plans for the edification of our churches. We are aware of the fact that you have an immense and increasing influence among our churches and in our country: hence we have resolved as a body to acknowledge your presence and influence, and to send you an address on our common relations and interests.

In respect to both our faith and our spiritual offices, we feel ourselves united to you by strong and pleasant ties. The history of our offices of pastor and ruling elder runs back into the history of your synagogues. It is our own history which we are endeavouring to trace to its fountain head, when we examine how it was the ancient custom in Israel to convene, on sacred days in the houses of the prophets, for religious exercises; and how, after the Babylonish captivity, synagogues were erected in nearly all the villages of the Jews, for the reading of the law, for the exposition of the Scriptures, and for prayer. According to our view, the local service of the temple, with its bloody offerings, its altars, its priesthood, and its mysterious ceremonies, was never designed for all the nations of the earth, was very inconvenient for even the Jews themselves, and was unquestionably destined to accomplish its restricted and preparatory work in a few centuries, and then entirely cease; but the synagogue was the institution which God raised up, during the gradual decline of the glory of the temple, that it might carry, simply and yet effectually, all the essential truths, and all the essential benefits of the temple, to every city, to every village, and to the door of every family. The temple, with all its awful grandeur and dark ceremonies, was to be dissolved, and everything in it worth preservation was to be committed to the simple reading, exposition, and prayer of the synagogue. God was carrying out gloriously his own plans for the spread of his truth and the promotion of his glory, in all the earth, when he moved the Jews to multiply synagogues in Jerusalem, and throughout Palestine, in Alexandria and in Rome. We look back on Jerusalem before her final destruction by the Romans, with her four hundred and eighty synagogues, and acknowledge that there is the mother of us all. We see, in your present synagogues, the clearest proofs that we both have the same origin; and we find a special proof of our oneness with the ancient synagogue, in the attestation of history, that in the synagogues of the Hellenist Jews the law was read in the Alexandrian, or Greek version. The Christian Church was the baptized synagogue. Our pastor is your Sheliah Zibbur, angel of the church, or Hazan, and it is a Presbyterian peculiarity to acknowledge no office higher than this. Our elders have their origin from the rulers in your synagogues. The different services in our churches likewise run back, in their descent to the synagogue; and if the great end of God, in the establishment of the synagogue, was to spread the truth and worship of the God of Israel among all nations, we humbly claim that we are, to some extent, advancing this object, and that the true spirit of the synagogue is among us. All the oracles of God that were ever read in the ancient synagogue, are read and expounded in our churches. Men go out from us to establish Christian synagogues in the worst regions of ignorant and depraved population in our country, and there to distribute, from house to house, your own scriptures. You observe that two of our presbyteries are in China; and some of our most promising and beloved members have gone far hence, to the most unpromising and dangerous fields, not for the purpose of obtaining either the riches or pleasures of this world, but, if we know our own hearts, from love to the God of Israel, and the perishing souls of men.

Now, brethren, we most earnestly appeal to you, are we accomplishing the work of God, or are we not? Mention to us any imaginable way in which we may accomplish more for the fulfilment of the promise that all the earth shall be filled with the glory of God, than by the distribution of bibles in every family, and the establishment of our synagogues in every neighborhood. It grieves us deeply that you take no part with us; and that you even look on us with suspicion. We are convinced that you ought to be by our side; that you ought to be among the leaders in this work. Many among us severely accuse our indifference to the melancholy fact, that the great body of the house of Israel stand aloof from us. We believe that the day of prophetic promise will never be revealed in its glory while you stand at this awful distance from us. And why this separation? Where lies the fault? The standard of Judah ought to be in the front of the armies of the living God, as they go forward to invade the kingdom of darkness. Why, then, do you not unite with us, and carry on triumphantly the standard of Judah in our front?

TO BENEVOLENT CHURCHMEN.

No. 2.

DEAR BRETHREN:—In the "Banner of the Cross" of the date of Sept. 22d, appeared a short Card in behalf of the Church at this place. The kind commendation of the Editor of the Banner has given me heart to repeat my call.

We greatly need a Church building. The interests of the Holy Catholic Church require that we should have it. But we cannot have it, unless we have aid from abroad. The Church has been planted here. It has taken root; and already the fruit begins to appear. But there can be no adequate success without a use of worship. To build this, our brethren must help us. We ask for $1000. The congregation will do the rest.

We ask you not to minister to our luxury, our ease, or our pride. We simply ask you to help us build a house unto the Lord where one is greatly needed. The services of the Church are held in an upper room of the court-house, subject to many inconveniences. With suitable accommodation, the congregation would be double what it is.

Since writing my first Card, arrangements have been made for the immigration and settlement of forty or fifty Irish families in the immediate vicinity of this village. Some are already on the way, others are expected this winter; and probably all the rest in the spring. They are to be Protestants. Shall these members of the Church be suffered to lapse into infidelity, or stray into other folds, to be fed on husks instead of the bread of life? Answer it, ye that have the means of preventing such an evil. Again: one month ago the missionary had the pleasure of reporting to the Board of Missions thirty-five or forty negroes under religious instruction. What more can I say of these immortal souls? With a sad heart the missionary had to dismiss them a few weeks ago, because the County Court, on the complaint of some Godless individuals, forbid their assembling in the court-house for the purpose of being taught, and there was no other place at the missionary's disposal. Shall the Word of God be thus hindered? Shall the missionary be thus tied hand and foot, and driven from his work; all for want of a Church edifice? Answer it some of you who are able, with one stroke of your pen, to prevent all such inconveniences for the future. Be not afraid to do something handsome for the missionary cause. To many of you $1000 is a small sum. To us it would be treasure.

My dear brethren, may the good Lord inspire you with the desire to give us a mite of your abundance for the love of our Saviour Christ. Amen.

Yours in the Common Faith, W. C. STOUT, CHURCH REVIEW.

MR. EDITOR:—

Will you permit us through your columns to call the attention of your readers to the only Quarterly which the American Church has provided us with? We do not mean to intimate that the Church press has been remiss in its duty, but only that the matter has not been so fully presented as it deserves. Prior to the issue of the Church Review, a general want of a substantial Church periodical was felt and acknowledged. Since its issue, an almost universal approbation of its intellectual, moral, and ecclesiastical tone has been evinced; and yet it is an indisputable fact that its circulation is comparatively limited. Why is this? How comes it that so many of our clergy and influential laymen do not take it? It cannot, surely, arise from a want of interest in high intellectual and moral truths. We trust it is only necessary to present the matter, with some fullness, to those whom it may concern, to increase the circulation of this valuable paper. It has reached its seventh number, and, in our judgment, has improved in every respect with every new issue. As we look back at those several issues, we find that in beauty and character the articles have been all highly respectable, and some of them masterly. The last number (the October, for 1849) is now before us, and will bear more than a favorable comparison with its predecessors. The papers that strike us most are those on "Foster on Future Punishment," and "American History." The first treats its subject on the exalted principles of a true Christian philosophy, and deals with truth as a sacred and fixed deposit, and not as changeable themes, which may be bent to mean anything or nothing, as may suit the religious charlatan. The second is a profound disquisition on the general principles of History, as applied to that of our own country. It strikes us that this article would do honor to the columns of the Edinburgh or London Quarterly. It treats the subject with all the vigor and force of Guizot, and the comprehensive and far-reaching philosophy of Frederick Schlegel, but in a more truly Catholic spirit than either. It shows with all the power of demonstration that national life and its outer vesture, its history, is not the creature of political jugglers, or even of well-meant statesmen, but is the result of its original organic life, developing itself gradually and naturally, until it becomes full and matured. It teaches with invincible power that no man is fit to write history, and above all American history, who is not in the highest and truest sense of the terms a Christian and a Philosopher. If this inadequate representation of a periodical for which there has been in this country a long and deep-felt want—a periodical, firm and decided in its churchmanship, and conservative in its philosophy, without being blindly attached to things because they are old, or run mad with radical theories of progress, shall further the extension of the sound teaching of the Church Review, we shall be more than rewarded.

WHO SHALL BEGIN THE SERVICE?

MR. EDITOR:—Why is the sublime opening of our beautiful service so entirely destroyed by substituting a voluntary for the commencement? Is it rubrical? Pray, inform me; if so, of course I must not object, however contrary to my sense of fitness; but I will merely express a wish that the words should be previously read, that we might have some idea what they were chanting. But as we praise God, by proxy, in this chant, perhaps it may not be deemed necessary that we should know whether it be Latin or English. If not ordered by the rector, have any choir the right of distracting a congregation, by screaming, ad libitum? for surely no one can suppose that it is an aid to our devotions, which I believe is the object of introducing music into our services, that with one heart and one voice we might praise God. What can be more impressive than the declaration, "The Lord is in his holy temple, let all the earth keep silence before him?"

REV. SAMUEL GEORGE LITTON.

There is a voice from the tomb sweeter than song; a memory of the dead to which, at times, we turn even from the devotion of the living. How can the true and constant heart ever forget them! Are they not unchanged and incorruptible treasures laid up for us in heaven? Have they ceased to remember us with a distinguishing affection? If the unhappy Dives forgot not his seven brethren how much more, may we well believe, do the emparadised sympathize with the sorrowing survivor! Yes, they do love us still! And we are one and indissoluble in the communion and fellowship of Christ our ever-living Head! We no longer behold them, indeed; but, with a vivid recollection of their beloved image, by faith we see them within the Holy of Holies, nearer the eternal throne, while we tarry praying without, consoled by the consciousness of a united adoration. Nay, we are more closely drawn together than while they were in the body; for our intenser love is softened and purified by sorrow, and they are freed forever from all the imperfections that belong to this state of commingled good and evil, and filled with the perfect love of God. Nothing is changed between us but the relation of sight. Seen and unseen, we have but one energy of spiritual being: we are nourished by the same hidden manna: we slake our thirst in the same waters of life. We are one in the unity of Christ's mystical body. We bless God's holy name, for all his servants departed this life in His faith and fear, beseeching him to give us grace, so to follow their good examples, that with them we may be partakers of His heavenly kingdom. Their experience encourages us to expect the same mercies from the same Saviour. Their pious memory, as with a heavenly fragrance cheers and enheartens us. We ask the mantle of the ascending prophet, that we may divide with it the waters which had before owned its power. Their triumphs confirm our faith and animate our hope. Thus, then, even in the most bright and beautiful passages of our lives, let the sainted dead, in fondest memory and sweetest communings come to us! Let them come into our arms, into our hearts, that our unfled riches may be made richer! Smiling in every smile of pious thankfulness, sanctifying every sorrow, and associated every holy aspiration, they lift our longing hearts towards heaven. "Wherefore, seeing we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us. These reflections, suggested by the consoling and edifying services of the Church, celebrating the annual festival of "All Saints' Day," are consecrated to the memory of the well-beloved brother in the ministry whose name stands at the head of this article.

The Rev. Samuel George Litton, whose death was a few weeks since, very briefly announced to have taken place at Franklin, Louisiana, was first known to the writer twelve years ago, as one of a small, but firmly united, laborious, and efficient band of brethren, the Clergy of the Diocese of Tennessee. Mr. Litton was prepared for the ministry by the Rev. Dr. Weller, and, with the well-known ability of that accomplished divine, was thoroughly instructed in all the principles of an enlightened and decided churchmanship. He was ordained deacon by Bishop Ives, in 1832, priest by Bishop Otey, in 1835. He was sent first as a missionary into the western district of this State, and settled at La Grange.

At that day the whole ground was pre-occupied, and yet the Episcopal Church made friends, and took root not only in La Grange, but wherever Mr. Litton extended his labors. His success was not the result of any compromise of principle, or of entangling alliances with the surrounding denominations. Speaking the truth in love, his Christian meekness and gentleness gave no offence to others, even while he zealously set forth and maintained our peculiar polity and practice. After some thirteen years of self-sacrificing labor, during which the parish was remarkably peaceful and prosperous, his failing health compelled him to leave La Grange for a more southern location. He had so much endeared himself to the people by his ardent piety, his untiring zeal, his abounding labors of love, his unusually pleasing manners, and his blameless life, that they mourned the removal of their beloved pastor with the truest widowed affection, and have ever since been regarded with a tender sympathy by all the other parishes of the diocese, as for a sadly bereaved sister. After Mr. Litton's settlement at Franklin, La., his health was slightly improved, and he entered upon the familiar duty of breaking new ground for the Church, with his accustomed activity and address. He laid deep and broad, and lasting foundations upon which it will be comparatively easy for another to build. The character of the population was peculiar, quite a different phase of Dissent from that which he had so happily disarmed and conciliated in his former position. But his judgment and discretion, with an unusual combination of gentleness in manner, and firmness in action, overcame all difficulties, and he had nearly completed his new church building, without aid from abroad, or debt at home, when his health again failed and failed entirely. "Better wear out than rust out," was the cheerful reply given to all his friends' foreboding suggestions of relaxation from the exhausting labors with which his untiring spirit over-tasked the too feeble body. Mr. Litton had been consumptive for many years; but in ordinary circumstances his useful life might have been considerably prolonged. The Cholera was however now raging in his parish, and he counted not his life dear to himself, so that he might minister to the sick and dying. He was glad to spend and be spent in the cause and service of his Divine Master. With his harness on, in the thickest of the fight, did this faithful soldier and servant of Christ receive the summons of Death, to take higher rank, in a more illustrious service, nearer the person of the Great Captain of our salvation. "Faithful in few things, made ruler over many."

As a son and brother, a husband and father, a friend and neighbor, in all the relations and duties of life, Mr. Litton was most exemplary. He has left the rich legacy of a spotless name, and a heavenward attraction to his family and friends, as well as of permanent good to the Church he so ardently loved and so faithfully served. In the calendar of the Diocese of Tennessee, the name of Litton, with that of Alston, once the justly boasted jewels of our beloved Diocese, are written and illuminated in characters of unfading beauty.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK FOR 1850.

"THE BOOK OF THE NATION."
The Oldest Magazine in America—Published by the present Proprietor for Twenty Years.

EDITED BY MRS. SARAH J. HALE.

THE Publisher of the Lady's Book, knowing how completely he put down all opposition in 1849, and being assured that the public is also acquainted with this fact, deems it only necessary to say that in 1850 he will improve on 1849; and he will, as usual, give more reading and more engravings than his contemporaries. Perhaps a little comparison of what he did last year, and what his adversaries did, may be amusing, if not instructive to those about to subscribe for a monthly magazine. One thing the public may be assured of, that the publisher of Godey's Lady's Book will not falsify his prospectus, as he deems it as great a sin to tell a falsehood in print as it is to give utterance to a verbal one. Listen to the universal voice of the American Press.—

Comparison between Godey and the other Philadelphia Monthlies.

In 1849, the Lady's Book gave 916 pages—which is 116 more than one, and 148 more than another; 136 engravings monthly. He gave 281 engravings—among which were 20 colored, and 93 full page—which is 136 more than one, and 180 more than the other.

We gave, in each number, a piece of music, printed separately on tinted paper, making 24 pages, or 12 pieces in a year. To show the cheapness of the Lady's Book, this same music, if bought separately at the music stores, would cost exactly the price of the whole year's subscription—$3.

It will be seen, at a glance, which is the cheapest magazine for $3, when you get 116 pages of reading more than one magazine, and 148 more than another; 136 engravings more than one, and 180 more than the other; to say nothing of the superiority of our engravings, among which are 20 colored, and their usefulness to ladies. The Colored Fashion Plates alone cost as much as nearly all the engravings of either of the other magazines. These endeavors to please our subscribers have cost us an immense sum of money; but if honesty of purpose and a positive dislike to falsehoods in prospectuses, will entitle a publisher to a large subscription list, the Lady's Book is entitled to it.

Some of our Peculiar Embellishments.

Ladies' Work Table, which comprises every kind of Needlework, Embroidery, Knitting, Netting, Crochet, Patterns for Caps, Chemisettes, Children's Clothes, Wedding Dresses, In-door and Out-door Costumes; Birds of America; Colored Flower Plates; Model Cottages and Furniture; Fashionable do.; Lace-Work; Vignette Plates at the head of articles, etc. etc. All the above are illustrated by engravings.

And, in 1850, will also be given a set of engravings, illustrative of

THE COSTUMES OF ALL NATIONS.

With descriptions by Mrs. Hale. Most of the old features of the Book that were so popular last year, will be retained, and new ones added as they may suggest themselves to the publisher.

A NEW NOVEL.

By W. GILMORE SIMMS, will be one of the Features for 1850.

Our Reading Matter.

We have long stood at the head of the magazine world for our contributions; they are always moral and instructive, and such as may be placed before a family without hesitation. This department is under the control of MRS. SARAH JOSEPHA HALE, whose name alone is a sufficient guarantee for the propriety of the Lady's Book. We may say the same of our engravings. We will never, as is done by a cotemporary, publish indecent model-art pictures, such as no parent would allow a child to look at.

We will not here parade the names of our contributors: it is not necessary. Godey's Lady's Book and its proprietor are too well known for us to take up space to enumerate the names of those who, by their writings, have placed themselves at the head of the authors of this country. One thing our friends will oblige us by not doing—confering upon us the title of "The Blackwood of America." We do not wish to bear the appellation of a magazine that is opposed to the interests of this country, and always loud in its denunciations of it; and, besides, Blackwood does not publish Fashions. To sum up all, we unhesitatingly state, that

We have much more than fulfilled all our promises, and enter upon the year with a new one, which those who know us—and who does not?—will believe.

John Wesley," "Wesley preaching in the Gwena Amphitheatre," "America Guided by Wisdom," "General Taylor and Old Whitey," "Likeness of the Rev. John Wesley," "Do. of his co-laborer, the Rev. John Fletcher"—the last two, though separate engravings, we count only as one premium.

Single number of the Lady's Book, 25 cents.
The above are large-sized parlor prints. The "Death-bed of Wesley" contains many portraits; "Wesley preaching in the Amphitheatre" contains hundreds of figures, and cost $1500 to engrave it. "America Guided by Wisdom" is a very large line engraving, and cost $1800 to engrave it. "General Taylor and Old Whitey" is one of the largest of the General Taylor prints, and is engraved from an original painting, at a cost of $1000. The heads of Wesley and Fletcher are of a good size for framing.

These Plates cannot be purchased at the Stores at less than $3 each.

Premiums are only sent when the subscriptions are remitted direct to the Publisher.

The LADY'S BOOK for 1850 will contain several hundred good engravings.

Postmasters and others sending Clubs will oblige us very much by having them all addressed to one name. It is no inconvenience to them, and will be a great favor to us.

PREMIUMS TO THE TOWNS SENDING THE LARGEST NUMBER OF SUBSCRIBERS.

ORPHAN HOME.

At a meeting of gentlemen connected with Grace Church, Philadelphia, held at the request of the Rector, on Monday Evening, Nov. 19th, 1849, the Rector being in the Chair, and having opened the suitable collects—

On motion, Charles E. Lex was appointed Secretary.

The Rector stated that the object of the meeting was to devise measures for the establishment of an Orphan Home in connection with the Episcopal Church in this city; and the Rev. Dr. Ducachet having addressed the meeting, at the request of the Rector, upon the subject,

On motion of S. V. Merrick, Esq., a committee of three was appointed to draft appropriate resolutions for the consideration of the meeting.

The Chair appointed S. V. Merrick, J. W. Claghorn and J. Bispham, said committee.

After consultation, the committee offered the following Preamble and Resolution, which, on motion of Mr. J. W. Martien, were unanimously adopted.

Whereas, the Rev. Mr. Suddards, Rector of Grace Church, Philadelphia, in a sermon preached on the 18th inst., presented to his congregation the necessity that exists of providing a suitable Asylum for the nurture and education of the poor orphans of Episcopalians, and requested the male members of the congregation to convene for the purpose of devising measures to carry out the views laid before them:

And whereas, this meeting, convened under the call of their Rector, fully concur in the propriety of the measure, which they esteem a noble charity, well worthy the cordial support of every Christian Philanthropist—will co-operate in maturing and carrying the plan into execution:

And whereas, in the opinion of this meeting, the proposed charity is one which, to be fully efficient, ought to embrace the whole body of Episcopalians in our community:

And whereas, the Rector and the Rev. Dr. Ducachet have informed this meeting, that at a meeting of the Bishop and Clergy of the city, held this day, the whole subject was discussed, and met the cordial approval of all, the Right Rev. the Bishop agreeing to address a letter to all the Clergy in the city and county, urging its claims, and requesting immediate action in these parishes:

Therefore, Resolved, That a committee be appointed at this meeting to ascertain what contributions can be obtained in this parish towards the erection and establishing of a suitable Orphan Home.

On motion of Mr. Claghorn,

Resolved, That a committee of nine be appointed by the Rector to carry the foregoing resolution into effect. Whereupon the Rector appointed Messrs. Joseph N. Withers, Col. T. Robinson, J. Bispham, G. H. Bicking, C. E. Lex, Marshall Hill, Alexander Brown, S. V. Merrick, and Franklin Fell, said committee.

On motion, Resolved, That the Rector be requested to call a meeting of this parish whenever the committee are prepared to report.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be transmitted to the Bishop, and published in the Episcopal Recorder and Banner of the Cross.

TENNESSEE.

On Sunday, A. M., the 21st ult., in Calvary Church, Memphis, Bishop Otey admitted to the sacred order of Deacons, Mr. Reginald Heber Weller, son of the late reverend and much esteemed Editor of the Weller Tracts. Morning prayer was said by the Rev. Wm. Fagg, rector of Emmanuel Church, Lagrange, assisted in the lessons by the Rev. Andrew Matthews of the Church of the Holy Evangelists, Hernando, Mississippi. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Dr. Page, rector of Calvary Church, Memphis, and the sermon preached by the Bishop, from 1st Cor. 4th chap. 1st and 2d verse. "Let a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God. Moreover, it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful."

Without dwelling upon the usual commonplaces in reference to the preacher of the day, suffice it to remark, that at the close of his discourse, invoking the spirit of Elijah to rest upon Elisha, he touchingly and impressively alluded to the well-fought field in which the venerable father of the candidate had expended his latest energies, and yielded up his breath, in the cause of the Church's Great Lord.

On the Wednesday following, the 24th ult., likewise in Calvary Church, Memphis, Mr. Wm. M. Steele, Deacon, was ordained by Bishop Otey to the holy function of a Priest. Morning prayer was said by the Rev. Andrew Freeman; the sermon preached by the Missionary Bishop for Arkansas and Texas; and the candidate presented by the Rev. Dr. Page, who, together with the Rev. Mr. Fagg, united with the Bishop in the imposition of hands.

NEW YORK.

Episcopal Duties, by the Bishop of New Hampshire, for the Diocese of New York.

On Thursday the 15th inst., the Bishop of New Hampshire consecrated to the worship of Almighty God, St. George's Church, Newtown, Long Island. The Instrument of Donation was read by the Rev. William Walsh, Rector of St. Saviour's Church, Maspeth, and the Sentence of Consecration by the Rev. J. Carpenter Smith, Rector of St. George's Church, Flushing. Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Rowland Hill Bourne, Rector of St. Thomas's Church, Brooklyn. The Lessons were read by the Rev. Dr. Haight, Professor of Pastoral Theology in the General Theological Seminary. The Ante-Communion Service was said by the Bishop, the Rev. Dr. Johnson, Rector of Grace Church, Jamaica, reading the Epistle, and the Rev. William H. Newman, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Flatbush, reading the Gospel. The Sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Tyng, Rector of St. George's Church, New York. The Rite of Confirmation was then administered by the Bishop—the Rector, the Rev. George A. Shelton, reading the appointed Preface—to five persons, who were subsequently addressed by the Bishop in a most impressive manner.

St. James's, Newtown, is one of our most ancient parishes. The old church, after having been oft repaired, it was found necessary to abandon; and the present chaste and beautiful edifice was erected, at a short distance from the former, and on a more eligible site. The day of the Consecration was auspicious in the extreme, and the church was filled with a large congregation, who were apparently much interested in the solemn services of the occasion. The Rector and the parishioners have our warm congratulations.

In the afternoon of the same day the Bishop visited St. George's Church, Flushing, preached, and confirmed thirty-one persons. The number of candidates for this Holy Rite is a most gratifying evidence of the prosperity of this parish.

November 16, at Little Neck, preached and confirmed 9. Afternoon, at Manhasset, preached and confirmed 2. November 17, at Glen Cove, preached and confirmed 9. Afternoon, at Oyster Bay, preached only. November 18, at Cold Spring Harbor, preached and confirmed 3. Afternoon, at Huntington, preached and confirmed 4.

At Caroline Church, Setauket, Tuesday, November 20, confirmed 3, and admitted the Rev. T. Jarvis Carter, Deacon, officiating in Calvary Church, New York, to the Holy Order of Priests. The Rev. S. L. Southard, of Newark, preached. The candidate was presented by his father, the Rev. Lawson Carter, who united with the Rev. Messrs. Southard, Noll, Davis, F. W. Shelton, and Diller, in the imposition of hands.—Churchman.

EPISCOPAL ACTS BY BISHOP MEADE SINCE OUR LAST NOTICE.—At St. Paul's Church in Culpeper county, seven persons were confirmed on the 17th of October: two persons at Smithfield, Jefferson county, on the 5th of November. On the 6th, the new church at Leetown was consecrated. On the 7th, three were confirmed at Shepherdstown. On the 8th, seven at Harpers Ferry, where a church is going up. On the 10th, one at Martinsburg. On the 11th, 9 at Hedgesville. On the 12th, one at Back Creek. On the 13th, one at Bunkers Hill, where preparations are making for a new church.—Southern Churchman.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

MR. EDITOR:—I see in a paper of to-day, an extract from a Buffalo paper, (the Buffalo Patriot and Journal,) which originally appeared in the Episcopal Recorder, of Philadelphia, under the heading of "Episcopacy in Western New York." It has led me to look into the Episcopal Journal of the Convention of Western New York.

The point to which my attention was directed, was the proportion which the amount of contributions to benevolent institutions exterior to the Parish, held to the number of communicants in each Parish; which is the common way of testing the Parochial benevolence. The result of my examination was different from what I had expected. To reach it, I divided the sum contributed by each Parish for all missions and other church objects exterior to the Parish, by the whole number of communicants, and that gave me the amount for each communicant. I find it stands thus in regard to several leading Parishes in this Diocese:—

Zion Church, Pierpont Manor, gave for each communicant	$5 00
Grace " Utica, " " " "	2 91
St Paul's " Oxford, " " " "	2 81
" " Buffalo, " " " "	2 39
" " Syracuse, " " " "	2 39
Trinity " Buffalo, " " " "	2 31
Christ " Oswego, " " " "	2 07
Trinity " Utica, " " " "	1 83
" " Geneva, " " " "	1 71
St Luke's " Rochester, " " " "	1 49
St Peter's " Auburn, " " " "	1 28

I find also, that for their 780 communicants, the Rochester Churches have contributed for objects within the Diocese and exterior to the Parish, thirty-six cents for each communicant; and for their 506 communicants, the Buffalo Churches have contributed one dollar and forty-two cents for each communicant; while, for all benevolent church objects, in and out of the Diocese, apart from Parish objects, the Rochester Churches have contributed ($1.05) one dollar and five cents, and the Buffalo Churches ($1.65) one dollar and sixty-five cents for each communicant.

It will gratify several of your readers if you can find a place in your paper for this brief article.

THE DANDIES REBUKED.

OR THE OLD SURTOUT.

I had taken a place on the top of one of the coaches, which runs between Edinburgh and Glasgow, for the purpose of commencing a short tour in the Highlands of Scotland. As we rattled along Princess street, I had leisure to survey my fellow-travellers. Immediately opposite to me sat two dandies of the first order, dressed in white great-coats and Belcher handkerchiefs, and each with a cigar in his mouth, which puffed away with a marvelous complacency. Beside me sat a modest and comely young woman in a widow's dress, with an infant about nine months old in her arms. The appearance of this youthful mourner and her baby indicated that they belonged to the lower class of society; and though the dandies occasionally cast a rude glance at the mother, the look of calm and settled sorrow which she invariably at such times cast upon her child seemed to touch even them, and to disarm their coarseness. On the other side of the window sat a young gentleman of plain, yet prepossessing exterior, who seemed especially to attract the notice of the dandies. His surtout was not absolutely threadbare, but it had evidently endured more than one season, and I could perceive many contemptuous looks thrown upon it by the gentlemen in the Belcher handkerchiefs. The young gentleman carried a small portmanteau in his hand—so small, indeed, that it could not possibly have contained more than a change of linen. This article also appeared to arrest the eyes of the sprigs of fashion opposite, whose wardrobes, in all probability, were more voluminous; whether they were paid for or not might be another question.

The coach having stopped at the village of Corstorphine, for the purpose of taking up an inside passenger, the guard observing that the young gentleman carried his portmanteau in his hand, asked leave to put it into the boot, to which he immediately assented. "Put it fairly into the centre, guard," said one of the dandies—"Why so, Tom?" inquired his companion. "It may capsize the coach," rejoined the first, a sally at which both indulged in a burst of laughter; but of which the owner of the portmanteau, though the blood mounted slightly into his cheek, took no notice whatever.

While we were changing horses at the little town of Uphall, an aged beggar approached, and held out his hat for alms. The dandies looked at him with scorn. I gave him a few half pence; and the young widow, poor as she seemed, was about to do the same, when the young gentleman in the surtout laid his hand gently on her arm, and dropped a half-crown into the beggar's hat, made a sign for him to depart. The dandies looked at each other. "Showing off, Jack," said the one. "Ay, ay, successful at our last benefit," you know, rejoined the other, and both again burst into a horse-laugh. At this allusion to his supposed profession, the blood again mounted into the young gentleman's cheek, but it was only for a moment, and he continued silent.

We had not left Uphall many miles behind us, when the wind began to rise, and the gathering clouds indicated an approaching shower. The dandies began to prepare their umbrellas; and the young gentleman in the surtout, surveying the dress of the widow, and perceiving that she was but indifferently provided against a change of weather, inquired of the guard if the coach was full inside. Being answered in the affirmative, he addressed the mourner in a tone of sympathy; told her there was every appearance of a smart shower; expressed his regret that she could not be taken into the coach; and concluded by offering her the use of his cloak. "It will protect you so far," said he, "and at all events, it will protect the baby." The widow thanked him in a modest and respectful manner, and said that, for the sake of the infant, she should be glad to have the cloak, if he would not suffer from the want of it himself. He assured her that he should not, being accustomed to all kinds of weather. "His surtout won't spoil," said one of the dandies, in a voice of affected tenderness, "and besides, my dear, the cloak will hold you both." The widow blushed; and the young gentleman turning quickly around, addressed the speaker in a tone of dignity which I shall never forget. "I am not naturally quarrelsome, sir; but yet it is quite possible you may provoke me too far." Both the exquisites immediately turned as pale as death; shrunk in spite of themselves into their natural insignificance; and they scarcely opened their lips, even to each other, during the remainder of the journey.

In the meantime, the young gentleman with the same politeness and delicacy, as if he had been assisting a lady of quality with her shawl, proceeded to wrap the widow and her baby in his cloak. He had hardly accomplished this when a smart shower of rain, mingled with hail, commenced. Being myself provided with a cloak, the cape of which was sufficiently large to envelope and protect my head, I offered the young gentleman my umbrella, which he readily accepted, but held it, as I remarked, in a manner better calculated to defend the widow than himself.

When we reached West Craig's Inn, the second stage from Edinburgh, the rain had ceased; and the young gentleman, politely returning me my umbrella, began to relieve the widow of his dripping cloak, which he shook over the side of the coach, and afterwards hung it on the railing to dry. Then turning to the widow, he inquired if she would take any refreshment; and upon her answering in the negative, he proceeded to enter into conversation with her as follows:

"Do you travel far on this road ma'am?"

"About sixteen miles farther, sir. I leave the coach six miles on the other side of Airdrie."

"Do your friends dwell thereabouts?"

"Yes, sir, they do. Indeed, I am on the way home to my father's house."

"Yes, sir," said the poor young woman, raising her handkerchief to her eyes, and sobbing audibly, "I am returning to him a disconsolate widow, after a short absence of two years."

"Is your father in good circumstances?"

"He will never suffer me or my baby to want, sir, while he has strength to labor for us; but he is himself in poverty—a day laborer on the estate of the Earl of H—."

At the mention of this nobleman's name, the young gentleman colored a little, but it was evident that his emotion was not of an unpleasant nature. "What is your father's name?" said he.

"James Anderson, sir."

"And his residence?"

"Blinkbonny."

"Well, I trust, that though desolate so far as this world is concerned, you know something of Him who is the father of the fatherless and the judge of the widow. If so, your Maker is your husband, and the Lord of Hosts is his name."

"Oh! yes, sir, I bless God, that through a pious parent's care, I know something of the power of Divine grace, and the consolations of the Gospel. My husband, too, though but a tradesman, was a man who feared God above many."

"The remembrance of that must tend much to alleviate your sorrow."

"It does, indeed, sir, at times; but at other times I am ready to sink. My father's poverty and advancing age, my baby's helplessness and my own delicate health, are frequently too much for my feeble faith."

"Trust in God, and he will provide for you, be assured he will."

By this time the coach was again in motion, and though the conversation continued for some time, the noise of the wheels prevented me from hearing it distinctly. I could see the dandies, however, exchange expressive looks with one another; and at one time, the more forward of the two whispered something to his companion, in which the words "Methodist Parson," alone were audible.

At Airdrie nothing particular occurred; when we got about half-way between that town and Glasgow, we arrived at a cross road where the widow expressed a wish to be set down. The young gentleman, therefore, desired the driver to stop, and springing himself from the coach, took the infant from her arms, and then, along with the guard, assisted her to descend. "May God reward you," she said, as he returned the baby to her, "for your kindness to the widow and the fatherless this day."

"And may he bless you," replied he, "with all spiritual consolation in Christ Jesus!"

So saying he slipped something into her hand; the widow opened it instinctively; I saw two sovereigns glitter on her palm; she dropped a tear upon the money, and turned round to thank her benefactor; but he had already resumed his seat upon the coach. She cast towards him an eloquent and grateful look; pressed her infant convulsively to her bosom, and walked hurriedly away.

No other passenger wishing to alight at the same place, we were soon again in a rapid motion towards the great emporium of the West of Scotland. Not a word was spoken. The young gentleman sat with his arms crossed upon his breast; and, if I might judge by the expression of his fine countenance, was evidently revolving some scheme of benevolence in his mind. The dandies regarded him with blank amazement. They also had seen the gold in the poor widow's hand, and seemed to think that there was more under that shabby surtout than their "puppy brains" could easily conjecture. That in this they were right was speedily made manifest.

When we had entered Glasgow, and were approaching the Buck's Head, the inn at which our conveyance was to stop, an open travelling carriage, drawn by four beautiful horses, drove up in an opposite direction. The elegance of this equipage made the dandies spring to their feet.—"What beautiful greys!" cried the one, "I wonder whom they can belong to?" "He is a happy fellow, any how," replied the other; "I would give half of Yorkshire to call them mine." The stage-coach and the travelling carriage stopped at the Buck's Head at the same moment, and a footman in laced livery, springing down from behind the latter, looked first inside and then at the top of the former, when he lifted his hat with a smile of respectful recognition.

"Are all well at the castle, Robert?" inquired the young gentleman in the surtout.

"All well, my lord," replied the footman.

At the sound of that monosyllable, the faces of the exquisites became visibly elongated; but, without taking the smallest notice of them or of their confusion, the nobleman politely wished me good morning; and descending from the coach, caused the footman to place his cloak and despoiled portmanteau in the carriage. He then stepped into it himself, and the footman getting up behind, the coachman touched the leader very slightly with his whip, and the equipage and its noble owner were soon out of sight.

"Pray, what nobleman is that?" said one of the dandies to the landlord, as we entered the inn.

"The Earl of H—, sir," replied the landlord; "one of the best men, as well as one of the richest in Scotland."

"The Earl of H—!" repeated the dandy, turning to his companion: "what asses we have been! there's an end to all chance of being allowed to shoot on his estate."

"Oh! yes, we may burn our letters of introduction when we please," rejoined his companion; and silent and crest-fallen, both walked up stairs to their apartments.—Christian Observer.

RIGHT NAMES.

FROM DR. HARE'S SERMON.

There are those to whom it will seem novel to hear that any but communicants have aught of connection, or title to connection, with the Church. "Is it not," they will exclaim, "when persons are examined by a minister, and admitted to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, that they first begin to belong to the holy commonwealth?" No, friends. However much this unscriptural way of talking may be in vogue, it is utterly unwarranted: nowhere in the Bible will you find authority or precedent for such language. The participation in the Lord's Supper is one of the privileges of church membership: without it, no church membership can be worthy; no individual of the holy people can be obedient to his Lord, or safe from danger of being cut off from the community, at the second coming of the Son of Man. But where, in the sacred books, is such participation represented as the means of obtaining membership in the church? The method appointed by our Lord for bringing into his body persons previously aliens from that community, is baptism. For what says St. Paul? "As many as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ." "We are all baptized into one body." What was the transaction provided by our Saviour himself, as the means whereby his Twelve should inscribe men with the name of the Holy Trinity? His language was, "Go teach all nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost." Baptism is the means, or ordinance, whereby foreigners can be naturalized into this commonwealth—the holy people—just as circumcision, and not the passover, was the ordinance whereby persons might be incorporated into the family of Abraham in ancient times. Greatly it is to be desired that Episcopalians in common conversation would use language accordant with this scriptural truth: would leave to others a style of speaking which conflicts with our Prayer-book from beginning to end; is sanctioned by the public standards of no religious denomination whatever; and, like all other unscriptural style, tends to confuse the mind, and give a wrong complexion to the biblical statements, when we betake ourselves to the searching of the sacred books.

RELIGIOUS TRAINING OF THE YOUNG.

FROM BISHOP DE LANCEY'S CHARGE.

SPECIAL LECTURES TO THE YOUNG.—You will find a great advantage in especial courses of lectures and sermons to the young of your flocks on religion; opening to them the evidences of its truth, explaining its doctrines, developing its history, discriminating it from errors, displaying its institutions, presenting its true character as a divine institution, to be studied, obeyed, adhered to, cherished, and reposed in, as God's appointed way, through Christ, to virtue and duty on earth, and to happiness and glory in heaven. Forty years ago this system of lecturing to the young was adopted by the venerable Bishop White, who thus prefaces the publication of his lectures: "Of the several ways essayed by the author at different times for the discharge of an obvious parochial duty, the delivery of the following lectures was one. They were drawn up, not for the press, but for annual delivery during Passion-week and on the week-day holidays of Easter; with an accommodation to the administering of the rite of Confirmation in that season."

"The principal design in the lectures was to prepare the mind of young persons for Confirmation, by opening and proving the institution, doctrines and duties of Christianity held by Christians generally: all of which are here conceived to come within the scope of the short compend (the catechism) undertaken to be explained."

The mere naming the subjects of these lectures and dissertations, will evince to you the course of instruction presented by this venerable Prelate and Pastor: The Baptismal Covenant; The Apostles' Creed; The Ten Commandments; The Lord's Prayer; The Sacraments; Confirmation; The Ministry; Public Service; Baptismal Regeneration; The Catholic Church; Forgiveness of Sins; Redemption; The Worship of Images; The Lord's Prayer as a form; Baptism; The Eucharist; The Spiritual Jurisdiction claimed by the Bishop of Rome; Episcopacy; Of Tradition; Forms of Prayer in the Jewish and Christian Churches; The Public Worship of the Church.

Such were the topics on which this time-honoured Father sought to have the youth of his flock duly instructed by himself and by his assistants in the Parish, in training them in the ways of God.

INTERCOURSE AND CONVERSATION.—Intercourse and conversation with the youth of the congregation, in matters connected with religion and the Church, is another branch of exertion most important in the due training of a Christian flock.

Without looking to the cause, we must all, I think, deplore the fact, that the topic of religion and the Church, aside from controversial relations, is to a wide extent an excluded topic in the intercourse of Christians. It is almost wholly crowded out of notice, even in domestic intercourse. Its introduction is often regarded as obtrusive. The mere naming of it startles anxiety, suppresses cheerfulness, closes many lips, and gains for the clergyman the character of a fanatic, bigot or ascetic—an austere and unwelcome visitor. It demands, I admit, in the existing state and tastes of society amongst us, no little skill, tact, and wisdom, in so referring to religious duties, claims, obligations, truths and exactions, as not to mar more than serve the cause of our Master, and the holy influence of His Gospel and Church. But still, my brethren, we cannot escape the obligation to use this species of address to the hearts and consciences of the young as well as others. We are not to forget that "a word in season, how good is it!"—and if you accustom yourselves to confer with the youth of your flocks in an easy, friendly and cheerful tone and spirit on religious subjects, I have no doubt you will find it a sure pathway to their minds for instruction, and to their hearts for reciprocal attachment and regard.

APPROPRIATE BOOKS.—The circulation of judicious books and tracts among the young, is another mode of training them in the ways of God. Indeed, I wish it were in the power of you all to present to each youth preparing for Confirmation, not a tract only, but some volume on religious topics, to be preserved by him as a memorial of the pastoral interest felt in his welfare. But the means of none of us enable us to discharge the duty in this way. By the agency, however, of well-selected tracts and smaller volumes within your reach, it may to some extent be partially fulfilled. In these days of suspicion and distrust, of insidious error and defective truth, of extreme opinions in opposite directions, when fundamental verities are assailed, and long held doctrines and institutions are frowned upon, and the minds of some are turning to the contemplation of important changes in our book of worship, as one means of counteracting the tendency to an erratic step from the Church, I know not that I can urge you to a sounder course than the one which, for the years since I have been over you in the Lord, I have uniformly urged—the faithful maintenance and preservation of the Prayer Book, intact in its liturgy, creeds, offices and articles, as the true, faithful and proper exponent of the Bible to our portion of the Church of Christ. Tracts and books which sustain the Prayer Book as it has been transmitted to us are sound. Tracts and books which change its teachings in reality, form or substance, to a sense which its language will not naturally and truly bear, are to be repudiated, in whatever direction of error they may look and lead.

CLASSES FOR CONFIRMATION.—The last suggestion I will make as to training the youth of a Parish, is, always to have a class preparing for Confirmation, and under a course of instruction from you preparatory to that holy rite. The advantages of this are two-fold. It keeps you in unceasing contact with the younger members of your flocks. It furnishes you an opportunity to guide them aright, when their minds are best disposed to receive instruction. When you consider any of the class prepared in heart and life for Confirmation, present them; reserving the others to a future visitation of the Bishop, under the same system of guidance, reading, instruction and lectures. All the baptized youth of a Parish are, by the very fact and terms of their baptism, candidates for Confirmation, and should be so regarded by the minister. The parents or sponsors have promised it. The only open question is, as to their preparation. In their preparation, minister, parents and sponsors, as well as the youth themselves, are concerned: and all should assiduously employ the best means to draw their attention to the subject, and keep it fixed there, until they have come forward, assumed their baptismal vows, and engaged openly in that service of God, on the due and faithful prosecution of which their eternal hopes depend. It is a fearful and fatal neglect of duty to regard the baptized children of the Church as not concerned in religious duty and action, until their attention is voluntarily drawn to the matter; to await in quietness, silence and neglect, the visitation of the Spirit to arouse them; to look upon them as so many individuals left to grow up in sin, carelessness and ignorance, till, in the providence of God, they shall be converted. The very opposite of all this is true. By baptism, the Church teaches that they are made "members of Christ;" as His members they are to be cared for, taught, nurtured, trained. By baptism, they are made "children of God;" as His children they are to be instructed, fed, nourished and guided, that they may be His obedient and faithful children. By baptism, they are made "inheritors of the kingdom of heaven;" as such, they are to be adapted to it by that holiness without which no man can see the Lord. To the Church of Christ, to their parents, to sponsors, and especially to the minister, they are objects of intense interest, that they may not repudiate the promised and pledged influence of the Holy Spirit, but cherish it in their hearts, be moulded by it in their views, tempers, desires and habits, and daily grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

You cannot be too thorough in your preparation of the young for Confirmation. There is the preparation of the heart and of the head. To both, your earnest attention is to be directed. Lead them to the Holy Spirit for the renewal of their hearts to holiness. Seek to have them led by the Spirit, that they may not fulfil the lusts of the flesh; train them in devotion, self-examination, prayer, self-denial, taking up the cross and following Christ in humility, faith, reliance, and filial obedience in all things. Lead them to the Holy Scriptures for infallible truth, that their minds may be filled with its doctrines, facts, sacraments and duties. Lead them to Christ, that they may know, perceive and acknowledge, that, destitute alike of power and merit in themselves, they must look to Him whose they are, and whom they serve, as the only fountain of wisdom, grace and strength on earth, and of justification and glory in heaven.

ANECDOTES OF BISHOP SEABURY.

Among some of the first Episcopal visitations of Bishop Seabury, was that at Middletown, where among the old steady habits of New England, long continued the primitive practice of psalmody; singing such tunes as Old Hundred, Mear, &c.; and this prevailed not only in the Church, but even in the meeting, till a few months previous to the bishop's visitation. A young singing master from down East, came into Middletown, offering his services as a teacher of music. The meeting folks employed him, and the youth were in high glee; the school-room was filled to overflowing. He cast aside all the old tunes, and introduced a new set of fugitive repeating tunes; and all the little children at home and abroad, from noon to night, were constantly heard at the top of their voices, in all sorts of tones, vociferating la fa sol, sol la fa. The singing was entirely silenced among the elderly and sober members of the meeting, and confined to a large class of boys and girls in the galleries; and all this, to the no small grief of the good old Puritan fathers and mothers. In vain they remonstrated, that if singing was a part of public worship, it ought not to be taken from the pious members of the Church, and be conducted by a set of thoughtless, unconverted youths. In vain, did they reason, that if the prayers of the wicked are an abomination in the sight of God, their singing must be also. The popularity of this theatrical music, and the itching ears for novelty, bore down even the logic of Geneva.

Many of the young people of the Church, by occasionally attending, and associating with these youths and nymphs, became tintured with the effluvia, and petitioned their parents to attend the singing-school. This became a delicate subject: there was a vestry meeting called, and no small searching of hearts. In the mean time, the singing-master, with a few coadjutors, knowing that the time of the bishop's visitation was nigh at hand, proposed to the vestry that if they would permit their young people to attend the singing-school, they should be taught not only gratuitously, but the singing master, with his whole school, would attend church on the visitation of the bishop, and conduct the music. This generous offer (although opposed by many old fashioned Churchmen) was complied with. Great exultation, and loud anthems sung. 'Hallelujah!'

In due time the bishop arrived. Great preparation was made, and especially for the new choir of amalgamated singers. The galleries were crowded into four solid columns:—1. Tenor. 2

Counter. 3. Treble. 4. Bass. To describe this display of vain glory, the readers is referred to the 4th of July, or a procession on the success of a party in politics; suffice it to say, that the last Psalm that was given out was the 133 Psalm; the second verse is as follows:

True love is like the precious oil,
Which poured on Aaron's head,
Ran down his beard, and o'er his robes
Its costly moisture shed.

The singing-master had repeatedly boasted that "Bishop Seabury would say, he had never heard such music as he should entertain him with, on this occasion, through his life." This the bishop frankly acknowledged as follows:—The singing-master gave out Montgomery. When they came to the third line of the second verse as above, the Counter solo sung out "Ran down his beard;" then the Tenor, "Ran down, &c.," and now to close the chorus, the Bass, with sonorous voices cried out, "Ran down his beard;" and to clap the climax, they repeated the stanza: Thus, eight times "Ran down his beard."

The singing-master, with many distinguished gentlemen of the place, was invited and dined with the bishop: at the table, and after the cloth was removed, many, various, and interesting subjects were introduced, and disposed of. The bishop, with his usual urbanity of manner, rendered himself not only agreeable, but instructive to all the company, except the poor singing-master. He was restless and unhappy, because the bishop said nothing about the singing, when he expected to have received great applause. But when a number were about retiring, and many had entered the hall, with the teacher, he could hold back no longer, but exclaimed with no little agitation, and said: "Gentlemen, I am disappointed, I am astonished!" A gentleman enquired, "What is the matter?" "Why, the bishop has said not a word about our singing today. Why, he never heard such music before; not even in London, and yet, he appears to understand all other subjects. I was in hopes some gentleman would have asked his opinion." A gentleman standing by, said, "I will ask him if you wish it." "Do sir." He stepped into the room, leaving the door ajar. At a suitable time, he says, "Bishop, among the many deeply interesting subjects of the day, what did you think of our singing?" "Why sir, I do not think myself prepared to express an opinion, for my sympathy was so much excited for Aaron, that I did not pay that attention to the singing as to be suitably qualified to judge." "Pray sir, why such sympathy for Aaron?" "Why sir, I was fearful by their running down his beard eight times, they would not leave a single hair on his face!"

This produced a laughter among the gentlemen, and an exclamation from the singing-master, "An old fool, he is no judge of music at all!"

ORPHAN HOME.

Within the past few weeks the question of an Orphan Asylum, to be established in connection with the Protestant Episcopal Church in this city, has been agitated in private circles, and discussed by the clergy. To its necessity and usefulness there has been scarcely a dissenting voice, and more than one have pledged "thank-offerings," at the coming holiday season, to aid in its establishment.

The origin of such an enterprise is sometimes worth attention. In the present case it certainly is. It often chanced that great movements are talked of and thought over with reservation, as, "It would be an excellent plan if we only had funds"—or, "I do not think it could be carried out at present,"—and no one seems ready to take the first step, perhaps not feeling sufficient interest in it, or faith in being supported. And here, though pastors and city missionaries had seen the need of providing a shelter for the homeless and fatherless little ones who wander through our courts and alleys, they have, with one exception, remained content with thinking it over for the present.

The heart of a lonely woman was moved by her beautiful creed—"a love for Christ, the poor and little children"—to offer her time and energies the ensuing year to the care of such an institution, if it could be founded. Moreover, she cast first her "widow's mite into the treasury," with fervent prayer that it might be the earnest of many a liberal donation; and when, from the solitude of her own home, she came to interest others in the work, the path had been prepared, and from the Bishop of the Diocese to the humblest of his flock, she found many hearts responding to her secret wish.

It has now received all due official and pastoral sanction. A thrilling appeal has been delivered in its behalf from the pulpit of one of our largest churches, and another contributed editorially to the columns of the Recorder. The Spirit of God certainly seems to have moved his people to the work, and we know that if so, it cannot come to naught.

It has been one of our duties for the past few years to go frequently among those whose necessities such an Institution would relieve; and there we have seen little ones who have almost lost the image of our Saviour's blessed childhood, in the want and squalidness by which they were surrounded, and desolate mothers watching over their children like Mary of Bethlehem, though still unlike, inasmuch as they had no joyful hope, no blessed anticipations for the future life of the fatherless and the destitute. Gathering lessons of vice and obscenity from every one around them, these children know nothing of the innocence which is the type of childhood. Sent out by their wretched protectors as soon as their lips can frame a lie, to beg or steal that daily bread, which, to those more fortunately situated,

— "Comes without
The sense of its providing," what wonder that disease goes with them to their filthy homes, and dishonesty becomes a second nature. Oh, from these dismal crowded streets, from these swarming leprous by-places, there comes a voice, the sweet voice of childhood, pleading for shelter from such perils of soul and body, for a home where they may learn of One who is their friend as well as our Saviour, and in His name we pray you heed the cry.

The high Christian festival in which we celebrate the birth of our Master is fast approaching. Already the interchange of gifts, which custom has sanctioned, is talked of and provided for; already the Christmas feast with its dainty cheer is planned by many a careful housekeeper; and children who have scarcely a wish ungratified are wondering what new pleasure, or what gift that does not already crowd their store is preparing for them.

Toys will be purchased fit only for the admiration of an hour; jewellery that will flash in a few weeks uncared for by the fastidious owner; hundreds will be given for an antique vase, that one touch of a careless hand may shiver to atoms,—and those thus lavish of their wealth where interest or their own pleasure is concerned, will "pass by on the other side" if we ask an alms.

Oh, fathers, as ye provide superfluities for your children, think of those who never had a parent's care; and mothers, as ye gather around the blazing Christmas hearth the "jewels" Heaven has entrusted to your keeping—as ye see the red light flash upon costly hangings and stainless mirrors, and hear the merry shout that goes up from that little circle of careless hearts, the sweet treble of childish voices—remember that you celebrate the day when the Redeemer of the World became as one of them, though in a lowlier home, and beware lest some day the wail of passionate outcry come not from your own lips—"Lord, when saw we thee an hungered, or athirst, or a stranger, or naked, or sick, and did not minister unto thee?"

How rarely is the consideration forced upon us that we are but stewards of God's bounty. How often do we number over our meagre charities and say, "I pay tithes of all I possess"—forgetful that it is but a just tribute. But when our Master shall return and demand of us what has been entrusted to our keeping, there will be no mere self-deception, no ostentation of free-will offerings. In view of that hour, let us beware how we send the "King's Messengers"—now before us in the garb of destitute orphans—empty away.

DECREASE OF CANDIDATES FOR HOLY ORDERS.

MR. EDITOR:

Since reading your remarks on this subject, I have been thinking that an additional reason might be given for this decrease besides those you suggest. And that is, the failure of the Clergy to present the subject of the Christian Ministry to the minds of parents and youth, as a calling the most desirable and most honourable that can offer itself to human ambition. Now, we look mainly to the influence of the Ministry of the Church for the extension and increase of her power and influence in every department.

It is a zealous and untiring Ministry that fills up our Sunday Schools, makes large additions to our Communion, and swells the contributions to our Missionary work.

And this is done by efforts purposely and repeatedly directed towards each desired object. But what little direct effort is made by the Clergy of the Church in order to inspire parents with a desire to see their sons enrolled among her Ministry? How seldom is the high calling of a Christian Minister presented to the minds of our youth as a distinction and privilege which no human honours and rewards can at all equal! Others may have been more fortunate than myself; but in all the preaching I have heard, "and I have had my share," I do not recollect ever to have heard one word in reference to this important subject. I know that there is a feeling with many people that this is a subject which is not to be spoken of, lest young men should be influenced to enter a profession for which they are unfit; and the answer to this is, that parents and the Clergy should of course endeavour to influence those who are fit. Just as well might it be said that no influence should be used to bring young people to the Holy Communion, lest they should come unprepared. I once knew a case exactly illustrative of this feeling. In a family warmly attached to the Church there was a younger brother of studious habits, and great gentleness of character, whom his family fondly hoped to see a Minister of Christ. "But," said one of them to me, "we never mention the subject to him, lest we should influence his mind." And for that false prudence, perhaps a zealous and efficient Minister has been lost to the Church; perhaps one that might have "shone as the stars for ever and ever," has been entangled by the cares of life, and is now fast bound to the service of the world.

The first aspirations of a pious and humble mind, to serve its Master in the work of the Christian Ministry, greatly need encouragement, lest the knowledge of its own deficiencies, the coldness of worldly friends, and perhaps the suspicions of those of shallow piety, should forever quiet the desire. There are perhaps few times of greater trial to a delicate and sensitive mind, than when it is compelled to make known, that with all its ignorances and imperfections, it still aspires to the work of the Sacred Ministry; and these are the times when the counsel and encouragement of Pastor and parents would be of inexpressible value to the young man fired with so noble an ambition; and also of great good to the Church, in adding many to her Ministry who should thus be saved from the tempting but deceptive promises of the world. I believe that if the attention of the Clergy were directed to the work not only of making Christian men, but Christian Ministers also, a few years would show a greatly increased list of Candidates for Holy Orders. VOLTAIRE.—INQUIRY ON HIS "ECRASEZ L'INFAME!"

MR. EDITOR:—

Since penning the inquiry on the blasphemous words ascribed to Voltaire, in my search after the expression, I have reviewed page after page of Smollett's edition of his works, consisting of twenty-two duodecimo volumes, comprising his Historical collections, Dramatic productions, Poems, and Epistles, and have been unsuccessful. Even the letter to the infamous Marquis de Villeville, from which the expression is said to be quoted, is not found in that edition.

I have also, with similar disappointment, gone through a French work of acknowledged ability, in two 12mo volumes, entitled, "Les Erreurs de Voltaire, &c., par M. l'Abbé Nonnotte," in which it might reasonably be expected the blasphemy would be exposed. Do we receive the expression of Voltaire alluded to on written authority, or on that of tradition?

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1849.

The following letter confirms the melancholy rumours which have prevailed for some time past, with respect to the writer.

New York, November 21, 1849.

To the Rev. Wm. Berrian, D.D., President of the Standing Committee, &c. &c.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—You may conceive that it is with no ordinary emotion that I feel myself constrained to declare to you, as President of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of New York, that it is my intention no longer to exercise the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, it having become my deep and conscientious conviction that duty to God requires of me to unite myself to the one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church in communion with the See of Rome, to which alone I feel that my allegiance is due.

Signed,

JOHN MURRAY FORBES.

This is certainly a very pithy and laconic announcement of such a step, one which involves the abjuration of the most solemn vows wherewith a responsible being can bind himself before God and man. No reason is given for this act, beyond that simple one, "I feel!" Directed by such a treacherous guide, we cannot wonder at this lamentable issue, lamentable only for him who so lightly holds the solemn vows of the Priesthood in the "one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church," nor "in communion with the See of Rome."

We cannot join with those, who in bad taste and worse spirit, say harsh things of a fallen brother, no matter what may be the nature of his fault. This stands sufficiently prominent. Dr. Forbes did once, undoubtedly, enjoy in a large measure the esteem and confidence of his brethren, and held an honorable place in the Ministry of the Church. This confidence his own course has gradually impaired, and at last destroyed forever. God and His Church are the judges in this matter. Individuals should bear in mind the charge of their Master, "Judge not, that ye be not judged." The fall of such a man should lead us to greater vigilance, and impress that solemn caution—"Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." Such instances of human frailty should lead us to greater earnestness and devotion, in offering up those solemn petitions of the Litany—"From all blindness of heart; from pride, vain-glory, and hypocrisy—from all false doctrine, heresy, and schism; good Lord deliver us."

We are compelled to say a few words further, as to the use which will be made of this act of an individual.

1. It will be used as an argument against the Church. Here is a glorious proof that Prelacy tends to Popery! According to this logic, Presbyterianism is only a lower step in the same stairway, since a large number of their clergy have come into our ministry, while a still larger number have gone in other directions, by paths which lead into outer darkness. Let any one of the sects, so many and various, covering the broad platform including the extremities of Rome and Geneva, only come forth and prove that none of their ministry have departed from them, or even deny that many more have quitted them than all who have ever left the Church, and they may then use this argument against her. Who can be found to "cast the first stone?"

2. This case will be used as an argument against the class in the Church, to which Mr. Forbes was reputed to belong. "Behold in this the end of high churchmanship!" According to this logic, "low churchmanship," is only a step in the same ladder. We knew Mr. Forbes, and attended his church, when he held the doctrines of Calvinism, and was intimately associated with those in the church who belong to this school of theology. The truth is, this case proves the soundness, rather, of the great mass of those who are called "high churchmen." What drove the Rector of St. Luke's from his Parish? Was it not that in attempting to force upon his people a system of doctrine and practice, opposed to the teachings and usages of the Church, he had almost emptied his church and broken down his Parish? All his influence with his people, and it was very great, could not induce them to submit to what he would substitute for the true system of the Church. Either in his resignation of the Parish, or in his farewell sermons, he gave this reason for the act, that he could not carry out what he conceived to be the system of the Church. And if he could not do it at St. Luke's, no one else could.

And in his late visit to this city, he made it a subject of bitter complaint against all his New York brethren, that they stood aloof from him, that they showed no sympathy with him, and that they treated him with coldness and distrust. Is not this a proof that the great body of the clergy in New York, who have the credit of being pretty fair samples of high churchmen, have no affinity with Romanizing? The truth is, this case, and all like it, prove nothing against either the Church at large or that class in the Church against which it is employed as an argument. Those who thus act, only verify that scriptural saying—"They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us: but they went out, that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us."

3. There is one more use which will be made of this case to which we must refer.

It will be used by those, "there-I-told-you-so" wise men in the Church to establish their prophetic wisdom!" "Didn't we warn you of this? Didn't you deny the truth of our warning?"

Now, we have not the slightest desire to detract from their supposed prescience, yet we must say a word for ourselves.

It has never been said, in the columns of this Paper, that there were not individuals in the Church, who were Romanizing as well as Genevanizing! It has merely been maintained that there was not, in the Church, a formidable conspiracy of Romanizers. All we demanded was that the Church should not be disturbed by these vague statements, and arguments against her thus put in the mouth of her enemies. All we asked was that these accusers should come out like men, and bring specific charges before the proper authority, against any in the Church, who were false to her principles, and traitors to her interests. We deprecated the false alarm excited by such insufficient cause. One might suppose that the very existence of the Church was endangered by the defection of a few, who have proved themselves weak in mind, and weaker still in principle! Is the Church so rickety, does she stand so insecurely on her strong foundations, that she can thus easily be shaken? Is not God with her, and shall we tremble for her security, because the fickleness of man causes him to change, while she continues immutable? We indeed pity those who err from the truth, but we have no fears for the Church.

Who is it that has given these men an importance which does not belong to them, and puffed them up with a vain sense of their own consequence? They have done so, who have made them the subjects of long and wearisome discussion. We have never defended them in their errors. We have all along said, and we now repeat it, that we hope all who are not satisfied with the Church, as she is now in her doctrines and practices; all, who would graft upon her pure faith the corrupt doctrines of Rome, or impair her integrity by the imperfections of Geneva; would go at once where their inclination leads them. The Church can do without them, and, so far from losing, will gain by their defection. And we maintain that the sad instance of human fallibility, which has occasioned these remarks, proves nothing against the Church, nothing against churchmen high or low, nothing against those who regard, with little apprehension, the few in the Church whose tendencies lead them to follow Mr. Shimeall to Geneva, or Mr. Forbes to Rome. It only proves that the Tempter, who gained admission to Paradise, may enter the Church, and that those who inherit the fallen nature of Adam may follow his example.

CORRECTION.

We quoted merely from the Church Advertiser its statement. Supposing that its Editor would not publish such a notice, except from actual knowledge, when that could be so easily obtained, we were led into this error.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE BANNER OF THE CROSS.

DEAR BROTHER:—

Never having seen "The Church Advertiser," I am only apprised by your quotation from it, which has just reached me, that I am published there, as uniting in the request for a special meeting of the House of Bishops. Have the kindness to say that such is not the case, and will not be; and oblige your friend and brother,

G. W. DOANE.

A HOME FOR ORPHANS.

The Pastoral Letter of the Bishop of this Diocese on this important subject, has presented the matter to the consideration of the Church. It is a subject which has long engaged the serious thoughtfulness of many devoted hearts in this city. And most worthy is it to excite Christian thoughtfulness; nay, it claims something more than thought, it calls for action. It is with this view that the Bishop has made it the occasion of a Pastoral Letter. And, it must not be forgotten, his commendation, in such form, has the force of high authority. And surely it needs not this to enforce the claims of such an object upon the attention of the Churchmen in Philadelphia. Our God declares Himself to be "a Father of the fatherless," and His Holy Church is bound to act in His behalf, if she would prove herself to be "the Church of the living God." Is it not a reproach to her that there is no refuge in her bosom for the unprotected lambs, whom the Providence of God has committed to her care. Surely, at the call of God, in obedience to the request of her Bishop, seconded by the supplication of helpless orphans, the Church in this city will not hesitate. Nothing can be done without prompt and united action.

It will be seen from our columns that one City Church has already acted in this matter. We also ask the attention of our readers to the interesting communication on this subject in our present number. May this strong appeal be answered, at once, by speedy and united action, and "A HOME FOR DESTITUTE AND ORPHAN CHILDREN" shall "soon rise to proclaim our gratitude to God for His mercies, our tender care for His helpless little ones."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received a communication from "a manager of the Philadelphia Orphan Society," but we cannot insert it this week, as our paper is full, and this subject occupies it already sufficiently. Indeed we must say there seems to be a manifest impropriety in publishing those parts of the article opposed to the official recommendation of the Bishop of the Diocese. We can only publish it on condition that the writer will allow us to modify it, so as to present the facts in reference to the Asylum already established.

MR. DANA'S FIRST LECTURE.

On Tuesday evening the Hall of the University was crowded to overflowing, and many could not gain admission to hear the first Lecture of this distinguished gentleman. Although we were on the Standing Committee of the house, which was a little too numerous, we forgot the discomfort of this position, and that is saying much, for a Lecture of an hour and a half in length.

The subject of the Lecture was the influence of Literature upon our daily life. It was a plain, practical and forcible exposition of high and noble views. Some of the hints given were of great importance, bearing not merely upon our reading, but upon our living well and wisely. There was a sound healthy tone in the Lecture, a freedom from all attempt at display, a home directness which touched every heart. For our own part, we hope Mr. D. will obtain a larger room and more seats in it, for we are sure they will be more needed the next time.

A NOBLE OFFER.

The following we find in an exchange paper. We hope the offer will be accepted, for if any man is likely to succeed in so hazardous and difficult an undertaking, it is Capt. Lynch, the fearless and successful commander of the Dead Sea Expedition.

Capt. Lynch has tendered his services to our Government to head an expedition to go in search of Sir John Franklin, and if possible, to rescue him and his party; and, what is still more noble and disinterested in this enterprising officer is, that "in case the Government will sanction his efforts, he will raise, from private sources, sufficient to charter, strengthen, and equip a steamer, the Government furnishing such officers and men as choose to volunteer to go.—Exchange paper.

DIOCESE OF DELAWARE.

The Rev. Andrew F. Freeman has resigned the charge of St. Ann's Church, Middletown, and been transferred to the jurisdiction of the Missionary Bishop of Arkansas.

The Rev. T. S. Carpenter has been received into the Diocese from Pennsylvania, and has been called to the Rectorship of St. Peter's Church, Smyrna, officiating also at Dover.

The Rev. Hiram R. Harrold has been received into the Diocese from New Jersey, and has been called to the Rectorship of St. Ann's Church, Middletown, and Christ Church, Delaware City.

The Rev. David McIlvaine has been received from the Diocese of New York; residence, Lewes.

Foreign Intelligence.

The Rev. Ernest Hawkins, Secretary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, arrived yesterday at Liverpool in the Caledonia on return from his tour in the Anglo-American provinces.

The Bishop of Victoria has taken out with him, as a missionary to China, Chun Di Kwong, whom our readers will have frequently seen at the Chinese exhibition during its visit here, and who received his education at the Theological College, Birkenhead, under Mr. Baylee.

AUSTRALIA.—In consequence of the Romanist Bishop in South Australia having issued a circular, for a subscription on behalf of the Pope, in which he assumes to himself the title of "Catholic Bishop of Adelaide," Bishop Short has made a formal protest, attested by a public notary.

We learn from the Nautical Standard the safe return of Sir James Ross from the Arctic Expedition, but unfortunately without news of Sir John Franklin:—

"The Enterprise and Investigator, forming the expedition under Captain Sir Jas. Ross, put into Scarborough, on Saturday night on their passage home from the Arctic regions, having been perfectly unsuccessful in their search for the gallant Franklin and his brave companions. The two ships wintered at Port Leopold, at the entrance of Prince Regent's Inlet and Barrow's Straits. On the 15th of May last, Sir James Ross, with a party of seamen, set out and traveled two hundred miles along the coast of North Somerset, south side of Barrow's Straits, on land never before trod by civilized men. The expedition returned after being out forty days, during which time not the slightest clue was obtained of the lost navigators. The enterprise lost four men during the voyage, and her consort, the Investigator, three. The two ships got clear of the ice on the 25th of September, and made the Orkneys on the 28th of October. On the 1st of November the Investigator was spoken by a vessel, and informed that no news of Franklin had been received at home. This announcement spread a gloom over the crews of the ships, and Sir James Ross was deeply affected."

ITALY.—Things remain in statu quo at Rome, though the French are daily anticipating their recall. The Observatore Romano gives some particulars concerning the various occupations of Pius IX. at Portici during the day:—

"From seven to ten P. M., after having visited several religious establishments, he receives the visits of about twenty families. Every one is desirous to kiss the foot of the Holy Father. Monsignor Medici is the master of the ceremonies. The Holy Father always addresses the persons who pay their respects to him, with these words, 'Cari figliuoli miei.' (My dear children.) Every one makes three genuflections, and at the third, the Pope slightly raises his foot, and the person kisses a cross worked in gold on his slipper. The Pope then helps the person to rise, and gives him his hand to kiss. He always asks whether the whole family is present: and if he learns that one of its members is absent, he raises his hand, and repeats the benediction. His last words are, 'Adieu my dear children.' The visitors then back out of the room."

The Cheltenham Examiner gives a striking illustration of the pew system by an eye-witness of the following scene at the parish church on Sunday week:—

"The churchwarden (walking up to the large pew which was only half filled, and the door of which was firmly held by a gentleman inside)—Mr. —, you have no right to keep that pew while there are parisoners who cannot obtain seats. Mr. —: It is my pew, and I shall admit whom I please. Churchwarden: You have no right to admit strangers while there are parisoners who cannot get seats. Mr. —: This pew is my property. Churchwarden: If you do not open the door, sir, I shall order the beadle to force it open. Mr. —: You have no right to do so; you may as well order a man to break open my house. Churchwarden: It is not your pew, and I shall insist on its being opened. Mr. —: This is not the place to settle that question. Churchwarden: I will have it settled here. Russell, I order you to break open the door. Pew opener: Very well, sir. Mr. —: I insist upon the door being opened. The door was burst open, and the pew immediately filled by the parties standing outside.

The Christian Times states that leading Evangelical clergymen are in mutual communication, with a view to an organization of the Evangelical party, "so far as to be prepared for all contingencies."

An eccentric old bachelor, who lately died at Madras, has left a sum of 1,000*l.*, the interest of which is to be divided annually into five portions, to be distributed by the minister of St. Cyrus, Kincardineshire. One portion to be given to the tallest; a second to the shortest; a third to the eldest; a fourth to the youngest married woman during the year; and the fifth to be distributed in groceries amongst the poor.—Dumfries Courier.

JUBILEE OF ALFRED THE GREAT.

A thousand years having elapsed since the birth of Alfred the Great, the people of Wantage, his native town, commemorated that event yesterday with great and general rejoicings. The day was observed by all parties as a holiday; the shops were closed, and business universally suspended. We have seldom witnessed any public demonstration into the spirit of which the people seemed to enter so fervently and unanimously. All vied with each other in giving the greatest possible effect, which their means and appliances would admit of, to what they regarded as a great national festival. The public roads approaching the town, and the principal streets were spanned by triumphal arches, and the fronts of the houses tastefully decorated with evergreens and flowers. Innumerable flags and banners floated gaily in the breeze, while various mottoes reminded the stranger that King Alfred the Great was born in Wantage in the year 849. The festival, as we have been given to understand, was promoted chiefly by the instrumentality of Mr. Tupper and the Rev. Dr. Giles, writers in the Anglo-Saxon, a new periodical of considerable merit. It was at first intended that the festival should be on a more enlarged scale, and less local in its characteristics. For that purpose a committee was formed in London; but two causes prevented any manifestation of the kind from being attempted in the metropolis. In the first place, the nobility, who were applied to on the subject, if they did not expressly disapprove of the object, at least withheld their countenance and support from it. The next, and not less important impediment to the success of any project of the sort, was the cholera visitation, which rendered festive exhibitions on so extensive a scale ill-timed and out of place. These objections, however, did not apply with the same force to the small but healthy town of Wantage, and therefore the inhabitants resolved with one accord not to let this thousandth anniversary of their distinguished townsman pass without paying a tribute of respect to his memory. We are glad to be able to state that self-gratification was not their ultimate object; that they purpose perpetuating the name and fame of Alfred the Great by an enlargement of the Grammar School, the establishment of a Mechanics' Institute, and the publication of a correct copy of the monarch's works. At an early period of the day most of the inhabitants were busy in the work of decoration, while every highway poured in its hundreds of well-dressed visitors, so that about noon the town was in a state of the most lively activity. The bands of the various clubs kept constantly parading the streets, and as they all seemed resolutely determined upon playing different airs, to the marrying of each others' attempts at harmony, their combined efforts were anything but agreeable. In a large field, outside of the town, several tents were erected, and various kinds of amusements for the million provided, after the manner of Battersea-fields. But while the entertainments of those in an independent position were catered for, as far as circumstances would permit, the poor and the needy were not forgotten. An enormous ox was roasted whole, a large steam-engine performing the work of turnspit, and distributed, with bread and other necessary accompaniments, amongst the aged and distressed. After divine service, addresses, with respect to the history of Alfred the Great, were delivered in the Town Hall by Major Bell, of Scarborough, and the Rev. C. L. Richmond, from America; followed by several well-executed airs on the Welsh harp, by Mr. Ellis Roberts, harper to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. At one o'clock the clubs accompanied most of the respectable inhabitants and visitors in procession, with flags and a band of music, through the town, to inspect King Alfred's Well. When they arrived at the spot, a lecture on the life and character of King Alfred was delivered by the Rev. F. Reyroux, B.D.; after which the Rev. C. L. Richmond spoke for a considerable time on the same subject. A charge of 1*s.* to those who had not dinner tickets was made both at the Town Hall and the Well, for the purpose of enabling the committee to carry out their charitable intentions with respect to the poor.

The dinner took place in the Alfred Head Inn. The large dining room was fitted up with remarkable neatness and taste for the occasion. A considerable number of ladies were present. The room was incapable of accommodating all the applicants for admission; but the disappointment was less felt, as the Town Hall was fitted up as a ball-room, and those who could not get admission to the dinner in most cases felt themselves amply compensated by the society of the ladies. Indeed, everything seemed to us to be well managed, and the greatest good humour prevailed among all parties. The humbler classes were remarkably decorous in their conduct, and, although it was at a late hour when we left the town, we did not hear of a single instance of inebriety or disturbance.

The guests were furnished with gold, silver, bronze, and white metal medals of King Alfred, struck expressly for the occasion, and sold at moderate prices. We extract the following description of the medal from a paper furnished by the secretary:—

"It is believed that this is the first and only medal ever struck in honour of our great King Alfred—the hero-monarch of England, whose children have now spread over both hemispheres of the globe. America has equal part with Britain and her colonies in the glory and the memory of our common Anglo-Saxon founder; and the design has, therefore, been arranged so as to include and to interest all who speak the kindly English tongue.

"The portrait on the obverse has been collected from a comparison and a combination of the best authorities, including the rude and widely-varying effigies on coins, the bust at Oxford, and the engraving of Vertue: it will be found, upon inspection, to exhibit the physiognomy of a character at once wise, dignified, gentle, and courageous; equal to the conquest of adversity, but not liable to be elated by success; a royal, philosophical, and philanthropic countenance, deeply imbued with Christian virtues, and bearing the marks of premature age and personal suffering, so appropriate to one who is recorded by his biographers to have never lived an hour without pain. An internal cancer is supposed to have been 'the thorn in his flesh,' which the piety of Asser declares to have been God's messenger of humility to Alfred's greatness. The diadem on the bust is copied from a manuscript illumination of the period in the British Museum; and the lettering of the name is a fac simile of that on the Ashmolean jewel.

"The reverse, bearing a continued legend, 'and his children' (according both to many ancient instances, and our own modern money), shows how, after exactly a thousand years, 'The British Empire, United States, and Anglo-Saxons everywhere,' within the olive-wreath of Peace, and under the hallowing influence of religion, can now all glory in the memory of Alfred, and feel a common brotherhood in commemorating their father."

At the dinner, after the cloth had been removed, and the usual toasts given,

Mr. TUPPER, at the request of the Chairman, then recited some original verses in praise of King Alfred, which were loudly applauded.

THE CHAIRMAN said it now became his duty to propose to the townsmen of Wantage "The memory of Alfred the Great." (Cheers.) In proposing such a toast in the presence of gentlemen much better informed in Anglo-Saxon history, he (the chairman) hoped the meeting would grant him their indulgence while he briefly glanced at the characteristic features of that great man. Alfred the Great was engaged in fifty-six battles in order to effect the deliverance of his country. Several of those battles were fought and won in the neighbourhood of Wantage. (Hear, hear.) Indeed, one of the greatest which he ever fought was contested between Wallingford and Kirkholmesley. He never was too much elated by victory nor depressed by defeat. When obliged to retreat to the marshes of Somersetshire he was not discouraged. Having bided his time he came forth renovated and strengthened, and at last, by perseverance and energy of character, he succeeded in expelling the Danes from his native country. His next act was to improve the laws, to consolidate the monarchy, and give security to property. Trial by jury, and the law relating to sureties, were also given by Alfred. It was not too much, then, to say that not only was King Alfred the founder of the British monarchy, but of most of the institutions of the country. (Hear, hear, hear.) As a man of letters he was as great as in his capacity of warrior. He patronized, not only the learned men of our own country, but also those of foreign lands; and if he did not found the University of Oxford, he at least fostered and encouraged it. (Hear, hear.) Did he not patronize the learned Asser, whom he brought from an obscure monastery in Wales? It was also to King Alfred that we were indebted for our maritime greatness. (Cheers.) It was he, who, by improving our naval architecture, enabled us to beat the Danes by sea, as we had already done by land. (Cheers.) He would therefore call upon the whole company to drink to "The memory of their townsman, Alfred the Great."

The toast was drunk in solemn silence, all the company standing up.

Mr. GILES, the secretary, at the request of the chairman, then read the report of the committee, in which they stated that they had come to the following resolutions:—First, that the old grammar school of Wantage be provided for and enlarged under the name of King Alfred's College, and that a mechanics' institution be founded, in connection with that town; secondly, that for the purpose of accomplishing this good work, a general subscription list be opened immediately, to which all of the Anglo-Saxon race, without reference to country, be invited to contribute. (Cheers.)

Mr. ALFRED FRY said he had been unsuccessfully employed half a century in endeavouring to discover a person like himself. When his father was about 21 years of age he went over to the United States with the intention of establishing himself there. One day he entered a lodging-house in Philadelphia. A great number of Americans, Germans, Danes, and persons from various parts of the continent, were accustomed to join the table d'hôte. On one occasion a great number of Americans came to take their dinner, and some one having whispered "We are all English," another said, "Ay, and we are twelve—neither more nor less." Instantaneously and spontaneously, the twelve Englishmen rose up and drank "Trial by Jury." (Loud Cheers.) No sooner did their enthusiasm on that point expand itself, than another drank to the memory of King Alfred. (Cheers.) These same gentlemen, without any special cause of excitement, pledged themselves then and there that whoever of them should have a son, that son should bear the name of Alfred. (Cheers.) "Now, gentlemen," continued Mr. Fry, "I am the only individual I ever heard of in my life that had the honour of bearing the name of Alfred under an influence one thousand years distant in time, and three thousand miles distant in space." (Cheers and laughter.)

The report was agreed to.

Mr. TUPPER then proposed "The union of the great Anglo-Saxon family everywhere—Great Britain and her colonies and America." (Hear.) He (Mr. Tupper) regretted that Mr. Abbott Lawrence, a distinguished ambassador from the United States, was not present to reply. He had, however, written to apologize for his absence, which was unavoidable.

The toast having been acknowledged,

Mr. RICHMOND briefly responded.

From "The Reading Mercury," sent us by a friend, we take the following account. We are sorry we have not room for the characteristic speech which preceded it.

Mr. Richmond afterwards addressed the ladies and gentry, at Alfred's Well, introducing the following verse:

Join then the stripes and stars and cross
In one fraternal band,
Till Anglo-Saxon faith and laws
Illumine every land:
Then in broad day the basking earth
Shall thank the King of Heaven,
That dear Columbia's blessed birth,
To England's lap was given.

Mr. Richmond was then introduced to the ladies and gentlemen assembled in goodly number in the hall, by the celebrated poet, Martin F. Tupper, Esq., supported on the other side by John Hughes, Esq., of Downing Priory, Newbury, a gentleman well and most favourably known in the literary world. Mr. Tupper said he would give us a line of his own upon the occasion, and turning to the American-Saxon, repeated with strong and eloquent emphasis the first stanza of his famous international "loving ballad to Brother Jonathan,"

"Ho! brother, I'm a Britisher,
A chip of heart of oak,
That would not warp, or swerve, or stir,
From what I thought or spoke;
And you, a just and honest man,
Straightforward, kind and true;
I tell you, Brother Jonathan,
That you're a Briton too."

On which, Mr. Richmond, who had since written "Brother Jonathan's reply to John Bull," said he might answer also in verse.

"Ho! brother John, I've made a call;
Stout Briton though you be,
Young Jonathan is grown as tall,
Beyond the western sea.
And if this paradox you doubt,
I'll prove it through and through,
That Jonathan is John throughout,
Himself and yourself too."

After which the rev. gentleman delivered an able address in his peculiar and nervous style, which was received with continued applause.

AN EXAMINATION OF THE DOCTRINE DECLARED AND THE POWERS CLAIMED BY THE RIGHT REV. BISHOP IVES, in a Pastoral Letter to the Clergy and Laity of his Diocese. By a Lay Member of the Protestant Episcopal Church in North Carolina. Philadelphia, H. Hooker, S. W. Corner of Eighth and Chestnut streets, 1849.

This is a well printed Pamphlet, of about 100 pages, said to be written by a Layman of high character. Had we not published the article of Carolina in reference to the Salisbury Convention, we should have felt bound to give so much of this Pamphlet as relates to this matter. For the "examination of the doctrine declared," &c., we prefer, at present, referring those interested in the matter to the Pamphlet itself, which can easily be obtained.

We have also received "THE DOCTRINE OF REPENTANCE," being a Review of a Pastoral Letter to the Clergy and Laity of his Diocese by the RT. REV. L. SILLIMAN IVES, D. D., Bishop of North Carolina, by the REV. J. H. HANSON, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Waddington, N. Y. New York: Stanford and Swords, 137 Broadway, 1849.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

This admirable collection of articles, from the best Periodicals, continues to sustain its high character. We always receive it with pleasure. There is great judgment shown in the selection of articles, so as to mingle instruction and entertainment.

DAILY PRAYER.

By M. L. C.

MR. EDITOR, DEAR SIR:—

Will you allow me to offer for publication in your columns, a poem, similar in subject and design to one from my pen which appeared not long ago. As it was written before the author could by any possibility have seen mine, it presents a curious coincidence of thought and feeling, and proves that more than one heart has acknowledged the beauty and efficacy of "Morning and Evening Prayer."

Respectfully,
MRS. J. C. NEAL.

Where men in daily pathways meet,
To seek for Mammon's gifts,
An ancient Church with tapering spire,
The holy Cross uplifts.
And when the morning's brightest sun,
The Eastern world illumines,
There, the soft chimes of holy bells
Echo above the tombs.

And daily, when the setting sun,
Goes down into the west,
Softly those holy bells peal forth,
A summons glad and blest.
Then, many a sad sinner's heart,
Bow'd 'neath a cloud of care,
Rises at sound of those soft bells,
And seeks the house of prayer.

Many a heavy heart, oppress'd
By its own secret grief,
Turns daily to that holy place,
And finds in prayer, relief.
There, too, are hearts, that late have known,
Fresh reason to rejoice,
Who in that hour thanksgiving pour,
Led by their Pastor's voice.

A loved one toss'd upon the deep,
A darling on the bier,
Gladly the Church doth shed o'er all,
The sympathizing tear.
There is a gentleness and love,
In this the Church's care;
Who, daily through our common wants,
Would win us home by prayer.

And when, through all the silent aisles,
Is heard the voice of love,
Asking on "all estates of men,"
God's blessing from above;
Who, that at twilight hour has heard,
This earnest, humble prayer,
And has not felt God's blessing fall,
On all around him there?

And 'tis no trifling joy to know,
In sickness, or distress,
That daily prayers go up to God,
For all who Christ confess.
Yes, stricken heart, thy "Mother Church"
Most fondly cares for thee,
And daily seeks in common prayer,
That God, thy God may be.

And who, that has not known, may tell
The blessedness and joy,
When Pastor's voice proclaims from God,
Peace, peace without alloy?
Then, when our feet again must tread
Life's daily path of cares,
How shall our hearts find strength renewed,
By these our daily prayers.

The sacred power of Daily Prayer,
No human heart can tell,
When offered in the house of God,
Where sabbath blessings dwell.
Nor of the holy calm that seems,
Through all God's temple shed,
Stealing most softly on the hearts
That thitherward are led.

Oh! that all Pastors of God's flock,
But knew the blessings given,
To those who seek in Daily Prayer,
The daily gifts of heaven.
Thy fervent prayers, oh, ancient Church,
How are thy children blest!
Whilst ever thus thine open arms,
Invite us to our rest.

For the Banner of the Cross. INCARNATION—REPLY.

MR. EDITOR:—

My article on the work of Archdeacon Wilberforce has drawn into your columns another opponent, "Daleth." He quotes largely against me the very book the extravagance of which I had endeavoured to answer: to which I might rejoin by reprinting the answer itself; for he does not allege that I have misrepresented. The more logical plan would have been, to refute my objections; but this natural course, he declares, "is no part of (his) intention"—the plea being, that Scripture is against me; whereas what I virtually maintained throughout, and also expressly argued, was, that Scripture ought not to be interpreted according to his and Mr. W.'s theory. So far, therefore, (and that is pretty largely,) he leaves the discussion exactly where it stood.

Many of your readers will gather from Daleth, that I reject "human nature" altogether, and not merely the fancied thing under that name. He quotes even the Prayer Book against me! Better attention to my piece would have shown him the phrases, "the law of like progeny," and "the whole transmissive constitution of men in body and soul," also that I allowed human nature to be "a principle, an influence, a law." All that my paragraphs were devoted to, was the exaggerated account of "human nature," and "its hyperbolic effectiveness in the Christian economy." Beyond this it concerned not my argument. No one imagines that I reject human nature proper or the Incarnation proper.

Of the texts adduced by Mr. W., I remarked, "they have other and more reasonable interpretations:" of which plea of mine Daleth takes no notice. Of the phrase "one body," I urged that Christians were thus embodied "because of 'the unity of the Spirit,' by whom we are 'all baptized' into it:" this likewise is left without remark. Of the principal text, "members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones," and "its cognates," I offered a somewhat detailed argument against the literal sense: but he vouchsafes it no heed, though re-quoting the text with much elation. He passes by all this, and is content with extracts from Mr. W. for other Scriptures; which, however, will not avail. The death of "those that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression," proves (observation and philosophy going no further) the "real connection" between parents and offspring through the "transmissive constitution of men in body and soul," changed by the Almighty into a mortal "constitution,"—not through an "external, objective entity, organized and consubstantial." Levi's "paying tithes" to Melchisedec "in Abraham," being in "the loins" of that patriarch, is an appeal, in a matter of comparative dignity, to the hereditary rule; much as, in former times, the ancient homage of a less king to a greater (something like it was lately purposed in Germany) was a claim for the like service from his heirs: only right and honour, according to the recognized hereditary principle, are involved, not the "objective reality of an organized, consubstantial entity." Besides, the apostle qualifies what he affirms of Levi—"as I may so say"—or, "so to speak;" it was not literally, but only in a moderated sense, that Levi "paid tithes" and "was in the loins of his father,"—a true sense, but not the strict one; so that, instead of help from that passage, Mr. W. and his defender Daleth are to understand it as contradicting them: "so to speak," being fatal to the letter, reverses their deduction.* The passage "for their sakes I sanctify myself, that they also might be sanctified through the truth," is expounded by Mr. W. "I purify myself;" but as Christ was absolutely pure, "knew no sin," He could not "purify Himself," and the word must either be ceremonial, or else mean "separate, consecrate, or devote myself." Again, the "myself" of the verse Mr. W. turns into "my human nature," whereas His "human nature" was immaculate, and to "devote" His human nature was to "devote" His body and soul: also, in this and the other passage, "sanctify them through thy truth, thy word is truth," he would have "truth" and "word" to mean Christ Himself, though the equivalents, the transmitted "word" of His apostles and His own "declaration," are immediately referred to,—"believe on me through their word," "I have declared unto them thy Name, and will declare it" through them. What support Mr. W. and Daleth find for their theory in calling "the Man Christ Jesus" the "one common Bond" between "God and men," I cannot imagine; figuratively, He is the mediatorial "bond;" but literally, He is the mediatorial "Man," and this takes rank of the figure; and Job calls Him the "Daysman" or Umpire, who "lays His hand on" both the parties: we ask, then, what profit hath the "human nature" fancy here? That the sacraments are "the means by which men are joined to the body of Christ," is readily proved from Scripture; but that "the body of the regenerate person becomes the flesh of the crucified One," is a helpless dogma without a further appeal—to St. Leo!

Another scripture is offered by Daleth—"as many as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ." There is neither Jew nor Greek, &c.: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus;" "one being," says Daleth; but if so, the whole "being" died when Christ died, sharing actually the agony, the scourge, the thorns, the cross, the spear; the whole "being" rose again when Christ rose; yea, the whole "being" is already glorified in heaven, where Christ ever lives in glory; and more, the "one being" ransomed the "one being," and the "one being" intercedes for and justifies the "one being." A mere confounding of language, of thought, of fact. Verily this is enough, without reminding Daleth that the word "one," (and others,) in the abstract form, must be interpreted by the context in its nearer or larger scope. And the reference here to distinctions, "Jew and Greek, bond and free, male and female," shows the meaning to be, that Christians are "one in Christ" without any kind of distinction. Not even the shadow of "being" is afforded to "human nature" by this language of the apostle. When that apostle declares that the "second Adam was a quickening (or life-giving) Spirit," he is speaking of "the resurrection of the dead," not of grace in the present life; and that that resurrection is begun in the present life, is only a respectable hypothesis.

Of the paragraph from Mr. W. in which Bishop Beveridge is quoted, I prefer saying little. It is eminently obscure; or else, it does say that Christ was not united to an "individual man," but only to "human nature." Now, I have always believed that the Son of Mary was "an individual man," not "human nature" merely. And I have never believed that, when the Nicene Creed affirms that Christ "was made man," and the Athanasian that He was "perfect man," they purported any thing other or less than that He was completely and unequivocally an "individual man." Nor do I believe that mere "human nature," as distinguished from or contrasted or compared with a veritable body and soul, died on the Cross, was buried in the tomb, went to the place of spirits, and rose again with body and soul re-united. Far better than this, is obscurity in the paragraph.

Having written thus much, I waited for the remainder of Daleth's article. It proves that he would go farther, if possible, than Archdeacon Wilberforce, and with an honesty equally fearless and frank,—yet not without inconsistency. In his first head, (and again near the close,) he appears somewhat indifferent to the words "organization" and "consubstantial," though these, with "entity," contain the grounds of my opposition to the theory. These gave it a definite expression; and indefinite fancies may be left to evaporate and release the true doctrine from their incumbrance. Daleth, indeed, averred of "human nature" that "the whole undivided substance" is "possessed by each member of the human race;" but as the terms "organization" and "consubstantial" "mattered not," the same might be inferred of his (not Mr. W.'s) word "substance," and of his assertion that every man "possessed" this "whole undivided substance." But now he offers and repeats the "great truth of the absolute identification [meaning, produced identicalness] of our regenerate nature with the manhood [nature] of Christ." Without the word "substance" this language presents a truth, though hyperbolically. But combined with that explicit word, all the others, "an organized consubstantial entity," are fixed and rivetted, as the more than quasi-physical explanation of our

* It is a crude hypothesis, that the germs of all mankind were contained in Adam and Eve; and sound theology repels all defective aid. A germ is an organization, however minute; and an organization must consist of several or rather many atoms; and atoms are not nothing, of no bulk; and the aggregation of these in a human being, for thousands of millions of progeny, would produce deformity, incompatible with health, without a constant miracle, and fatal eventually to life. Allowing only 500 millions for each generation, three generations in a century, and 60 centuries since the creation, we have 180 generations, and 90,000 millions of germs: below the mark, probably, but I have not time to refer; and thousands of millions more are yet to be born. What a tumour—and for nine hundred years! Where was the "human form divine?" The sound view is, that germs, by the creative law providentially directed, are formed prout ova of the immediate parent—that law being embodied in the animal economy.

How many billions of germs in the first grains of wheat, mustard, millet? in the original mushroom and fern seeds, and those of the other cryptogamous vegetables? in the primitive gnats, mites, animalculæ? in the fish of the fifth day, seeing that the expansion of one roe swells the animal beyond long endurance?

union with the Redeemer. "Each member of the human race possesses the whole undivided substance of human nature;" and that "whole undivided substance," in "our regenerate nature, is absolutely identical with (the whole undivided substance of) the manhood or human nature of Christ!" Consternation! Beloved reader, whether philosophic or devout, (or both, which is better,) are you not dumb with amazement? I know not who Daleth is: but, be he who he may, except from his own pen, I would not believe he could utter this.

And this lamentable utterance proclaims how he understands the phrase "in Christ," of which he quotes a paragraph of texts. As much as he, or any one, I joyfully believe that good Christians are "in Christ;" but I do not believe that their privilege comes of the "absolute identicalness," in both Him and them, and in all, of "the whole undivided substance of human nature." Nor do I imagine that many of us agree with honest Daleth, or at least will manfully and explicitly avow their consent, in that crudest of doctrines; although it is obvious that his complete unreserve ought to be loyally shared by his friends and those of Mr. W.'s book. It may be added, that, according to the final text quoted by him, we are "in Christ" as we are "in" the Father; (1 John, v. 20.) "we are in Him that is [the] True, even in His Son;" and we are "in" the Father, obviously, without any quasi-physical "identification absolute" of "human nature" with His nature, of human "substance" with the Divine substance—without any conjoined "entity" of man, co-"organized" and "consubstantial," with His "entity" inscrutable. I do not believe that such fancies are either requisite or lawful.

And quite as little does my poor judgment apprehend how, in order to "co-die" with Christ, be "co-crucified" with Him, "co-buried, co-raised, co-quickened, co-seated," we must believe that "human nature" is a "substance," a "whole undivided substance," and "absolutely identical" in Christ and all holy men, or that it is an "organized consubstantial entity." A small dash of common sense will certify us that the human nature of one who is regenerated in this year, 1849, can only in a wide (however edifying and comforting) sense have "co-died, been co-crucified, co-buried, co-raised, co-quickened, with Christ," in the year 33. And our being "co-seated with Him in heavenly places," refers to our position in the Church below, which, like the "holy place" in the tabernacle, is one with the "holy of holies," or Church above, and so is called a part of the "heavenly places." There is reference also, by anticipation, to our final throne, "we shall also reign with Him." Daleth himself, in a few lines, acknowledges against the strict letter of these and other expressions,—"The Scriptures seem to labour, by the strongest and most emphatic figures and language, to impress this great truth of the absolute identification," &c.: i. e. "the strongest and most emphatic scriptures" of this kind are "figures," are "figures and language," language in which the figurative is an element; and figure, less or greater, dissolves an argument concerning reality, concerning "substance" and "absolute identity." An involuntary glimpse of the debility of his theory. Moreover, the Jews and Romans, against light, crucified the Redeemer; but we ourselves, with the light enabling us, "crucify the flesh, with its affections and lusts."

The Church is called "the body of the Lord," because it is His own beloved which He ransomed, His own property which "He purchased with His own blood." The Jewish Church, likewise, "chosen Jerusalem," is called "the body of Moses." (Jude 9; Zech. iii. 2.)

Of the clauses quoted from the Communion office, it is enough to say, that they neither utter nor imply aught of our pertaining to the "body" of Christ through an "organized consubstantial entity," or through the "absolute identification of substance." Nothing short of the most positive and most absolutely unqualified terms can adjuvate such theology. To go at large into the signification of this eucharistic language, would create a side issue, of which the point before us is altogether independent.

My apprehension that the peculiar theory of Mr. W. might in future be exaggerated into heterodoxy, is turned aside by Daleth without the least notice of the fact I gave, from the "Christian Remembrancer," of a degree of defection already! Since then, a straw in the same direction betrays the course of the aerial current. I may presume that he has seen it. The plea that the "Incarnation is closely allied to the Cross," &c., is valid for the genuine doctrine, not for the illusion of a semi-material working of its benefits. That plea, too, of future indefectibility, has been offered in nascent heresy, nascent parity, nascent mysticism; and it reminds one of the old exclamation, "is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?"

My hint concerning the "mediation of a medium" embodied the contrast between that and the "mediation of a Mediator," between the intervention of a thing or instrument, "human nature," and the interposition of a Person or agent, the Divine Harmonizer, Victim, Priest, High-priest; but this wide discrimination Daleth ignores. And his and Mr. W.'s view of "natural religion" is the mere popular and short-sighted one, that which half-philosophers, and conceited infidels, and their unwary echoes, obtrude on sound theology; while mine is greatly more ample. But, as before, I avoid adventitious questions, however important.

I think I have written enough on this volume and its theory. Twice have I now discussed them; once on the work generally, and again in the selections from it made prominent by Daleth. And what the latter has himself contributed to his article may be regarded, I trust, as effectually disposed of. The words "organization" and "consubstantial" are already visibly shaken, in more than one direction; and the magnificent excoitation—"the whole undivided substance of human nature, existing whole and undivided in every man, and absolutely identical (whole and undivided) in all, including the Saviour"—rests on lower authority, and may possibly have a swifter fate. These very notions are too recondite for much enlargement in a newspaper. Delivered from all such incumbrances, expurgated and re-cast if that may be, the learned and eminently pious and edifying instruction of Archdeacon Wilberforce will be more widely and more effectively profitable. God forbid that I should touch rudely the minutest lineament of the genuine revealed doctrine of the INCARNATION.

WHO SHALL BEGIN THE SERVICE?

MR. EDITOR:

Your correspondent upon the subject of "Who shall begin the service," having anticipated me by clearly stating his objection to the practice upon which I had intended animadverting, I will merely express my decided opinion, that it would be "more honored in the breach than the observance." I am sure if the Rectors, respectively, would make known to the committees on music their disapprobation of the "screaming" by the Choirs, at the beginning of the service, it would forthwith be discontinued.

In reply to his question, "Is it rubrical?" I will quote from the order of morning Prayer in the Church of England: "At the beginning of morning Prayer, the Minister shall read with a loud voice some one or more of these sentences from Scripture that follow;" and although the rubric in our Prayer Book is not quite so emphatic,—“The Minister shall begin the Morning Prayer by reading one or more of the following sentences of Scripture”—yet it is rendered imperative in both to read the introductory sentence. And what, therefore, can be more appropriate than for the Minister to begin the service by reading with a loud voice the impressive sentence, "The Lord is in his holy temple, let all the earth keep silence before him?" BAPTISMAL REGENERATION IN 1738.

MR. EDITOR:—

In wandering among the tomb-stones in the venerable graveyard of St. Thomas' Church, White-Marsh, Montgomery county, the following inscription was noticed, and transcribed. We like (though some may not) the poetry for the sake of the theology, and herewith give it to the readers of the Banner.

OLD MORTALITY.

Here lieth the Body
Of GEORGE and PATIENCE, Son and Daughter of
Jos. and Mary M———
GEORGE died April 20th, aged 18 months,
PATIENCE died Jan. 1, 1738, aged 3 years.

Two harmless Babes that only came and cry'd
In Baptism to be wash'd from sin, and dy'd.
They're gone to rest just as they did begin
Sorrow to know, before they had known sin.

Rock Church Rectory.

REV. AND DEAR MR. EDITOR:

I have a desire to say a word or two touching a custom which is amazingly in the fashion in the Diocese wherein lies my parish. It is a custom to which my worthy predecessor fell a victim, and to which I foresee I am about to be sacrificed.

It would appear that, time out of mind, it has been the habit of my good parishioners and their fathers before them, to pay half the minister's salary in presents. Doubtless in the good ancient days when my parish was in its infancy, (it is now one hundred years or more old,) and the good people were simple and agricultural in their habits, the custom was a proper and a healthy one; for I find on turning back to an old parsonage expense-book, kept by my predecessor of eighty years ago, that he acknowledges the receipts in one quarter year of as follows:

From * * * 14 bushels of corn.
" * * * 2 loads of fodder.
" * * * 1 ton of meadow hay.
" * * * 1 barrel of flour.
" * * * 4 bacon hams.
" * * * 3 cured sides.
" * * * 1 barrel of apples.
" * * * 1 cart load of pumpkins.
" * * * 3 loads of wood, corded.
" * * * 1 sheep.
" * * * 2 nice quilted counterpanes.
" * * * 1 new chapeau with lace.
" * * * 1 pair of breeches and paste buckles.
Mr. * * * A two-year old heifer.

Such were the sturdy gifts made to their minister by the forefathers of my parishioners. But time and people and tastes have changed. Then all the congregation were farmers, and gave of such as they produced. But now there are not three farmers in my parish. The village has become a large town, and pianos have taken the place of the spinning wheel. With the change of times, unfortunately, there has been no change in the modus of paying the minister's salary. It is now half money, and the other half in presents! But, alas! there is a sad change in the character of these. But a list of a few will be more eloquent than words. I take it from a catalogue that I made out for the purpose of having them disposed of at auction, to be converted into money; but very little came from them to clothe and feed me and mine withal, as you may judge when you read the receipts for three months.

From Mrs. * * * 1 bouquet holder, filagree.
" Miss * * * 1 Album for daughter Jane.
" Mrs. * * * 1 Daguerreotype of widow L's late husband.
" Mr. * * * 1 Turkish pipe.
" Miss * * * 2 ornamental gilt pasteboard baskets.
" Mrs. * * * 1 shell box.
" Mr. * * * A ring for Betty.
" Mr. * * * A port-folio.
" Mr. * * * 1 Annual, gilt.
" Mrs. * * * 1 snuff-box, with Napoleon's picture.
" Mr. * * * 1 patent candle extinguisher.
" Mr. * * * 1 copy of Shakespeare, 5 vols.
" Mr. * * * 1 bottle of Cologne for wife.
" Mr. * * * 3 jumping ropes for the three girls.
" Miss * * * A stuffed rabbit for a pin-cushion.

Such, sir, is part of the catalogue of my parochial gifts. Such vanities as these are supposed to eke out the difference between $500 and $1000. You can judge how far they will be likely to go towards adding to the comforts of the table, clothing, or welfare of the minister. For absolute want of money I had to dispose of a perfect toy-case of these bijouterie at auction; and I realized seventeen dollars for what represented two hundred.

I hope, sir, that if parishioners are to pay their ministers, they will do it to the full in money. The plan of presents in these gairish days is an iniquitous one. The giver eases her or his conscience by the present of an annual, or a doll to the baby, and the live baby starves for bread and butter. If any man ought to have his mind at ease touching money, it is the minister of God.

Your friend,

A VICTIM TO PRESENTS.

LINES ON THE DEATH OF MARY HAND ROGERS.

God loved her gentle heart so well,
He claim'd her as His own,
And kindly fitted her to dwell
Beside His mercy's throne.

He watch'd her with a father's care,
With tenderness and love;
He made her pure, and good, and fair
As angels are above.

He gave her Holy Truth to light
The happy path she trod,
In spirit gay, in beauty bright,
She ne'er forgot her God.

He never wrung her gentle breast
With anguish such as ours,
She went "rejoicing to her rest"
O'er paths of earthly flowers.

He would not leave the dear one here,
Where snares and thorns beset;
Why trickles then the falling tear?
But we can ne'er forget.

He takes her to that Heavenly home
So blissful, but unknown,
Not destin'd sadly there to roam
A stranger and alone!

A joyous welcome she will meet
From one she lov'd on earth;
There spirits hold communion sweet
As round the family hearth.

"God's will be done," He hath done well,
He took our lov'd and best,
All merciful the edict fell,
For grace he spared the rest.

He blames us not, that o'er the dead
Sad mem'rys watch we keep;
He will accept the tears we shed,
For did not Jesus weep?

DIED, in Smithfield, Isle of Wight County, Va., on the 23d September, 1849, Mrs. ANNA R. TUCKER, wife of Mr. James H. Tucker, in the 70th year of her age—a Christian from principle, an Episcopalian from an honest conviction, Catholic in her feelings toward "all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity," active in doing good—respected, esteemed and beloved by all who knew her. Never have our Church and community been more sadly afflicted than in this our loss. And yet why should we mourn her departure! Why should we weep that the aged disciple has been at last permitted to go in peace to the bosom of her Father and her God! It will be a matter of no surprise to those who have traced the true Christian character in the life of Mrs. Tucker, to learn that her death was at once peaceful and triumphant. No gloomy fears haunted her pillow. She who had been justified by faith and renovated by the spirit of God—knew in whom she had trusted; and felt, as she was about to descend the dark valley and shadow of death, that "the Saviour had passed through its portals before her, and the lamp of His love was her guide thro' its gloom." Thus guided, her soul seemed to antedate the bliss reserved for the faithful in Heaven—and yet her's was no selfish joy. One by one she had summoned to her bedside her brothers, nephews, and her physician, and recounting the mercies of God to her and to them, exhorted them to meet her in that Heaven which seemed to dawn more brightly upon her vision as the spirit trembled upon the verge of the two worlds. Her sufferings had been sanctified through God to the perfection of her spirit in that meekness and gentleness, which were her characteristics during a long life, which shone with steady ray during her protracted illness, and surrounded her death couch with an halo of beauty to those who were privileged to stand thus, as it were, "quite on the verge of Heaven." She spoke in terms of deep affection of her Pastor, himself abroad in quest of health; and calling her husband requested him to remove from the finger her wedding-ring, which more than forty years before he had placed there, with a kiss of youthful affection. It was returned to his gray-haired partner with a parting kiss, as he bent above her in tears; and affectionately commending all to her Saviour and her God, her bright black eye, always beaming with love and kindness, was closed to earth, to open in the beatific vision in Heaven.

"Oh change! stupendous change!
There lies the soulless clod—
The sun eternal breaks,
The immortal wakes,
Wakes with her God!"

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK FOR 1850.

"THE BOOK OF THE NATION."

The Oldest Magazine in America—Published by the present Proprietor for Twenty Years.

EDITED BY MRS. SARAH J. HALE.

THE Publisher of the Lady's Book, knowing how completely he put down all opposition in 1849, and being assured that the public is also acquainted with this fact, deems it only necessary to say that in 1850 he will improve on 1849; and he will, as usual, give more reading and more engravings than his contemporaries. Perhaps a little comparison of what he did last year, and what his adversaries did, may be amusing, if not instructive to those about to subscribe for a monthly magazine. One thing the public may be assured of, that the publisher of Godey's Lady's Book will not falsify his prospectus, as he deems it as great a sin to tell a falsehood in print as it is to give utterance to a verbal one. Listen to the universal voice of the American Press.

Comparison between Godey and the other Philadelphia Monthlies.

In 1849, the Lady's Book gave 916 pages—which is 116 more than one, and 148 more than the other Philadelphia monthly. He gave 281 engravings—among which were 20 colored, and 93 full page—which is 136 more than one, and 180 more than the other.

We gave, in each number, a piece of music, printed separately on tinted paper, making 24 pages, or 12 pieces in a year. To show the cheapness of the Lady's Book, this same music, if bought separately at the music stores, would cost exactly the price of the whole year's subscription—$3.

It will be seen, at a glance, which is the cheapest magazine for $3, when you get 116 pages of reading more than one magazine, and 148 more than another; 136 engravings more than one, and 180 more than the other; to say nothing of the superiority of our engravings, among which are 20 colored, and their usefulness to ladies. The Colored Fashion Plates alone cost as much as nearly all the engravings of either of the other magazines. These endeavors to please our subscribers have cost us an immense sum of money; but if honesty of purpose and a positive dislike to falsehoods in prospectuses, will entitle a publisher to a large subscription list, the Lady's Book is entitled to it.

Some of our Peculiar Embellishments.

Ladies' Work Table, which comprises every kind of Needlework, Embroidery, Knitting, Netting, Crochet, Patterns for Caps, Chemisettes, Children's Clothes, Wedding Dresses, In-door and Out-door Costumes; Birds of America; Colored Flower Plates; Model Cottages and Furniture; Fashionable do.; Lace-Work; Vignette Plates at the head of articles, etc. etc. All the above are illustrated by engravings.

And, in 1850, will also be given a set of engravings, illustrative of

THE COSTUMES OF ALL NATIONS.

With descriptions by Mrs. Hale. Most of the old features of the Book that were so popular last year, will be retained, and new ones added as they may suggest themselves to the publisher.

A NEW NOVEL.

By W. GILMORE SIMMS, will be one of the Features for 1850.

Our Reading Matter.

We have long stood at the head of the magazine world for our contributions; they are always moral and instructive, and such as may be placed before a family without hesitation. This department is under the control of MRS. SARAH JOSEPHA HALE, whose name alone is a sufficient guarantee for the propriety of the Lady's Book. We may say the same of our engravings. We will never, as is done by a cotemporary, publish indecent model-artist pictures, such as no parent would allow a child to look at.

We will not here parade the names of our contributors: it is not necessary. Godey's Lady's Book and its proprietor are too well known for us to take up space to enumerate the names of those who, by their writings, have placed themselves at the head of the authors of this country. One thing our friends will oblige us by not doing—conferring upon us the title of "The Blackwood of America." We do not wish to bear the appellation of a magazine that is opposed to the interests of this country, and always loud in its denunciations of it; and, besides, Blackwood does not publish Fashions. To sum up all, we unhesitatingly state, that

We have much more than fulfilled all our promises, And enter upon the year with a new one, which those who know us—who does not?—will believe.

Single number of the Lady's Book, 25 cents.

The above are large-sized parlor prints. The "Death-bed of Wesley" contains many portraits; "Wesley preaching in the Amphitheatre" contains hundreds of figures, and cost $1500 to engrave it. "America Guided by Wisdom" is a very large line engraving, and cost $1800 to engrave it. "General Taylor and Old Whitey" is one of the largest of the General Taylor prints, and is engraved from an original painting, at a cost of $1000. The heads of Wesley and Fletcher are of a good size for framing.

These Plates cannot be purchased at the Stores at less than $3 each.

Premiums are only sent when the subscriptions are remitted direct to the Publisher.

The LADY'S BOOK for 1850 will contain several hundred good engravings.

Postmasters and others sending Clubs will oblige us very much by having them all addressed to one name. It is no inconvenience to them, and will be a great favor to us.

CANDIDATE FOR HOLY ORDERS.—Cornelius E. Swope, Instructor in the Grammar School of St. James's College, has been re-admitted to the Candidature in this Diocese, on Letters Dimissory from the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of New Jersey.—Church Advertiser.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH.—INCENDIARIES.—Another splendid church is now going up, phoenix-like, from the ashes of St. Paul's church, destroyed by fire, the 3d of August, as also mentioned in my last. It is to be brick, and to cost some $16,000.

So frequent and alarming were the fires in our city the past summer, that for two months no one felt safe on retiring to bed at night. At the burning of the Theatre, one man, advanced in years, a worthy citizen, being so suddenly overcome with fright, died in a few hours. The citizens generally, believing these fires the work of incendiaries, induced the Mayor (whose barn was also burned) to offer a reward of five hundred dollars. A night watch was put in motion, and the city police, and citizens in general, were on the look out. Indeed, every precaution was used to ferret out these desperadoes. At length the $500 reward had, indirectly, its desired effect, as frequently such large rewards do, when all other means fail to accomplish the object. By the vigilance of the night watch, or of Mr. Morgan, Captain of the watch, suspicion was fastened on three young men, to wit: Newton Holt, — Kelley, and — Parker; there was, however, no evidence to work a conviction, until one of the three, Kelley, turned State's evidence. This brought to light some of the darkest deeds ever known in the history of Cleveland. Holt and Parker, aware that they were suspected as being the guilty ones, fled: having engaged a passage on board the Eureka; but were taken from the vessel on her way to Montreal, and brought back to Cleveland.

During the trial of Holt, (which continued nearly a week,) the Court-House was crowded. Hundreds coming and going, could not get in. The excitement was great. The whole community felt a deep interest in the trial. Yesterday Holt was sentenced to the Penitentiary 6 years; a very mild verdict, considering the offence. Parker's case is laid over to the next term. Kelley, their accomplice and accuser, goes clear of punishment.

For the last six months, crime and wickedness seem to have increased to a degree never known in Cleveland. Our Jail has been, and I am informed by the sheriff, is yet filled to overflowing. Some of whom, I regret to say, are very young, even youth of twelve years. Some are there for murder. Some for robbery. Some for arson. Some for larceny. Yesterday James Hammond was sentenced to the penitentiary four years, for manslaughter; killing Daniel Route, a colored man. Jonathan Kaneen, manslaughter, killing Daniel Route, two years. George Bailey, burglary, three years. Christian Meak, alias Mack, stabbing with intent to kill, five years. Newton Holt, as above, for arson, in firing St. Paul's Church, six years. Lucius Newton was indicted for grand larceny, and fled on bail $4,000. Several boys were returned to remain in the dark dungeon-like cells of our county jail, on bread and water, 30 days, for various offences. Surely the way of the transgressor is hard. O, the heart sickens on narrating the dark catalogue of crimes and its consequences; and is moved with pity at the sight of the evil doers. May we not inquire who is responsible for this increased amount of crime in our city? May we not say parents have much more to do with it than they are aware of. It was proved in evidence given at the trial of Holt, (who is 19 years of age,) that he has been in the habit of being out night after night, late, and sometimes all night, prowling about the streets in company with others like himself; assembled at places such as groceries, saloons, playing checkers and other games; idling away his time in foolish talk and frolics; when he should have been at home, in bed and asleep; or reading some useful book, with which to improve his mind; or enjoying the society of pious parents, for such he had, as any one in the churches in Cleveland. Parents should keep their children at home at night; aye, and days too, or find some suitable employment for them. Idleness, and want of employment, has brought many a young man to the gallows. O, I never pitied parents as I did those of young Holt, when the father, overwhelmed in deep-felt sorrow, told me he had rather see every child he had buried, than that they should be guilty of such demeanors, and come to such an end. And the mother, O, it seems as if her heart-strings would break. What sorrow has the misdemeanor of that forward son brought upon the whole family. Council engaged in the case of Holt, were, S. J. Noble, Prosecuting Attorney, and Joseph Adams, and H. B. Pains, Esqrs., for the State, and Messrs. R. Hitchcock, E. Wade, and J. Fitch, for the defence.—Cor. W. C. Journal.

MAINE.

On Friday, the 23d of November, at Christ Church, Gardiner, the Rev. Edwin Murray, Minister of St. John's Church, Dresden, was admitted to the order of the Priesthood. Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. Messrs. Crosswell and Gardiner; the candidate was presented by the Rev. Mr. Burgess; and these three Presbyters united with the Bishop in the imposition of hands. The sermon was by the Bishop, from the ordination of elders by Paul and Barnabas.—Christian Witness.

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. Edward Magee has resigned his charge of St. Mary's Church, Delphi, Indiana; and has accepted a unanimous call to the Parish of Grace Church, Mount Clemens, Macomb County, Michigan.

Rev. Wm. L. Hyland, having taken charge of Christ Church, Wellsburg, and of the Mission at Elizabeth Town, desires all communications intended for him, to be directed to Wheeling, Va.

The Rev. William Green, Deacon, having presented Letters Dimissory from the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of New Jersey, has been received into the Diocese of Maryland, in which he has been for some time officiating, as Missionary at the Mt. Savage Works, and at the Maryland Mining Works, Allegany county.

OHIO.

At a meeting of the Standing Committee, held Nov. 20th, 1849, Rev. J. T. Brooke, D. D., was elected President, and Rev. G. D. Gillespie, Secretary.

Columbus S. Doolittle was recommended to the Bishop to be received as a candidate for Orders.

ALABAMA.

We think that the following portrait is not unknown in these parts.

AN IMPOSTOR.

A man passed through this city recently, against whom it would be well for the public, and especially churchmen, to be on their guard. He pretended to have lost his pocket book, and in this way to have been left destitute of the means of continuing his journey. He called on a gentleman who has a son in College at Princeton, and whose wife is a Presbyterian. Here he professed to be a Presbyterian Student of Theology, just from Princeton. He called, he said, at the request of the gentleman's son, with whom he professed to be intimately acquainted. After taking tea with the family he declared his loss, and asked aid. He called also on the clergyman of the Church, to whom he pretended to be a student of Theology, preparing for orders in the Church, and to be on his way from Mississippi, where he had been on a visit, to Marietta, Georgia, his place of residence. The Clergyman of Marietta being written to declared that no such person resided there, but that one answering his description had passed through the place about two years ago, and attempted to impose on him, and did impose on several. About the same period the same individual, as the writer feels well assured, called on him, in Richmond, Virginia, with the same story of losing a pocket book. He is gentlemanly in his manners and appearance, intelligent and well informed, especially in relation to every thing pertaining to the Church. In his deportment he is easy and at the same time modest and unassuming, his voice is soft and low; he is of middle stature and rather stout. He is a young man, of fair complexion and light hair, inclining to auburn. He called himself Mason here, in Richmond he called himself M'Mann, and in Georgia the impression of the clergyman above referred to is that he took the name of Campbell. His impositions have evidently been carried on extensively, and he is admirably calculated to succeed in them.

TOM MOORE.

On a bed of pain, perhaps death, in a cottage in Devonshire, lies the greatest poet of the new tongue of Ireland.

After a life of nearly seventy years—for fifty years of which he has been famous—the son of a Dublin grocer, the friend of Emmet, Grattan, Byron and Fox, lies crushed in mind and heart, his memory with all its untold tales taken from him, the quiver of his fancy emptied of its last arrow, with many years and sorrows like oak and lead wrapping about his body, in anticipation of the grave. Poor "Tom Moore," how grey and cold sets in the night of his long and brilliant day!

The poet's body must die. Let us leave that to the undertaker and sexton—it belongs lawfully to them. But the poet's works and words, his genius, or that part of it developed in type, his philosophy as revealed in his writings, his moral influence on his nation and his age—these belong to us who are of that posterity to which all the genius past has appeared, and before whom such men as Moore have laid their works as it were in evidence.

Of the moral influence of Moore on his age, but little can be said. In temperament and taste he was neither European nor Christian. He was "a child of the sun," an Asiatic. All his imagery and all his predilections were oriental. Born in the very west of Europe, on the Bank of the Atlantic, in an atmosphere of salted mist, he was totally unlike an Islander of that latitude, as man could be.

Judging from his writings he should have been a native of Rhodog, half Greek, half Asiatic, an intellectual compound of Epicurus and Mahomet. He sings forever of the sun, of nightingales, of living in the open air, of orange groves and fire flies, palanqueens and palmtrees. A true child of the Islands would have substituted for these the cloudy storminess of his own climate. The mighty Homeric sea, the oak and pine, the struggling ship, and the thunder of heaven.

But his first exercise of self-will was to forsake his country, and to acclimate his imagination in the east—an effort in which he succeeded, as no Western man ever did before or will do again.—Dublin Nation.

THE CHEERFUL HEART.

In infancy, the cheerful heart
Beholds a smiling world of flowers,
Each look, each word, a joy imparts,
And earth seems gay as Eden's bowers:
Its inward light is shed on all,
A world more bright its dreams recall.

In childhood, still the cheerful heart
Finds many mirthful, happy hours;
Its infant purity departs,
Yet round it linger lovely flowers,
Lent from that land of radiant truth,
Where Angel bands watch over youth.

The cheerful heart, as years steal on,
Trembles to view a world of crime;
Its faith in earthly things is gone,
For sin or sorrow come with time,
To cloud the brow and dim the eye,
Where brightness now doth shadow'd lie.

The cheerful heart then turns from earth,
Nature and God its light restore,
It finds a new and holier birth,
Where blessed truth departs no more,
The spirit meek, its wings expand,
And soars to seek its native land.

BISHOP IVES AND MR. BADGER.

MR. EDITOR:—

Some thoughts have been suggested by the perusal of this painful controversy, which I shall venture to proffer for insertion in your columns.

1. As to the spirit of controversy. I do not mean to intimate that there should be any trammels imposed upon the right of free discussion in matters of such moment as those which concern our salvation. But I do think that we should be most careful and self-restraining in the exercise of the right, where the conscientiously expressed opinions of a Bishop of the Church, uttered in the discharge of his solemn and bounden duty, are the subject of our criticisms. There should, in such a case, be no departure from due respect—from kind and charitable construction of motives and conduct—and from the fullest admission of the same right on his part to the formation and expression of opinion, which we claim for ourselves. Above all, there should be no effort (or, if any be attempted, none such encouraged by the true sons of the Church,) to put down a Bishop, or to terrify or silence him in his conscientious exposition of the duties and rights of the Gospel Ministry. If his views on these topics should be deemed by any of us erroneous, respectful hesitation to receive them, even entire forbearance from attempts publicly to refute them, is far better than active opposition. With these views, such remarks as the following are, to many, painful and exceptionable. "Has Bishop Ives been favored with a special revelation, a vision of angels to open to him the mind of the Church?" (Badger, p. 39.) "Has he seen a star in the East, at Oxford or at Rome, and has he gone there to worship?" (ib.) This last sentence seems, moreover, to be in bad taste; insensible; calculated merely to tickle the ears of very superficial persons; and the idea suggested in it entirely without analogy to the subject in hand.

Open to similar exceptions, are the expressions of the pamphlet on pp. 101, 102. The Bishop is there charged with an attempt to establish a "spiritual lordship and tyranny," to "disannul, in effect, the laws made by our Church," and to "establish in the Diocese, an Episcopal despotism." Now all this declamation, which sounds like a town-meeting address, rather than a grave theological discussion, is calculated really to lessen the force of Mr. Badger's able arguments upon some of the points under discussion, and to lead to a suspicion, that there is some motive for the sharp opposition which would not be divined by a stranger, from a mere perusal of the Bishop's Pastoral. However this may be, such charges, I suppose, can have no effect upon any in the Diocese of N. Carolina, or out of it, who are acquainted with that eminent Bishop; and I suppose farther, that that gentleman will not be at all intimidated by the threat thrown out, "that we must, and will do what we can to assist and defend our endangered rights, and maintain our threatened liberty." (p. 102.) One is almost tempted to smile at this heated language, which sounds like a second Declaration of Independence; but the smile is checked by the rising regret, that words of affectionate entreaty and remonstrance had not been substituted for those of indignation and defiance. Earnestly do we hope that language like this, may not encourage the Bishop to take a stand, under the influence of excited feelings, upon ground which he would not occupy in his cooler and more deliberate moments.

2. As to the Bishop's doctrine upon the subject of confession and absolution. What is it? I suppose it, from his Pastoral, to be as follows:

That private confession is not regarded by our branch of the Church as generally necessary to salvation, and hence is left to the voluntary action of individuals, there being nothing in her doctrines, however, to interfere with this voluntary action, while priestly absolution from all deadly sin after baptism, is regarded as necessary, and that private confession, although not enjoined by the Church, may become necessary by the moral state of individuals. (Pastoral, p. 51.)

Mr. Badger argues that the Bishop's teaching is this, viz., that absolution by a priest, to be given upon a particular private confession made to him, of all mortal sins, is necessary to the remission thereof; (p. 13.) or that, in any event, he teaches that priestly absolution is necessary, where it may be had; a particular confession being necessary as a condition precedent to render the absolution effective, and that either as a means or as an aïd, such confession ought, in some cases, to be made to a priest. (p. 14.)

Now one thing is very clear, which is, that if Mr. Badger makes the Bishop to say that a particular private confession to a priest is necessary to salvation, according to the doctrinal standard of our Church, he argues him into saying what is directly opposed to his express declaration, both in his Pastoral and in his Charge to the Salisbury Convention; for, in that Charge, he says, "I may here express my conviction, that the Book of Common Prayer, our standard of Doctrine, Discipline and Worship, does not authorize any clergyman of this Church to teach or enforce such confession as necessary to salvation; and that the only confession which it authorizes, is the voluntary confession of the penitent in accordance with the exhortation in the office for the Holy Communion." And at the very close of his Pastoral, the Bishop affirms: "In regard to the substance of my Charge to the Clergy at the last Convention, I desire distinctly to avow my adherence to it as my belief, always and still." This is very emphatic, and seems very plain, and ought to be satisfactory. How then can Mr. B. persuade his readers that the Bishop teaches, that the Church enforces particular private confession to a priest, in order to obtain absolution, and thereby remission of sins, as necessary to salvation?

The Bishop quotes with approbation, the expressed opinion of Bishop Gadsden, concerning his Pastoral Letter on the Priestly Office, as containing the truth on this great point; and that high authority, in the extract which is contained in the Pastoral, expressly states, that absolution is not "a sacrament," but "an ordinance full of instruction." The Bishop also relies upon the authority of the Rev. W. A. Curtis, and quotes a passage from his sermon in 1843, touching "the Judicial Absolution of the Minister," as containing "sound and godly" instruction, and is evidently of the opinion that his own views correspond with those of Bishop G. and Mr. Curtis. Mr. Badger intimates no hesitation in accepting Mr. Curtis's doctrine. He calls his sermon, "able." Should not all this have led him to hesitate in supposing that Bishop Ives goes at all farther than that rev. gentleman in his doctrine of absolution? Farther, Mr. Badger is himself not very clear in his statement of Bishop Ives' doctrine, for he does not in terms say, that the Bishop teaches the necessity of private absolution; although that would seem to be inferred from Mr. B.'s manner of announcing the former's doctrine. (p. 14.) Now the Bishop does not say one word expressly about the necessity of private absolution, and consistently with his own views, he could not, because, having stated that "private confession is not regarded by our branch of the one Catholic Church, as generally necessary to salvation;" he could not maintain the necessity of private absolution which only follows confession. He therefore leaves it as a question "for each one to determine" for himself, how far the priestly absolution (which of course, means the absolution in our public worship) may be effective without private confession. All that he says, therefore, upon the subject, of the necessity of absolution, may well apply to the Declaration of Absolution in the public service of the Church.

That this is generally necessary, the Bishop asserts. Of course, no Churchman will deny, that if the power of absolution rests anywhere, it is with the Priesthood. I shall not stop to argue this. Well, it is introduced into the public service of the Church, and is pronounced by the priest alone. It follows the confession. This Declaratory Absolution is one of the four modes (according to Bingham and Mr. Curtis, both of whom Mr. B. quotes with approbation) whereby "the benefit of absolution is ordinarily dispensed unto men." Is this a mere form introduced into the service of the Church? Has it no effect? Is it intended to have none? Why does it compose a part of our stated service? Mr. Badger says nothing from which an answer to these questions can be drawn. The natural answer seems to be, that the Declaration of Absolution is not a mere form, that it has an effect, if the conditions are performed, and was intended to be effective, and that it composes a part of the daily service, because men are daily sinning, and need the absolution consequent upon their repentance and faith.

But farther. By the same authorities just quoted, (and they are, in great degree, Mr. B.'s own) Judicial Absolution is another of the "four acts of the ministry whereby the benefit of absolution is ordinarily dispensed unto man." By this ordinance, when "scandalous and flagitious sinners are excluded from the Communion of the Church, 'upon becoming sincerely penitent, they are received again into it.'" When such are excluded from the communion of the Church, does Mr. Badger contend that they can be readmitted without absolution? He supposes that the general confession and declaration of absolution are all that are necessary in such cases. It may be so, yet there seems much reason to require some more personal act in the case. But, however this may be, the absolution by the Priest, precedes the admission to the communion, and being pronounced as part of the office, would appear to have been thought necessary. Bishop Ives contends that this power of Judicial Absolution is not confined simply to Church censures, but extends to the remission of sins; and his authorities are apparently of the highest order. Mr. B. on the contrary, takes Wheatly's ground, and thinks that the ministry have merely the power of "remitting ecclesiastical censures and bonds;" and that the power of the keys is but "a power of admitting into, and shutting out of the Christian Church." To a conscientious Churchman, this supposed minor power would seem to be a tremendous one; and perhaps, there may not be a very great difference between the two powers; but whether or not, Bishop Ives stands in too good Church company with his opinion on this point, to be set down as Romanistic, merely for this reason.

Starting from the proposition that scandalous and flagitious sinners may be excluded from the communion of the Church by the Priesthood, and that absolution is necessary to restore them, the Bishop contends that the same principle applies to those who, although not notorious offenders, are equally sinners in the sight of God, by means of their secret offences. He argues, that they cut themselves off from the communion of the Church, and require restoration in the same way with the other class of offenders. There is nothing very horrible in this, nor in urging, as he does, that such persons should confess particularly to their minister these secret sins, while he abstains, as we have seen he does, from pressing it as a duty required by the Church. The exhortation to the communion, and the order for the visitation of the sick, employ language so nearly akin to what would be used in a direct requisition to private confession and absolution, that I could readily pardon a brother Churchman for entertaining the opinion that these were intended by the Church, particularly if he leaves me free to hold my own view about it, and to act accordingly.

3. As to the power of a Diocesan Convention. On this point, Bishop Ives is triumphantly right. He contends, "that a Diocesan Convention has no right to define and set forth the belief of a Diocese, or what its clergy may or may not teach." And can there really be any doubt about the truth of this position? Is this so tyrannical and novel a proposition as to justify indignant opposition, as if "the common liberty were threatened?" Why, what is Mr. Badger's doctrine? a doctrine, I hesitate not to say, fraught with frightful danger to the peace and security of our Church; calculated in its inevitable and practical tendency to divide, enlarge, diminish, and multiply the creeds of the Church; to manufacture a Southern and a Northern, an Eastern and a Western creed in the American Church; and to make these creeds change year by year, with the variant composition of our Conventions; one undoing what its predecessor had done; repealing a definition of absolution which had been before promulgated with the authority of the Diocese; and perhaps condemning as heretics the previous majority in the Convention. Is Mr. Badger aware of the consequences of his doctrine? Does he know what the power would lead to, when he claims for any Annual Convention, the right "to declare its opinions, whether there has been in any one, Bishop, Priest, or Deacon, an encroachment upon the Articles or Liturgy of the Church," and "a power to pass Canons (not inconsistent with the Constitutions and Canons of the Church) for giving to their opinion the force of law." (p. 97.) What does this mean? A Convention having power to convict a Bishop of Heresy? A Convention forcing by law its creed upon a Bishop? Who is to judge of the consistency of the Diocesan declaratory Canon with the Constitution or Canons of the Church? What Church does he mean by "the Church," in the above parenthesis? Does he desire to see one form of faith proclaimed in his own Diocese, and perhaps a different one in another? And both by Conventions? Or does he wish his own Diocese to set up for herself? Is there not abundant safeguard in our Church against heresy? Are not the clergy amenable for it? Cannot a Bishop be tried by his peers for such a sin? Would Mr. B. impanel a Jury of the Country for this trial in the shape of a Convention, some of the members, perhaps, unbaptized? Who framed our Liturgy? Did the Convention of N. Carolina? Who has the right to alter it? Has the Convention of N. Carolina? Has the Convention of N. Carolina, together with the Bishop, a right to change it, or authoritatively construe it? If not, has the Convention alone, without him and in spite of him, such a right? What disorganizing thoughts were floating through Mr. B.'s mind, when he intimates that if the Bishop resists an attempt by the Convention to force upon him its construction of the Liturgy, that body might displace him from his post of Presiding Officer, and place some one else in his room? (p. 98.) Does he insinuate that there can be a lawful Convention in opposition to the authority of the Bishop of the Diocese? Does he pretend that the Bishop has no right to be in the Convention, and to preside there, except under the will of the Convention itself? Does he mean that the Convention can exclude the Bishop? Are there any Churchmen among us who hold that doctrine? Will the clergy of N. Carolina sanction it?

But farther. What responsibility rests upon Mr. B. to preserve the Diocese in the true faith? What responsibility, under the laws and constitution of our Church, even upon its Convention? I should like to see it pointed out. Did Christ constitute Conventions to be the successors of the Apostles? Did he intrust the Commission to them? Will Mr. Badger deny that there rests on every minister of the Word, a heavy responsibility "to watch over souls as they who must give an account?" If not, does he deny that this responsibility rests upon the Chief Pastor of the Flock? Can the Chief Pastor get rid of it, without discharging his conscience in the expounding of the Word, and the administration of the Sacraments and Ordinances of our Holy Faith? Is he to be threatened with being placed under the ban of his Convention for the sincere exposition of his views, when he solemnly says, "Less, I could not have said, and been faithful to you. Less, and saved my own soul?" (p. 54.)

Mr. B. must answer the foregoing questions satisfactorily, before his pamphlet can carry conviction to thoughtful minds. These queries have been put, and the foregoing suggestions made, under the hope that they may induce a caution on the part of those interested in the Diocese of N. Carolina, (and if one member suffer, all suffer with her) in judging with respect to an all important matter, and one in which haste, passion, or prejudice may do inconceivable injury. The talented author of the "Examination" would, no doubt, be among the last, designedly to do an injury to the Church of his State and of his affections; but the heat of controversy is a dangerous atmosphere. A portion of his declamation would incline the unprejudiced reader to indulge in goodhumoured ridicule, were it not apparent that the burning words were the effusion of an earnest and an able man.

HILARIUS. DE TRIN. L. 2, p. 27.

Thus spoke a great theologian, in view of the difficulties which beset all discourse upon divine Mysteries, especially that One on which he wrote. He was a contemporary of the Nicene Council, and a confessor and sufferer for the sake of the truth of Christ's Sonship, there defined. His dogmatic knowledge may therefore be considered eminent. As a writer, his Benedictine editors have ranked him with Quintillian. His command of an accurate style is therefore unquestionable. And yet he shrank from putting ineffable Mysteries to the hazard of human utterance, lest, while combatting one heresy, his poverty of speech should involve him in a similar fault. How, then, should I presume to run the same hazard, who have none of his gifts? How should I venture to follow him along that difficult strait of orthodoxy—

Scyllam atque Charybdim
Inter, utramque viam leti discrimine parvo
Ni teneam cūsum.

It is not without a deep sense of my insufficiency for the task, that I venture to call attention to a truth which is well nigh overborne by the current theology of the day; and which I conceive has been unwittingly, but most seriously attacked by "O." in his late communications to this paper.

In my preceding article, I charged "O." with putting an unauthorized sense into the Nicene definition, Consubstantial; and his reply, in which he says I was mistaken, furnishes additional proof that I was right. I gave a history of the origin of that tessera of orthodoxy, out of Athanasius, that my readers might themselves judge of the meaning it has in the Creed. I cited passages from Athanasius, who sat in the Council, and who was afterwards the world-renowned expositor and defender of the Symbol, to show that it was intended to define the Sonship of Christ, and nothing else. I quoted a passage from the Athanasian Creed of the same purport. And yet "O." ignores all this testimony, and persists in using the word in a sense which teaches simple Sabellianism. His illustrations of his meaning put this fact beyond all question, sad though it be, to say it. "Links in a chain are not consubstantial," say, he enunciates a proposition which I will clothe in another tongue—"fœtus in utero matri consubstantialem non esset." How does that consort with the Athanasian Creed,—"God from the substance of His Father begotten, man from the substance of His Mother born?" Or with the following definition against Eutyches, by the Council of Chalcedon: "We confess one and the same Son, truly God and truly Man, consubstantial with the Father according to the Godhead, and consubstantial with us according to the Manhood?" And in his last paper he says, "a bar of iron, a block of wood or stone, are consubstantial." Consobstantial to or with what, I ask? What is that other subject with which the bar of iron is consubstantial? "O." has no other subject to produce. He uses the word in a sense which makes consubstantiality between any two subjects nonsense: an impossibility in the nature of things. He means, that every subject is consubstantial with itself only; and the word applied in that sense to the doctrine of the Trinity, I affirm to be Sabellianism. It annihilates the dogma of the Eternal Sonship, the very truth which the word was intended to establish and define.

It is a sad remembrance, but one not to be passed over, that the word ὁμοούσιος was first known in theology as a symbol of Sabellianism. It was used by that shrewd dialectician, Paul of Samosata, to express his views of the Trinity; in which the Logos, or Word, was an impersonal function, or energy of the One God, which on its union with the Son of Mary made Him then the Son of God. This energy was consubstantial with God in the same sense in which, as "O." says, "a body with its limbs is consubstantial." Male homousion Samosatensis confessus est, sed numquid melius, Arius negaverunt. (Hilar. de Synod. p. 513.) The Council of Antioch condemned Paul, and rejected the word homousion, as unfit to express the unity of the Godhead. And this decision of the Church was used by the Arians as their palmary argument ad ecclesiam. It was also the only reason why those called Semi-Arians, but who were nevertheless orthodox in doctrine, refused to accept the definition of the Council. But Athanasius and Hilary answered that as used in the Creed, it has quite another sense than that which was condemned at Antioch; because at Nicea, it was taken to express the true and genuine Sonship of Christ begotten from the substance of the Father. The words, "God from God" in the Creed effectually cut away that Sabellian sense which Paul had put upon the word. Speaking of the "thought of Samosata," Athanasius says, "it remains to say that the Son of God is so called, according to the sense in which Isaac was the son of Abraham; for what is naturally begotten from any one, and does not accrue to him from without, that in the nature of things is a son, and that is what the word implies." (De Decret. p. 10.)

But "O." reclaims against the use of consubstantial as a definition of Sonship. He says, "that the word ought not to be used in theology of the relation between progeny and ancestor, results from its higher appropriation in the Nicene Creed." That sentence fixes "O.'s" theological position. It denies that the Creed takes the word in the sense of the relation of Son to Father, but in a higher sense. How higher? As well might he say, that the words Father and Son ought not to be used, to express the relation of the first to the second person in the Trinity; for his objection means that, or nothing. The Church has ever understood those terms to mean all they express, True Father, and True Son, in that highest sense in which the words are taken by all mankind. In that sense they are used in the Creed, and the word homousion only ascertains and fixes that sense. The Church has never taught that any of the terms, by which a knowledge of the Divine Nature has been revealed, express all that is true of God. Human thought cannot embrace, and human language cannot utter the full truth of the Divine Nature. Such terms are short of the truth, but true as far as they go; therefore they must be taken in the highest sense they bear. We know no higher sense of son than its ordinary meaning, of one begotten consubstantial to his father. Christ's Sonship includes all that meaning; but how much more, is a secret to us. "O." is therefore under a great delusion, in supposing that "Son begotten consubstantial to the Father," is used in any higher sense than the highest the Nicene Fathers knew.

But so to talk, "O." thinks, "is to handle theology with slippery fingers." I have no doubt, that this is a moderate expression of his opinion. Such real words bring out so clear an idea of our Lord as a true Son—ascertain so distinctly His Divine Person as other than the Person of the Father—that it must shock one who takes consubstantial to mean the oneness of one subject, (ταυτόουσιον) instead of the genuineness of Sonship. "Men," quoth he, "are one in nature, not in substance. The Divine Three are One both in nature and in substance." Did not the thought of "O.'s" unhappy illustrations here recur to me, I would unite with him in this proposition. But I stumble at the recollection of the "bar of iron and the blocks of wood and stone." He separates so widely nature from substance, that I fear lest, if I adopt his statements, I should be understood as accepting that "truer philosophy" he speaks of, which cannot interpret offspring by ομοουσιον. Petavius (de Trin., L. 4, 1) says, "Since we, as well as the philosophers, use that word usia, it is important to know how each party understands it. For its meaning is not the same with both, as Anastasius (in Hodego) and Theorian (in Legat. ad Armenos) testify: 'The Heathen philosophers (οι φιλοσοφοι) define it to be an individuum, or hypostasis, or what is one in number, which the Fathers by no means allow. For the Divine Fathers take usia and nature as universals, which the heathen understands as form or species. Wherefore they profess, that in the Holy Trinity there is one nature and substance containing several hypostases. After citing from Aristotle that philosophical definition* of substance which Theorian speaks of, Petavius adds: 'The Christian writers use the word otherwise, and do not call usia a singular or individual thing, but a substance common to individuals.' And shortly after: 'The heretical enemies of the Trinity, imbued with the opinion of Aristotle and other philosophers, brought an impious dogma against the Christian Truth. For Sabellius, and those who before him supported the same error, maintained one usia or unsubstantial God (μονοουσιον Θεον) evidently in the Aristotelic sense, as meaning a prime substance, a single solitary individual, as well in respect to essence, as in the mode of existing or subsisting.'"

Aristotle was regarded by the Fathers as the Hierarch of every heresy, because he furnished all enemies of the truth with principles and arguments wherewith to assault the Faith. It should seem that St. Paul also had him in mind, when he bade the Colossians "beware, lest any man spoil them through philosophy and vain deceit." How his philosophy did corrupt the Faith is evidenced by the fact, that while shunned as a pestilence by the early Church, it yet found a welcome reception in the monastic schools of the Middle Ages, and was made the basis upon which the dogmatics of Popery were systematized. And since Lord Bacon's time—whom God, through the Reformed Church of England, gave to mankind—Aristotle has been recognized as having been the enemy of all truth, the suppressor of all knowledge of things earthly and heavenly, the representative and impersonation of the Ruler of the darkness of this world. "Timeo Danaos," and I likewise fear that "O.'s" philosophy is of the same sort. However this may be, it is notorious that the great doctors of the Church during the period of the Four Councils, the expounders of the Nicene Creed, who fought the long and weary battle with Antichrist, did illustrate the union of Father and Son in one essence, by the union of Adam and Seth in one nature. The orthodox and established sense of homousion led them so to speak, because it implied such oneness, so far as that sense went. But the Fathers did not stop there. They sought for the source of Unity, (as they expressed in the Creed,) in the One Origin of Godhead, the Father: "I believe in One God the Father Almighty." He was regarded by them as the εωςτος, the Bond of Unity. And this was in strictest adherence to the style of Scripture. St. Paul e. g. in stating the Christian Faith in contrast with the polytheism of the heathen, says: "But to us there is One God, even the Father, of whom are all things, and One Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things;" a text which I venture to say "O." would not select as a proof of the Unity of the Godhead, though St. Paul so announces it, and though after the apostle, the Nicene Fathers transferred it almost bodily into the Creed. Their philosophy, true or not, did not at least obstruct their freedom in the use of Scripture. They held a doctrine taken out of Scripture, and called by them Monarchia. As in Scripture, wherever God simply is mentioned, the Father is almost always understood, so they considered the Father as the Root and Fountain of Godhead, of whom the Son is eternally begotten, and from whom and the Son the Holy Ghost eternally proceedeth. Rightly did they consider, then, that there is not only all that same oneness of the Father and the Son that there was between Adam and Seth, but a still closer unity, such as our Lord revealed to St. Philip, in answer to his question, "Lord, show us the Father." "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father. Believe me, that I am in the Father and the Father in me." This mutual indwelling of the whole Son in the Father, and the whole Father in the Son, they called περιπαρσις, or circumincision, and it proves the Godhead of the Father and the Godhead of the Son to be One Godhead. Without this doctrine of the Monarchia, and that of the Circumincision, their teaching of a union in species, like that of Adam and Seth, would be tritheism. But while Scripture does most abundantly convey to us a conception of the distinct personal subsistence of both Father and Son, as clear, quite as clear as that we form of the individuals Adam and Seth, it adds to that information the declaration of a union which is predicable of no other subjects than the Three Divine Persons. The mystery is not how One is Three, as Sabellians would say, because we are told that the Son is "begotten," and that the Spirit "proceedeth;" but it is, how the Three are One. To this truth human thought can approach no closer than is vouchsafed by our Lord's words: "I am in the Father and the Father in me;" words which teach One Godhead, One Majesty, "in the Power of which Majesty we worship the Unity." Athanasius, in expounding the passage "I and the Father are one," says: "The Jews, when they heard one, thought, like Sabellius, that He said He was the Father; but our Saviour shows their sin by this argument: 'Though I said God, ye should have remembered what is written, I said ye are Gods.'" Then, to clear up "I and the Father are One," He has explained the Son's oneness with the Father in the words,—"Because I said I am the Son of God. For nothing is one with the Father but what is from Him. What is that which is from Him but the Son? and therefore he adds, 'that ye may know that I am in the Father and the Father in Me.'" For, when expounding the One, He said that the union and inseparability lay not in This being That, but in His being in the Father and the Father in Him. For thus He overthrows both Sabellius, in saying not, I am the Father, but the Son of God; and Arius, in saying, are One." (Orat. 4, §. 17.) "The Sabellianizers must be confuted from the notion of a Son, and the Arians from that of a Father." (ib. §. 4.)

* "Substance (ουσια) in its strictest, prime, and most proper sense, is that which cannot be predicated of any subject, nor is in any subject, e. g. as this horse, this man." That is, it is a solid unit and not a predicable of anything but itself.

Out of this doctrine of the Eternal Sonship arises the whole Mystery of the Incarnation. It is the corner stone, the first principle of the Great Purpose. It is utterly in vain for any one to attempt to form a conception of the aim and end of the Mystery of the Incarnation, unless he views it from this standpoint. This is the reason why I said that "O." "has no such conception of the theory advocated by Wilberforce as enables him to exhibit it, much less to overthrow it." I saw clearly where his difficulty lay, and joined issue with him, not on any of the details of the scheme, but on its one fundamental principle. A controversy about details where men differ on a principle, is an idle, a never-ending work. That which took place in the columns of the Churchman (N. Y.) some time since, between Aernus and Mastix, is a notable instance of the futility of any such procedure. I have nothing to do with that sort of controversy. I will not fight as one that beateeth the air. All questions in Catholic Theology concerning Regeneration, Justification, the Sacraments, the Priesthood, take their significance from the doctrine of the Divine Person of the Eternal Son. And whenever men adopt a notion of that prime Dogma which varies from the truth propounded and defined in the Nicene Creed,—whether it be Sabellianism, or Arianism, or Nestorianism, or Eutychianism, or any of the various shades of these heresies—as surely do they form for themselves a corresponding theology, as surely is their belief, as to every distinctive article of the Christian Faith, vitiated. And conversely, all opinions upon the details of doctrine are reducible to one or other of the many views of the Sonship of Christ.

Here I take my leave of "O." with the assurance that, however vicious I may, and must deem his theology, I do not consider him an "outside barbarian." Far, far other are my thoughts of him. I abstract gladly and freely his doctrine from his person. I attach no blame to him for the error which I have felt it my duty to God and the Church, to charge upon him. I judge him not at all; God forbid that I should. As he appears in print I take him, simply as the mouthpiece and representative of his generation, uttering opinions by no means peculiar to himself, but which are rather far more generally received than most persons would think. In a future number I shall endeavour to show what a numerous and respectable company that is of which "O." is unhappily an associate.

THE CASE OF DR. FORBES.

MR. EDITOR:

You have perhaps said all that need be spoken concerning the change of Creed, and the change of Church lately effected by Dr. Forbes. Yet I would fain add a few words. He goes where others have gone before, and where others will follow after him. It is no new thing for men to forsake their early faith and follow new fancies. Such changes do little injury to the communions abandoned. What has Rome lost by her hundreds of deserters? What has Geneva lost by the "three hundred" who have forsaken her altars? What has the Church lost by the scores who have quitted her fold to feed in strange pastures? One and all are much as they were in general condition before the exode. Rome is bolder, Geneva no less confident, and the Church far stronger than of old! Truly it seems to me a source of gratulation to every communion deeming itself a true branch of the Church of Christ, to see those that are heretics "manifesting" themselves as well as "making manifest those that are approved." If heresies "must be," the sooner they manifest their existence and betray their locality, whether by sound or motion, the better. "What thou doest, do quickly."

The only matter of much moment to the forsaken Church is the reason, the motive of the abandonment. Why have men left her? If nine out of every ten of her Clergy should go out of the Church because they could not stay in her, being daily rebuked by her articles of faith and daily condemned by her established customs, it would only strengthen the Church by proving her fidelity and intolerance of novelties—if they left her because she would not bend her back to the heavy burden of human traditions, and dress up her gentle form in the gaudy robes of a sensual system, it would only sustain her claims to the confidence and affection of all who revered God's word, and loved simplicity. Desertions from such causes though diminishing numbers would double the strength of "that which remained."

It would be another thing if she were left, because she was found idolatrous, unapostolic, uncatholic and corrupt. Well might her children stand aghast and fear, did they see good men and wise departing because she had corrupted the truth, giving heed to fables, "forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats."

But when the deserters depart because they cannot carry out what they call the "catholic system," but what she calls the "Roman contrivance," they compliment her by their exit, and by their absence contribute to her increase.

We are in some degree acquainted with the early and late history of Dr. Forbes, and feel convinced that the reason he assigned to a tried friend was the true ground of his departure. "He could not carry out what he thought the Catholic system in the Episcopal Church." All his life long he has had his own way. In various difficulties he has had the resolution and the tact to defeat his opponents and accomplish his ends. He has ridden a steeple chase (very devious and wandering in its course) and has leaped every hedge and cleared every ditch in the way. But at last he has reached a wall which he cannot "top." The high wall of church doctrine and church custom. What more natural than that, finding this obstacle and resolved to ride as he lists, he should turn his horse's head and enter that field where there seems to be few walls and those well furnished with gates through which favored riders may pass at pleasure! Whether this seeming liberty will be realized is another matter with which we will not now meddle.

When Dr. Forbes can show that the true catholic system is not to be maintained in the Church he has forsaken, then we shall consider his abandonment of her for such cause ominous, and admit that those who tarry behind him have cause for fear. But as wiser heads than his have been trying to do this for many centuries without a shadow of success, we shall not permit ourselves to mourn over his defection as a misfortune to any one but himself, or count his sudden change of position a proof of any defect save in the individual by whom it has been effected.

MR. EDITOR:—

Will some of your learned readers be good enough to state upon what ground it is affirmed by Bishop Ives, in his late Pastoral Letter, (note on page 69,) and by others, that, "Romanists belong to the body of Christ, and hence to the same family with us." Now it is of Romanists in this country and in England, that this assertion is made. And I wish to know whether, even supposing these Romanists to be as free from heresy as the Donatists and Novatianists were, they are not equally with them guilty of the sin of schism? and whether schism does not, ipso facto, cut those who are guilty of it off from the body of Christ? But are the Romanists, indeed, free from the sin of heresy, using the term in its strict theological sense? Is not the Romish doctrine of purgatory, for example, a virtual denial of the article of Christ's descent into hell? Will any of your readers, then, be so kind as to inform me upon what principle of Catholic antiquity Romanists can "belong to the body of Christ," when guilty, as I verily believe, of the sins of heresy and schism?

ADVENT.

How suggestive are all the holy services of the Church, if we only "mark, learn, and inwardly digest them," not only of right thoughts, but also of corresponding acts. Each solemn season of the Christian year has its peculiar truth to impress upon the heart. Advent, directing our thoughts to the great object of the past and future coming of our Blessed Lord, speaks to dying man, first of the manner in which he is to improve the season allotted for the work which God has given him to do. It is not by the mere empty profession of an inefficient faith, that he is to prepare for judgment to come. "For as the body, without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also." Therefore it is that the Church has ordered that the collect for the twenty-fifth Sunday after Trinity shall always immediately precede Advent. In this, we call upon God to stir up the wills of His faithful people, that they, plenteously bringing forth the fruit of good works, may by Him be plenteously rewarded. Therefore, in the collect for Advent Sunday also, we ask for grace, not only that we may cast away the works of darkness, but that we may also put on the armor of light. And therefore the Epistle also sets before us the sum of our duty, in that saying in which it is briefly comprehended.

We cannot think that those who make this season a time of vexatious and needless controversy, of fierce and angry disputes, discharge aright that obligation, "Owe no man any thing, but to love one another." Surely theirs is not that affection of which it is said, "love worketh no ill to his neighbor." Let us strive rather to embrace the many opportunities now presented to do good to our neighbors. The Church's Missionaries are to be fed and clothed, her aged and infirm Clergymen are to be provided for, her sick and destitute members are to be visited and comforted, her helpless orphans are crying aloud for aid, countless objects of charity are demanding our help. Let us then turn from words of strife to deeds of love, and thus will we best prepare our own hearts, thus will we most prepare the world, to welcome the Son of God "in the last day, when He shall come again in His glorious Majesty to judge both the quick and the dead." And let us not forget another great lesson of Advent. The work which our Lord has given us to do must be done "now in the time of this mortal life." Each new

Advent calls upon us with more earnest voice to work in the sphere of our appropriate duty, "and that knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep."

The following address presents to the Church in this Diocese a happy chance for exercising that love which "is the fulfilling of the law."

The Trustees of the CHRISTMAS FUND, invite the attention of the Clergy of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, to the recommendation of the Convention, that the collections made at the Celebration of the Holy Communion on Christmas Day, be appropriated to the relief of superannuated and infirm Clergymen, and paid over to the Treasurer of said Fund. By a subsequent enlargement of the objects of the Trust, its benefits are extended in cases of emergency, to the widows and children of deceased Clergymen, who, at the time of their death are canonically connected with the diocese.

For the last two years the receipts from the collections made at Christmas have fallen considerably short of the expenditures, and the deficiency has been supplied by the sale of stocks, constituting a small fund, which the Trustees have been anxious to preserve, to meet any unusual demand. Should the present ratio of receipt and expenditure continue, this fund will soon be exhausted, and the Trustees be liable at any time to receive applications for aid, which they will be unable to grant. This result they are anxious to avoid—and they make this statement in the hope that such measures will be adopted by the Rectors of the different parishes, as will give their congregations generally an opportunity to contribute, believing that it will be liberally and cheerfully responded to.

THE PROPOSED ORPHAN HOME.

In publishing the two following communications we are compelled to say a few words in reference to the matter of which they treat. We are quite sure that while our readers are ready, with us, to admit the just claims of the Philadelphia Orphan Asylum, they will at the same time perceive that this does not quite absolve the Church from the duty, or deprive her of the privilege, of providing a shelter, under the roof of her own fold, for the lambs of her flock. If such an Institution were merely to provide for the bodily and temporal wants of unprotected Orphans, it could make little matter whether it was under a mixed religious influence or not. But the case is different, when we consider that Orphans have souls as well as bodies, and that, in the provision for their necessities, the want of that parental care which might train them up in the way they should go must be supplied. We hold it to be a self-evident truth, that no fixed and definite system of religious training can be carried on in an Institution, controlled by those who are guided by different systems of religious truth. Allowing the largest toleration of the views of the ten Episcopalians, in a Board of 24 Managers, we can hardly suppose that even so large a minority can expect to control the Institution. Whatever peculiar privileges they obtain must be gained by concession on the part of the others. And then how can they have separate Worship and separate religious instruction of those living under the same roof? Surely, the tender minds of the young must be distracted in hearing such varied teachings. And how shall it be decided who are to be brought up as Episcopalians and who as Presbyterians, &c.? Shall they draw lots to decide whether they shall be taught the Church Catechism or some other? To bring them up in the reputed faith of their parents would be, perhaps, to teach them none.

And then, large as may be the charitable desires of the Managers of this Asylum, we are quite sure it cannot meet the demand of this whole city. There are, we know, hundreds of applications for admission to the Girard College which cannot be answered. If every religious denomination had an Asylum of its own, still the need would not be supplied.

When our risen Lord gave that solemn charge to His Apostle, "Feed my lambs," surely He did not limit the commission merely to the supply of their temporal wants. He included that bread of life with which their souls are to be nourished and by which they are to "grow in grace." We rejoice that the Bishop of this Diocese takes this noble view of his solemn Commission, and is not satisfied that the Church should make no peculiar provision for the Orphans whom Christ has committed to her care, because there are three classes of Asylums already provided, in the first of which they may learn Romanism, in the second of which they may be taught various kinds of religion, and in the third no religion at all!

A Home for Orphans is strictly to be regarded as a religious house, and the arguments which establish the propriety of union in this matter do away with the necessity of separation for any religious purpose. If the Lambs of the various flocks should be folded together, why not the Sheep also? If the former can be trained together, and worship together, why not the latter?

We are doing wrong, according to this argument, to erect new Houses of Prayer, while the various places of Worship around us are not fully occupied! If it is not right for the Church to separate in this great scheme of mercy, why should she in any other? On these grounds we cannot think the arguments of our correspondents, however strongly they present the claims of the Philadelphia Orphan Asylum, have any force against the Proposed Home for Orphans, which the Bishop of the Diocese has so justly commended to the Clergy and Laity in his Pastoral Letter.

For the Banner of the Cross.

MR. EDITOR:

In your notice to Correspondents in the Banner of December 1st, you decline publishing a communication from "A Manager of the Philadelphia Orphan Society," on the ground of its being "opposed to the official recommendation of the Bishop of the Diocese;" but allow me, Sir, to ask, with due respect to all parties concerned, whether, when an object is proposed requiring public contributions and public support, it may not be presented to that public in all its bearings, that so it may be fairly examined and calmly discussed?

It is not surprising that the Managers of the noble Institution known for 35 years as the Philadelphia Orphan Society, should feel somewhat hurt, that in all the late public notices and pathetic appeals in behalf of the Orphan, this Institution should have been so utterly unnoticed, that the only way of charitably accounting for the omission, is to suppose the writers and speakers to have been ignorant of its existence; yet it has rescued above 1000 orphans from poverty and vice, fulfilling towards them every parental duty; many of them, too, the children of the Church; and it was therefore well entitled to a passing word of gratitude and commendation. The Managers have not only provided for these children bodily comfort, and their instruction, mental, moral and religious, but have exercised a most discriminating care in their choice of situations for them when leaving the Asylum; so that while earning their living, they might be preserved from every vicious association; and have kept a watchful eye over both them and their employers until their term of servitude expired, and they no longer needed protection.

But, lest the motive of this communication be mistaken, I take leave to say, that I am an Episcopalian, and one who fully recognizes the responsibility resting upon the Church to provide spiritual instruction, according to her own doctrines, to all her members, (and, if need be, bodily sustenance also,) especially to the young, the ignorant, and the destitute. The only question I conceive to be, what will be the most judicious mode of accomplishing this object? Not, I fear, the only plan yet proposed.

No one knows better than the present writer the vast amount of personal influence and exertion expended by the founders of the present Institution, (to say nothing of their munificent donations,) before sufficient funds could be raised to provide a suitable building, and an adequate support for its little inmates, or the seasons of deep anxiety experienced by the Managers lest this support should fail, an anxiety lessened only by faith in the Father of the fatherless; this, too, when all religious persuasions were equally interested in their success; there is consequently great reason to fear that the funds will fall far short of the object, when both the beneficiaries and the contributors will be confined to the Church. I would, therefore, on the ground of expediency, humbly suggest the following plan: Let every exertion be made to render the fund as large as possible; let it be invested in safe securities, and placed in the hands of Trustees. Let the annual proceeds thereof, or as much of them as may be necessary, be added to the annual income of the Philadelphia Orphan Society. Let the children of the Church be confided to its care, with the express proviso, that an Episcopalian clergyman, appointed by the Church, shall have the sole charge of their spiritual instruction. Secure, if necessary, an Episcopal teacher and a proper proportion of Episcopal Managers, and when the children are bound out let them be placed only in Episcopal families. If it be objected, that the Managers will not consent to this arrangement, I reply, that of its 24 present Managers 10 are Episcopalians; of its 3 teachers 2 are Episcopalians; and I have been informed by one of its oldest Managers, that if at the present time any clergyman of our Church would go to the Asylum, select the children of Episcopalian parents, and offer to take the entire charge of their religious instruction, no opposition would be made, nor would it have been made at any previous period. I therefore truly believe, that the object of the Church would be as fully attained, and their Orphans be more advantageously situated by this plan than by the one proposed, of procuring a "new home." We have here provided to our hands a spacious building, with all the conveniences and improvements which long experience could suggest and adequate means attain; a delightful playground shaded by trees of 30 years' growth; a most efficient organization, and a Board of Managers several of whom have held their places from the foundation of the Institution, and have for 35 years devoted a very considerable portion of their time to its interests, with what success is best learned from the fact, that although 100 children have been the average number in the Asylum, of all ages under 12, it has frequently happened that a whole year has passed without having a single death to record. If the members of the Church have the ability and the will to provide a "new home" for her orphans, which can at all compare with this, I have nothing to say but to rejoice in her success.

ONE WHO IS NOT A MANAGER OF THE PHILADA. ORPHAN SOCIETY.

The author of the above communication, by again recurring to the notice in our last number, will see that we did not absolutely "decline publishing," &c. We were quite willing, not more so we are sure than the Bishop of the Diocese, to give publicity to all the facts strictly bearing upon the case. We would not refuse to present, in full, the claims of a long established Institution, and one which has done faithful service, to the sympathies of the Church. Had not the article of our correspondent gone beyond this, we could have had no hesitation in publishing her statements. But her article concludes by urging other arguments against the appropriation of funds to such an object. As, for instance, "the great necessities of the Church," "the wants of her Missionaries," &c. It was merely to this part of the article our remarks applied. And it certainly appeared to us not quite respectful or proper to follow a Bishop's Pastoral letter with opposing arguments from an anonymous correspondent.

We take the liberty of omitting this portion of the article, and publish all that presents the claims of the Philadelphia Orphan Asylum.

For the Banner of the Cross.

MR. EDITOR:

My attention has this day been called to an article in the Episcopal Recorder of Nov. 10th, on the subject of a projected Asylum for the Orphans of Episcopalians; and from its tenor I should presume the writer to be ignorant of the existence of an Institution which has been for thirty-five years past in active operation among us, and during that whole period one of the most prominent and best sustained among the many charities of which our city justly boasts. I allude to the Philadelphia Orphan Society, incorporated in 1815, whose spacious and comfortable Asylum, at the corner of Schuylkill Fifth and Cherry streets, has been, and is, the "provided home" in which the destitute children of many hundreds of "widowed mothers" have, when deprived of their surviving parent, found both shelter, education, religious training, and powerful friends. It is not, it is true, an Episcopal Institution, but it has always found warm supporters in the Church; much of the property from which it draws its annual revenue has been bequeathed by members of our communion, and it will eventually become possessed of a munificent endowment under the will of the late Mr. Kohne, an Episcopalian, who also bestowed many valuable bequests upon various Church institutions.

The Society is directed by twenty-four ladies as Managers, ten of whom are Episcopalians, the remaining fourteen belonging to three other religious denominations. Two teachers are employed in the house, both of them Episcopalians; and the school for fifteen years past has been principally under the care of an orphan, one of the earliest beneficiaries of the charity, who for thirty years had a happy home within its walls, and was from childhood a pious and consistent member of the same communion. A devoted and zealous churchman has a weekly Bible Class at the Asylum, composed of all the orphans able to read fluently, which he has instructed faithfully for many years. The children attend church on Sunday morning alternately with the matron and teachers at their respective places of worship. Formerly it was customary, during the summer months, to have an afternoon service at the Asylum, and from its foundation until a year before his death, the Chapel was every season opened for worship by Bishop White, with whom it was a favorite duty; and others of our clergy frequently followed his example in ministering for the orphan family. Owing to the difficulty of filling the pulpit, this service has of late been relinquished, and the children are formed into a Sunday School, in which the assistance of members of the Church has been constantly urged, and whenever granted warmly welcomed. The religious instruction of the children is necessarily elementary, as they leave the Asylum at 12 years of age, and generally adopt the form of worship of the families into which they are received as apprentices—a result that would probably ensue under any mode of religious training. I believe, however, that I may venture, in the name of the managers of my own Church, and from fifteen years experience of the respect ever shown towards her institutions by the ladies in the Board who are attached to other communions, to say to those of the Clergy and Laity who are moving in this cause,—Give to us your Orphans as children baptized into the Church, we "have bread enough and to spare;" give us with them the personal co-operation of the Clergy; send us some able and efficient Sunday School teachers; and above all, provide homes for them at 12 years of age in the families of pious churchmen—and we will educate them for the Church, and teach them to love her ordinances, while we prepare them to fulfil their "duty in that state of life into which it has pleased God to call them."

MR. DANA'S LECTURES.

Morning Course, at the Sansom-street Hall.—For the satisfaction of a large number of persons who have been unable to obtain tickets for the Evening Lectures, a MORNING COURSE OF LECTURES will be delivered by MR. DANA, on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, in the Sansom-street Hall, at 11 o'clock, A. M. beginning on Monday morning, Dec. 3d.

Mr. Dana has been induced, by the large number of persons who were unable to obtain admission to his Evening Lectures, to give this Morning Course. It would be hard to assemble more intelligent audiences than those, by whom the first two Lectures of this Course have been received with so much approbation. The Lecture on Friday morning will be upon a most interesting subject—WOMAN. We have often heard what poets have to say on this inspiring theme. And then, again, grave philosophers have opposed their harsh judgments to the poet's praise. In this Lecture we shall have the judgment of the philosopher, tempered by the feelings of the poet, and thus may hope for a complete picture.

Since the above was written, we have heard this Lecture, and large as our expectations were, it more than fulfilled them.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Daleth," in reply to "O," is received, but came too late for this week.

We should like ourselves to see the letter referred to below. We publish this inquiry because we feel there must be some misunderstanding, and we would desire to have the statement corrected by authority.—[EDITOR OF THE BANNER.]

BISHOP IVES' PASTORAL.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:

In a pamphlet, attributed to the Hon. Mr. Badger of North Carolina, reviewing Bishop Ives' Pastoral, it is said that the Bishop in a letter to one of his presbyters, says, "I feel bound, however, to say, that while I allow no prayers to the Virgin Mary, or to Saints, not because they are wrong in themselves, but because they are liable to abuse;" it seems impossible to me Mr. Editor that one of our Bishops, and especially one so devoted to the Church as Bishop Ives, could use such extraordinary language. Can you, or any of your readers, inform me where such a letter is to be found, or where published? Coming from so honorable and distinguished a man as Mr. Badger, gives it a weight which it otherwise could not have from any other source, for we know that parts of a letter may be quoted to give a sense which the author never intended. AN INQUIRER.

Bishop Ives became a Romanist in 1852.

A DEFINITION.

Some friend has sent us the following in a Buffalo Paper. We give it for what it is worth. According to this, Puseyism is bolting Churchmanship, and we fully agree with the De finer, that the Church is happy in every such deliverance:

ABJURING FAITH—PUSEYISM DEFINED.

It is stated that the Rev. Dr. Forbes, of St. Luke's Church, N. Y., has sought a home in the bosom of the Romish Church.

This, we suppose, illustrates what Puseyism is. The Bishop of Western New York, in an elaborate discussion in his address in 1847, told us what Puseyism was not—perhaps he can now tell us what it is.—Rochester Advertiser.

We don't believe the Bishop can answer this poser, but we think we can. Here goes: A week since Dr. Forbes left the Episcopal Church and embraced Romanism. Four weeks ago the Rev. Mr. Shimeall also left the Episcopal Church and embraced Presbyterianism. Now our idea is, that where a Clergyman of the Episcopal Church bolts, and goes over to any other religious denomination, he is guilty of Puseyism. "Hence we view" Dr. Forbes and Mr. Shimeall as rank Puseyites—men who have slept with the Oxford tracts under their pillows for the last four years, and who, during the whole of that time, have had a kind of religious nightmare from which they are at last happily delivered. The Church will breathe more freely!

CORRECTION.

We copy the following from "The Church Advertiser."

It seems we were misinformed in regard to the call for a meeting of the House of Bishops.—We had the report from a clergyman of high respectability, and published it without enquiring respecting its truth.

From the same paper we take the following acknowledgment.

THE BANNER OF THE CROSS.—"The Banner" has completely outdone us in the matter of compliment, and we acknowledge, "beat." Not being large enough to return the affectionate embrace of our Methodist brother, we will content ourselves by assuring him that we will do what little in us lies, to place "the brethren," en masse, in such position that they may receive, with perfect propriety, the cordial Ecclesiastical embrace of the one Catholic and Apostolic Church, in which, we doubt not, the best wishes of the "Banner" will be with us.

The last Calender contains the following announcement.

It gives us great pleasure to announce, that there is in press, at this office, and will, in a few days be published, a letter, entitled A VOICE FROM CONNECTICUT; occasioned by the late Pastoral letter of the Bishop of North Carolina, to the Clergy and Laity of his Diocese. By the Rev. Samuel Farmer Jarvis, D. D., L. L. D. This letter has been submitted to the Bishop of this Diocese, and is printed with his approval.

We take this opportunity of thanking our Editorial brethren for the kind spirit in which they have referred to the subject of the following announcement. There are occasions, when all diversities of feeling must yield to the better sympathies of our holy religion, whose life is love, and this thought may help to reconcile us to the trials which thus purify our natures. A sudden change, brought about by the wishes of kind friends, occasioned the erroneous statement which appeared in the Banner. We copy the following from the New York Churchman.

The Rev. Dr. Ogilby, Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the General Theological Seminary, sailed on Wednesday last in the ship Havre, for the port of the same name. The state of health of our reverend brother has rendered it necessary for him to spend the winter in a milder climate, and his physicians have recommended the south of France. His residence in the first instance will be at Pau, in the Department of the Lower Pyrenees; and he will remain there until the spring, in case the climate should suit him. Leave of absence for a year has been granted in very flattering terms by the Standing Committee of the Trustees of the Seminary, and a very handsome address was presented to him previous to his departure on the part of the students. Our earnest prayers are offered for his complete restoration to health, and the speedy resumption of his labors, so useful to the Seminary and beneficial to the Church at large.

Foreign Intelligence.

The English Churchman says,

We regret to announce the death of Dr. French, Master of Jesus College, Cambridge; an office which he has filled with credit to himself, and benefit to the University, for nearly thirty years. His loss will be severely felt, particularly at the present time, when an attack upon the University is evidently in preparation.

FIRE AT ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH, CAMBRIDGE.—Cambridge, Nov. 11.—A disastrous conflagration has just occurred in this town, by which the ancient Church of St. Michael's has been partially destroyed. As service time approached this morning, the Church, which is attended, under the ministrations of Professor Scholefield, by one of the largest congregations in Cambridge, was gradually filling, when an alarm was given that smoke was issuing from the roof on the south side. The congregation speedily separated, and on an inspection being made, it was found that the roof of the Church was on fire, between the plastering and the slates. A few minutes only had elapsed before the flames broke out through the slates, and raged with great fury. The most prompt and energetic measures were immediately adopted, the parish books and registers, and the altar-piece, were removed to a place of safety. The engines were sent for, and arrived at intervals to the number of eight or nine, but many of them, owing to its being Sunday morning, were late in their attendance, and when they arrived, the hose was found to be in a lamentably deficient state, and they were otherwise out of repair. The Church is uninsured; but a fund was instituted for its repair, by the benevolence of the late Mr. John Bowtell, who, in 1813, left £500 in the Three per Cent. Consols, for repairing the Church and chancel, but this fund has been much trespassed on of late for alterations. The damage has not yet been estimated, but part of the loss, which will not fall short of £1000, will devolve upon Trinity College, the Society of which present to the living.

No particular news from Rome. The French army are taking up their winter quarters. General Baraguay d'Hilliers will take the place of General d'Hautpoul, and be chief, both in civil and military affairs.

The Pope is still at Benevento, from which place he has addressed an autograph letter to his "dearly beloved son," M. Thiers. This incident will excite the hilarity of the French, who will regard it as an indication that the Papacy has indeed fallen low.

In the English Churchman we also find the following report of the proceedings in the case of Mr. P. Connolly.

CONNOLLY V. CONNOLLY.

This was a suit instituted by the Rev. P. Connolly against his wife, for a restitution of conjugal rights under novel and very peculiar circumstances. The parties were American subjects, the marriage had been contracted there, and Mr. Connolly was at the time, a Minister of the Episcopal Church of that country. After the birth of five children, three of whom are still living, Mr. Connolly became a convert to Roman Catholicism, and by his persuasions his wife embraced the same views. They then repaired to Rome, and after some delay, a decree of separation, as was alleged, was obtained from the Pope. Mr. Connolly afterwards became a Minister in the Roman Catholic Church, and Mrs. Connolly established a religious order at Derby, which has since been removed to Hastings, and of which she is now superioress. Mr. Connolly has returned to the Protestant faith, and his wife refusing to see him, he instituted the present proceedings. The cause first came before the Court in May last, when on allegation responsive to the libel of the husband was tendered on the part of Mrs. Connolly, and its admission opposed. The learned Judge directed it to be reformed, and the question now before the Court was its present admissibility.

Dr. Bayford (with whom was Dr. R. Phillimore) contend, on behalf of Mr. Connolly, that if all the circumstances stated in the allegations were true, they would be no answer in law to the libel. After vindicating the motives of his client, he went on to argue that the proceedings which had taken place at Rome were not clothed with legal authority. No sentence of divorce had, in fact, been pronounced, and neither of the ingredients essential to obtaining one in this country—namely, cruelty or incontinence—was alleged to exist in this case. Three grounds of opposition to the suit were stated in the allegation—first, the orders of celibacy in the Roman Catholic Church. It appeared from Bingham's Ecclesiastical Antiquities that it was not until 692 that those regulations were introduced; and the rule had never existed in the Greek Church. In this country there was an express statute permitting the Clergy to marry. All that Mr. Connolly now asked the Court to do, was to disregard the peculiar discipline of the Roman Catholic Church. The second ground was, that Mrs. Connolly was the superiority of a religious house, and it was supposed that under the Catholic Relief Bill, the Court could take cognizance of monastic institutions. He maintained, however, that that enactment afforded the lady no relief from the Ecclesiastical law relative to this case. The last point relied upon was the vows of chastity which the parties had respectively taken. It did not, however, follow, that if the prayer of Mr. Connolly was granted, those vows would be broken. He, therefore, trusted, that the Court would reject the allegation.

Dr. Addams (with whom was Dr. Robertson) considered that the only question now before the Court was whether or not the allegation was admissible as reformed. He had on the former occasion stated his views on the general question, and he saw no necessity for repeating his argument, to which he still adhered.

The learned Judge observed that the points raised were of great importance; he would, therefore, take time to consider his judgment.

New Publications.

It must cost our publishing friends many an anxious thought to determine what books they shall get up for the HOLIDAYS. The question is not merely what shall be published, but how, or in what style? A greedy public, a clamorous host of expectant givers and receivers, are all crying aloud for something new! Not merely books filled with new thoughts, if there be such under the sun, but books with new types, new paper, new pictures, new binding,—all bran new! All that has been brought out in the old year becomes ancient, the infant new year, with childish taste, demands novelty.

And then what a variety and contrariety of tastes to be satisfied. The old want something serious, yet not too grave, printed in large type for failing vision; the less ancient something that is neither too light nor too heavy; the young a compound of the sentimental and the humorous; the children want books all full of glee and pictures. Poor Publishers! Where shall all these things come from? Aladdin's lamp would hardly enable you to meet the demand. But your efforts deserve success, and if our wishes could bestow it, that you should have. The first week in Advent brings us a few happy specimens. Not indeed books with attempted new thoughts, but books which have enshrined in outward beauty glorious old thoughts. First among these, we have,—

THE SACRED POETS OF ENGLAND AND AMERICA, FROM THE EARLIEST TO THE PRESENT TIME. Edited by RUFUS WILMOT GRISWOLD. Illustrated with fine steel engravings. A new improved edition. New York: D. Appleton & Co. PHILADELPHIA: GEO. S. APPLETON, 164 Chestnut Street.

A happy union this of the offspring of a mother and her fair daughter, each blessed with a large and numerous family. Here the reader may trace back the stream of sacred poetry to its deep wells in the old English heart, and follow its shining course down to our own times. Most interesting is it to compare the separate streams, disparted by the broad Atlantic, which flow from the same source.

Mr. Griswold has shown excellent judgment in his selections, and in the concise biographical sketch prefixed to the extracts from each author. This is a choice book for a holiday gift, and the publishers have done their part to make it an acceptable one.

The same publishers, ever mindful of their young friends, have provided for them THE BOOK OF BIRDS; intended for the amusement and instruction of young people, illustrated with 16 elegant plates. Also,

THE BOOK OF TRADES AND PROFESSIONS; or familiar objects described, embellished with 24 illustrations. Both these books happily unite amusement with instruction.

Next we have a rich and appropriate book for the young:

THE IVY WREATH. By Mrs. Hughs, Author of "Buds and Blossoms," "Aunt Mary's Tales," &c., with beautiful illustrations. Philadelphia: LINDSAY & BLAKISTON.

Next MESSRS. HOGAN & THOMPSON have brought out two books, in very rich and attractive form. The first is upon the most sacred subject which can employ a mortal's pen,—THE LIFE OF CHRIST; delineated in the series of events recorded in the New Testament. By Rev. H. Hastings Weld, Rector of St. James' Church, Downingtown, Pa. Embellished with illustrations in tint, and illuminations from original drawings by Devereux.

We can only speak of the outward appearance of this work, which is certainly attractive, if we except the pictures, most of which, in our esteem, it would be better without. We always regret to see our blessed Lord depicted in common prints. Indeed we would go the length of questioning whether any human hand should dare to attempt such a similitude. No likeness can convey a just idea, none can unite with the meekness of His humanity the majesty of His Divinity. All the attempts we have ever seen, even from the greatest masters, tend to produce that false view of the Saviour which regards Him only as man.

In exactly the same style, but with more suitable illustrations, the same publishers have given us, in one volume, RASSELAS, THE VISION OF THEODORE, AND THE FOUNTAINS, a Fairy Tale, by Samuel Johnson, L.L. D.

We need not say more of this volume than that its outward form corresponds with the beauty within.

"CHARITY THINKETH NO EVIL."

As Bishop White's opinions in regard to doctrinal and ecclesiastical matters are so frequently quoted as decisive, I will repeat one of his sayings, in regard to Christian manners, which, I hope, will be influential in sweetening social and domestic intercourse. He said, he thought the idea of the pain it would occasion the hearer, would be sufficient to deter a person, with a benevolent mind, from unnecessarily uttering any thing disagreeable to the person addressed. How frequently has this remark recurred to me when I have heard persons say, or what is equally reprehensible, insinuate, exactly those things which they knew would either exasperate the irritable, or wound and depress the unresisting and unoffending object of their malevolence. They are very much mistaken when they imagine they are actuated by the desire of benefitting those whom they thus wound and offend: the habit of censuring others proceeds from a latent and unsuspected uncharitableness, which thus gives vent to its own uncomfortable sensations.

I have often been amused in observing these self-constituted censors, priding themselves upon their judicious manner of reproving those who have incurred their disapprobation, by praising others for the exercise of qualifications and dispositions, in so pointed a manner, that the hearers cannot mistake their meaning, that they consider the imaginary delinquents to be entirely destitute of them: and in acrimoniously censuring others for the exhibition of those faults and failings which they think characterize the object of their disapprobation. These covert attacks are as cowardly as they are ungenerous, as it is impossible to repel these indirect accusations, and to vindicate your character, without appearing to be guilty of these implied censures, although the cases are generally totally dissimilar. If they wish to reform the imaginary culprit, they take exactly the wrong way to accomplish their design.

The most virtuous and excellent characters are the least addicted to censoriousness and defamation. When, from their relative situation, it is incumbent upon them to reprove others; they "speak the truth in love." The law of kindness is ever in their mouths; and, out of the abundance of a kind and affectionate heart, proceeds a word in season, uttered in a mild and persuasive tone, accompanied with that compassionate and benign expression of countenance which is irresistible. It is evident that they have imbibed the meek and lowly spirit of their Master, when he said to a notorious culprit whom he could have condemned to death and eternal ruin, "Neither do I condemn thee, go and sin no more." There is nothing so injurious to the character as the habit of blaming and finding fault with others. It induces self-delusion, self-conceit, self-righteousness, pride, and arrogance. It is a remarkable fact that people censure, with the most virulence and acrimony, those faults in others, to which they are the most addicted themselves. Censoriousness destroys love, humility and benevolence, and renders people misanthropic and cynical. If they were aware what a harsh repulsive expression of countenance they acquire, who take a delight in censuring others; and if they could be convinced how much the cultivation of a candid, tolerant, and charitable disposition would add to their own happiness, and how much the habitual exercise of benevolent and sympathetic feelings beautifies the countenance, self-interest alone might induce them to correct the one, and acquire the other. The approach of these destroyers of domestic and social comfort, is dreaded like that of the "genius of the coming storm." "The poison of asps is under their lips;" they annoy and sting like wasps and gnats. The presence of the benevolent is as cheering and exhilarating as the sun after a storm, as soothing as the vernal zephyrs, and as welcome as the flowers in May. The society of the one is welcome and courted; that of the other is dreaded and avoided.

Many persons gradually become malignant and uncharitable, without being aware of the deterioration of their character, by indulging in the habit of finding fault. At first, they censure others merely to evince their superior sagacity and discrimination in the knowledge of character, without feeling any particular ill-will against them: but they should reflect, that it requires more "perspicacity of penetration" to discover latent good qualities, especially in vicious characters, and is a laudable exercise of Christian charity to foster these germs of excellence, which may grow and bud and bring forth abundant fruit. Our tongues were given to us to praise and bless God, and to please and edify our neighbor. Whenever we have an opportunity of animating our fellow travellers in running with patience the race that is set before them, or of cheering our fellow sufferers in this valley of tears, by a few kind and seasonable words, and neglect to avail ourselves of the occasion, either from sluggish selfishness or a total want of Christian sympathy, we are guilty of a sin of omission.

Another of Bishop White's sayings was, if people "looked within, and examined their own hearts," they would perceive so much to rectify there, that they would have neither time nor inclination to blame others. The breath that is worse than wasted in censuring others, would be profitably employed in praying the Father of mercy and compassion to convert them. Our Saviour has commanded us "Judge not, lest ye be judged," &c.; yet, in the face of this prohibition, many who profess and call themselves Christians, arrogate to themselves the prerogative of Omniscience, and not only judge but condemn those, who, perhaps, in the eyes of Him "to whom all hearts are open, and from whom no secrets are hid," are more guiltless of the failings imputed to them than their self-righteous accusers. When we consider that we must give an account of the tendency of every idle word we speak, in the day of judgment; and with what judgment we now judge we shall then be judged; it would be supposed that none would voluntarily exercise the office of censor. How heartless, and how offensive to the Divine Majesty must be the prayer, "Let the words of my mouth, and the meditations of my heart, be always acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my Redeemer;" from those who wound the feelings and injure the characters of those for whom Christ died. They express a horror of a thief, a liar, a murderer, and a blasphemer, being totally unconscious that they are actuated by a similar spirit. If they rob others of their peace and tranquillity, are they not more guilty than those who deprive them of their money? If they falsely accuse them, are they not guilty of lying? If they destroy their equanimity and cheerfulness by their unkind remarks, the frequent recurrence of which acts like a slow poison upon the constitution, and often leads to despair and suicide, are they not virtually guilty of murder? And may not the language of uncharitableness in those who are instructed in the way of truth and righteousness, be equally abhorrent in the ears of that God, who is love itself, with the language of blasphemy in the ignorant?

Those who are truly regenerated, renovated, and sanctified, feel the deepest commiseration for the unconverted, and make every charitable allowance for them, and feel such a lively sympathy for their fellow sinners, that they endeavor to "hide the fault they see." Now, in the end of the year, if those who have exerted their talents in finding fault with others, and have employed their tongues in saying unkind and unpleasant things to them, and in uttering uncharitable assertions in regard to the characters of those who have done nothing to excite their ire, could only perceive what injury they have done to the cause of religion, how much they have embittered the existence of those who could not escape from their malevolence; how many affectionate and benevolent emotions they have crushed, how many evil feelings they have excited, how much they have discouraged and dispirited others, by their unjust censures and unmerited reproaches, they would be convinced of their culpability, and shudder at the idea of their responsibility! They may have daily offered the petition "Thy kingdom come," they may, from a sense of duty, have made great active exertions in the cause; but they have rendered their labors nugatory, in regard to their own spiritual prosperity, according to the declaration of St. Paul, "if I give all my goods to feed the poor, and give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." Few can accomplish great things, but every person can promote peace and good-will among men, by saying kind and encouraging things to animate and support their fellow creatures in their spiritual warfare. Good words cost nothing, and are always profitable.

Let the peace of God rule in our hearts, and the operative love of God and man be obvious in all our looks, tones, words, and actions. In our domestic and social intercourse let us think charitably, act kindly, speak gently; and, by the uniform exhibition of a Christian spirit, let all men know that we are the disciples of the meek and lowly Jesus, who came not to condemn the world, but to save. Thus shall our light shine clearly before men, and they will glorify our Father in heaven.

VILLAGE CONVERSATIONS.

MR. EDITOR:—

Ours is a small Village, prettily situated—exhibiting the characteristics of such communities. We attach as much importance to minute circumstances as the inhabitants of large cities to stirring events; but we are a simple-minded people, and what if the wisest heads amongst us are sometimes puzzled to know why the minister walked up the road when his calling certainly led him down, so long as we confine ourselves to such innocent speculations, no harm is done. No one could pass our village without being attracted by the spire which rises in simple dignity from the prettiest of all village churches.

Who would suppose so much to alarm and excite our wondering population, existed beneath so humble an exterior?

"Well, there's no use in talking, Mr. Jones!" said Mr. Dunn, "your church can never prosper, she has too many marks of the Beast about her!"

Mr. Jones—"Marks of the Beast! what Beast?"

Mr. Dunn—"The Church of Rome, to be sure. Haven't you got a Crucifix, an Altar cloth; don't you burn wax candles on the Altar, and doesn't your Minister wear Popish garments, and preach Popish doctrine, and pray to the Saints, and put up wreaths at Christmas, to the scandal of all godly persons? Answer me that, Mr. Jones!"

Mr. Jones—"Stop! stop! neighbour—not so fast, my brain is quite puzzled by your vociferation; let me have your questions one at a time. What would you have first?"

Mr. Dunn—"Don't you burn wax candles on the Altar in the day-time?"

Mr. Jones—"I never saw a wax candle in our church, nor a light of any kind upon the Altar!"

Mr. Dunn—"Haven't you got a crucifix?"

Mr. Jones—"No!"

Mr. Dunn—"Doesn't your Minister wear Popish garments?"

Mr. Jones—"He wears such garments as the Reformed Church of England adopted as becoming the Priest of the Lord when engaged in the service of the Sanctuary. By the command of God Himself, the Jewish Priest was arrayed in a special garb when similarly employed in the Temple."

Mr. Dunn—"Well, neighbour, we'll let that pass, but what is this Altar cloth I hear so much talk about?"

Mr. Jones—"A simple covering for the Communion Table, of red damask, to correspond with the hangings of the pulpit, on which the letters 'I. H. S.' are placed, with a cross resting on the H."

Mr. Dunn—"I thought I would pin you before we were done; that is the way with you church people; because I said crucifix you deny the charge, but own to it by another name."

Mr. Jones—"My friend, a crucifix and a cross are not the same thing; the one, is a symbol of our Faith; the other, a representation or image of our Saviour upon the Cross, which is worshipped by the Church of Rome."

Mr. Dunn—"Well, for my part, I don't know the meaning of those letters. I have heard they were Greek, and some kind of prayer to the Virgin."

Mr. Jones—"They are the initials of these Latin words: 'Jesus Hominum Salvator,' containing a truth from which no Protestant Christian can dissent: 'Jesus, the Saviour of Men.'"

Mr. Dunn—"Why, then, can't you put them in English; that their meaning may be plain to the unlearned?"

Mr. Jones—"There are no three English words which would express so comprehensive a truth; and, even could they be found, the initials would not point out the truth so certainly as to preclude the necessity for enquiry; and one would as well remember the words and truth conveyed by the Latin letters when once informed of their meaning, as the English."

Mr. Dunn—"Well, friend Jones, so far so good; but your minister does preach strange doctrine. Why, I am told he asserted from the pulpit, that he was ordained by St. John, and no one had a right to preach who was not!"

Mr. Jones—"Indeed! an assertion so evidently untrue could not have been made thus publicly by any man in his senses, therefore it is hardly worthy of refutation. I certainly never heard from any pulpit an assertion of the kind."

Mr. Dunn—"I remember, now, you were absent that day. He called it 'Apostolic Secession,' but why do you smile?"

Mr. Jones—"At the idea of a secession among the Apostles, who knew but one Faith, one Lord, one Baptism, and who charged over and over upon the Church, that there be no divisions."

Mr. Dunn—"Well! perhaps I mistake the word!"

Mr. Jones—"You mean 'Apostolic Succession,' a doctrine as old as the times of the Apostles, taught by our Saviour in His promise to the twelve, 'Lo! I am with you always, even to the end of the world,' a fact evident to all men diligently reading Holy Scripture and ancient authors."

Mr. Dunn—"Well, neighbour, you seem ready to give an answer, and doubtless are fully persuaded of the excellence of your views; but I have not yet done. That you pray to the Saints out of your own mouth I can judge you. Did you not reply, in answer to my question, 'why is your bell ringing?' 'it is St. Stephen's day.'"

Mr. Jones—"My friend, you, who are so active in the due celebration of the Fourth of July, and in keeping alive the memory of the Heroes of the Revolution, ought surely to be able to separate between the contemplation of the lives of holy men, saints of old, to our edification, and the idolatrous worship of the creature. What would you think of the American citizen who would refuse to commemorate the birth and deeds of the man who is worthy of a nation's gratitude, because too many profane the day by intemperance? You would hesitate to call that man friend, or offer him your hand, the index to a patriotic heart. Shall Christians, then, refuse to follow the Primitive Church, in considering those of whom the world was not worthy, 'men of like passions with ourselves, who through faith wrought righteousness, subdued kingdoms, stopped the mouths of lions,' to our comfort and encouragement as we follow them, who now through faith and patience inherit the promises?"

Mr. Dunn—"You are warm, Mr. Jones, and I have but one more remark; why do you deck your church with greens at Christmas? Have you any Scripture for that?"

Mr. Jones—"I have not! I am aware there are several passages usually so applied, but I cannot think they bear upon it. We have, however, the example of the Primitive Church. Surely it is fitting to welcome the birth of our Saviour with joy and gladness; and while the earth is cold beneath the winter's snow and ice, yielding nothing to cheer the heart, we gladly bring the bright evergreen, the thorn-crowned holly, to beautify the place of His Sanctuary. Has this custom no charm to your eyes? Brings it no admonition to your heart? or, whispers it no confession to your ear? These wreaths and branches, my friend, carry me from the dreary earth; they tell me of joy in the sanctuary of God; they warn me to turn from the world, which fades and withers, and to set my affections where the evergreens of Faith, and Hope, and Love, bring joy and peace in believing; and they prompt the heartfelt confession that, however the world may fail and disappoint us, here may we always rejoice, even in the Courts of the Lord's House."

Mr. Dunn—"It is all very fine, neighbour, but I should fear so much form and ceremony might destroy all spirituality, and it is the want of that which makes church people so worldly."

Mr. Jones—"What you say with regard to the want of spirituality is very true; it is to be deplored that Christians of all denominations are so deficient; but that there is less of pure and undefiled religion in the Church, is a charge utterly unfounded."

Mr. Dunn—"Why, surely, neighbour, you do not really mean what you say? You never have Prayer Meetings, nor Protracted Meetings, nor Revivals, among you?"

Mr. Jones—"The church bell is now ringing, and if you will go with me you may take a part in our Prayer Meetings, for minister and people have each their appointed portion in the service; and if you mean, by a Protracted Meeting, a continuation of services for several days, we have one annually, which lasts a week, and where the solemn truths taught are frequently blessed to the salvation of souls; and to the revival of religion, in the hearts of Christians."

Mr. Dunn—"Perhaps, neighbour, I am somewhat prejudiced against those of your way; here comes our friend Green, if he will join us I will go with you."

Mr. Jones—"The last bell is now ringing, and I shall be very much pleased if you will both accompany me, and judge for yourselves of the fairness of my statements; for I feel convinced you will be constrained to acknowledge 'God is with you of a truth.'"

Mr. Dunn—"Suppose, Mr. Green, we join our neighbour; for if these things be so, we have done great injustice to the Church of which he is a member; and I, for one, would be glad to view that Church in a more favourable light."

Mr. Jones was so absorbed in his devotions, that he had no time, or thought, to observe the impression made upon his friends; but was not surprised at their seeking an early opportunity to inquire more fully of that way, in a spirit of earnest inquiry, seeking to know what is truth.

CANT.

It is a common remark that there is nothing so difficult to define as what is most intelligible without definition. This is true of one very well known and familiar thing in particular. Every body knows what is meant by cant. And yet, if a person were called upon suddenly to define it, the chances are that he would describe it in some way which did not really represent his own ideas of it, and test it by some mark which was not at all its real differentia.

Thus, the first idea which the term cant summons up before us is that of triteness. What! that old thing again, that worn out sentiment. The fatigue of repetition comes before us, and we think of something which every body says, because he has heard somebody else say it. And yet triteness, if we look into the matter further, is very far from being the distinctive sign and defining characteristic of cant, for a large part of not only very respectable but most majestic truth is trite; and for the best of all reasons, that truth has certain grand marks and evidences of itself, which necessarily appeal with success to the world of human minds, and procure its reception and currency. Hence the department of proverbs, maxims, and dicta, moral, social, and political. It must be admitted, indeed, that truth often suffers for the very force which gives it this currency, getting into the mouths of people who do not feel or realise it, and so becoming trite, not only in the sense of being often repeated, but also in the sense of losing its freshness and reality, and then even the most large and majestic truths become cant. But this is a particular species of cant, and a comparatively inoffensive one, which we do not give any prominent place to, in our idea of the thing.

The real defining characteristic or differentia, of cant, is rather a defect and falling short of truth than a superfluity of it. Where a dictum or sentiment has real large substantial truth in it, it will bear any amount of repetition—so that it is not brought in irrelevantly and out of place; but where there is a weak point in its truthfulness, a partiality, a one-sidedness, an obliquity of any kind, then repetition tells upon it. That is to say, it is not repetition itself which constitutes cant, but repetition acting upon some infirmity in the sentiment repeated. To quote a familiar fact from the department of the palate, the tastes of some particular dishes or fruits will please at the first trial, but a certain peculiarity about them, an obliquity and a digressiveness from the general law of taste which characterises them, comes out on the second trial, comes out stronger on the third, stronger still on the fourth, and gradually reaches the final point of being disgusting. Thus, some Asiatic fruits have a perilous sweetness about them, which is nice at first, though not unaccompanied with apprehension, and in the course of a few mouthfuls brings the bold adventurer to the verge of sickness. There is something of the same progress observable in moral things, though, of course, a good deal more gradual. Sentiments that start with a certain weakness and attitude of obliquity to substantial truth, are bearable at first from the element of truth which they contain with their obliquity; but, as they are repeated, they begin to pall, and, finally, with the accumulation and growth of repetition, become cant.

Thus cant, as we examine it, assumes a connexion with sect or party. It is the expression of some favourite view or line of thought which forms or sustains some one-sided and partial system, political or theological. It has enough truth in it to appear perfect truth to the school or clique which nourishes itself upon it. It is thus fondled and stroked, and passed on from mouth to mouth, and from book to book. It becomes, in its passage, more and more confirmed in its character. It represents the self-complacency and self-adulation of parties and cliques, who, without sufficient largeness of mind to appreciate or see large truth, idolize their own imperfect conceptions which reflect themselves, and gloat over their own fancied wisdom and superiority to the rest of the world.

Thus, to give one or two instances—justice is not a cant sentiment, because justice is truth; but "Liberty, equality, fraternity," is cant, because that is a peculiar and party notion of justice taken up, and put forward, and echoed by a particular school of politicians and philosophers. Thus, in the religious department, repentance is not cant, because it is divine truth; but "conversion" in the Wesleyan or popular religious use of the word, becomes such; because that is a peculiar and one-sided notion of repentance, put forward by a particular religious use. Thus, generosity and mercy are not cant; philanthropy, sometimes is, because that is a party word. But, generally, the difference lies more between the same words, in different senses and uses, than between different words; for schools and sects naturally take up recognised words, to give authority to their sentiments, only using them in their own way. Thus, charity, in the religious use of the word, is not cant; in the liberal and latitudinarian use of it, it is, because it then expresses a particular party's and school's view of charity. Thus peace in the mouth of a practical statesman is not cant, for peace is undoubtedly an advantage; in the mouth of the Peace Congress it is, because it is associated with a certain perfectionist view of the progress of society which is the mark of a party. But it would be endless to multiply instances.—London Guardian.

GOD'S REVENGE AGAINST MURDER.

Remarkable instance of keen sight and scent in a native of New South Wales, which led to the discovery of murder.

A settler on the great western road was missing from his farm. His overseer (a convict) gave out that he had gone to England, and left the property in his care. This was thought extraordinary, as the settler was not in difficulties, and was a steady, prudent man. The affair was almost forgotten, when, one Saturday night, another settler was returning, with his horse and cart, from market. On arriving at a part of the fence on the roadside, near the farm of his absent neighbor, he thought he saw him sitting on the fence. Immediately the farmer hailed his neighbor, but receiving no answer, got out of his cart, and went toward the fence. His neighbor (as he plainly appeared to be) quitted the fence, and crossed the field toward a pond, in the direction of his home, which it was supposed he had deserted. The farmer thought it strange, and the next morning went to his neighbor's cottage, expecting to see him; but saw only the overseer, who laughed at the story, and said that his master was at that time near the shores of England. The circumstances were so inexplicable, that the farmer went to a justice of the peace, related the circumstances, and added that he feared foul play had taken place. A native black was sent with some of the mounted police, and accompanied the farmer to the fence where the farmer thought he saw his friend. The spot was pointed out to the native, without showing him the direction which the lost person apparently took after quitting the fence. On close inspection, a part of the upper rail appeared to be discoloured. The black scraped it with a knife, smelt it, and tasted it. Immediately after he crossed the fence, and took a straight direction for the pond near the cottage. On its surface was a scum, which he took up in a leaf, and after smelling and tasting it, declared it to be "white man's fat." He then coursed round the pond, somewhat after the manner of a blood-hound, and at last darted into a thicket, and halted at a place containing some loose and decayed brushwood. On removing this, he thrust down the ramrod of his musket into the earth, smelt it, and desired the spectators to dig there. Instantly spades were procured at the cottage, and the body of the settler was found, with his skull fractured, and presenting every indication of having been some time immersed in water. The overseer, who was in possession of the property of the deceased, and who had invented the story of his master's departure for England, was committed to jail, and tried for murder. The foregoing circumstantial evidence formed the main proofs: he was found guilty, sentenced to death, and was on his way to the place of execution still protesting his innocence. Here, however, his hardihood forsook him. He acknowledged the murder of his master; that he came behind him when he was crossing the identical rail on which the farmer fancied he saw the deceased, and with one blow on the head killed him; dragged the body to the pond, and threw it in; but after some days took it out, and buried it where it was found. The sagacity of the native black was remarkable; but the unaccountable manner in which the murder was discovered is one of the inscrutable dispensations of Providence.—R. M. Martin's Colonial Library.

MR. EDITOR:—

A meeting of the Delaware and Chester Convocation was held in St. James' Church, Kingsessing, commencing on Tuesday November 20th. During the session there were present, Rev. Messrs. Clemson (Pres.) Allen, Kirke, Childs, Huntingdon, and Smith, members; and Rev. M. R. Talbot, U. S. N. Public services were held on Tuesday evening, three times on Wednesday, and three times on Thursday.

On Wednesday morning, the Convocation Sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Childs; after which, the Holy Communion was administered by the Rev. Mr. Clemson, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Huntingdon.

On Wednesday afternoon, addresses were delivered by all the brethren on the subject of Christian Education, and on Thursday afternoon, on the subject of Missions. On Thursday evening the Rector baptized two adults.

The attendance at all the services was large, particularly in the evenings, when the church was filled to overflowing. We trust that both clergy and people derived much profit from the exercises of the Convocation, and I pray that the seed sown may spring up and bring forth fruit to the glory of God.

The next meeting will be held at Westchester, on the afternoon of the fourth Tuesday of February, 1850. Rev. Mr. Woodward, Junior, was appointed to deliver the Convocation Sermon; Rev. Mr. Huntingdon, the alternate.

On the Sunday following the Convocation, Bishop Potter, visited the parish, and administered the Apostolic rite of confirmation to thirteen persons.

BLOCKLEY ALMSHOUSE MISSION.

The Missionary would call the attention of the friends of this enterprise to one or two of its existing wants. A short time ago a room was set apart as a Reading Room in the Lunatic department of the Institution, where at certain specified hours those patients who felt disposed to read might enjoy some mental recreation. A few books and some periodicals of the day are now upon the tables, but quite an accession to the slender stock is needed to form a moderate library. The Missionary has entertained the conviction that most of the families of the Church in our city could contribute a volume from their stores. An old book, if interesting and instructive, would do as well as a new one; and by the plan thus suggested, in which all could co-operate, a very respectable collection of volumes could at once be secured without expense. It might here be stated for the information of those who are not acquainted with the moral treatment of the mentally affected, that in no way is the intelligent patient more soothed and tranquillized than by perusing some work of interest for a limited period: we say limited, for only for a limited period can the attention be fixed. The Missionary would incidentally state that he has two reading classes now in full organization in this department—to one he attends on Thursday—to the other on Friday afternoon—and the good results are so marked as to stimulate him to additional endeavors. He would also say that he should be glad to receive any books suitable for a children's library. He steadily officiates to a congregation of one hundred and fifty children in the Children's Asylum attached to the Institution, and wishes to form a juvenile library. Also, he would be happy to receive prayer books, old or new, as he can find use for a much larger number than he can reasonably anticipate from the societies which have kindly contributed prayer books at an early stage of the mission. If some families in our communion respond to this appeal, and leave at the house of the Missionary, each but one volume, old or new, an object will be compassed which cannot but conduce to the moral and spiritual amelioration of a large and too much neglected class of our fellow-creatures.

PROCEEDINGS.

MATAGORDA, JAN. 1, 1849.

At a meeting of the Clergy and Laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of Texas, called by the Right Rev. G. W. Freeman, D. D., Missionary Bishop, exercising Episcopal functions in the said State, at their request, and held in Christ Church, in the city of Matagorda, on Monday, the first day of January, 1849, for the purpose of considering the propriety of organizing the Church in said State into a Diocese: there was present of the Clergy, Rev. C. S. Ives, Rev. C. Gillett, Rev. J. F. Young: of the Laity, Matthew Talbot, Esq., James Dennison, Esq., Thomas C. Stewart, Esq., W. L. Sartwell, Esq., and Dr. P. A. Davenport. Rt. Rev. the Bishop took the chair, and opened the meeting with prayers; after which, the Rev. C. Gillett was elected Secretary.

On motion of the Rev. C. S. Ives,

Resolved, That the chair appoint a Committee, consisting of one Clergyman and one Layman, to ascertain what persons are properly delegated to attend this Convention.

The chair appointed the Rev. J. F. Young, and Dr. P. A. Davenport, said committee, who, after examination had, presented the following report, which was adopted:

The committee appointed to ascertain who are properly delegated to attend this Convention, report the following gentlemen as having presented certificates of their election from various parishes in this State:—Matthew Talbot, Esq., James Dennison, Esq., Thomas C. Stewart, Esq., and William L. Sartwell, Esq., from Christ Church, Matagorda; Dr. P. A. Davenport, Todd Robinson, Esq., Guy M. Bryan, Esq., and William L. Bush, Esq., from St. John's Church, Brazoria county; and Col. Geo. Fisher, and W. M. Taylor, Esq., from Christ Church, Houston, of whom the following were present: Matthew Talbot, Esq., James Dennison, Esq., Thomas C. Stewart, Esq., William L. Sartwell, Esq., and Dr. P. A. Davenport.

The chair then declared the meeting duly organized, and ready to consider the question of organizing the State into a Diocese.

The chair stated briefly, but pertinently, our present position, and the nature of the step proposed; after which, the following preamble and resolution, moved by Rev. C. Gillett, were adopted:

Whereas, the Clergy and Laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, living in Texas, have been for some time past, desirous of uniting themselves into a Diocese, to be represented in the General Convention of said Church, and for other purposes, not attainable without such Ecclesiastical organization: and whereas, the present meeting of the Clergy and Laity of said Church, was called by the Right Rev. Bishop, presiding, at their request; and although some of our brethren have been detained, as is believed, by the rumor of an epidemic, or by high waters; yet this meeting having been called by their approbation, it is deemed necessary by the Clergy and Lay Delegates here assembled, that they proceed to organize a Diocese; therefore,

Be it resolved by this meeting, That the clergy and laity of said Church, living in Texas, are hereby united and formed into a Diocese, to be styled and known as the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of Texas, and to be in union with the General Convention of said Church, when admitted to a representation therein.

On motion of Rev. C. S. Ives, the chair then appointed the following committees:

I. To report a Constitution of the Diocese of Texas, Rev. C. S. Ives, James Dennison, Esq.

II. To report such Canons as may be necessary to carry into effect the organization, Rev. C. Gillett, Wm. L. Sartwell, Esq.

After retiring and consultation, the committee on the Constitution reported; when, on motion of Rev. J. F. Young, the articles of the Constitution were considered, and adopted seriatim; and, on motion of T. C. Stewart, Esq., the Constitution was then adopted as a whole.

The committee on Canons made a report, which, on motion of Rev. J. F. Young, was considered, and adopted seriatim; and, on motion of T. C. Stewart, Esq., they were then adopted collectively as our present Canons.

On motion of Rev. J. F. Young, the chair appointed Rev. J.

F. Young and Dr. P. A. Davenport a committee to report a form of articles of association, to be recommended for the organization of new parishes in the Diocese. The committee reported the following, which, on motion of James Dennison, Esq., was adopted as a whole.

On motion of Dr. P. A. Davenport, the Convention then adjourned until 3 o'clock, P. M.

C. GILLETT, Secretary.

JAN. 1, 3 o'clock, P. M.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Right Rev. the Bishop in the chair.

Minutes of the morning session read and adopted.

On motion of Rev. C. S. Ives,

Resolved, that the present standing committee consist of three.

On motion of Rev. C. S. Ives,

Resolved, that we now proceed to elect the standing committee.

The balloting then took place, which resulted in the election of Rev. C. S. Ives, Rev. C. Gillett, and Rev. J. F. Young.

On motion of Rev. C. Gillett, the Convention then proceeded to the election of delegates to the General Convention, which resulted as follows:

Clergymen.—Rev. Messrs. Ives, Eaton, Gillett, Young.—Laymen.—Messrs. P. A. Davenport, E. S. Perkins, R. D. Johnson, W. L. Sartwell.

On motion of Rev. C. Gillett, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we place the Diocese of Texas "under the full Episcopal charge and authority" of the "Right Rev. G. W. Freeman, D. D., Missionary Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, appointed to exercise Episcopal functions in the States of Arkansas and Texas, and in the Indian Territory south of 36 1-2 deg. parallel of latitude."

Resolved, That, inasmuch as the exigencies of the Church in Texas require organization, and it is still too feeble to support a Bishop, that the Board of Mission be, and hereby are, respectfully requested to continue to us the aid hitherto extended.

On motion of Dr. P. A. Davenport,

Resolved, That the Secretary be requested to transmit the foregoing resolutions to the Board of Missions.

On motion of Rev. J. F. Young,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Convention be authorized and instructed to have printed 500 copies of the minutes of this Convention, and that he forward 12 copies of the same to each clergyman of this Diocese.

On motion of Rev. C. S. Ives,

Resolved, That the deputies to the General Convention be authorized and requested to apply for the admission of this Diocese to representation in that body.

Wm. M. Taylor, Esq., delegate from Christ Church, Houston, appeared at this point in the proceedings, presented his certificate of election, and took his seat as a member of the Convention.

On motion of Rev. C. S. Ives,

Resolved, That the next meeting of the Convention be held in the city of Houston, on the second Thursday of December, 1849; but the Bishop, if he see good reason, may change the time of meeting.

On motion of J. F. Young,

Resolved, That, as the Lay Delegation from Houston has been prevented from reaching here until a late period in our session, that the minutes of all our proceedings, together with the Constitution and Canons, be read, before adjournment; that opportunity may be had, for re-consideration, should not all our proceedings meet the views of that delegation.

Whereupon the Secretary proceeded to read as directed.

On motion of Rev. J. F. Young, the minutes of the entire Convention were approved.

On motion of Rev. C. S. Ives,

Resolved, That after prayers by the Bishop, this Convention adjourn sine die; whereupon, the Bishop having concluded the proceedings by prayer and benediction, the Convention adjourned.

THE LITTLE CLOUD.

BY THE REV. EDWARD C. JONES, A. M.

When Julian the Apostate commanded Athanasius to leave the city of Alexandria, as he departed from his see, and beheld the people weeping around him, he exclaimed, "Take courage, this is but a little cloud, which shall quickly pass away;" and so indeed it proved. For on the accession of Jovian, Athanasius was promptly restored.—Church History.

Take courage—'tis a little cloud,
That soon will pass away,
The hearts that now with grief are bowed,
May only grieve to-day.
To-morrow, up the azure height
The sun may dart his beam,
And then one joyous burst of light,
O'er mount and vale shall stream.
When thwarted plans and baffled hopes,
Become our only store,
And the crushed spirit barely copes,
With ills unknown before,
Despond not—yet the tide will turn,
The gales propitious play:
Take courage—'tis a little cloud,
That soon will pass away.

When doubts eclipse the ray of joy,
And fears their shadows cast,
When rugged seems the way to bliss,
And foes come crowding fast,
Faint not—a mightier power than thine,
Is pledged those foes to stay,
Light shall at last for thee be sown,
The cloud shall pass away.

But shades there not the vale of Death,
A cloud of sombre fold?
Yes—but the eagle eye of Faith,
Detects the streak of gold:
Those radiant tints shall wider spread,
And form one burnished sea,
Till thine at last, triumphant Saint,
Is Immortality.

THE RETROSPECTIONS OF A MISSIONARY.

No. 1.

The labors of a faithful Missionary are of great importance to the extension of the Church in the great field of the West, where the harvest is ready for the sickle of the reaper. The great field of the West! and well may it be called, the great field of the West, for it stretches to the far-off shores of the Pacific; and must, in the lapse of another century, contain a population of many millions who must be supplied with the bread of life and the waters of salvation, unless we are supine and indifferent to the spread of the Gospel of the Redeemer, and the extension of the Church, which he purchased with his own blood. For "Christ," says the Apostle, in his Epistle to the Ephesians, "loved the Church, and gave Himself for it; that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish."

And, in order that the labors of the Missionary may be successful and result in the extension of the Church, and the establishment of her doctrines, discipline, and primitive mode of worship, he must be imbued with sound learning, ardent zeal, fervent piety, commanding talents, a self-sacrificing spirit, and a blameless life. These qualifications were required in the first Missionaries of the Cross, in the day when they had to contend against the warlike Roman and the polished Greek, who were both opposed to the influence and the spread of the Gospel. And they were eminently successful, for the Church of the living God was planted in Rome, and Jesus was preached as the way, the truth, and the life, in the temples of Greece; and after three hundred years of strife and contest, in which thousands of martyrs sealed their attachment to the truth, by a painful death, the fires of superstition died out on the altars, and the Cross, as the symbol of our redemption, was emblazoned on the standards of the Roman army. And the same qualifications are demanded now from the Minister of the Church; for though they have not to preach in the West, against the idols of the heathen, or to denounce the cruel and licentious rites of paganism, yet they have to preach against idolatry of the heart, and to warn men of the danger of trusting in uncertain riches, and of devoting their time and thoughts, their talents and their lives, to the objects of time and sense.

But the Missionary not only needs all the qualifications that have been mentioned, and that to the fullest possible extent, but he needs also a large share of patience, to enable him to contend against the difficulties and to endure the numerous trials to which he will be called in the exercise of his ministry in a land of strangers; to people who are strangers to the claims of the Church, ignorant of her worship, and prejudiced, from the reports they have heard concerning her, to her establishment in their midst.

I do not, however, intend to enter more into detail respecting the qualifications necessary for the faithful missionary who wishes to make full proof of his ministry, and for the successful prosecution of the duties connected with his holy and useful office; because it is rather my intention to furnish you with a few sketches of places, incidents, and characters which have fallen under my observation, during a period of thirteen years, spent in missionary labors, in places west of the Allegheny Mountains, than to discuss the necessary qualification of missionary men. And these sketches will appear as often as time, health, and inclination may be afforded, until the principal incidents worthy of notice that have occurred during the above-mentioned period, have been reviewed, and with your consent, placed before your readers.

The Church holds in her hands the charter of salvation which she has received from the Prince of Missionaries, and therefore she is bound to do all in her power to send the glad tidings of the Gospel to all, and to continue in the work until the earth is full of the knowledge of the glory of God. And the Church not only holds in her hands the charter of salvation, but she is the appointed ark of salvation, and therefore her missionaries must be sent out, not only into the rich and fertile districts of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, where a rich harvest will eventually be gathered, but they must be sent out to the far-distant regions of California, and track the steps of the gold-hunter, to tell him that there is gold to be gathered, in comparison of which the gold of the mountain stream is but dross—for the one is imperishable, while the other perishes in the using. Let the Church then send out her heralds to tell the story of redeeming love, and teach the way of salvation, and then, under the influence of divine grace, enlightening the mind and purifying the heart, her numbers shall finally increase to such an extent, as to induce the cry once heard by the ancient Church: "Who are these that fly as a cloud and as the doves to their windows?"

PRESENTS.

Having observed in the last Banner, a list of presents made to a clergyman, and charged as part of his salary! we cannot forbear making a few remarks upon this injudicious custom, or rather ungenerous mode of giving presents. We have lived in two or three Dioceses where matters were somewhat different, and as the above mode of paying Ministers is far from being in accordance with our ideas on the subject, we will endeavour to suggest a more noble and generous way.

First, let all who are members of "the Church" feel that it is a duty, a privilege to contribute to God's ministers; that all they possess in this world is but loaned them for a short period, seldom do many live to fourscore years; let them become their own almoners, do good while they live, lay up the interest in Heaven, teach their children that by baptism they are members, and bound by the highest authority on high to contribute if but a mite, and we should soon see a different state of things; instead of the loud and heart-rending appeals on behalf of our missionaries, there would be a constant fund to do good, and to pay each minister of the Church his lawful salary. Shame be it to any people to think of charging presents contributed to our ministers or their families. We blush at the bare idea. It must be a narrow contracted mind who could be guilty of such meanness. And yet the instances related in the Banner are but a few of many who act in such a manner. Send presents of what we have to spare, but never charge those presents! Let them go as free-will offerings, as well as a generous and good salary to supply all their wants. Who of all men upon earth deserve more at our hands than our ministers? Would we act so meanly with lawyers, merchants, physicians, and tradesmen? Certainly not. Do not those who labor for our souls earn more than all other professions or occupations? Then let us give of our substance, liberally, freely, and not expect them to live on air. They are human nature as well as ourselves. They require food and raiment (and these of the best) as well as we do.

Instances have come under our observation, of presents having been sent to ministers, while laboring for years in a parish, such as a quarter of beef from a man worth a hundred thousand dollars, the minister of course writing a most polite note returning thanks for this, as he supposed, present, when lo and behold, when his poor pittance was to be paid, this said quarter of beef was charged as a part of his subscription! These things should not be. Kentuckians and many in Ohio would blush to hear of such an act. When presents are made in the West and South, the congregation meet, each one determines before Christmas what they will send their minister. The physician gives his professional services free as well as his presents and pew rent. The merchants send articles that will serve the family often throughout the year. The grocers send some sugar, coffee, and all articles in their line of business. The shoe merchant, shoes and boots. The hatter, hats; and these articles they would scorn to charge; and so on until the poor minister is overwhelmed with gratitude and love to his people, and praises God who has thus put it into their hearts to contribute to his wants. Then, if a minister has say three, four, five hundred or a thousand dollars salary, he is enabled to do good, to enlarge his library, and in some instances lay by part for his family, that they may not become a burthen when he is called from them. He is enabled to educate his children, and not compelled to depend upon the too often cold charities of the world. Will Church members never learn their duty? While pampering their appetites with all that is unnecessary, when often the poor minister has not shoes or clothing for his family, perhaps they may send him a turkey or ham for a Christmas dinner. He receives these with thankfulness; but what do we find when the quarter's pay comes round, these articles charged! Alas, that there should be so little humanity, to say no generosity.

Let each one commence the plan of giving now at the approaching season of our blessed Christmas, and give generously, give as a privilege, and if he is a loser at the end of the year, we would be willing to pay the forfeit. On the other hand, his stores will be increased, his mind will know a peace more blessed than can result from all the hoardings of the miser. He will be sending his riches before him. He will see the good results. He will know that no moth or rust can enter that which is put to such blessed uses. We care not what a man's faith is without works. It is dead, and not worth having. Hoping these remarks may reach some, and enable them to do good with what God has only loaned them, and lead them to feel and know their duty, we submit them to you for the favour of a place in your valuable paper.

THE KING'S MESSENGERS.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

In a former communication I sent to you an extract from the beautiful and instructive Allegory, "The King's Messengers." It left the four brothers in the possession of their Father's wealth.

The mysterious "old man" had appeared to them, and told them how they might use their riches to obtain for themselves imperishable treasures in the Regal Palace. He had left with them his counsel and warning, and assured them they should see him again at some future day; and that he would then come with the authority of the Great King to summon them to the Regal Palace to give an account of the manner in which they had employed the gifts of His bounty entrusted to them.

I shall not follow them, as avarice slowly, but surely, gains the heart of one, dries up the fountain of benevolence, infuses its withering influence, and leaves it without charity, absorbed in cold selfishness, the fast companion of that "covetousness which is idolatry."

Or, as fame leads another to her shrine, and claiming him as her devotee, exacts from him his time and his treasure as the cost of the ephemeral reward which she can bestow:

Or, as a third, beguiled by the desire of gaining popular applause, sends forth his proclamation to all who would partake of his munificent bounty, to appear at his mansion, vainly believing that thus will his gifts be carried to the Regal Palace and be treasured there to await his coming.

All these things, with the fulfilment of the promise of the "old man" to visit the brothers again, and the fearful alarm which his second coming brought to all of them, save one, may be learned from the book of which I write, and I hope your readers will get it, and profit, as they must, by meditating upon the histories it relates.

My object now is, to offer you a further extract, illustrating most beautifully, as I think, and truly, as I doubt not, the effect of practical benevolence upon the close of life.

It may appear to some, perhaps, to partake too much of the writer's fancy. It will be received by others as showing forth the presence and the peaceful influence of "ministering spirits," and the joy of Christian love in the heart of a good man at the hour of death.

"Such was the fearful history of the three elder brothers. It is a relief to turn aside from it, and seek a resting place in Siphron's lowly dwelling. He had wept bitterly for their exile, but he did not, like Euprepes, make a display of his compassion, or boast of his readiness to depart.

"His tears had flowed in secret, and his hopes also were cherished in the solitude of his own bosom. Every day he put his little room in readiness for the stranger's coming, and was so constantly preparing for it, that he may be almost said to have lived in his immediate presence. Yet he, like the rest, was conscious of some change of feeling when his actual summons arrived.

"He was at that time enjoying the quiet beauty of the evening hour. It mattered not that a rose with a few autumnal flowers was the only ornament of his humble abode; and that the flame burnt faint and feebly in the solitary lamp which was standing at their side. Siphron could not really be in darkness, poverty, or alone; for as the shadows of night closed in, the pearls appeared upon the threshold, the soft music spoke to him as a companion, and the amber light shed its radiance around. His heart was full of gratitude for these blessings; when a mingled feeling of awe and sadness stole upon him, and it seemed as though some shadows were moving along the wall. Every object changed as the dark outline fell upon it: the flame of the solitary lamp burned even more dimly than before, and the autumnal flowers began to wither and decay. It needed not these signs to warn Siphron that it was the same figure that had appeared in the mirror. For a while he watched it with a calm and steadfast gaze; presently a sensation of weariness stole upon him, his thoughts grew confused and indistinct, and at length he sunk in a state of partial unconsciousness upon the ground.

"When he again opened his eyes, the old man was standing at his side. No gloomy attendants were near, but he held a mirror in his hand. Beneath it were the words, 'This is the image of the past.' The scene which it reflected was one that had been long familiar to Siphron, and he did not shrink from beholding it now. From time to time, soft shading forms moved across the glass; they were, doubtless, the images of the King's Messengers; but the eye of Siphron did not for a moment rest upon them, for ever as they appeared, his thoughts wandered to the Regal Palace and Glorious City.

"At length, the old man addressed him. 'Oh! merchant,' he said, 'how is this? All signs of life and luxury are wont to vanish at my presence, but it is not so with thy abode. Even as I crossed the threshold of thy door, pearls of inestimable value were scattered upon the ground. They can be no part of the treasure of this city; for, when I trod silently upon them, they were not sullied by my steps, but only shone with a purer brightness than before!'

"'Stranger,' said Siphron, 'I cannot tell. You say truly that they are no part of the treasure of the city. The whole of my father's vast wealth would not have purchased one of them. They are as the pearls of the East, and I have looked upon them as gifts from the Great King; but I know not what hand has scattered them thus plenteously at the threshold of my door.'

"He had hardly finished speaking, when a shadowy form moved across the mirror, and there was a voice from therein which said, 'I was a widow, poor and destitute, but a Messenger from the Great King. I went to Philargyr for relief, and he told me that his money was his own. I came to Siphron, and he spoke soft words of comfort, and ministered to my wants, and bade me take freely of his treasure, for it was for my sake that the Great King had placed it in his hands. I wept with joy and gratitude when I left him, and each tear has been changed by the Great King into a pearl, and remained to this hour on the threshold of his abode.'

"And the old man said, 'Oh! merchant, from whence is this wonderful melody that I hear? Sure I am that none of the musicians in this city could produce such strains. Their harps lose their tunefulness, and their sweetest notes become harsh and discordant when I am standing near. But this music has some magic power. My presence only renders it more distinct and perfect than before, and even my own voice is moved into harmony by the sound.

"Stranger," replied Siphron, "I cannot tell. You say truly that the music has a magic power, for it lends its own tunefulness to all around. To me it has long since breathed a spirit of harmony above the din and discord of this crowded city; every care and anxiety has been changed and modulated by its soothing influence; and the events of day after day, have seemed to flow on in perpetual melody. But though the music has thus dwelt in my own house, and I have loved it, and listened to it with gladness, I believe it to be but the echo of a yet sweeter strain which is played afar off in some distant land."

"Again there was a voice from the mirror; its accents were low and tremulous, like those of a little child, and it said, 'I was an orphan, weak and friendless, but a Messenger of the Great King. I went to Megarles for succour, and he pointed to a block of marble, and bade me raise it on high, but my hands were too feeble for the task; and then his attendants drove me away, and said there was no place for little children in the towers of Fame. I came to Siphron, and he fed me and clothed me; and told me that the house in which he lived, had been lent to him as a shelter for the orphan child. Every morning and evening I went in secret to the Great King, and carried with me each precious gift that I received from Siphron; and he bade me take back to him in return the offering of a simple heart overflowing with gratitude and love. So it was that my looks and words became to his house as a perpetual song; and this is the soft music which you hear within its walls.'

"And the old man said, 'Tell me, Siphron, from whence is this light that sheds its radiance to all around? Sure I am that it belongs not to this city; for night has thrown her dark mantle over its streets; and, even if it were otherwise, mists and chilling darkness are the signs of my approach. The flame of your own lamp grew more faint and feeble when my shadow first fell upon it, and is fast expiring now. Whence, then, is it that in thy dwelling there seems to be perpetual day?'"

"A soft slumber was stealing upon Siphron; his eyes were already closed; his voice was indistinct, and yet it sounded like happy music, as for the last time he replied, 'Stranger, I cannot tell! The light has indeed shone upon me; nay, is shining upon me now. My eyes are closed, and I see it not; but it is as the sunshine of the heart, and I feel it to be here. Whether it be a reality or a beautiful dream, I am conscious of its presence, though I know not from whence it comes.'

"Then, for the third time, a voice proceeded from the mirror, as a shadowy form moved across it, and it said—'I had been rich and prosperous, but a long sickness brought me into poverty and distress. I heard the proclamation of Euprepes, and made a feeble effort to reach his door; but the crowd, and the glare, and the noise of the trumpet overwhelmed me with fear and shame. I shrank back in silence, and hid myself in the obscurity of my own solitary dwelling. Siphron sought me out, and found me there. He tended me in my sickness and ministered to my wants, and bade me be of good cheer, for I had a secret store of wealth, even the prayers and blessings of a poor man; and when I spoke to him of gratitude, he asked me to give him some portion of my treasure. Then did I remember that poverty and distress had made me a Messenger of the Great King, and I hastened to the Regal Palace, and took with me thither my blessings and my prayers. The Great King received them from me, and shed them as rays of unchanging sunshine on the abode of Siphron, and from thence comes the amber light that yet lives within its walls.'

"There was a pause of a few seconds; while Siphron appeared to be yielding more and more to the soothing influence of sleep. And then the old man breathed softly upon him, and said—'Thrice happy merchant! Well, indeed, hast thou traded with thy wealth. Thou hast bartered thy perishable silver and gold for the widow's gratitude, the orphan's love, and the poor man's prayer. Now that thou art going home, those riches will follow thee. The costly pearls, the gentle music, and the amber light, shall attend thee on thy journey even to the gates of the Glorious City. But a more abundant pleasure, a more perfect harmony, and a light of brilliance unutterable, await thee there.'

"As he thus spoke, he placed a second mirror before the eyes of Siphron, and though they now seemed to be sealed in slumber, a smile of joy and gladness played across his countenance. I cannot tell how bright and glorious was the vision that he saw. This alone I know, that the image of the future was reflected in that glass; and that, as the old man held it, his own form faded away. For a moment, there was a sound as of the rustling of many wings in the air, and then all was stillness in the dwelling of Siphron.

"On the morrow, the sun shone brightly upon the city; there was the usual hum of traffic and moving to and fro of the busy multitude in the streets, though the lamp had been extinguished in Siphron's abode, and the aged merchant was gone. Very few of the passers-by noticed the deserted dwelling; but the King's Messengers wept as they beheld it from a distance, and there was a strain of sadness in the gentle music of the orphan child. They mourned, because their own office was at an end; but when they thought of Siphron, their sorrow was turned into joy. They knew that his treasures had been marked with the Cross, and were stored up for him in the Regal Palace, and that he himself was dwelling in the happy City where the law of exile was unknown."

Rev. Sir and Editor:

The publication of the following table may, possibly, be of use to some of your clerical readers; if not, I humbly crave your and their pardon for taking up so much space in the Banner. The Psalter Psalms are the original Introits of Edward VI.'s Prayer Book; and wherever these Introits were found among our "Selection" the metre Psalms have been given.

It has been stated, that the venerable Bishop White was accustomed to select and appoint, at the beginning of each year, what Psalms the choir of his parish church were to sing on the several Sundays of the year.

Very respectfully yours,

WILBERFORCE ON THE INCARNATION.

MR. EDITOR:—

Your correspondent, "O" having favoured us with a "Reply" to our article in defence of the above work, in which he trusts he has "effectually disposed" of it, we shall trouble you with a few words, by way of rejoinder, and then leave the case to its merits.

What we undertook to prove in that article by the concurring authority of Scripture and the Prayer Book, we consider as very far from being "disposed of" by any arguments which "O" has yet adduced, or by the "reasonable interpretations" he has given to the scriptures quoted by us.

I. In our article we remarked:—"The Scriptures seem to labour, by the strongest and most emphatic figures and language, to impress upon us this great truth of the absolute identification of our regenerate human Nature with the Manhood of Christ."

"O," commenting upon these words, seems to think we have "dissolved our argument concerning reality, substance, and absolute identity," by making it in any respect rest upon language and figure—especially the latter. We think differently, and consider they strengthen our argument. We shall give one or two instances to prove this. With respect to language, we quote 1 Cor. xii. 13. "For, as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body, so also is Christ. For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free;" and again, (v. 27.) "Now ye are the Body of Christ, and members in particular."

Now, supposing the Apostle to intend to teach the absolute identification of the Believer with Christ, we are at a loss to know what stronger language he could use, to convey that idea, than that above quoted.

With respect to figures, we refer to those of "the Vine," and the "one Bread," with which all are familiar. Analogies would have expressed our meaning better than "figures;" but, having written it, we let it stand. Now, so far from weakening our argument for the absolute identity contended for, we consider these figures as among the strongest arguments in its favour as illustrations, most apt and convincing, of a Truth, which, being revealed to our faith, is necessarily above the human understanding; a truth, which no "reasonable interpretations" can explain, and no "dash of common sense" can fathom.

II. But, if the doctrine of the absolute identification of our regenerated Human Nature with the Manhood of Christ find little favour with "O," still less does our assertion (not Mr. W.'s) that Human Nature is "a substance." Mr. Wilberforce called Human Nature an "entity," an "organization," &c. With these terms "O" found much fault. In defending the book of Mr. W., we did not use the term so much complained of, but chose another ("substance")—a well known theological term, as will presently appear, and one (as we believe) very much to the purpose.

In our previous article, after having, from Scripture (as quoted by Mr. Wilberforce and Bishop Beveridge) and the Prayer Book proved the reality of Human Nature, we remarked: "this Human Nature being the common property of all mankind, (the whole undivided substance being possessed by each member of the human race,) it follows that there is a community of Nature among mankind."

To this doctrine "O" is much opposed, and denies its truth. We shall, therefore, prove it.

(1.) Art. IV. is as follows:

"Christ did truly rise again from death, and took again his body, with flesh, bones, and all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature, wherewith he ascended into Heaven, and there sitteth, until He return to judge all men at the last day."

In this article of the Church we have a broad line of distinction drawn between "Man's Nature," and the things which "appertain to its perfection." We have, therein, established two great facts, viz: that Human Nature is a Reality; and that *body, flesh, bones, &c., are not that Nature, but only "appertain to its perfection."

(2.) The next points to be considered are, where Christ got this Nature, and what it is?

Art. II. says: "The Son, which is the Word of the Father—of one substance with the Father, took Man's Nature in the Womb of the blessed Virgin, of her substance, so that two whole and perfect Natures, that is the Godhead and the Manhood, were joined together in one person."

In this Article, therefore, we have the fact established, that Christ obtained His Human Nature from the substance of the blessed Virgin. What is meant by the substance of the blessed Virgin? It means either her body, flesh, bones, &c., or her Human Nature. Now we have already proved that body, flesh, bones, &c., are not this Human Nature, therefore they were not the substance from which Christ derived His Nature. It follows, then, that Christ derived His Human Nature from the Virgin's Human Nature. But Christ derived His Human Nature from the Virgin's substance; it follows, then, that her Human Nature was a substance, and therefore Christ's Nature was a substance. But, Christ's Nature was man's Nature; consequently, man's nature is a substance.

(3.) Having proved that Human Nature is a Reality and a Substance, we proceed to show that it is "whole and undivided," and the common property of all mankind.

When Christ obtained His human Nature from the blessed Virgin, it was "a perfect Nature;" so that here were two persons, each with a perfect Nature; and yet that Nature was not "divided," but each one possessed the "whole" Nature; because, if either had possessed less than the whole, it would not in either have been "a perfect Nature." From whom, then, did the Virgin obtain her Nature? Certainly, from her Parents. And, in taking that Nature from them, their own Nature was left "whole and undivided."

Thus might we proceed back from one generation to another, until we reach the common Father of our Race, from whom this Nature was transmitted to his descendants, a Nature which is the common property of all mankind—the whole, undivided substance being possessed by each member of the human race.

Having proved the truth of this doctrine to which "O" is so much opposed, we shall only add a word or two more in connection with it. This Nature Christ took and, by His indwelling, regenerated; and, whosoever is baptized into Him becomes one with Him, and is made a partaker of this regenerated Nature. And in this consists our regeneration. It is a putting off of the old Nature (the "old man") which we derived from Adam, and a putting on of the regenerated Nature (the "new man") which we receive in Christ; for "as many as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ."

Having thus, as we trust, shown, in this and our previous article, that the doctrine of this valuable work of Mr. Wilberforce rests upon the certain foundation of Scripture and the teachings of the Church, we take our leave of the subject. The truth being once ascertained, all objections to it fall to the ground, and all fears of its dangerous tendency are shown to be unfounded.

A LINE FOR "LEO."

MR. EDITOR:

I see nothing in "Leo's" last article to change my purpose of going no farther into the discussion of the word "consubstantial,"—or indeed any thing requiring notice,—except that he again omits my repeated reference to the clause in the Athanasian Creed, "not dividing the substance," which proposition cripples all his authorities. The theory he cites, of a "Circumcision," did "divide the substance" of the Godhead, in idea, and then, in idea, reunited or rather recombined it. And, as our ideas of the substance of God, subject to no corrective from observation, are to us doctrine, I am compelled to say, that Leo's authorities in effect "divided the substance," though they subjoined an interfusion or interior involution to remedy the "division." The simple assertion of the Creed has more congruity and more weight than any compensatory cross-propositions whatever. Sabellius could not breathe my atmosphere.

Bishop Obediah O.

* Should this be denied, it is only necessary to substitute the words "body, flesh, and bones, &c.," for the words "Man's Nature" in the article, to be convinced of its truth. And farther, after death, though worms destroy this body, yet our Nature, if regenerated, will live with Christ; if unregenerate, with lost spirits.

MAN'S LOGIC vs. GOD'S WORD.

There are many such cases tried before the tribunal of private judgment. A writer, signing himself "Peter Dour," has for some time been reviewing Bishop Ives' Pastoral Letter in the Richmond Christian Advocate, for the edification of his Methodist Brethren. He must have a good deal to say as he has now reached his 23d Letter. Fortunately we are under no compulsion to read these productions. A glance at the latest has shown us how hard our opponents are pushed to find arguments against the Apostolic Succession, as held by the Church. We have thought that one or two small specimens might serve to show the weakness of the human reasoning, which feebly attempts to overthrow a doctrine resting upon the strong "foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief Corner stone."

In the course of his argument this Reviewer favors us with the following:

"I do not say that Christ might not have appointed Timothy, Titus, Epaphroditus, and the angels of the seven Churches to have been Apostles; but if He had done so, they could have acted independently of any other Apostles, by virtue of the Apostleship being given them by Christ. But when the Apostles themselves transmit office (suppose the Apostolic) to any person whatever, that person could not possibly exercise, that official power independently of the Apostles. The reason is, the source of power must be superior to derived power amenable to itself as the higher power. This argues an inferiority in the derived power, and consequently, that Apostolic power could not be transmitted by the Apostles."

The foundation of this argument rests on the assumption that Timothy, Titus, &c., during the life time of the Apostles, "did not possess Apostolic power." We need only quote one verse to show whether this assumption is sustained by the Word of God or not. In the 5th verse of his first chapter of the Epistles to Titus, St. Paul says, "For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldst set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee."

And what force there is in that logic by which he arrives at the conclusion suitable to his premise, "that Apostolic power could not be transmitted by the Apostles!" Listen, gentle reader, to the profundity of the reason—"The reason is the source of power must be superior to derived power, &c." Who dares to maintain that the Apostles are "the source of power" in the Church of Christ? He is "the source" who is "the Head of all principality and power." Who says, "all power is given to Me." Our Reviewer goes on to say:

"This view derives some (I might say strong) confirmation from the case of the original appointments made by Christ. None of the Apostles could exercise their Apostolic authority independently of Christ; they were held fully responsible to him for the proper exercise of their power, and could not act under the authority of their Apostleship but in deep submission to him. This shows most clearly, that whatever power Christ invested his Apostles with, it was not the same that he had received from the Father; and consequently, the power conveyed by Christ to his Apostles, was of an inferior grade to that power which he himself possessed. The same holds good with regard to the power which it is supposed the Apostles transmitted to "Timothy, Titus," &c.—

His argument here rests upon the notion which seems very strongly impressed upon his own mind, that power is constantly diminishing by transmission! What a very small point it must have attained in this 19th century of its transmission through so many generations! It would be very easy to apply to this argument the reductio ad absurdum. This view would certainly account for the very small estimate which so generally obtains with respect to Ministerial power. If it has been tapering off from Apostolic times down to the present, we cannot wonder that it so nearly approaches nonentity. The reasoning here will be found as much opposed by Holy Scripture, as it is by common sense. The writer says, "This shows most clearly that whatever power Christ invested His Apostles with, it was not the same He had received from the Father, &c." What shows this, the deponent saith not. But the Word of God, if its language has any force, shows differently, as the Church Catholic has ever interpreted its sacred teachings. In the very act of His solemn commission to His Apostles, our blessed Lord is thus declared by Saint John, (chap. xx. 21,) to have spoken, "Then said Jesus to them again, Peace be unto you: as my Father hath sent Me, even so send I you."

From such a profound beginning, we could not have expected any thing more sagacious than the following conclusion.

"Every case shows subordination in the appointee to the appointer; consequently, inferiority in official power. Nor do we find it otherwise either as to the claim of power, or its exercise; either before the death of the appointer, or afterwards,—

"Timothy, Titus, and Epaphroditus" on the one hand, and the "angels of the seven Churches on the other, appear before us in the same light after the death of these Apostles, that they did before their demise; but before their death, these men were subordinate to the Apostles in all things; consequently, they continued so until their own death; therefore, they were not equal in power to those Apostles before and after the death of the Apostles; they consequently lived and died as a lower order of ministers in the Church of God, than were the Apostles.

"The Succession, therefore, of Apostolic power, has not descended to any of the branches of the Church of Christ, through the channels of "Timothy, Titus, Epaphroditus, and the angels of the seven Churches. These not having received the Apostleship themselves, could not by ordination transmit it to others; so that the very first link in this chain of Apostolic succession, is wanting; there is, therefore, no method left in this line to hook on Bishops to the Apostolic car."

The simile, borrowed from the rail-road, with which this concludes, is very striking to those who would thus compare the Apostolic office. But it will not impose on those who have discernment enough to discover the difference between an Apostle and a "Locomotive!" The train we go by, is not, we rejoice to say, so easily thrown off the track.

We find the following in the last CALENDAR :—

THE APOSTACY.

"In commenting upon the recent apostacy in New York, the Banner of the Cross uses the following language:

"What drove the Rector of St. Luke's from his parish? Was it not that in attempting to force upon his people a system of doctrine and practice, opposed to the teachings and usages of the Church, he had almost emptied his church, and broken down his parish?"

"Now these remarks are certainly strange. How long had Dr. Forbes been pressing these things upon the Church? And when was it that his Church became so empty, and his parish broken down? When he attempted to resign in the spring, we heard nothing of all this, although it was just as notorious then as it has been at any period since. On the contrary, the circumstances under which that resignation was declined, were thrown in our faces in certain quarters as giving almost the lie direct to our statement. The editor of the Banner knew nothing of all this then. We honestly believe he did not. We accuse him of no wilful concealment of the truth, but we think it is abundantly evident, that until very lately he has been going on in the dark. Perhaps he may remember how he laughed at our calling the passing scenes of the last six months a tragedy. We trust he is now fairly awake, and will continue so, to the edification of his readers, and the advantage of himself. Meantime, we call attention to the extract given above."

Upon the above we feel bound to make a few friendly remarks, to show that we are "fairly awake," and "to the edification of (our) readers."

In the first place, we would have thought it more just had a little more of our article been given—at least enough to show the proper connection of the extract. How long it took Dr. Forbes to empty his Church we know not. Neither do we know aught of the beginning or continuance of the process. We only know the result just brought to light. To know the exact condition of the various parishes, even within a hundred miles, we would be obliged to add largely to our editorial department. It would require an assistant editor to do the traveling after information, as well as a large number of reporters to collect the gossip afloat in and about the various parishes. A single editor, unaided in any department of his paper, with the care of a parish besides, must be more than "fairly awake" to see all this of himself.

We were entirely ignorant of the condition of things in St. Luke's parish, altogether uninformed of its rector's and assistant minister's views and practices. But if the Calendar knew all this, why did it not come out and "tell it to the Church?" Not a word did it whisper about St. Luke's in its earlier articles. And from no other quarter did we have the slightest intimation as to the real state of the case.

And does the editor of the Calendar think, even now, that a tragedy has been enacted which demands our tears? For our part, instead of making tragic heroes of those who turn such ecclesiastical somersets, we think they belong to quite an opposite class of characters. In the tragic result the Church has no share. The sorrow, which their own acts have brought upon themselves, falls upon the individuals who have thus cut themselves off from her sympathy. Greater afflictions than these must befall the Church to make out a tragedy.

One word more. As we have borrowed an illustration from the stage, suppose we take a lesson from one of its best practices. After the enactment of "a tragedy," it is usual, at least it was the custom for all the actors in it, to join hands and form a friendly group, to show that their animosities were only temporary. And, as the curtain fell, the spectators beheld those who had been engaged in fierce and angry strife united as a band of brothers. Even so, brother Calendar, let also our "tragedy" end. Thus will we, in this blessed Advent season, prepare our hearts for happier scenes, in which a glad earth renews its joy in remembrance of a Saviour's birth, and joins with the "multitude of the heavenly host, praising God, and saying, glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill toward men."

PRAYERS FOR RULERS.

It is one of the peculiar advantages of our noble Liturgy, that in its brief but comprehensive particularity, it specifies all the chief objects of our intercessory prayers. While it leaves out nothing, it gives to every thing its proper place. Especially in every public service, a voice of supplication rises for our civil rulers; asking in their behalf, the guidance of Infinite wisdom, the protection of Almighty power. We had designed saying something more at this appropriate time, in reference to the use of the Prayer for Congress; but all that should be said on this point, is said so well in the following editorial from "The Episcopal Recorder," that we prefer quoting it.

PRAYER FOR CONGRESS.

"I exhort," said the Apostle of the Gentiles, "that first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving thanks be made for all men, for kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour."

The roll of seasons has brought us to the time when the Representatives of the people assemble in their legislative character to make laws for their government and well-being. It was a conservative principle in Christianity that it did not interfere with the modes of government. It laid down no certain form of administration, but avowed in unqualified terms the source of civil authority. "The powers that be, are ordained of God." "There is no power but of God." "Rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil." To save society from becoming a prey to disorder and confusion, which would issue in the dissolution, if not in the destruction of the race, God has made government an essential element in man's welfare, but he has left the form and mode to human discretion and the course of events. The responsibility of those who are entrusted with the management of a nation's affairs is no light burden. Peace and war, life and death, freedom and oppression, prosperity in commerce or stagnation of trade, are in a large degree placed under their power; the happiness of millions now living, and millions yet unborn.

How much do such men need the fervent prayers of all who have power with God.—When the vessel of State is rocked by internal commotion, how difficult for erring, short sighted men, to take the helm and guide it over the turbulent waters of clashing interests, conflicting opinions, and party strife. The assembling of Congress, calls into requisition the prayer provided for the occasion. The Church has not left it to the taste, political bias, or personal feelings of her ministers, but has made it obligatory upon them during the continuance of the session, whether long or short, to use that admirable form, which is embodied in our liturgy. There is no room for fulsome praise of men or measures, no opportunity for the utterance of censures upon the administration in power, no chance to gratify any of those unhallowed feelings which might fain intrude themselves into the holy place. Thankful then for the good land in which we dwell, the numberless blessings we enjoy, the admirable form of government we possess, let us devoutly, earnestly, and in the exercise of true faith, use the prayer for Congress.

A DEVOTED ASSISTANT.

The Freeman's Journal states that the Rev. Thomas S. Preston, late the Assistant Minister of St. Luke's Church, has followed his Rector into the Church of Rome. This is but another illustration of the truth of that Divine declaration, if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch.

We take the following from the Gospel Messenger.

MEETING OF THE HOUSE OF BISHOPS.

The following we understand to be the facts in regard to the proposed meeting of the House of Bishops:

The Convention of Pennsylvania have passed a resolution, expressive of a desire that the suspension should be removed from Bishop H. U. Onderdonk.*

The Convention of the Diocese of New York, have passed resolutions, referring the case of Bishop B. T. Onderdonk to the consideration of the House of Bishops, with a view to the relief of the Diocese.*

The Standing Committee of the Diocese of New York, under the direction of the Convention of that Diocese, have requested of the Bishops individually, an early meeting of the House of Bishops.

The Bishops of Maryland, South Carolina, Western New York, Michigan and Wisconsin, have addressed, individually, a letter to the Presiding Bishop, requesting him to call a meeting of the House of Bishops in February, to settle these two cases. The presiding Bishop, Rt. Rev. P. Chase of Ill., has issued a call for a meeting of the House of Bishops, at Cincinnati, Ohio, on the day before the meeting of the next General Convention in October.

NEW DIOCESE.

From the report, in our Church Intelligence, it will be seen that a new Diocese has been organized in the state of Texas. We gladly welcome this new and distant Diocese to our number, and trust the Church therein may largely share the progress and prosperity which have attended this State, since its union with our confederacy.

In copying the following just commendation of this most useful work, we may add that "the Church," the excellent Paper of the Colonial Church in Canada, has been republishing Mr. Odenheimer's Book, by chapters, in its columns.

ORIGIN AND COMPILATION OF THE PRAYER BOOK.

This little work from the pen of the Rev. Mr. Odenheimer of Philadelphia, has already been noticed in our columns. Regarding it as a most valuable and useful manual, which should be in the hands of every Churchman, we wish again to call attention to it. The contents of the first chapter are, I. The Churchman's estimation of the Prayer Book. II. Reasons for a diligent and systematic study of it. III. Testimonies to its surpassing value.

In the second chapter, which embraces the main part of the work, the author proceeds to show what is properly comprehended under the term "the Book of Common Prayer;" and 1st, that it did not originate with the Church in the United States; nor, 2dly, in England, at the time of the English Reformation. Under this head, the author shows at length the origin of the English Church, and proves his assertions by historical quotations and references. On this point much ignorance prevails. It has been asserted times without number that the English Church originated with Henry VIII., although such an assertion is directly contrary to the plain statements of history. This subject is very ably and satisfactorily treated in the little work before us. Under the third division, in the second chapter, it is stated that the Liturgy of the ancient British Church, was substantially the same as that of the Church in Gaul, and differed from the Roman Liturgy in many important particulars. The Gallican Liturgy originated in Asia Minor. And the Asian Church professed to have been taught the substance of her Liturgy by the Apostle John, who was Bishop of Ephesus, and died in that city. From this source is derived the main part of what is now known as the Book of Common Prayer.

This book, though printed in 1844, furnishes a complete answer to the mis-statements of Macaulay in 1849, with regard to the origin of the English Church and Liturgy. The appendix contains an amount of curious and valuable information. In short there are few works of the size and price, (a small 32mo, of 190 pages, at 38 cents,) of equal interest to Churchmen.—We repeat what we have said upon former occasions, it should be in the possession of every church family.

CHURCH PERIODICAL FOR SALE.

By a reference to our advertisements it will be seen that a work of this kind is for sale. It offers, we are assured, a good opportunity for those who are desirous of engaging in such business.

ST. MARK'S CHURCH.

The daily service in this Church is suspended until next week, on account of some necessary alterations in the furnaces. It will then be continued at the hours specified in the notice on our last page.

INAUGURATION OF MR. KING.

The following account is abridged from a notice in the N. Y. Churchman.

The inauguration of Charles King, Esq., as President of Columbia College, took place on Thursday evening last, in the College Hall. General Laight, chairman of the Board of Trustees, presided on the occasion. The exercises were opened with appropriate prayers by the Rev. Dr. Haight, one of the clerical members of the Board. The chairman, then, in happy terms, presented to the Trustees, the Faculty, and the Students, the President elect. Whereupon, the Senior Professor, the Rev. Dr. M'Vickar, in the name of his associates, in a feeling and eloquent manner, welcomed him to the College; pledging to him the cordial and earnest support of the Faculty, and unfolding with great beauty and power, what, in his view, were the true principles on which the College should be carried forward. The President then delivered his Inaugural address; in which he responded to the kind expressions of Rev. Dr. M'Vickar; and in the happiest manner presented to the Students his view of their mutual relations, and an outline of the course he proposed to pursue, as head of the College. The President then proceeded to give a sketch of the history of the Institution, with the view of showing its strong claims to the confidence and patronage of our citizens.

New Publications.

WOMEN OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS.

A Series of Portraits, with characteristic descriptions, by several American Clergymen; edited by William B. Sprague, D. D. Eighteen original designs, engraved expressly for this work. New York, D. Appleton & Co., 200 Broadway. Philadelphia, George S. Appleton, 164 Chestnut St. 1850.

This work is similar, in its general character, to the one entitled "Women of the Bible," published last year. There is, however, in the manner in which the various departments are executed, an improvement corresponding with the progress of art in this country. And those who remember the beautiful book of last year, must agree that this is saying much for the present work. We like the book all the more, because it has none of the flimsy finery about it with which our showy Annuals are bedecked. With all its richness and beauty, there is a substantial character about it, which declares that it was intended for use, as well as for show. It is adorned like the holy women of old, not only with outward grace, but with that inward worth which is of less perishable nature. We have read enough of the "descriptions" to perceive that their great aim is to instruct, and to hold up, in an interesting and striking point of view, the virtues and vices of female character recorded in the Holy Scripture for our admonition. We have read with great interest, the first descriptive sketch, by the Rev. Dr. Kip, of "the Virgin Mary." After presenting the true view in which the Church teaches us to regard her who was "Blessed among women," he sketches briefly the gradual development of this just regard for her high and holy character, until it expanded into idolatry. The author's visit to Italy enables him to give this subject peculiar interest. As we cannot speak particularly of all the descriptions, we select this, as it stands first in the book, not doubting that others are equally worthy of notice. This our readers will perceive, when we mention the names of the writers who have contributed. Rt. Rev. Drs. Henshaw and Hopkins; the Rev. Drs. Kip, Erskine Mason, W. B. Sprague, E. Halley, N. S. S. Beman, J. Todd, Thomas Smyth, S. H. Cox, N. Murray, and the Rev. Messrs. C. Wadsworth, E. N. Kirk, A. A. Wood, J. F. Stearns, R. A. Hallam, and R. S. Storrs, Jr.

The subjects are, the Virgin Mary, Sarah, Elizabeth, Miriam, Anna the Prophetess, Rahab, Herodias, the Levite's wife, Woman of Samaria, Zipporah, the Canaanitish Woman, the Witch of Endor, Daughter of Jairus, Widow of Nain, Michal, Martha, Mary Magdalene, Bathsheba.

The engravings are from drawings by G. Stahl, and they are, for the most part, beautiful and appropriate designs, and finely executed. We cannot judge of their claims as "Portraits," but we can speak with confidence of their merits as most admirable pictures. The binding is by J. T. Altemus, and is an excellent specimen of the art. Altogether, this forms a rich and appropriate gift for the holidays, one which may be treasured as a memorial in after years, and one which we think fulfils the hope expressed by the publishers in the preface, that it "may prove a welcome offering, as well to the cause of taste and literature, as to that of virtue and piety."

The same publishers have just brought out the following works:

THE FOUR GOSPELS; arranged AS A PRACTICAL FAMILY COMMENTARY, for every day in the year. By the Author of "Peep of Day," &c. Edited, with an introductory preface, by Stephen H. Tyng, D.D. Illustrated with twelve highly finished steel engravings.

This is a well-printed volume, substantially bound in cloth, with plain edges. The pictures in it are of a pleasing character. We must object to the manner in which persons may be misled, as to the real author of the book. On the back is the following title: "Family Commentary on the Four Gospels—Dr. Tyng." Whereas the Commentary is by "The Author of Peep of Day." The labor of supervising the republication, and writing an essay of five pages, hardly entitles this appropriation of another's work. We see in some of our papers, the book is reviewed as a work of Dr. Tyng's.

As to the work itself, the plan is excellent, though we cannot agree with the views of the commentator. We wish he had taken a stronger light than "the peep of day," wherein to view some of the great truths of the Gospel. Our readers will understand us when we instance the following brief commentary on St. John vi. 53, 54, &c. "Believing in Him is compared to eating and drinking!" "It was not till long after Jesus had spoken these words, that He ordained the Holy Communion of bread and wine, saying Do this in remembrance of me." He did not speak of that Communion, when he said, "Except ye eat, &c. No; he spoke of faith in his death."

GRAY'S ELEGY, with thirty-three illustrations.

All acquainted with this noble composition will own that it affords fine scope for the pencil of the artist. And we think he has done justice to his subject. His efforts help to give distinctness to the life-like pictures of the poet. Every admirer of Gray's Elegy, and who is not? should obtain a copy of this work.

HOLIDAY BOOKS FOR CHILDREN. By the same publishers.

HOLIDAY HOUSE; a series of Tales, by Catherine Sinclair. A most beautiful book, and equally interesting, as the name of its Authoress will attest.

FANNY AND HER MAMMA: or Easy Reading Lessons, with hints for Nursery Discipline.

LITTLE DORA; or the Four Seasons. A tale for little children, by a Lady of Charleston. A simple and interesting story, impressing proper lessons of duty, and very pleasingly illustrated.

"CITY CRIES," "CITY CRIES," a grand book to help along the noise of the nursery, and therefore likely to be a prime favorite.

ANNUAL EPIPHANY COLLECTION FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS.

FESTIVAL OF THE EPIPHANY: SUNDAY, JANUARY 6TH, 1850.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

The Committee for Foreign Missions respectfully make their third annual application to the Church, for contributions to their Treasury, on the Festival of the Epiphany, Sunday, January 6th, 1850, or on some other Sunday during the season of the Epiphany.

The requests made on former similar occasions have been responded to extensively and liberally; the plan of an annual collection at this season has received the cordial sanction of the Board of Missions; it has brought to the minds of many this important department of Missionary exertion; and has prompted numbers who might otherwise have overlooked it, to render to this portion of the field a measure of their contributions.

In the conduct of their affairs the Committee have every regard to economy, consistent with a proper attention to the multiplied and increasing details peculiar to the office of the Foreign Department; they have likewise dispensed with special agencies; and now rely for their support upon the practical recognition of the acknowledged principle, that "every parish minister is a Missionary Agent for his own immediate sphere."

The Committee are greatly encouraged by the blessings of the past, and by the prospect before them. Through the Divine goodness they have extinguished a heavy debt; their receipts have been steadily advancing in amount; they have been enabled to strengthen their Missions; and the reports from these invite to still greater extension.

The Committee feel it to be their duty to add to the number of their laborers. For the support of these, as well as for the maintenance of those already engaged in the Missionary field, very heavy obligations are now pressing, to meet which prompt and liberal supplies are needed.

The Committee affectionately solicit from the parishes of the Church, small as well as large, weak as well as strong, contributions for a work upon which the Lord of the harvest has already so distinctly vouchsafed his blessing.

For the FOREIGN COMMITTEE,

P. P. IRVING, Secretary.

CHURCH MISSIONS: FOREIGN OFFICE, No. 2 Park Place,

WESTERN NEW YORK.

CONFIRMATION.—On Saturday afternoon, Dec. 1st, Bishop De Lancey officiated at Newark, Wayne Co., at the desire of the Episcopalians of that village. The services were held in the Methodist chapel, and the Bishop preached and confirmed two persons residing in Newark, but connected with Grace Church, Lyons.

On Advent Sunday, Dec. 2d, the Bishop visited Grace Church, Lyons. The Bishop preached and administered the Holy Communion.

In the afternoon the Rector read prayers and the Bishop preached and confirmed thirteen persons, making in all fifteen for the parish.—Before the morning service the Bishop visited the Sunday school, and briefly addressed the scholars. Of the persons confirmed, ten had been baptized as adults since the convention in August, and the same number belongs to the band of Churchmen at Newark, where the Rev. Mr. Wardwell has occasionally officiated, and who within the year has baptized twenty-six adults and twenty-five children connected with his parish.—Gospel Messenger.

Feast of St. Andrew.—Friday, 30th. P. M., in the Church of St. John the Baptist, New York he preached, confirmed 15, and addressed the candidates.

Saturday, December 1, a. m., the bishop consecrated All Angel's Church, New York. The instrument of donation was presented by A. V. Williams, M. D., and read by the Rev. Cornelius R. Duffie, Rector of St. John Baptist's Church; the sentence of consecration was read by the Rev. Benjamin I. Haight, D. D., Professor of Pastoral Theology in the General Theological Seminary; Morning Prayer was commenced by the Rev. Professor Haight; the Lessons were read by the Rev. Mr. Duffie, the Prayers were said by the Rev. William Berrian, D. D., Rector of Trinity Church, and President of the Standing Committee; the Communion Service was said by the Bishop, assisted by the Rev. Drs. Berrian and Haight. The sermon was preached by the Bishop.

All Angel's Church is built in a small hamlet in the centre of the Island, about three miles beyond the densely populated parts of the city. It is a small plank church, designed by Upjohn, and every way worthy of this distinguished architect. From its propriety, simplicity, and small cost, it may well serve as a model for churches of this class. The ground was given by four sisters, and the sum necessary for the erection of the building, was raised through the zealous and persevering efforts of the Rev. T. M. C. Peters, Deacon, assistant minister of St. Mary's, who has officiated in the hamlet for some time past, and taken a lively interest in the welfare of its inhabitants, a large portion of whom are poor people of color. The first effort in their behalf was made under the auspices of the Rev. William Richmond, Rector of St. Michael's, by whom a Sunday School was established, under the care of a student of the General Theological Seminary. A more pleasing instance of successful benevolent enterprise it would not be easy to name.

Advent Sunday, 2d. A. M. In the Church of the Ascension, New York, the Bishop preached and confirmed 43 persons, and addressed the candidates.

Evening, in St. George's Church, Stuyvesant Square, New York, he preached and confirmed 50, and addressed the candidates.

CONSECRATION.—On Tuesday morning, December 4, the Bishop consecrated St. George's Church, Stuyvesant Square, in the city of New York. The instrument of donation was read by the Rev. Dr. Balch, and the sentence of consecration by the Rev. Dr. Wainwright. Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Mr. Bedell, and the Lessons were read by the Rev. Dr. Haight. The Ante Communion service was said by the Bishop, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Berrian, who read the Epistle, and the Rev. Dr. Hawks, who read the Gospel. The sermon was preached by the Rector, the Rev. Dr. Tyng, from the Song of Solomon, c. vi. v. 9,—“My dove, my undefiled is but one.” In the course of this discourse, which was delivered with the preacher's accustomed eloquence and energy, he very emphatically set forth the claims of the Protestant Episcopal Church upon the love and obedience of her members as a true branch of Christ's visible Church on earth.—At the close he stated in a brief and happy manner the circumstances connected with the building of the spacious and splendid edifice, whose consecration that day witnessed, and paid an affectionate and well merited tribute to the memory of his venerable predecessor. It was very gratifying to us to hear that the new church is entirely free from incumbrances of every description, and entirely owned by those who had requested its consecration. The income is about $9,000 per annum, which is amply sufficient for all its expenses; and while the paying part of the congregation is as large as that of any other congregation in the city, there is also abundant room for those, who from want of means or other circumstances, do not rent seats. The concluding prayer and the benediction were pronounced by the Bishop.

About 50 of the clergy were present, all of whom were amply accommodated in the spacious chancel. Among them we observed the Rev. Drs. Cutler, S. R. Johnson, Lewes, Turner, and F. Vinton, Rev. Messrs. L. Carter, Parks, Irving, Pardee, R.

Cox, Eigenbrodt, Pound, Diller, Clapp, Jones, T. Cook, Duffie, B. C. C. Parker, Bruce, Walker, Weston, Chipman of W. N. Y., and Moore of N. J.

The congregation though large was not as numerous as we expected; partly owing to the wet state of the streets, and still more to the erroneous notice in some of the city papers that the consecration was to take place in the evening! an unheard of anomaly in this diocese.

After the conclusion of the religious services the Bishop with the clergy and other guests returned to the Chapel, a large edifice on 16th street, in one of the rooms of which a handsome collation was provided, and the utmost attention shown by the members of the Vestry and others of the congregation in supplying the corporeal wants of their numerous visitors. We beg leave to express our thanks for the kindness we experienced, and our cordial wishes for the spiritual and temporal prosperity of this spirited and important parish.

NEW JERSEY.

“The House of Prayer,” Newark.—A new parish has recently been organized in the city of Newark, under the title of “The House of Prayer,” and the Rev. Samuel L. Southard recently Rector of Calvary Church, New York, has been invited to become Pastor thereof. The corner stone of a new edifice to be erected on Broad street, was laid on Wednesday 28th ult., by the Bishop of the Diocese, in the presence of a large number of the clergy and laity, morning service having been previously read in the building which has been purchased for a rectory. The rector of the parish said prayers, and the Rev. Mr. Rankin, of St. Peter's, Morristown, read the lessons.

The address of the Bishop on this occasion was exceedingly beautiful and touching.

We congratulate our fellow Churchmen of Newark upon the rapid growth of the Church in that flourishing city, and more especially the parish newly formed; for we learn that the whole amount for the purchase of the land, and a substantial stone house for a rectory, as well as the required sum for the edifice has been subscribed. There is yet, however, something needed for the interior arrangements which remains to be made up; the Rector having properly reserved the privilege of giving the faithful an opportunity of making pious offerings to the Lord by placing such memorials in his holy temple, as their feelings may dictate. We doubt not there are some among his friends in the city who will be glad of an opportunity of putting in a memorial window, or giving a font or Altar Service, or something of the kind. “The House of Prayer” when completed, is to be opened morning and evening for the daily service forever, and it is trusted that its doors may never be locked, but at all times, as well as “The Hours,” it may be open so that the faithful pilgrim can enter in, and in private commune with God before His Altar. Then will it indeed be what its name imports, “THE HOUSE OF PRAYER” for all people” H.

We trust that the shame and reproach of having such accounts as the following go forth to the world, will tend remove this disgrace to a Christian land. It is strange that England should be so slow to follow where her older civilization should have led the way, the more humane practice of this country.

The two wretched beings, Manning and his wife, who have for some weeks monopolized a large share of the newspaper press, and, consequently, of the attention of newspaper readers, were publicly put to death on Tuesday morning. We shall not occupy any of our readers' time, nor pain their feelings by the details of this execrable affair. Suffice it to say that, as might have been expected, the wife made no confession, and showed no penitence even at the very close of her life. The husband exhibited a few better signs, though, compared with anything like a Christian standard, the last days of his life have left an unsatisfactory and very doubtful impression. He persisted that his wife had first conceived and carried out the plans for the murder; that she shot their victim, while her husband was upstairs; but he admitted that he struck him in his dying moments, and that he committed forgery in order to realize the property of the murdered man, the proceeds of which, however, he handed over to his Jezebel-like wife.

The following letter may do something to bring about what we some years since strongly urged—not the abolition of capital punishment for murder, but the abolition of public executions:

(To the Editor of the Times.)

Sir,—I was a witness of the execution at Horse-monger-lane this morning. I went there with the intention of observing the crowd gathered to behold it, and I had excellent opportunities of doing so, at intervals all through the night, and continuously from daybreak until after the spectacle was over.

I do not address you on the subject with any intention of discussing the abstract question of capital punishment, or any of the arguments of its opponents or advocates. I simply wish to turn this dreadful experience to some account for the general good, by taking the readiest and most public means of advertising to an intimation given by Sir G. Grey in the last session of Parliament, that the Government might be induced to give its support to a measure making the infliction of capital punishment a private solemnity within the prison walls (with such guarantees for the last sentence of the law being inexorably and surely administered as should be satisfactory to the public at large,) and most earnestly beseeching Sir G. Grey, as a solemn duty which he owes to society, and a responsibility which he cannot forever put away, to originate such a legislative change himself.

I believe that a sight so inconceivably awful as the wickedness and levity of the immense crowd collected at that execution this morning could be imagined by no man, and could be presented in no heathen land under the sun. The horrors of the gibbet and of the crime which brought the wretched murderers to it, faded in my mind before the atrocious bearing, looks and language, of the assembled spectators. When I came upon the scene at midnight, the shrillness of the cries and howls that were raised from time to time, denoting that they came from a concourse of boys and girls already assembled in the best places, made my blood run cold. As the night went on, screeching, and laughing, and yelling in strong chorus of parodies, melodies, substituting “Mrs. Manning” for “Susannah,” and the like, were added to these. When the day dawned, thieves, low prostitutes, ruffians and vagabonds of every kind, flocked on to the ground; with every variety of offensive and foul behaviour. Fightings, faintings, whistlings, imitations of Punch, brutal jokes, tumultuous demonstrations of indecent delight when swooning women were dragged out of the crowd by the police, with their dress disordered, gave a new zest to the general entertainment. When the sun rose brightly—as it did—it gilded thousands upon thousands of upturned faces, so inexpressibly odious in their brutal mirth or callousness, that a man had cause to feel ashamed of the shape he wore, and to shrink from himself, as fashioned in the image of the Devil. When the two miserable creatures who attracted all this ghastly sight about them, were turned quivering into the air, there was no more emotion, no more pity, no more thought that two immortal souls had gone to judgment, no more restraint in any of the previous obscenities, than if the name of Christ had never been heard in this world, and there were no belief among men but that they perished like the beast.

I have seen, habitually, some of the worst sources of general contamination and corruption in this country, and I think there are not many phases of London life that could surprise me. I am solemnly convinced that nothing that ingenuity could devise to be done in this city, in the same compass of time, could work such ruin as one public execution; and I stand astounded and appalled by the wickedness it exhibits. I do not believe that any community can prosper where such a scene of horror and demoralization as was enacted this morning outside Horse-monger-lane Goal, is presented at the very doors of good citizens, and is passed by, unknown or forgotten. And when, in our prayers and thanksgivings for the season, we are humbly expressing before God our desires to remove the moral evils of the land, I would ask your readers to consider whether it is not a time to think of this one, and to root it out?

I am, Sir, your faithful servant,

CHARLES DICKENS.

THE ETERNAL SONSHIP.

No. II.

“Our Lord inquires [of the man who had been born blind] Dost thou believe in the Son of God? If, indeed, the sole confession of ‘Christ,’ in any way, had been the consummation of faith, He would have said, dost thou believe in Christ? But because this name would be in the mouth of all heretics, so as to confess Christ and yet deny the Son, that which is peculiar to Christ is required as the object of faith, namely, to believe in the Son of God.”—Hilary, de Trinitate, Lib. 7, p. 169. Ed. Bened.

The great work of the Bishop of Poitiers was written against the Arians; consequently he here uses the word Son, in that sense, and in that sense only, which was denied by the Arians. All heretics, he says, confess Christ in some sense; all likewise confess him to be Son in some sense. But since real existences are the objects of Christian faith, and not words and formulæ, such confessions are waste breath, if they do not contemplate the objects of faith in that sense in which they exist. That general purpose of our Lord, which Hilary argues from one case, is made most abundantly manifest in Scripture. The prime object of faith held forth in Scripture is not Christ simply, but ‘Christ the Son of God;’ nor Son in any sense, but “own Son” (αἰὼς ὡς Rom. 8, 32,) one proper to a Father; not one proper to the Father as being first created and then born, such as Christians are, but “only-begotten Son.” Christ is not, therefore, Son of God, only in His Manhood, as many Sabellians teach; for in that sense He is not the only Son, but First Born among many brethren. Consequently, it is in His Divine Nature that He is the genuine only-begotten Son, “God from God, consubstantial to the Father,” who “sent Him forth in the fullness of times, made of a woman, that we might receive the Sonship.” By assuming our nature he did not become another Son of God, but “took our Manhood into His Godhead,” and so gave it fellowship with His Eternal Sonship, as the “first fruits” of that glorious purpose of God whereby “He predestinated us into a Sonship to Himself through Jesus Christ.” The “first fruits” are the same in kind with the harvest; and our Sonship is also a fellowship with the Sonship of the Eternal Son of the Father. Hence, although Christ is the Last Adam, yet is He not in any sense our Father. “His Father is our Father, and His God is our God,” and we are, with Him, “children of God, and joint heirs with Himself of whatever inheritance of glory He hath attained to in His Human Nature. Out of His Fullness have all we received grace for grace.” “For in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and we are made full in Him who is the head...buried and risen with Him in Baptism.” By that birth which he took of the Virgin, he became a partaker of our mortality, assuming along with His likeness to sinful flesh, the curse which lay upon us because of sin. In and with that mortal nature He entered into battle with our enemy and accuser, the Prince of this world, who, through Adam's sin, held us, and this Earthly dominion of ours, in the ‘Captivity of Corruption.’—(Rom. 8, 21.) ‘Touched with our infirmities, and in all points tempted like as we are,’ He wrestled with the principalities and powers of darkness. And that He might wholly undo the curse which pride had brought upon us, and “condemn all sin in the flesh,” He voluntarily yielded himself up to temptation by that awful series of humiliations which ensued upon His making Himself this sin offering, so as to accomplish that will of the Father, “to still the enemy and avenger, by strength ordained out of the babe and suckling man.” “The seed of the woman Eve was to bruise the serpent's head.” Having made this oblation of Himself to work the Father's purpose of Love, the hosts of hell at once assaulted Him. They did their utmost, through scorn, strifes, and mockery, even unto the Crucifixion between thieves. His soul, as well as body, bore this Passion. His soul bore the shame and humiliation; his body, the sharpness of the agonies of the Cross, and of death. But through all these bitter temptations He was yet found “without sin.” “The Prince of this world came, but had nothing in Him to accuse." He was even "perfected through these sufferings," and dying innocent, "He spoiled the principalities and powers of darkness," ransomed us and this earth of ours from his tyranny, by "giving His mortal life" away in the contest; and thus triumphed over our enemies and made an open show of them on His Cross. "Wherefore God highly exalted Him" from this abyss of self-abasement. He raised Him from the dead victorious over Him who had had the power of death, and advanced Him in his manhood to the "joy set before Him," even to that "glory which He had with the Father before the world was." So was Human Nature ransomed and set free in its "first fruits." The "servant's form," taken from the Virgin in order that therein He might redeem us from "the bondage of corruption," was put off in death, and the glorious beauty, befitting the Son of God, put on in His resurrection. So is He set before us as the object of our faith, and the earnest of all our hopes. "Our eyes behold the King in His beauty," in a land which is no longer "afar off;" for we are "translated into His Kingdom" of which we are "joint heirs with Him," the First Born of "many Sons of Glory." We become sons of God, and enter that kingdom, by being made members of His risen, and glorious, and immortal body. We become members of His body, by partaking of that immortal life which He attained to by His Resurrection. We partake of that immortal life by the ministration of the Holy Ghost in the sacrament of Baptism; and being thus cleansed from sin and born into immortal life, we are hallowed, so as to become fit recipients of "the Gift of the Holy Ghost," "by the laying on of Apostle's hands;" by which gift we are made "Temples of God," in which He "makes His abode." Our new birth is after that pattern of excellency in which He was "conceived by the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin." And the birth thus attained, a full, complete, and perfect birth, if we walk after Him as our Exemplar, holding "fellowship with the sufferings." He endured under temptation, and "being made conformable unto His death unto sin," will issue in our Resurrection in His likeness, in "the measure of the stature of His Fullness." He who hath begun the good work in us will perform it until the Day of Jesus Christ. "God is faithful by whom we have been called into fellowship with His Son."

It may now appear how intimately our Sonship, which is the sum of all those "exceeding great and precious promises whereby we are made partakers of the Divine Nature," is connected with the fact of the Eternal Sonship of Christ. Without this fact, that does not exist—cannot be. Without this dogma of the genuine Sonship of Christ, there is no Gospel whatever. All is involved in this one truth; and if this be not believed, as the beginning of all divine knowledge, whatever else men may believe, and think they know, will form no part of the Gospel of Christ. They may call their notions by the names of Gospel dogmas, 'atonement,' 'regeneration,' 'justification,' and the rest; but those notions will not be truths, but fancies, having no basis whatever outside of their own minds. Full of meaning, therefore, was that simple creed propounded by Christ and His Apostles, as the beginning of all knowledge concerning Him, by the root of all faith: "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." That simple confession implied and involved the whole Gospel. And therefore to miss that, is to miss the whole Gospel. It is truly a narrow base to stand upon; but it is the "Corner-stone of Zion, elect, precious; and those who believe in it shall not be confounded." It is also "a stone of stumbling and rock of offence, and who so shall fall upon it shall be broken." "We do testify that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world. Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him and he in God. Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God. He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son hath not life. He is Antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son. Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father; but he that acknowledgeth the Son, the same hath the Father also." Sabellius, Arius, Nestorius, and Eutyches, each had a creed containing the names 'Christ,' and 'Son;' but notwithstanding that, each denied the only Son that is; and consequently the doctrine of each was an annihilation of the dogma of our Sonship, that is, a denial of all the promises of the Gospel. Sabellius believed in a single solitary Divine Unit, manifested to us in a Trinity of relations, or assumed offices; and in a Son in human nature, representing or filling one of those offices. The Personality of the Son was therefore simply human; and consequently, our brotherhood with a human person cannot exalt us to a participation of the Fullness of God. It leaves us in the condition of Jews, with only a nominal Sonship to God, which is no Sonship at all. Arius believed in a Son who was not begotten of the Father's substance, but a creature; and therefore, however exalted as a creature, still infinitely below the glory of the Creator. Brotherhood with such a Son cannot therefore make us "partakers of the Divine Nature." Nestorius believed in two Sons, who had the "aspect" of one Christ, but were not really one person. One Son, he said, was not born of the Virgin, but the other was. This latter, then, was but a human person, and fellowship with his Sonship gives us no more than the Sabellian dogma. It leaves us in the state of Judaism, without real regeneration, because without fellowship with the Sonship of Him who is the only genuine offspring of the Father. Eutyches confessed a Son who is indeed consubstantial with the Father, but not consubstantial with us; because he said His Human Nature, on being taken into the Godhead, was sublimated above our sphere, because υπερβυς, by absorption or transubstantiation into Divinity. This cuts us off from the "one Mediator between God and men, the Man Christ Jesus;" and, therefore, by taking away the doctrine of His true Manhood, it leaves us no basis upon which fellowship with His Divine Sonship may subsist. It is full of promises which it makes, impossible to enjoy. It talks of Christ, but hides Him from our sight. It holds forth hopes only to disappoint. It speaks of our freedom in the Son, but leaves us slaves. Its mouth is overflowing with falsehood. It is Satan robed as an angel of light. It is the harbinger of the full grown Antichrist, with all his "lying wonders."

It is obvious that these several heresies may slide into, and consort with one another; and that those apparently most opposite give a common denial to the One Truth. Sabellianism and Nestorianism are at bottom the same, and present one antagonism to the Christian Sonship. And as Arianism separates us from the Father on the side of Christ's proper Nature, Eutychianism does the same on the side of His assumed Nature. There are also aspects of Sabellianism identical with Eutychianism. In that form in which it was maintained by Paul of Samosata, it taught that the man Christ Jesus had become God on His resurrection, nay, it would seem even homousion with the Father (see Athanasius, de Synod., § 42) which is the doctrine of Eutyches, except that he referred this sublimation of the Manhood to the Incarnation, instead of the Resurrection. And thus, as Sabellianism allowed no medium between the Father and us, in which a Divine Sonship could subsist, so Eutyches, by denying the consubstantiality of the Son with us, equally removed the basis of our brotherhood with Him.

The Truth stands aloof from all these counterfeits of Satan. It hath no community with any of them, as they have with each other. It is supreme and single in its majestic isolation. There is one only doctrine of the Sonship of our Lord, one single view of the Trinity and Incarnation, which consorts with the scriptural doctrines of Christian Sonship. It is that which holds forth to the vision of faith, the genuine Son of the Father. Perfect God and Perfect Man in One Eternal Person, as the "first fruits" of that Hidden Wisdom ordained by the Father before the world, to make us His sons with conformity to His Image in all holiness, to glorify us with the fullness of His own glory, to exalt us far above all angels, and principalities, and powers, to give us dominion over all the works of His hands, not only in this world but in that which is to come (Heb. ii. 5-9); yea, to enthrone us, even as our Forerunner and First Born Brother is now seated with Him in glory. (Rev. iii. 21, and xxi. 7.)

We are obliged to reserve the very interesting conclusion of Leo's article for our next paper. In this he shows with great force of truth, "how wide spread among all communities calling themselves Christians, above named heresies are."

THE PAPACY.

The advantages which the Church of Rome, as an organized body, derives from its centre of unity, the Papacy, have formed the subject of many a treatise long ago read and forgotten, and may, for aught we know to the contrary, form the subject of treatises yet unwritten. Whether these advantages are or are not as great as they have been represented to be, it is not within our province to inquire. At any rate we are not now about to call them in question. But the events of the last two years, and those which are at present passing under our eyes, do undoubtedly suggest the reflection that, whatever may be the benefits which flow from the time-honoured institution that crowns the vast pyramid of the Roman hierarchy, they are not unaccompanied with some minor inconveniences.

"Ubi Petrus," say the doctors of the Church, "ibi ecclesia"—and the Ultramontanist of the nineteenth century writes the dogma upon its phylacteries, and adopts it in its broadest signification. The majesty of the Church attends whithersoever he moves, the person of the successor of the great Apostle. With him she keeps her court in the city of the Cæsars—with him she wanders into exile; when he speaks, her accents are heard in his voice; her tears flow when he weeps; hers are his sufferings, and hers his triumph. The whole congregation of faithful Catholics claim their share in all that pertains to their chief pastor. But have not, we may ask, the life and adventures of Pius IX. been such as to make this solidarité too frequently a source of pain and humiliation? We do not speak now of the brief honeymoon of the new Pontificate, nor of the troublous period that succeeded it—of concessions made, sometimes injudiciously and almost always ungracefully, or of reforms granted to buy an hour's popularity, which proved too often not worth the buying. We do not refer to that memorable day when the Supreme Pontiff of the Church was seen masquerading on the coach-box of a Bavarian baron, in the tags and lace of a liveried footman. But does it redound to the Church's dignity that he should for many successive months be expiating by a dreary banishment the faults and errors of a system of government which had made itself odious to its subjects, and made his subjects terrible to him? Does it conduce to the Church's moral influence, that he should be seen imploring one sovereign after another to chastise his rebellious people, whilst accepting all the while, a needy and dependent guest, the hospitalities of Ferdinand of Naples? He was a greater man than Pius IX. of whom it was said—

"In exillium præceps fugit, atque ibi, magnus Mirandusque cliens, sedet ad prætoris regia,
Donec Bithyno libeat vigilare tyranno."

Is it well, we say, that the eyes of the civilized world should be fastened for months together on an endless negotiation, throughout the whole course of which the Papal Court is seen in an attitude of dogged refusal and passive but obstinate resistance—studying, and studying successfully, how to purchase, by a minimum of concession, the keys of its own capital and the protection of a foreign garrison against its own subjects, from a power which has taken advantage of an interregnum to possess itself of the one, and is not ashamed to proffer the other? We do not quarrel with those who try to gild the picture by celebrating the fugitive Pontiff as a martyr and a saint. Such language is part of the homage which devout Catholics think it proper to pay to their spiritual head. But the plain truth is, that the ninth Pius is not a saint, nor anything like one. General Cavaignac described him the other day as "a most respectable man." We ourselves might be disposed, perhaps, to accord him higher praise than that. But to call him a saint is as much a figure of speech as it would be to call him a Quaker. And as to the trick of blazoning his good-natured countenance with the halo of martyrdom, the same tribute might with equal justice be paid to the Grand Duke of Baden, who fled his country for precisely the same reason, and under the influence of a not less reasonable alarm. These flowers of oratory cannot invest the quarrel between the Pope and his subjects with a dignity that it does not possess. The plain sense of the European public is not deceived by them; and the Church degrades her lofty character and impairs her influence, within as well as without the pale of her spiritual kingdom, by allowing herself to be dragged, as a busy and interested actor, into the petty politics of the Roman States.

But farther. Entangled in the commotions which agitate this little sphere, the Roman Church is fain to enter the arena of political strife, and to grasp one of the banners that wave over that now ensanguined field. The standard she unfurls is the symbol of a fallen cause—the tattered and worn-out flag of Absolutism. With what consistency, indeed, could she tolerate abroad the representative institutions which she refuses at home? Implying the aid of foreign armies to crush every movement of impatience within her own principality, can she recognize elsewhere the inalienable right of every independent people to modify its own political organization at pleasure? It is thus that we have seen the orators and the publicists who are the acknowledged organs of the sentiments of the Roman Catholic body broaching the most extravagant doctrines, and endeavouring to entrench themselves in a position which, as the language they have themselves used on other occasions plainly shows, they well know to be false and untenable. The same men with whom, when Ireland was the theme of their discourse,

"Passive obedience was a jest,
A joke was non-resistance," are now advocating, with all the warmth of sincerity, the right of the Catholic Church to keep a little Ireland for herself in the Italian peninsula. Whether all this is morally right we do not ask; but we may be permitted to suggest that it is certainly far from wise. The most heedless observer may see that the slope of public opinion, throughout the whole civilized world, is towards democracy. Autocracy is dead and buried; the bureaucracies, which in most countries stifled long ago the arbitrary power of the monarch, have themselves fallen into decay. We are entering upon an age of popular self-government, when political activity will and must be largely developed amongst all classes hitherto contentedly excluded from political power. What can be clearer than that the Roman Church mistakes her interests, or forsakes them when she undertakes to preach up Absolutism, and to combat the spread of representative institutions, for the sake of retaining her grasp on the little territory that gives her a stake in the game?

For our own part, indeed, we cannot but suspect that the Papacy will be found more flexible and elastic than either its friends or its foes are at present disposed to admit. In re-echoing the cry of "Il Papa netto,"—"le Pape maître et souverain"—in struggling to keep a nook of Europe to themselves, and to debar a few millions of people from the liberties enjoyed by surrounding nations, the champions of the Roman Church contend for no principle—they do but betray their own distrust of the solidity of the stately fabric they adore. If they are right, then indeed there is little hope for the Papacy—little hope for the hierarchical system of which it is the keystone. Down it must come, sooner or later. It contains within its bosom a perishable element, which the course of events has already doomed to swift decay. Like the feet of Nebuchadnezzar's image, half of iron, and half of clay, it is a composite which will not outlive another generation, and which the next revolutionary shock that shakes the world will shatter into a thousand pieces.—London Morning Chronicle.

AND WHAT THEN?

A story is told of a very good and pious man who was living at one of the Italian universities, when a young man whom he had known as a boy, ran up to him with a face full of delight, and told him that what he had long been wishing above all things in the world, was at length fulfilled—his parents having just given him leave to study the law; thereupon he had come to the law school at his university, on account of its great fame, and meant to spare no pains or labor in getting through his studies as quickly as possible. In this way he ran on a long time; and when at last he came to a stop, the holy man, who had been listening to him with great patience and kindness, said:

"Well, and when you have got through your course of studies, what do you mean to do then?"

"Then I shall take my doctor's degree," answered the young man.

"And then?" inquired Philippo Neri.

"And then," (continued the young man,) "I shall have a number of difficult and knotty cases to manage, shall catch people's notice by my eloquence, my zeal, my acuteness, and gain reputation."

"And then," replied the holy man.

"And then, why then there cannot be a question—I shall be promoted to some high office or other; besides, I shall make money and grow rich."

"And then?" repeated Philippo.

"And then, (pursued the young lawyer)—then I shall live comfortably and honorably in wealth, and shall be able to look forward quietly to a happy old age."

"And then," said the student, "and then I shall die."

Here Philippo lifted up his voice, and again asked:

"AND THEN?"

Whereupon the young man made no answer, but cast down his head and went away. This last "And then?" had pierced like a flash of lightning into his soul, and he could not get rid of it.

Soon after he forsook the study of the law—gave himself up to the ministry of Christ, and spent the remainder of his days in goodly words and works.

The question which Philippo Neri put to the young lawyer, is one which we should frequently put to ourselves. When we have done all that we are doing, all that we dream of doing, even supposing that all our dreams were accomplished, that every wish of our heart is fulfilled, still may we ask—"What will we be then?" Whenever we cast our thoughts forward, never let them stop short on this side the grave: let them not stop short of the grave itself; but when we have followed ourselves thither, and have seen ourselves laid therein, still ask ourselves the searching question—"and then?"

NEW JERSEY.

CONFIRMATION.—On Sunday evening, November 11, (twenty-third after Trinity,) in Trinity Church, Princeton, the Rector, the Rev. Mr. Paterson, read prayers, and the Bishop preached, and confirmed nine persons.

The Rev. J. M. Bartlett has been received, on letters dimissory, from the diocese of Western New York, and is the Rector elect of the Church of the Ascension, Gloucester City; and officiating in Grace Church, Haddonfield.—Missionary.

ADDRESS BY THE BISHOP OF NEW JERSEY,

AT THE LAYING OF THE CORNER STONE OF "THE HOUSE OF PRAYER," AT NEWARK, NOVEMBER 25, 1849.

"Mine house shall be called a house of prayer, for all people." How admirable the impression, which these words convey, of the provident goodness of God! He is in heaven, and men are on the earth. They are needy and dependent. He is the source of every good. He would supply their temporal wants. And He sets up in Heaven, the storehouse of His providence; and sends to earth the golden key of prayer, to open all its wealth. He would exalt their spiritual nature, by the promise of a better hope, that shall outlive all time. And the Cross of Jesus, like that mystic ladder, in the Patriarch's dream, is reared, from earth to heaven; and prayers, the winged messengers, that ascend upon it, with their penitence and praise, and bring again the comforts of His pardon, and the blessings of His grace. He would prepare them, here, for the inheritance, which is reserved for them, hereafter; and sustain them, undismayed by the trials of life, and uncorrupted by its temptations. And He sets up His holy church; lays its foundations deep and strong, that not even the powers of hell shall harm them; opens its gates wide, that the nations of the whole earth may flow into it; and, storing it with His pure word of truth, and opening in it the precious fountains of His comfortable sacraments, and promising to be with its ministering servants, even unto the end of the world, He accepts it, as His house, and declares, that it shall forever be the "house of prayer, for all people." Even "the sons of the stranger, that join themselves in the Lord, to serve Him, and to love the name of the Lord," keeping His Sabbaths from pollution, and taking hold of His covenant, "even them," saith He, "will I bring to My holy mountain, and make them joyful, in My house of prayer; their burnt offerings and their sacrifices shall be accepted upon Mine altar; for Mine house shall be called an house of prayer, for all people."

The Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, always excepted, our holy and merciful religion, reveals no conception so sublime, and offers no provision so affecting, as this divine appointment, of a House of Prayer. We have all had a father's home. And, as most of us have been compelled to wander from it, so most of us have felt that sinking sickness of the heart, which even the bravest and the strongest feel, at the remembrance of their distance from its doors. In hours, like this, who has not breathed, from the deep heart, the Psalmist's sigh; "Oh, that I had wings, like a dove; for then would I flee away, and be at rest!" In hours like this, who has not hailed, with joyous tears, the slightest token, that was hallowed by the memories of home! And who, in hours like this, would not feel all his bosom melted with delight, if, in all his wanderings, there were still one sacred spot, where all the words he spoke, and all the tears he shed, and all the love that swelled his heart, were heard and seen and felt, at home; where he might pour out, on his father's bosom, the doubts or fears, the joys or woes, of his lone spirit; and receive his father's counsel, his father's consolation, and his father's blessing!

As mortals, and as sinners, we are wanderers all, upon the burning wastes, or stormy seas of life. We are, "pilgrims and sojourners, as all our fathers were;" having "no continuing city here," but ever "seeking one to come." God is our common Father. Heaven, though the grave, and, still more, our transgressions, divide us, from it, is the home for which we long. And, though our journey towards it, be laborious, though the voyage of our life be upon stormy seas, and under threatening skies, there is one spot, which the tempests cannot reach, and one place—the house where prayers are made to God—which is the foretaste and the pledge of heaven. Thither, the weary foot may ever tend, and be assured of rest. Thither, the clouded eye may ever turn, and find it radiant with the fairest light of heaven. Thither, the burthened or the broken heart may go; and lay down all its load of sin, and find a healing unction for its hurts. It is their Father's house: and they may make their penitent confessions there, to Him; and he will hear them, and forgive. It is their Father's house: and they may make their humble supplication there; and all their wants shall be supplied. It is their Father's house: and there the children all may go; and find His ear forever open, and receive His wise instructions, His precious comforts, and His heavenly blessing. There is no distinction there, for they are all His children: and whether their worship rise to Him beneath the tropics, or at the pole, they are gathered in one Temple, to His gracious eye; and whether their prayers descend from old Cathedral's "high embowed roof," or from the log chapel of some Indian Missionary, they are, to His ear, offered from one altar. He is a spirit. He fills all places. He reads all hearts. The faithful worshippers, that worship Him, "in spirit and in truth," are heard, and accepted. He meets them, on His holy mountain. He graciously receives the homage of their hearts. He makes them joyful, in His house of prayer. For His house—so great is His goodness, and so provident His love—His house is "the house of prayer, for all people."

Dear, reverend brother, beloved friends, respected fellow citizens, it is in furtherance of this great and glorious work, so gracious for men, so highly favoured of the Lord, that we have been engaged to-day. Encouraged by your presence, and aided by your suffrages, I have now laid, in the name of God, and according to the order of His Church, the foundation of "The House of Prayer." True hearts and willing hands have made it certain, as man's work can be certain, that, what is now begun, will go on, to immediate completion; and the building, to be erected here, devoted to its sacred uses, set forth, forever, by its simple, beautiful, affecting name, the office of a church; and be, through ages yet to come, what God declares His Church to be; "a house of prayer, for all people." A fitter time, to speak of this, will be when all the "beauty of its holiness," shall be accumulated here; and God shall take it for His own. But there are points of present interest, peculiar to this enterprise, which call for notice now.

The erection of "the House of Prayer," is a beautiful illustration of the sound principle, that the true growth of the church is from within, outward. It is so, that men grow, from the embryo, on. It is so that trees grow from the acorn out and up. The God of nature is the God of grace. It was so that the Church grew, from Jerusalem abroad. It is so that the church should ever grow, from living centres, all around. When the church grows from without, it is for convenience, or for interest, or for strife, or for the name of it. Men say it is too far to go to the next church. We must have one here. Or they say, our property would be enhanced in value, if we had a church. Or they say, such and such have places here; why should not we? Or they say, they have built a church at this place, or at that. It is a shame, if we cannot. When the church grows in any of these ways, it only seems to grow. It is an artificial, not a natural, a forced, not a spontaneous growth. You cannot make a child grow so, or a vine. The vine grows, from the outward impulse of the sap, layer upon layer. The child grows, from the outward impulse of the blood, stature upon stature. The true growth of the Church is from the heart, by love; the sap of the spiritual Vine; the blood of the one body, in Jesus Christ. When men, who love the Church, open their hearts, to win in others, to its love; when men who have the Church, open their hands, to bring in others, to its heavenly comforts; then, the Church grows outward, from within; it grows, by love; it grows. It is so here, to-day, thank God!

"The House of Prayer" has been erected, with an admirable exclusion of the selfish and commercial, principle, in Church building. Men have said, "a Church is needed in the North Ward of the city of Newark." A providential opening invites its erection, at this time. We can combine and furnish the ability. We will build it, if God help us. We do it, from no personal consideration. We reserve no claim, for places in it. We look for no individual advantage, from it. When it is built, it will be for them, who will, to occupy it. So it serve men, and glorify God, our object is effected." This is right. The Church is the House of God. He permits men, indeed, to build it. But, it is for Him, not for themselves. How can they sell out, what they devote to Him? How can they own that, on which they set His name? How can we make our Father's house, "a house of merchandise?"

In the erection of "the House of Prayer," an excellent example has been given, of the avoidance of all debt. Before the ground was broken, the means of its erection were insured. As David, though he might not build the Temple of the Lord, had every thing prepared, and in abundance. Men have, or they have not, ability, to build a Church. If they have not, He, who withholds the one, will not require the other. Only to dwell in houses of cedar, and to be clothed in purple and fine linen, and to fare sumptuously every day, may be accounted as ability, by Him; and so revealed to them, when they would give a world, but to retrieve the past. But Churches may be built at various cost. Some can come up to fifteen hundred dollars. Let them build for that. Or fifty thousand; let them build for that. Or fifteen thousand; let them build for that. Only let them build what can be kept. Let them bind no burthens upon them, that shall come after, which they cannot bear. Let them leave no opening, for a writ to enter in. Nor expose the ministry of the Gospel to interruption, from the ministers of the law. No house of prayer should ever be in debt.

The house to be erected here, is to be called "The House of Prayer." If it sustain that name, the morning and the evening service, will be said in it, as long as stone shall stand on stone. It never will be shut against the wayfarer, who seeks a sacred home, for self-communion and communion with His God. It never will exclude, whom God hath not excluded; but will be, in deed and truth, "a house of prayer, for all people."

Churchmen of Newark, this is a day to thank God for. Three years have not yet past, since, at the laying of the corner stone of Grace Church, one was bold to say: "The work we do, this day, is but the earnest and the pledge of more. From the two altars of our holy faith, a third shall spring, more readily, by far, than, from the first, the second. Not three, nor five, would meet our duty, or would task our strength." The third, a perfect gem for beauty, "Christ Free Mission Church," is now well nigh completed; and the fourth is here. "What hath God wrought?" What shall God not work, if your hearts be opened, to receive His grace? "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto Thy name, give the praise; for Thy loving mercy, and for Thy truth's sake!"—Missionary.

MASSACHUSETTS.

CONSECRATION.—On Thursday last, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Eastburn consecrated to the service of Almighty God, according to the rites and usages of the Protestant Episcopal Church, the edifice recently erected in Waltham, under the name of Christ Church. He was assisted in this truly interesting service, by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Potter, of Pennsylvania, and several of the clergy, from Boston and vicinity. The request for consecration was presented by J. S. C. Greene, Esq., Senior Warden, and was read by the Rector, the Rev. Thomas F. Fales. The sentence of consecration was read by the Rev. Alfred L. Baury, Rector of St. Mary's Church, Newton Lower Falls. Morning prayer was said by the Rev. Wm. R. Babcock, of Salem, assisted in the Lesson by the Rev. Wm. Horton, of Brookline. The ante-communion service was read by Bishop Potter, assisted by Bishop Eastburn, who read the Epistle. The sermon was preached by Bishop Eastburn, and was most happily suited to the occasion. Its effect upon the large and attentive congregation who listened to it, we doubt not, will prove salutary, in leading them to value more highly, the blessed privileges of that goodly heritage, in which God has been pleased to cast their lot.—Witness.

MISSIONS.

We take the following intelligence from the "Spirit of Missions" for December:

ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS.—A lady, who has the relief of our Missionaries very much at heart, has signified her intention of giving one thousand dollars, as a missionary contribution, provided $10,000 are received before the first day of January. Will not our churches send in their collections speedily and liberally; and the more so from the hope of securing such a serviceable offering—an offering which will give the missionary allowance to five or more missionaries, and which will relieve so far their simple wants. Shall we not be willing thus to be provoked "unto love and to good works?"

VACANT PARISHES.—St. Luke's church at this place (Marianna, Flo.) is without a minister, and at the suggestion of Bishop Cobbs, I write to you, as Secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions, with the hope that one may be obtained. The salary will be four hundred dollars, to be paid by the vestry, and I suppose that the Board of Missions would add one hundred and fifty.

"Our church is not yet built, but we have a beautiful lot, and are gathering the materials on it as rapidly as we can. We have not ceased to regret the resignation of the Rev. Henry McViekar, nor do we expect to have his like again. If convenient, be pleased to present to him my kind regards, and also to make such inquiry concerning the people and country as may be useful to you in the selection of a minister.

"When it is said that there are churches in North Carolina, in Alabama, and in Florida, with none to minister at their altars, and it is urged that even the Pagans could confidently assert that the gods would take care of their own, what reply is left to a churchman?

"Perhaps I should add, that I write at the wish of vestrymen and wardens."

Such applications are being constantly made, and facts such as are here mentioned are true of almost every Diocese in the Union. In the hope that, by calling attention to such a state of things, we may be instrumental in obtaining some relief, we intend to present such appeals in the columns of the Spirit of Missions. On the same subject, Bishop Freeman, in a letter just received, says: "There are several places in this State (Arkansas,) calling most piteously for the ministrations of the church, but alas I have no means of supplying their wants."

And Bishop Kemper, under date of November 12th, in giving a statement of the need both of men and means, concludes: "For Minnesota I have not yet obtained a missionary, can you get one for me?"

The following places cease to be missionary stations from the 1st October last, and in consequence the following resignations take effect from that date:

Delphi, Rev. Edward Magee; New-Albany, Rev. J. Ramsdell, and Richmond, Rev. Geo. Fiske, in the Diocese of Indiana; Robins Nest, Illinois, Rev. Samuel Chase; Fayette, Rev. J. W. Dunn, and Marion County, Rev. W. B. Corby in the Diocese of Missouri; Jackson, Tenn., Rev. J. W. McCullough, D. D.; East Baton Rouge, La., Rev. J. Burke.

The following are the sums acknowledged from the Diocese of Pennsylvania for month preceding 15th of November:

THOUGHTS FOR CHRISTMAS TIME.

THE POOR YE HAVE ALWAYS WITH YOU.

Most of our readers have heard of the Rev. E. M. P. Wells, the faithful and devoted Missionary to the Poor in Boston. We have just received and read with deep interest his last Report, entitled, St. Stephen's Chapel; Report of the Mission to the Poor. It shows a heart fully alive to this portion of Christ's Body, so dear to their Master, and it proves also a head of sound practical sense to guide the motions of such a heart. And both are necessary.

We do not think we can make a better selection for the Season, the Week before Christmas, than a few extracts from this report. And first, by way of example, the following will show what has been done at this Mission. The contribution for the Mission, some of them very liberal, for the year amount to $3031 22. The Missionary says:

The above $3031 22, with something more, I have disposed of as follows:—I have given on 5923 occasions, $3340 53, in the following manner:—

Board and provision,	$1810 89
Clothing—not including a large amount given for distribution,	132 59
Sickness—besides the free-bed given at Mass. Hospital,	61 28
Burials—$91 13—Furniture, $55 09	146 22
Books and printing,	88 36
Cash, $21 52—travel and moving, $40 53,	62 05
Tools and materials, $73 27—Rent, 410 67,	483 94
Wood, coal, stoves, and sundries,	555 20
	$3340 53

Some of our other doings are as follows:—Regular and appointed services of the Church, 762—at which 209 sermons and lectures have been delivered. Besides which, we have officiated for destitute churches at 64 services on Sundays, and held 17 other religious meetings. The holy Communion has been administered 19 times—61 have been baptized—17 confirmed. We have buried 52—married 14 couples, and catechised the children "openly in the Church" 11 times.

Besides the regular visiting of the Parish, and visits to the destitute and sick, I have received thousands of visits at St. Stephen's House, which sometimes consume whole days. I must frequently leave my meals, and occasionally my bed. New comers want advice where to go, and how to proceed in a strange land—situations are to be procured—cases of difficulty and wrong investigated—recommendations for work given—letters on business for the poor written—family and individual quarrels reconciled—except when Satan is too strong for me—pledges administered to those who cannot restrain themselves without a helping hand—and moral and religious counsel given to the erring and troubled. Then there are "troubles at court" to be attended to—prisoners to be visited—bonds to be given for the release of persons whose cases seem hard—which I have several times done—voyages to be procured—homes for orphans to be obtained—and boys who have broken away from family control to be disposed of.

Our business on this occasion is between the rich and the poor—their intercourse in labor, giving and receiving, and their character and condition. How differently from each other do they look to man! They doubtless appear as different from each other to God—but often in an opposite direction as to their excellence. The appearance of the poor is disgusting, perhaps; that of the rich, delightful. But to God, who sees the within, the disgusting and the delightful may change places. Though the poor are not, at first sight, as agreeable as the rich, yet often, on acquaintance, the gilding of the one becomes sadly tarnished, and the iron of the other becomes, in our estimation, as gold. Would that ye rich would become interested in the poor, and that the poor would love the rich—That ye rich would take a fair view of the poor, and not consider them just what they seem by their uninteresting exteriors. Their hands have grown hard in your service—if not directly, yet indirectly—for ye cannot get rich, nor keep rich, nor live elegantly, without the hands of the poor. Thus sings Mary Howitt:—

Oh, what were the pride of the rich man's gold,
Or the worth of each untill'd rood,
Were it not for the rough, hard-handed poor,
Who toil for their daily food.

Whatever of labor the rich man needs,
From the poor man's hand must come—
From the cradle rare of the new-born heir,
To the coffin and sculptured tomb.

Your wealth must all pass through their hands, to your hearts? It makes their hands hard; beware lest it produce the same effect on your hearts; for generally, as the heart grows hard, the head grows soft. Some of the poor might pray for their employers—their masters—as Father T. prayed for a class of persecutors on a public occasion. After expressing himself with much earnestness for awhile, he concluded with "O Lord, if Thou wilt only make their hearts as soft as their heads, we will ask no more." But, whatever you do with your hearts, remember that their hands have grown hard in gathering your riches, and, like soft-hearted fellows, they will gladly go on so to do, only treat them as if they had hearts, and teach them to love you, by first loving them. Though the poor seem coarse and rough, yet they are often excellent fellows. When poverty does not descend to pauperism—but the two ends of want and supply are made to meet by putting forth the whole energies, —they are saved from the imbecility which wealth is wont to produce; and a good opportunity is given the poor for the development of the MAN. This is especially the case, when the mind is under a religious influence, so that faith and hope may give cheerfulness and stern confidence; and charity may prevent the heart from being shrivelled by the poverty of selfishness. And these qualities are of more indigenous growth in the poor than in the rich. The seeds of virtue are not in as great danger of "falling by the way-side"—trodden down by custom—or, if falling otherwise,—of being "choked by thorns," "the cares"—and "deceitfulness of riches." The poor man can more easily say his prayers in good earnest, and with longing desire, "Father—give us this day our daily bread." Thus, he has the better means of faith. The rich man is too wont to look to his wealth as the means—the cause—of his abundant supply—the poor man is wont to go more directly to God—there is no long golden chain of intermediate means to divert his attention. It is "Father give me, and forgive me, for Jesus Christ's sake"—and, says the most philosophical of English popular writers, "One attribute of the true hero is faith." And the poor man's hope, too, flourishes better—he is not visited with that dire destroyer of happiness, the having nothing to hope for—strive for. What can those who "are full—are rich"—hope for? This world? They have it—if not in degree, yet in kind—they can only get something more of the same kind—more than they can use. Would they hope for Heaven? Alas! no. I mean the rich par excellence—no, not Heaven—at least, not yet—that would be too bad—after having worked so hard, and sacrificed so much, to exchange it for Heaven? Oh no—do not name it—hope for Heaven? where gold loses its value and becomes the base metal? For Heaven? where they might find a Lazarus at the immortal banquet, holding the next place of honor to Abraham? The thought excites despair rather than hope. The poor man can hope for this world, for he has not yet grasped it—alas, that he should wish to! and for Heaven, that he has not yet won—O that he would! And then, for charity, the poor man "from his own learns to feel for others' woe"—to think, feel, and act pitifully and kindly to others. As a good widow, who, during a severely cold season, had collected and mended garments for the poor, said to me, "it takes the poor to feel for the poor." And then their hearts are not narrowed by the swelling of their purses. The poor man, too, is not hindered by the loftiness of his condition and station from humbly bowing his heart at the cross, in sorrow for, and penitence of, sin. Those who are above him, or quasi above him, help to teach him humility; and, being so taught, it is easier for him to repent. And "he who can be penitent has something lofty in his nature," says a great man, and a Greater has said, "he that humbleth himself shall be exalted."

How grateful should we, who are poor, be to the rich, that amidst all their trials—sufferings—temptations—dangers and, perhaps, losses—eternal ones—they are willing to accept of a stewardship of so great care—of so little worldly benefit to themselves—for, after all, they get only their living. I mean in comparison with the fearful responsibility which will be felt to be such, when the command sounds in the ears of their souls, "Give an account of thy stewardship, for thou mayest be no longer steward." From this responsibility of great wealth, at least you and I, poor brother, are exempt; for which we should thank God, and pray for His blessing on those who are faithful stewards of His bounty. There are such faithful ones, who consider themselves strictly and daily accountable to God, for the manner in which they use the thousands or the millions committed to them. These men are heroes—they have fought a good fight—and while the devil has been striving to sink them down to perdition, by tumbling gold upon them by the thousand, they have stemmed the tide, and, struggling onward and upward, have kept their heads above water by keeping their hearts above the clouds on their "true riches"—and an eye on those "things written in the books" against their names.

In his quaint and nervous style the Missionary proceeds to point out what is to be done for the poor.

Another thing to be done in the mean time, is, not to wait until this enlightened, benevolent, and determined WILL lifts up society to fulfil the second great table of the law—THOU SHALT LOVE THY NEIGHBOR AS THYSELF—for if so, it will never be accomplished. All reforms for the benefit of mankind should be eminently practical. We must take the world as we find it, and, instead of stopping its motion,—which would be but chaotic destruction,—we must go on with its motion, checking as far as we can its erratic course—correcting an evil here, and introducing a good there—and provoking to good works, by our ardent and self-denying efforts, as many as we can. Should we attempt to aid the poor by getting the will of the community correct at first, we should fail altogether, in two ways:—First, while we were putting the will right—no very tangible thing, by the way, in the abstract—the poor would be starved off and frozen dead, so that we should have no poor to begin upon, after the will was put right. But, secondly, this could never be accomplished, because the only way to correct an individual error is to begin imperfect as we may be, and go on striving for the better, till as "practice makes perfect," we "go on unto perfection." And the surest way to correct a social error is to "provoke another to love and to go works."

We must take men as we find them, and not begin by condemning them because their hearts, their wills, are no better—that is God's province—all that man can do, is to try to judge the heart, and in so doing he condemns himself, and proves that the devil has cunningly drawn off his eye from the gangrenous condition of his own heart, by tempting him to judge that of others. Leave others to, and urge others to, judge their own hearts, and set them the example so to do, and we shall find quite enough of that disagreeable—that disgusting work, of heart-judging. Take men as we find them. Urge them to pity—to help their fellows, for Christ's sake—and if in response they do, and give—though it were, often, more from love of self than love of the "neighbor"—to be seen of men than to please God—to buy praise for the proud heart rather than bread for the hungry stomachs—yet we shall do such imperfect givers more good, by our simple-hearted, humble, earnest, and pitying efforts, to make their gifts do the good which the givers ought to have intended, than by quarrelling with them for any lack of an enlightened, warm-hearted, and determined WILL.

In our efforts to relieve the poor, it must not be our object to destroy the poor-class in society. If we would do it we cannot, for God's decree is against it; and, if we could, we should not, for we might put the poor in a worse position. To be poor—simply poor—is not an evil, any more than it is a shame. Pauperism is an evil—alas! how great a one? Neither you nor I can answer that question—it is a fearful evil—it is a sinful evil. It is a sin—a degrading sin, in society—it is an evil which should make every political economist—every thrifty citizen—every dealer in stocks and real estate—every manufacturer and ship owner—every Statesman proud of his country, and every Patriot loving his country—unwilling to put off the armor of life and lay himself down upon the soft bosom of mother earth to rest, until the class PAUPER be destroyed from the community from which he is retiring as a workman forever. And is it so? Is Pauperism such an evil? One which should so influence such men? How, then, should it influence you, Christian brothers—ye baptized ones—baptized in the fountain opened by love, with the holy cross emblazoned on your brows—ye who act in the double capacity of citizens of Earth, and subjects of the Kingdom of Heaven—can ye die in peace till ye have, by sacrifice and effort in your own sphere, at least, wiped out that disgraceful handwriting of sin and self—PAUPERISM IN THE CHURCH?—Till those for whom the Son of God died are no longer borne-down—turned-out, paupers—till no longer the blushing disgrace can be told of you, that Pauper Saints are sent from your doors with broken meat—that your Brother Saints are more squalid and disgusting than your dogs—nay, that those whose souls have been washed in the blood of atonement, and are the sons of God, and whose "bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost," are cowering, squalid, houseless paupers. Pauperism is a evil—a sin. Disgrace must rest on society where it is allowed to exist. A MORAL PAUPERISM must exist in a Church which allows its members—not its technical members only—but members of the body of Christ within its purview—to be paupers.

I said to be poor is not an evil. Our Lord Jesus Christ was poor—"for our sakes He became poor"—so poor that "He had not where to lay his Head." Some of the greatest benefactors of mankind have been poor—the most ingenious and scientific men have been poor—the most distinguished scholars and celebrated artists have been poor—and often the fact of their having been poor was the very cause of their excellence—their improvements and of their distinction. I say, then, we should not aim to destroy the class of poor; we might thus do them an evil. If it could be done, sensible men might choose to become poor—preferring comfort to luxury, and freedom to the weight of chains, though they were golden.

Another means of aiding the poor is to advance their moral improvement. Many of the sufferings of the poor—though not so many as of the rich—arise from immorality. Much time and their small earnings are wasted thereby. Good morals would promote their industry and economy, and above all, true religion will banish discontent and murmurings, and sweeten poor fare, by the thought of having so much more than such sinners deserve. It makes their sad burdens light, by trusting in God for help, believing that "affliction cometh not forth from the dust," but from God, their best Friend and Father. In the darkest time, religious hope cheers them on by the bright prospect of better things hereafter. Religion rarely, in every day concerns, appears more divine in its influence, than in the abodes of poverty—thus sings Tupper—

"I turned to the cottage, and there my poor hind Lay sick of a fever all meekly resigned,
For, O the good wife was so cheerful and kind—
In spite of all matters—
An angel in tatters."

The moral improvement of the poor is an important means of aiding them. Yet, this is not to be a substitute for physical relief, when needed, nor is the latter to be postponed until the former is secured. The writer of sundry tracts on this subject teaches that the sufferings of the poor are sent upon them to turn their minds religion-ward, and that, if we relieve them, we are in danger of hindering their religious improvement!! Moral and religious instruction will not get easily through a chilled skin, nor find its way readily to a heart that is out-laid by a gnawing stomach. Jesus fed the hungry, though he told them that they sought Him from no higher motive than to be fed.

There is great point in the following. It speaks too in a strong voice the feeling of a man's heart. It is a poor business, often followed, this of buying recruits!

As many of the poor whom we are called upon to aid are Roman Catholics, I hope you will excuse me for suggesting that in our moral efforts with them, we should be careful not to do any thing to prejudice them against their Church. Early impression—parental love—awful obligation, and years of habit, have made them Roman Catholics. If you understand the general principles of the philosophy of the mind, I think you will perceive that the attempt to convert such minds under such circumstances, is a delicate—a dangerous work—such as no tyro should middle with—and one which cannot soon be accomplished. It is an easy work to pull down, or burn down, a building; but a much harder and longer work to re-erect it. You may unsettle the minds of such Roman Catholics—at least in appearance—from their own Church—ridicule may do this—you may even make them, as far as you can see, Protestants—leaves and fishes will do this, with the unfaithful—but, thus far, you have done them no good, and have done them evil—you only make them sin against their consciences—you have not made them Christian Protestants, but infidels. And if affliction—the approach of death—or the influence of holy truth, should arouse the mind of such an one to religion, you will find him “kneeling at the confessional,” “bowing at the elevation,” and with earnestness crying, “Sancta Maria, ora pro nobis.” This kind of conversions can be had by the score, for a dollar a head—not a heart. They used to offer themselves to me to be converted, “for a consideration,” until they found that it was the sure way to be turned off altogether. D—, a notorious fellow, came to me one morning with “Mr. Wells, I can bring you two or three of our boys who will come over to your church, if you will give them some little assistance.” I dismissed him immediately to go to his priest, and confess his wickedness. If you wish to make a real conversion then, as the boys say, take a fellow of your size—a person of information, and then convert him—and God help you—but beware how you attempt to convert a good Roman Catholic and make him only a bad Protestant.

There is advice of great practical importance in the following. How often does Christian Charity (?) encourage beggary, sloth, improvidence, thoughtless dependance on others, and all the vices which follow in their train.

Another mode of aiding the poor, is by furnishing them work. This is so important a matter that, so far as physical relief is concerned, it seems almost the only one necessary. The great majority of applications which I receive from the poor are, in the first instance, for work. Most of those who apply for assistance, do so only because they have been unable to get work. In many cases, after searching day after day, for work, during months, and selling almost every article of furniture and clothing, at last, in sorrow and humility, they come, feeling that they have ceased to be men, because they can no longer, like men, work for the support of themselves and families, and ask for bread. Though their muscles and hearts ache for the independence of self-supporting men, yet must they ache in idleness and beggary. Those to whom I gave work last winter, and who had before been beneficiaries, were wonderfully changed in look and manner, after commencing work. They came and went with activity, as if they had gained new life—they were cheerful and animated, as if they too belonged to the community of industry. Even their health seemed improved—yet what they earned was not more, in most cases, than what they had before received in gratuity. Can—may, I will not ask, can you not—for I know well that you can—but will not any of you determine to do something to improve the condition of the poor in this respect? I think there are ways of doing this, on a large or a small scale, which I could suggest, and which you would find feasible. I doubt not that some there are who feel disposed to act in this way, but, secundum artem, they wait for the calling of a public meeting to discuss the subject, and to pass resolves thereon. Some one has shrewdly remarked, that we never read of the resolves of the Apostles, but the “Acts of the Apostles.” Why cannot an individual embark in such a moral speculation alone? The insurance of Heaven guarantees it save—for if you suffer pecuniary loss, you will yet make great profit in the peace of your own mind, and in the favor of God. If you sacrifice a little of earth, you may “lay up treasure in Heaven”—taking from “mammon” wherewith to serve “God.” But what will be your loss, speaking after the manner of men? You invest, say, $500, more or less. Suppose 75 per cent. of this goes for materials; this leaves 25 per cent. for the work—$125. Suppose then, that instead of paying, as is done, 6 cents for making a shirt, and 8 or 10 cents for making a pair of trousers, you should double it. Then, if you sell the goods well, you would at the most, sacrifice only 50 per cent. on the work, $62 50. But suppose you sell to a disadvantage, and lose $100 thereby; then for your $500 invested, you have a return of only $400, what, ask you, has become of my other $100? That is a fair question, and properly put. I answer it. You have furnished five widows the means of a support during the winter, three months, for themselves, and their two or three fatherless ones each, that is, if they get their fuel from some of the public provisions therefor, or if two such families united in one room in defraying the expenses of rent and fuel. Then you have made five sad families happy, and, say, fifteen persons comfortable for the winter, all for $100. Comfortable? Not what you call comfortable, but what they would so call, and be thankful to God for it, and grateful to you for it. Should you regret that you had so done? No—not on some fearful winter night, when the spirits of the wind were moaning in your ears, to tell you of the sufferings of the poor, or, when all but your own thoughts was hush, and you felt that “God was about your bed,” and you saw through the darkness, with the eye of the soul, the “all-seeing Eye” looking through you, or, when as it will do, at such times, “the soul takes its stand in your ears,” and you heard more than the jingling of earth; heard, hark to that still small voice; “What hast thou done?” “What art doing?” “Art thou ready?” Then you would not regret the investment; unless you regretted that it was so trifling, on so important a subject.

Work for men can be obtained even at less pecuniary sacrifice than for women.

There is great present appropriateness in the following. It is He, whose coming in great humility to visit us we now celebrate, who says—I WAS SICK AND YE VISITED ME. LORD WHEN DID WE VISIT THEE? FOR AS MUCH AS YE DID IT UNTO ONE OF THE LEAST OF THESE YE DID IT UNTO ME.

Another mode of aiding the poor, is by visiting them. How happy does it make them, especially if in trouble, to see a friend—a friend, too, who has come, not because of neighborhood or relationship, or the return of a civility, but from good-will—because the Father commands so to do—the Master requires it—and the heart chooses it. It is the visit of a rich brother to the house of poverty—a prosperous sister to one in adversity—it is one coming to them from the bright world, or rather, from a bright spot in this dark world. The poor feel as if religion was more a reality, when it so changes the hearts of worldly people that they love to cultivate its spirit, by imitating the example of Him who so loved the world—who, for our sakes, became poor—who went about doing good. Such kindly visits make gala days to the poor and the afflicted. And who cannot will not—spare—only, if you please, an hour a week—to improve your own hearts, by thus cheering the lives of others? A little kind advice—a few words of comfort—a cheering smile—an act of love—or, perhaps, a lesson from the Father's word, you can give. Do thus, and you will enjoy your own homes the better—you will find less going wrong, on returning thither—you will feel that you have done something—really something; which will tell hereafter. Themistocles said, “I cannot fiddle, but I can raise a village to a state.” Christians might thus raise a world to Heaven—but too many prefer “to fiddle.”

In looking about among this—what to you appears rubbish—though it be immortal rubbish—you may find many a valuable—many a diamond. When the friends of Sir Humphrey Davy were expressing their high admiration of his valuable discoveries, he interrupted them with this extraordinary remark, “The greatest discovery that I have ever made, was the discovery of Dick Farraday”—a poor boy whom he picked up in a work-shop, and whose after-life did credit to the philosopher's assertion. But to affording this kind of relief, as well as all others, it is objected, that the poor are dirty, disagreeable, disgusting, ungrateful; this is oftener said by looks and actions than in words; and sometimes, actually to the poor themselves; but what then? They are poor, and have no delicacy of feeling! They are used to it! When Professor Silliman saw the French market-woman cutting the frogs in halves, so alive, that the head and fore-legs hopped off from the knife, he exclaimed, “How can you be so cruel?” “La! sir,” she replied, “they don't mind it; they are used to it;” not recollecting that it was herself that was used to it. Let us beware that it be not our hearts that become used to the unkind treatment of the poor—God's creatures—created in His image, and though, that which is of His image be lodged in a body so disagreeable to you, yet is its value not depreciated thereby. It is beneath the fastidious man of the world to value gold less because it is contained in a dirty bag—not so dirty, either, as the well-dressed heart that covets it. The lapidary does not value a first-water diamond less because it is in a poor setting. If the poor are disagreeable, whose is the fault? The steward is always accountable to the master for the bad condition of the tenants—so will our Master make us accountable to Him for neglecting His talents. You complain that they are dirty. Wash them, then. Our Lord washes us, with bleeding hands, foul in His sight as sin has made us. Are they ragged? Clothe them, then. He has furnished the means so to do. Are they coarse and rude? Mend their condition, that they be not compelled to herd together like mere animals. Are they ungrateful? Treat them with kindness and gentleness—not once, or twice, and then expect more goodness in return than you have put forth towards them, but habitually; and continue it only half as long as God has drawn you with the tenderest cords of love towards Him—then, if they are not grateful, you will have somewhat of an answer to give to our Lord, when “He returns to reckon” with you.

While you remember that the class of the poor are such in order to help us cultivate “that most excellent gift of charity” in our hearts, so they are almost necessarily, from their very poverty, rendered less personally agreeable, and for our greater advantage. For, if the poor were always clean, nicely dressed, good mannered, grateful, and interesting, there would be but little virtue in relieving their sufferings, for we could not well help it. To render our slight virtue of relieving those we are interested in, more stern and vigorous; to give it a harder growth, or a higher flight; to make it in kind, at least, like that which moved our Master to leave Heaven, and come to a cold-hearted, deceitful, ungrateful, selfish, and disgusting race of beings, and to do them good; to help us cultivate a virtue of this water, that we may thus become like Him: it is for this, that the poor are often thus uninteresting and disagreeable. But why are they thus? Are they deceitful and faithless? What better could we expect from those whose treatment, by oppression and wrong, seems to have driven them to such base expedients as lying, flattery, pretence? For years they have come in contact with those; those above them; who have set them the example of wrong, and, taking their cue from their bettors, they have attempted to play the other side of the game. And when, at first, they meet with true, kind men, they do not believe them to be such, and fancy that, because they are rich or refined, they must be their opponents. If some appear to them better than others, they think it is only because they can play their part better. Be patient with them; pity them; for the miserable notions which they have learned from members of your own class; continue in your kindly feeling and action till they have an opportunity to see—to feel—that you do pity, do love them; and then their hearts will respond to your goodness, and you will no longer complain of their deception and ingratitude.

It is said, that “there is something in every man's heart which, if we could know it, would make us hate him;” but true as my own experience, and my observation of others teach me this may be, yet I prefer to travestie this German dogma to what I believe equally true; and O how much more beautiful: There is something in every man's heart which, if we could get at it, would make us love him; yes, however bad he may be, try to get at that one thing, and there hith on the cord of love, and draw him away thereby to Heaven. Do not, good brother, call me a heretic for this, for I believe, as I am bound to, and have promised to, that “man is very far gone from his original righteousness.” I believe this more practically than many, whose theory may, perhaps, be better than mine; for I have for years had in my own breast a living—ah! a deadly, proof of its truth. Yet do I love to look upon my brotherhood of man with as kindly feelings as I honestly can. It is a dreadful state of misery to live in, to feel that all about us are base, deceitful, and ourselves alone left, the only good one. What a lonely, desolate, unsympathising, untrusting condition. Let was a happier man than such. Who, that has tried long and steadily, has failed to find that something in the heart of every one, which may be as the fulcrum on which to fix the lever of reformation, to turn the heart to God; one lonely spot, less hardened than the rest, where we can place “a little leaven to leaven the whole lump;” or plant one little seed of grace to bear fruit to God?

SUNDAY MUSINGS.

BY REV. RALPH HOYT.

Comes a high mandate—Rest! 'tis God's own hour;
Keep silence earth in all your busy throngs.
Ye weary sons of toil whose rugged brows,
Bend to the penalty and sweat for bread,
Unchain the spirit from life's turmoil now
And lose awhile the memory of care.
Mid the half-furrowed field bestay the plough;
Bid the twin toilers of the yoke go free,
Within the stall, or at some cooling stream,
Or by the upland court secure repose;
Whilst ye, in nobler rest, by faith reclined
On the dear hill of Calvary afar
Shall soothe away the weariness of life
In hope through Him that hath redeemed the world.

The tired artisan adust and sad,
Whose sinewy arm is doomed to be o'erstrained
For the poor promise of a scanty fare,
Let him forbear the anvil's ponderous stroke;
The plummet's nice demand: and all the din
Of busy manufacture,—and look up;
Eternal Sabbath!—none are weary there.
And he that fearless bridle ocean's surge,
Swift rushing o'er th' illimitable main,
Let him remember now to honor God,
And, as he needful climbs the towering spar,
Tugs the hard cordage, or adjusts the sail,
Sing in sweet unison with all the shore,
It is the Sabbath! Let the nations bow
In lowly reverence; while the eternal hills
Voiced with an earthquake, roar—Amen, Amen.

THE SON OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN.

No. I.—THE PROPHECY. (Isa. vii.)

MR. EDITOR:—

Every reader of the Bible is acquainted with this prediction of Isaiah, and its fulfilment in the Babe of Bethlehem, “that Holy Thing which was born of Mary.” And some readers of that volume are skilled in the details of the received exposition of the passage. It offers considerations appropriate to this hallowed season. Isaiah, by heavenly command, taking with him his little son, Shear-jashub, appears before King Ahaz, then in great peril from certain foes, and pronounces the oracle, “Behold a Virgin shall conceive, and bear a Son, and shall call His name Immanuel: butter (or milk) and honey shall he eat, that he may know (or, until he know) to refuse the evil, and choose the good.” Immediately adding, “for before the child shall know to refuse the evil, and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings!” The added portion, (that which precedes being transparent) declares the current of commentary within my reach, referred to the “child” whom the prophet took with him, he pointing to the boy on reaching that part of the prophecy—there being apparently no other reason for the divine order for its presence on the solemn occasion. So that, of the three verses, the two former apply only to the redemption of the world, and the last to the rescue only of the king of Judah from his closely threatening difficulties. The sudden change of allusion from one person to another, within one and the same recital, has a parallel (according to some interpreters) in the declaration of our Lord—“Thou art Peter, a rock, and on this Rock (pointing to Himself) I will build my Church.” Also, this child of Isaiah's was included with another, born afterwards, and yet to be spoken of, in the subsequent proclamation, “Behold, I and the children whom the Lord hath given me, are for signs and for wonders,” &c. The foregoing view of the three prophetic verses, implying the instantaneous transition from the Son of Mary to the son of Isaiah, and from the eternal redemption of the world to the brief respite of Judah, is, I believe, the current one among the orthodox. Its authority, though the references at hand are not many, is unquestionably very high.

Once, however, my opportunities of reference were almost none. And it then came to pass, some thirty odd years ago, that, in studying a few recent works on both sides of the Unitarian controversy, which impinged on my early ministry, I was not perfectly content with the abrupt passing, in one breath as it were, from the one child to the other; just as not a few reject the startling bound from St. Peter to Christ. My Unitarian authority, as usual, closed the prediction to both those children, Jesus and Shear-jashub, and applied it to only the later son of Isaiah, (viii.) "Maher-shalal-hash-baz;" who was the offspring of a new marriage, (it was affirmed,) which he, presumably as a widower, yet possibly as a polygamist, was about contracting:—the maiden, when united to the prophet, is called "the prophetess:"—and in the infancy of that son, came the promised temporary relief of Judah and Ahaz. That Unitarians do not "see Jesus" in the prophecy, troubled me not, except for them, inasmuch as St. Matthew saw Him there, and that so plainly, that they reject that part of his gospel, which is a presumptuous license that God hath most terribly denounced. St. Luke also records the great and wondrous fact. Still, the transition appeared—ungainly. And might not Shear-jashub have been sent to the august interview with the king of rebellious and idolatrous Judah, because of his prophetic name, "the remnant shall return:" i. e., though the majority of that nation would remain obstinate, a small minority would recede from their erring faith to that of "Immanuel," then foretold? This, as much as the other view, would make both the children of Isaiah "signs;" while Jesus, preeminently included, would be the "sign" of "signs," the miracle of miracles, a Son "given" to Isaiah and to all, "unto us a Son is given." In short, my notion was,—with no "man" and almost no book, only the merest hint, to "guide me,"—and yielding somewhat, perhaps, to an occasional propensity to concede a little, and take an opponent on his own ground, if truth were not compromised,—the notion I affected was this: * may not these three verses be like many others, a double prophecy, not shifting but twofold in general purport,—a comprehensive utterance of the seer, referring, not to Shear-jashub, but to "Maher" (we will shorten his name) first and in part, and to Jesus supremely and for its final accomplishment?

My working out this notion, at the time mentioned, it is the further object of the present paper briefly to lay before the reader,—who may regard it, either as a mere adventure of a juvenile theologian, or as an offering of riper thought to intellects more learned and more judicious for their more trustworthy consideration.

The solution of these three prophetic verses took the following shape and course. Though the words may be applied to the birth of a son to Isaiah by his intended new marriage, they may also be referred, and more eminently, to Christ. Not a few prophecies have a twofold interpretation: many concerning David go likewise beyond him to Jesus, the spiritual David: the nuptial psalm of Solomon carries us onward to the marriage of the Lamb with His bride, the Church; and that points to their more complete and happier union yet to come. Examples need not be multiplied. And this possibility of extending the prediction from Maher to Jesus, becomes a high probability, a controlling presumption, when we remember that "the spirit (or intention) of prophecy is the testimony of Jesus:" to attest or to foreshow Him or His affairs, including those of His Church, is the very purpose, direct or indirect, of every inspired premonition. Which presumptive argument is fortified, of course, when the predictive language is more teeming or more majestic than befits the primary sense alone:—thus, "I have found David my servant: I will make him my first-born, higher than the kings of the earth." Primarily, David is clearly found, but the "First-born" who is to be God's own "King of kings" appears not till we look to the Messiah. And all these considerations carry the three sublime verses of Isaiah beyond his son Maher, granting him to be referred to, to their secondary and principal application to Jesus, the Son of the Blessed Virgin.

The words were announced to Ahaz, king of Judah, when in imminent danger, (i. e. politically, for their church languished under every fortune,) from the armies of Pekah, king of Israel or Samaria, and of Rezin, king of Syria or Damascus. Isaiah was commanded to offer a "sign" to Ahaz that God would protect the nation of Judah. The wicked prince, arrogantly hypocritical, rejected the proffered token. But the inspired messenger broke forth,—"The Lord Himself shall give you a sign: Behold, a Virgin shall conceive and bear a Son, and shall call His name Immanuel: butter and honey shall He eat (feed like infants generally on sweetened milk,) that He may know to refuse the evil and choose the good: for before the child shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good, the land thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings." He then further declares, that, to fulfil the latter part of the promise, God would "hiss (give a sort of whistling signal, one used for bees in the East,) for the fly" from Egypt, "and for the bee" from Assyria, to deliver Judah by these nations, particularly the latter. The next chapter (viii.) narrates, it is thought, the fresh marriage of the prophet, and the birth of the son before mentioned, whose name signifies "hastening to the spoil or prey," the reason being added, "for before the child shall have knowledge to cry, My father, and my mother, the riches of Damascus, and the spoil of Samaria, shall be taken away before the king of Assyria:" and both these defeats (of Damascus and Samaria,) occurred in about two years. (2 Kings xv. 29. xvi. 9.) This prediction accords sufficiently with the latter portion of the former one; some discerning of "good from evil," or the elementary notion of obedience, is acquired about the period of a child's being able to call, "Father, Mother," the sentiment of loving obedience being involved with that of filiation:—and the birth of a son to a new wife is a fulfilment, though completely unimportant, of the previous portion. With this meagre fulfilment, however, the Unitarians are content.

Our better faith, strong in the higher interpretation of the chief current of the prophecy, looks to Him who was truly the Son of the Virgin. The birth of the child, not the name only, is called a "sign," which the birth of Maher was in but the lowest sense; it imported no miracle, was no proof, no consecrated emblem or type. At the most, the child was a mere pledge, or cognisable earnest, of the temporal deliverance promised,—or rather, its being and presence were nothing more than outward acts or occurrences linked with the foretelling of the event; like the arrow Elisha directed Joash to shoot; or the potter's vessel broke in the making; or the "earthen bottle" broken solemnly by Jeremiah; or the girdle hid by him till decayed near the Euphrates: (2 Kings xiii. Jer. xviii. xix. xiii.) all which deeds only emblemized the words pronounced, gave them emphasis, but not proof or inherent confirmation. Solely in this inferior acceptance,—nay, in a sense yet more inferior, the occurrence not resembling the catastrophe foretold,—was the birth of Isaiah's son Maher a "sign."

* A note in Doddridge, on Matth. i. 23, in which Grotius is named and censured, was the only suggestion within reach. The reader will find an approximate or corresponding statement of this hint in Hammond, and a fuller view of the interpretation and its cognate in Pol. Syn: where also Poole, though preferring the generally allowed sense, concedes, Non omnino rejicienda est hæc interpretatio.

Such were the three prophetic verses in their primary application. Undoubtedly a fulfilment is shown. But reverence for the pregnant language of an inspired oracle, and the assertion of St. Matthew, lead us far beyond this point of our exploration, to that its supreme significance which ranks it with "the testimony of Jesus."

From the passage itself we take our clue. The "Son" spoken of is to be named "Immanuel." The son of Isaiah was not so named, has never been so called; hence, the prophecy cannot stop at him. But our Saviour was named Immanuel, is universally so designated; no other has ever had the appellation, except in honor of Him. To none other, then, can the prediction fully apply. The Babe of the Virgin Mary is the "Son" foretold by the herald Isaiah. But it is objected, that the name "Immanuel" was not the one given to Jesus at His circumcision; and that therefore its appropriation to Him is arbitrary and a collusion. Not so. Had that very name been given at circumcision, collusion might have been suspected; it would have seemed an insidious appropriation; but there could be no artifice, when He, as it were, earned the title, and all who came to know Him conceded it. The name formally given was, moreover, the equivalent of this lofty title,—"Jesus" is rendered (Pearson) "God the Saviour," i. e. "God saving us,"—and "Immanuel" signifies "God with us," i. e. "God on our side," "God in agreement or covenant with us," "God defending, saving us." The two, Jesus and Immanuel, are in purport one name; just as Peter and Cephas, names of an individual, both mean "a rock." Further: The name Jesus ratifies the additional interpretation of "Immanuel, God with us," viz. God is united personally to man; for of Him who is "Jesus, God the Saviour," it is declared, "He shall save His people from their sins." The doctrine of our Lord's proper divinity, as from everlasting the Son of the Father, is interwoven with the prophecy, and with all the scriptures relating to it. And they point us onward to (ix.) the exulting anticipation, "unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given; and His Name shall be called . . . the Mighty God."

A further proof that Isaiah's infant was not "Immanuel," and so not the ultimate subject of the prophecy, is found in the declaration concerning the ravages of the Assyrian king, afterwards an enemy of Judah, "the stretching out of his wings (armies and their sway) shall fill the breath of thy land, O Immanuel." (viii. 8.) In no sense did the "land" of Judah belong to Maher, or to any one distinctively, but the successive kings, who are never termed Immanuel,—and to the Messiah, supreme over kings, and always known by that appellation,—to Him of whom it is written, "of the increase of His government upon the throne of David, (i. e. the throne of Judah,) there shall be no end." Judah was also the "land" of the then Church; and Christ, as always the Head of the Church, was "Immanuel" to whom that holy "land" belonged. To Him only, therefore, pertains the great prophecy in its complete scope.

We conclude then,—reserving some REFLECTIONS for another paper,—that, not only St. Matthew, but the prophet himself, makes known to us that the eye of inspiration looked beyond the primary application of the intense language to his own infant. A Virgin and her Child were revealed in distant futurity. The "spirit of this prophecy was the testimony of Jesus." The letter of the words was absolutely fulfilled, and their "spirit" was then only fulfilled, when "the handmaid of the Lord" gave birth to Him who united Heaven and earth in His parentage,—His heavenly parentage being twofold, from eternity as God, in time as man. And why should this supernatural event be rejected, more than the first creation of man, or any other miracle? He who brought matter out of nothing, and man out of dust,—He whose omnipotence raised the dead, and wrought a thousand wonders,—He, beyond question, could accomplish the miraculous human origin of the Saviour of the world,—He could effect the grand miracle which made the Blessed Virgin the Mother of the Son of God.

MR. EDITOR:

Meeting lately, by chance, with a number of the Calendar, I saw therein an article concerning the Bishop of North Carolina, in the course of which it was stated that a reply to his late Pastoral Letter was soon to be published, the author of which reply was a layman, "distinguished alike in the Councils of the Nation and the Church." I write merely to correct an error of fact. The author (if he be the one pointed out by rumor and Calendar) has never been distinguished in the councils of the Church. He has never attended a General Convention, and but once a Diocesan Convention, and then it was held in the place where he resided at the time.

It is remarkable that one who has taken so little interest in the public affairs of the Church should now assume so prominent and singular a position—(we might name it quasi-Episcopal)—as to write a pamphlet in opposition to a Pastoral Letter of his Bishop; while those who have really held the position in the Church thus mistakenly assigned to the author of the reply, deem it their duty, as a matter of principle, to condemn an act so opposed to the spirit of the Church, and so repugnant to the feelings of

A TRUE CHURCHMAN.

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1849.

Mr. C. W. James, No. 1 Harrison street, Cincinnati, is our general travelling Agent for the Western States; assisted by J. R. Smith, J. T. Dent, Jason Taylor, J. W. Armstrong, Perrin Locke, W. Ramsay, and G. Steinman—receipts from either will be good.

CHRISTMAS.

We need not say a word to our readers concerning the object of this happy festival, beyond that announcement in which an Angel's tongue first proclaimed the glorious object of our Christmas celebrations—"BEHOLD, I BRING YOU GOOD TIDINGS OF GREAT JOY, WHICH SHALL BE TO ALL PEOPLE, FOR UNTO YOU IS BORN THIS DAY IN THE CITY OF DAVID, A SAVIOUR, WHICH IS CHRIST THE LORD."

Our paper will hardly be read by any who do not acknowledge the propriety of this commemoration, and know well the reasons which justify its observance. So strong is the feeling which demands this annual manifestation, that if the Church should refuse to observe it, the world would still mark, in its own way, the Christmas holidays. And strange it is to think, that even now, the spirit of the world finds, in this season, an occasion of undue excitement. Strange, indeed, it is that the day which God has distinguished, as one of spiritual mercies and heavenly hopes, man should mark chiefly with a greater indulgence in the pleasures of earth. May the faithful teachings of the Church, and the distinctness with which her holy services set forth the nobler use of this most blessed festival, preserve her children from such a sad abuse of its wise intention. Let us well consider the ends for which the Eternal Son of God "took our nature upon Him, and as at this time was born of a pure Virgin." In great humility, He "was made in the likeness of men," that we might be made like Him, and our nature might share in the dignity of His own. He became the Son of Man, that it might be said by all who in Him are regenerate and made God's children by adoption and grace, "now are we the sons of God." His own inspired Apostle has taught us what should be the character of the rejoicings excited by such a hope—"Every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself, even as He is pure."

The observance of this festival, should also revive and strengthen in us all the nobler and better feelings of our nature. It speaks of God's infinite love for us. This great motive should excite, in our minds, thoughts of peace, and in our hearts, feelings of "good will toward men." By the remembrance of this wondrous act of love, we should be moved to deeds of mercy and to acts of beneficence. This is CHARITY's blessed festival. How many hearts may be gladdened, if Christians only duly celebrate it! Christmas joy should never be selfish. The heart in which it glows should cast light and warmth on all within reach of its influence.

Forget not, then, Christians, as you enter "the glorious sanctuary," wreathed with festive branches, that there are brethren who ask your aid, that they may build temples in which they may join with angels in their Christmas songs of joy.

Remember, Christians, when you hear the voice of those whom Christ has sent to prepare His way before Him, that you have brethren who can only be blessed with the offices of Christ's Ministers, through your liberality. Remember the needy Missionaries. Remember, too, that Christian Ministers may grow infirm and helpless, or die and leave widows and orphans unprovided for. Churchmen of Pennsylvania, forget not the CHRISTMAS FUND, whose demands upon your charity have already been presented. And, Christians, as you gather round your plentiful boards, or enjoy the warmth of your own cheerful firesides, forget not the poor around you. And be sure your Christmas joy will be brighter and happier when you think that you have been able to make others partakers of its gladness.

Our first selection, chosen as peculiarly appropriate to this season, will give some excellent counsel as to the manner in which this duty is to be discharged. Among our communications, will also be found some appropriate to the season.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS.—We have received from Messrs. STANFORD & SWORDS, too late for notice this week, some most appropriate books for the holidays. Among them are—"The Aged Christian's Companion," edited by the Bishop of Indiana; "The Church Service," and a new edition of "Keble," both beautiful books. Also, their "Pocket Almanac," in handsome form; "The Churchman's Heavenly Hours;" "The Whole Duty of Man;" "History of the African Mission," &c.

GENERAL PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

We have received "the twenty-third Annual Report of the Executive Committee, read at a meeting of the Board of Managers, held June 27, 1849, to which is appended a catalogue of the Society's Publications." We are most happy to learn, from this Report, the prosperous condition of this important institution of the Church, which has already done much by its excellent publications, to extend that best knowledge, a knowledge of the truth. We have looked over the catalogue of publications, and we can most conscientiously commend them as safe books, and that is saying much. At this time we may add that many works are brought out in a form suitable for Christmas presents. Mr. Hooker, corner of Chestnut and Eighth streets, is the Agent of the Society for Philadelphia. We would have said more, but we gladly substitute the following remarks from a Layman of the Church whose opinion is well entitled to confidence.*

For the Banner of the Cross.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

At this season of the year when so many persons are in search of suitable books for children, will you allow me to remind them of the claims of the Sunday-School Union of the Church upon their confidence and support.

That Institution, which I believe to be a most important and useful one in the Church, has been for years quietly and steadily fulfilling its mission to the extent of its means, by providing such books for children as are suited to their capacities, to their mental wants, and to their moral and religious improvement.

Its catalogue embraces a great variety of books in the different departments of Juvenile learning, well suited each in its particular office, to inform the mind and to improve the heart.

It has recently added some new volumes to its list of published works, which will commend themselves, I think, to the favorable judgment of their readers.

HELEN MORTON'S TRIAL, is a pretty little Story, in which the authoress rather incidentally, has given an exposition of the doctrine of the Resurrection of the body, so simple in language and so accommodated in its illustrations to the capacity of a child, that few who read it can fail to understand it.

THE REVELLERS: THE MIDNIGHT SEA, and THE WANDERER—in one small volume, are beautiful Allegories. The first is a well sketched miniature of the world, or the people in it, as illustrated by the Revellers' banqueting hall, and may be read with profit by the old and young.

The Midnight Sea, and the Wanderer, present to the young in the Pilot and the Shepherd, the character of the Saviour as their willing and watchful Guardian, under whose protecting care they may traverse life's troubled ocean and arrive in safety at "the haven where they would be," or rest in His quiet and peaceful Fold with the Sheep of His pasture. This will be an acceptable little book to those who would bring up their children with right thoughts of Him and its quiet securities, and who would have them to acquire an habitual sense of their dependence upon Him, who is our Shepherd, for guidance and protection always—and in all things.

I hope this excellent Institution will find by the increased sales of its books during the coming Holy-days, that they are valued as highly as I think they deserve to be, and that it will thereby realize additional means, that it may continue and extend its good works for the benefit of the Church by feeding her Lambs.

The Union has a Library containing One Hundred and Fifty-nine Books, bound up in muslin, in One Hundred Volumes, selected for the use of Sunday Schools, which it sells at the low price of Ten Dollars. A more useful present to a Sunday School could not be given at so small a cost, and such a Christmas or New-Year's gift would be sure to afford the donor a pleasant thought, and obtain for him the hearty thanks of many a young reader, made happy and better, by his liberality.

Ten Dollars sent to the Agent in New York, or paid to the Agent in this city, with a request to send a Library to any Sunday School, will insure its being done.

DANIEL DANA, JR., 20 John street, New York, is the General Agent. Herman Hooker, South West corner of 8th and Chestnut streets, is the Agent in Philadelphia. A LAYMAN.

CLERGY DAUGHTERS' FUND.

We have received the Report, together with the constitution, of the Trustees of this excellent Association. The object of this Fund, is to educate the daughters of deceased Clergy, of Pennsylvania, or of those who have not the means to provide the advantages of a superior school training. It is an excellent object. We see by the Report, that eight young ladies are now enjoying its benefits, although the annual subscriptions do not provide for more than half the number. We trust that more ample means will soon be provided to carry out such an admirable purpose.

* The following Books have just been published in suitable form for Holiday presents—"Christmas Carol," "The Dove," "First and Last Communion," "The Testament in the little Coffin." All good books.

JOURNALS OF PENNSYLVANIA.

We beg leave to call attention to the following:

For the Banner of the Cross.

DEAR SIR:—

The Standing Committee of the Diocese, some time since, appointed a Sub-Committee to take the requisite measures to procure a set of the journals of the Convention of Pennsylvania.

The Diocese possesses none of the journals of the Conventions held before A. D. 1813, and none of the journals for the years 1822, 1824, 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1831.

I am requested by the Sub-Committee to state these facts, and to request you to apprise any of your readers who possess copies of the missing journals, with which they are willing to part, that they will do a service to the Church by sending them to the care of the Rev. Dr. Clay, next door to the Swedes' Church, G. M. Wharton, Esq., No. 13 Prune street, or to the subscriber, at the Episcopal Academy, No. 341 Market street.

Any of those gentlemen (who constitute the Sub-Committee appointed for the purpose,) will be glad to receive, likewise, copies of journals of the several general Conventions; that so, while engaged in their work, they may be the means of securing to the Church in the Diocese of Pennsylvania complete sets of both the local and the general journals.

Yours, very truly,

G. EMLEN HARE.

33 SUMMER STREET, Dec. 13, 1849.

We sincerely sympathise with the BISHOP of RHODE ISLAND in the bereavement recorded under our obituary head this week.

A friend in this city has communicated to us some particulars as to the demise of this venerable and excellent "Mother in Israel," which are very solemn and touching. Mrs. Henshaw had reached the advanced age of seventy-nine, without much visible impairment of her physical or intellectual powers; and her health continued good up to the very moment of her departure. She had frequently referred to her death, of late, as an event daily to be expected, and desirable, rather than otherwise; not because she was weary of life, and found it a burden—for few enjoyed the society of their friends more, or took a deeper interest in passing events, than she—but, because she knew that "to depart, and be with Christ, is far better." On Sunday, the 18th ult., she had received the Holy Communion with great satisfaction and pleasure; and on the succeeding Lord's day, again enjoyed the privileges of the sanctuary at two full services. That evening, in conversation with one of her daughters, she expressed a hope that she might never need "watchers," or give trouble to others in her last sickness. On Monday, the 26th, after breakfast, according to her usual custom, she retired to her room for devotional reading; where she heard one of her little grand-daughters read a chapter in the Bible before going to school. One of her daughters also read to her in the course of the morning; she was at the front door about half-past twelve o'clock; and in fifteen minutes after, when another of her daughters went into her room to sit with her until dinner time—she was found seated in the same arm-chair in which her husband had died in 1825—her spectacles on—the Bible and Prayer Book on the stand before her—not a limb, feature, or muscle moved—perfectly life-like. But her heart had ceased to beat, and an angel had borne her soul away!

Such a departure is more like a translation than a death. Like Enoch, she "walked with God, and is not, for God took her."

We cheerfully give the following letter a place in the Banner, with the earnest hope that its interesting appeal may find a ready and liberal response:

NEW YORK, COLUMBIA COLLEGE, Dec. 10, 1849.

DEAR SIR:

Will you permit me through your journal to make known the wants of the Parish of St. Luke's, Marrianna, Florida, with which I was connected last winter. When I left there this spring, a copy of the following resolution, passed at a meeting of the Vestry, was sent to me:

"Resolved, That the Rev. Henry McVickar be requested to collect funds from churchmen abroad for the establishment of the Church of St. Luke's, Marrianna, Florida, and for the erection of a church building."

Want of health has prevented me pressing the claims of this church personally, and I avail myself of the medium of your journal to present to your readers—as the season approaches when, more especially, our hearts should overflow with charity—a statement of a case of more than ordinary destitution of the "Word of God."

The diocese of Florida, according to the Church Almanac for 1849, contains, clergy 6; population 54,477; square miles, 87,750. Six clergymen for an extent of territory more than double that of the whole State of New York. Moreover, it has no bishop whose duty it is to look after its interests, and the supplying of parishes in want of pastors.

The nearest clergyman to St. Luke's, Marrianna, is over seventy miles distant. The Vestry have a lot of ground and about $900 collected, for the erection of a church. They offer $400 for a clergyman, but this has not, as yet, been found sufficient to induce any one to go there. The domestic missions at present can give them no aid.

If any one feels disposed to give, contributions left at No. 8 Columbia College, city of New York, will be carefully transmitted to them.

Very truly, your ob't. serv't.,
HENRY McVICKAR.

CONSECRATION OF DR. UPFOLD.

This service was to take place on Sunday last, in Indianapolis. We await the account of it and hope it may arrive before our paper goes to press. We have received the following from Indiana:

For the Banner of the Cross.

THE CONSECRATION.

MR. EDITOR:

The following announcement appears in the "Madison Banner." I understand that the presiding Bishop was respectfully invited to attend and to officiate, but that he is unable to accept of the invitation. It is a subject of deep regret that our highly respected and beloved Bishop in Charge, who has for fourteen years so faithfully watched over this Diocese, should not have been selected to officiate as one of the Consecrators on the interesting occasion.

INDIANA.

The consecration of the Rev. Geo. Upfold, D. D., as Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Indiana, will take place, D. V., in Christ Church, Indianapolis, on Sunday, the 16th of December, being the third Sunday in Advent.

The Bishops of Kentucky, Ohio, and Missouri, with other Bishops, are expected to take part in the services of the occasion.

Bishop Kemper, nevertheless, was present and joined in the act of THE MISSIONARY. Consecration

We find, in its last number, the following notice concerning this paper:

TRANSFER.—The proprietorship of THE MISSIONARY is transferred, after the present number, to WILLIAM CROSWELL DOANE, of Burlington College. It will be conducted by him, under the direction of the Bishop of the Diocese. All who desire to receive it, from this date, will enclose one dollar, free of postage, to his address. Six papers will be sent for five dollars enclosed. The interest of the clergy is solicited. Should the amount of subscriptions warrant the expenditure, it will be restored to its original size of eight pages, and in other respects improved.

We need not say that our best wishes attend THE MISSIONARY, and the good cause to which its columns are so faithfully devoted.

Our English Church Papers have arrived just as we are going to Press.

New Publications.

A FEW PLAIN WORDS TO CRISTIANS ON UNION; with a Sketch of Church History.

A pamphlet of 24 pages, by a Parish Clergyman, and well designed to give brief but important instruction. It is written in an easy and simple style, and presents the historical argument for the Church with great force and clearness. It would make a most useful tract. The two concluding paragraphs exhibit the line of argument pursued:

"In a former part of this tract I showed from Scripture, that Jesus Christ established His Church on earth, to be one visible perpetual society; and that therefore all divisions among Christians, all setting up of rival societies calling themselves by various names, is contrary to the spirit of His Gospel. Admitting these premises, the question would at once arise in a conscientious mind: How am I to escape the guilt of causing or countenancing division? How am I to tell which of the various Christian bodies I ought to join, so as to be sure of being in the unity of the Church? The answer is simple: to that body which can show that it has never broken itself off from the Church which the Apostles founded; that stream, which flows in an uninterrupted course from the very fountain head, must needs be the true one.

"It then becomes a simple matter of history, and as such I have treated it. History shows that the Episcopal Church in this country is a direct and perfect branch of the Universal Church; and we have traced it down, in unbroken descent, through the English Church, from the days of St. Paul and St. John. By joining a Church which can thus clearly show its credentials, you will be certain that you are taking the first step towards restoring unity and peace to the Christian body."

ESSAYS UPON AUTHORS AND BOOKS, by W. Alfred Jones. New York, Stanford and Swords, and for sale by G. S. Appleton, Philadelphia.

A very interesting book, indeed; and showing much judgment in its critiques upon authors. We have not had time to peruse it carefully, but we see it is well spoken of by good judges.

We have also received No. 4 of Phillips', Sampson and Co.'s beautiful edition of SHAKESPEARE. When complete, it will make a choice volume.

Also, from the same publishers, vol. v. of HUME'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND. These works are also for sale by Mr. Appleton.

We have also been favored with APPLETON'S HOLIDAY CATALOGUE. This exhibits an admirable collection of fine books especially adapted for Christmas and New Year's Gifts, handsomely illustrated and elegantly bound.

Among these we would call our readers' attention to the following:

THE WOMEN OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENT. This beautiful work we noticed in our last number. A further examination more than sustains us in the opinion then expressed.

THE SACRED POETS OF ENGLAND AND AMERICA, edited by Rufus W. Griswold.

A most beautiful and appropriate book for a gift of love.

THE MISCELLANEOUS WORKS OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH, M. B. Comprising the Vicar of Wakefield, Citizen of the World, Poetical Works, &c., &c.; with an account of his Life and Writings: Complete in one volume. London: Thomas Nelson. Philadelphia: G. S. Appleton, 1850.

A handsome book, of whose inward excellence we need not speak.

A BUDGET OF YOUTHFUL FANCY, by G. W. S. Nicholson. This is a collection of Poems by a young author of "seventeen years of age."

BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

THE CHILD'S CHEERFUL COMPANION, or a Book for Young People. Illustrated with 23 designs by Darley.

FANNY AND HER MAMMA, or Easy Reading Lessons. Two attractive books by the same publishers.

We have also received from the publisher, J. W. Moore, 193 Chestnut-street—

ELLEN SEYMOUR; or the Bud and the Flower. By Mrs. Saville Shepherd, (formerly Anne Houlditch.)

In this story, which appears to be an interesting one, the author has attempted to present only so much religious truth, in "which it is presumed the orthodox of all denominations are nearly agreed." She also informs us that she has sought to "avoid everything of a Sectarian tendency." We cannot however admire the character of her Catholicity.

THE YOUNG MAN'S WAY TO INTELLIGENCE, RESPECTABILITY, honor and usefulness. By Rev. Anthony Atwood. A truly useful book if it rightly points the way to all these.

THE ETERNAL SONSHIP.—No. II.

It is my purpose now, the Father of Wisdom being my helper, to show how wide spread among all communities calling themselves Christians, those above named heresies are, single or compounded, simple or developed, as they variously appear. For they all contain the elements of all error. They are but the Protean forms of the One "Mystery of Iniquity," arrayed against the one "Mystery of Godliness, God manifest in the flesh." I confidently affirm, and shall prove, that those called Protestants are deeply infected with Sabellianism and Nestorianism; and that the Roman Church is as deeply, if not more thoroughly corrupted, with a mixture of Sabellianism and Eutychianism. These will be thought startling assertions by most persons, and so they are. It will shock many of my brethren, who fondly dream and speak of "Orthodox evangelical denominations," to hear Calvinists, e. g. distinctly charged with heresy as regards the Trinity and Incarnation. And it will be as great a shock to another sort of persons, who consider the Roman Church as Orthodox in the fundamental articles of the Creed, because she accepts its words; and entertain themselves with shallowest talk about her "practical corruptions," as though there were any practical corruption which is not the expression of corrupt principle. If I succeed in proving these propositions, then the cause of all those divisions wherewith Satan has riven the Church will be patent and palpable. The foundation of all differences as to the meaning of the Gospel promises will be exposed; and it will appear, that unity in the faith is possible, only by adopting, in its full sense, that simple creed which Scripture makes the comprehensive confession of all truth: "I believe that Jesus, [i. e. the Son of Mary] is the Son of God."

To begin now with those called Protestants. Is it not the generally received opinion, among all the various species who are comprehended under that name, that Calvinists are believers in the doctrine of the Trinity? Are they not famous for their treatises and controversies on the Divinity of Christ? Are they not the special antagonists of their own offspring, the Unitarians? These facts are commonly taken as confirmations strong of the orthodoxy of Calvinists respecting the Person of Christ. But I ask again, is it not an indisputable, but still not a generally known or remembered fact, that Calvin and Beza, and Danacus, and the whole Genevese school, denied the true Sonship of Christ? Did they not denounce the invocation "Holy Trinity One God, have mercy upon us?" Did not Calvin object to the word Trinity? Did he not call the passage in the Creed "God from God, Light from Light, true God from true God," "frigida cantilena," "a trifling sing-song;" while he and his followers at the same time stoutly asserted the term homousion? This adoption of the word homousion, without that passage of which it is an integral portion, and from which it takes its only Catholic sense, is Sabellianism. So taken it is not a part of the truth, but no truth at all, absolute Sabellianism. Again, was it not proclaimed at the Presbyterian General Assembly in Cincinnati, which distinguished itself by pronouncing Romish Baptism invalid, that Presbyterians and the New England Puritans, did not believe in a Trinity in the Nature, i. e. in the modus existendi of the Godhead, but in a "Trinity of official relations?" The restless Dr. Smyth of Carolina, whose mouth is so full of words about the Apostolic Succession and Confirmation, but whose head is a perfect vacuum of knowledge on those subjects, was the person who, as the mouth-piece of his associates, announced a Trinity of 'official relations,' together with a denial of the Nicene Creed, as the faith of all sorts of Presbyterians. And who is so eminent an antagonist of Dr. Channing and the Unitarians, as Mr. Moses Stuart, of Andover? And yet he has openly advocated the Sabellian theory of Schliev-macher (in the Bible Repository) and joined with that profound minded Lutheran, in denouncing the Nicene Creed. He is well known for an obtrusive officiousness in bestowing upon the dogma of a "Begotten God" his ineffable scorn. He nevertheless accepts the word homousion, but true to his mark, he rejects it as a definition of Sonship.

And now, as to our own highly blessed and favoured Church, blessed beyond our power of gratitude, in spite of the tares which are growing up with the Lord's wheat; though she is, as a body, true to the Eternal Son by the imposition of the Nicene Creed, and nothing more, as a RULE OF FAITH, upon her members, still we may not forget, that once we were on the point of losing it. And why? Not because there was any Arianism or Socinianism amongst us; for there was a perfect willingness to abide by the Offices of Worship used in the Church of England. No, that was not the reason; it was the subtle presence of Sabellianism that arrayed its front against both the Athanasian and Nicene Creeds; but through God's mercy we were allowed to retain that chiefest one, which alone bore the Majesty of this Synodical authority of the Catholic and Apostolic Church. We only retained it because it was the conditio sine qua non of receiving the Apostolical Succession. Gloriously are that Symbol of Faith and our Ministry united in our history. It is an omen—a sign from Heaven, "Whose we are, and Whom we worship." In an age of indifference and coldness, and latitudinarianism, God inspired the English Hierarchy with a fixed determination, to refuse consecration to our Bishops elect, unless we accepted the Nicene Creed as our Rule of Faith. "Not unto us, O Lord! not unto us, but unto thy Name give the praise: for thy loving mercy and thy TRUTH'S sake! Wherefore should the Heathen say WHERE IS NOW THY GOD?"

What the common, but not universal, sentiment of the American portion of the Church of England was, after its separation from the jurisdiction of the See of London, and before it had Apostles of its own—is now obvious. Nor has that sentiment been as yet entirely overborne by the adoption of the Nicene Creed. There are still many among us who dislike it, and refrain from its use; and those who do, are the very persons who consider Calvinists orthodox believers as to Christ's Person; while some go further, and take their theology for a pattern of purity. Why should they, how in the nature of things could they, entertain this favourable opinion of Calvinists, if they did not sympathize with them in their view of the Trinity; and like them accept the term homousion, but not as a definition of Sonship. And I repeat it, that this use of the word homousios, to express a solitary, solid unit, and not as the definition of the sort of Sonship which the Catholic Church, on the authority of Scripture, has affirmed of our Lord, is the very root and acmé of Sabellianism. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the Churches."

The road from a Sabellian view of the Trinity to a Nestorian view of the Incarnation is short and straight. No Sabellian—except one involved in the Eutychian heresy of the υπερφυες of our Lord's Manhood, could possibly believe that the Second Person of the Trinity took a birth from the Virgin Mary. He could not call Her, who is blessed among women, because of the Blessed Fruits of Her Womb, θεοτοκος. He cannot hold to any other than a Human Personality in the Christ. Such is his view of the Divine Usia as a solid unit, that to say she is the Mother of God, is with him all one with saying she is the Mother of the Trinity. Now, as I have shown above, one who holds the Nestorian notion of a human personality, necessarily empties the Gospel promises of their essence, of all their distinctive meaning; and accounts Christian Sonship all one with the Jewish, Baptism the same as circumcision, Adoption a mere entrance into a covenant of unrealized promises, Regeneration nothing more than what they call a "change of heart," a change in tastes, and views, and sympathies, a moral improvement, a mending of the old dead nature, instead of the beginning of a new; and Justification an imputation of righteousness to a "body of deaths," "white-wash upon a sepulchre filled with all uncleanness." It utterly ignores the fact, that "God sent forth His Son born of a woman, when the fullness of time had come, that we might receive the Sonship" "to Himself," and consequently, that our regeneration was impossible, until our First Born Brother had His birth. It looks for no other gift in Justification than was received by Abraham and the faithful of old; albeit the Apostle expressly states that "these all died" tinctive "glory" of the Church as the ministration of righteousness. Their eyes and hearts are blinded, to all real constitutional difference between the old and the new covenant; and they know not, in spite of what is written, that while the promises of "the righteousness of God," i. e. a righteousness of nature, like God's, thorough absolute holiness, such as was wrought in the manhood of the Son of God, was the blessing in store for Abraham, and of which he, equally with us, was an "heir by faith;" yet we have received in our New Birth, an "earnest of our final inheritance," a real outset in that New Creation which shall be perfected in the whole body at the Last Day; a beginning of what shall reach "the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ's Manhood," at our Resurrection; first fruits of that fullness of the Spirit which shall then establish us in spiritual bodies, glorious in a perfect likeness of our First Born Brother. And then God shall be all in all. The Nestorian, wrapped in the darkness of his heresy, stands in stolid, stupefied amazement, when he hears one take the language of scripture in its first and most obvi-

* Lest any body should cavil, and ask, "how then were they regenerated, as regenerated they must be in order to attain unto Christ's likeness?" I answer, that the "Gospel was preached to the dead" that they, "like men in the flesh, after Christ's coming, might live according to God in the Spirit."—1 Pet. iv. 6. So that they with us, and we with them, will be perfected together at the resurrection.

ous meaning. Living in a mist, the aspect of all these realities appear natural to him only when they are hazy. The true, common sense interpretation of scripture he thinks, is to exhibit it as a splendid phantasmagoria of dissolving views. Never does his theological acumen and skill, seem so palpably triumphant to himself, as when he takes into his alembic, a declaration of Divine Wisdom, precipitates its heavenly essence with his common sense, and leaves its earthly form a new piece of rhetorical bombast, as an object for our faith. "The Wisdom of this world is foolishness with God."

O my brother! whosoever thou art, into whose thoughts this dogma of the True Sonship of Christ has never fully entered; thou whose vision of the truth has been obscured by the dust and smoke of the long and weary battle which Antichrist has for ages waged against the Rock of our Salvation; may I not ask of you, in the name of the Eternal Son, to open the eyes of your understanding, and to survey attentively the facts which I have laid before you? Answer truly to your conscience and to God. Have I not disclosed somewhat to you which is worthy of your consideration? Have I not laid bare the rock on which you have often stumbled when you have coldly received, or it may be rejected, truths commended to you by the Church, "the least among the thousands of Judah," of which you and I are members; dogmas delivered by the Synodical voice of the Catholic Church, the whole body of Christ, in those early days, when alone she has been permitted to prophesy unto the world? Have I not called up passages of Scripture which hitherto have been of no use to you; which you have never appropriated, have never been able to appropriate to the filling out of your conception of "what is the hope of your calling, and what the riches of the glory of God's inheritance in the Saints, and what is the exceeding greatness of His Power to us-ward who believe, according to the working of his mighty Power which he wrought in Christ when he raised Him from the dead and, set him at His own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but that which is to come, and gave Him to be Head over all the Church, which is His Body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all." Have I not told you things you never knew before? Things, I say, and not the imaginations of my own weak mind, which, of its own wisdom, is not worthy to address you. If I have, then meditate upon these things; give thyself wholly to them; "and the God of peace, Who, through the Blood of the everlasting Covenant, brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, make you perfect in every good work, working in you that which is pleasing in His sight." And may the God of all grace who hath called us unto His ETERNAL GLORY, establish, strengthen, settle you. To whom be glory, and dominion for ever, Amen.

THE RETROSPECTIONS OF A MISSIONARY.

No. II.

The office of a Missionary is not only a holy and useful office and of great importance to the extension of the Church and the diffusion of the Gospel, but it is one of dignity and honor, and is consequently worthy of the respect and reverence of men. "How beautiful," such is the language of the seraphic Isaiah, who is frequently called the fifth Evangelist, "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace; that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation: that saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth. Thy Watchmen shall lift up the voice: With the voice together shall they sing; for they shall see eye to eye, when the Lord shall bring again Zion. And if the feet of the Messengers of Cyrus proclaiming deliverance to the oppressed Israelites were beautiful, how much more beautiful are the feet of those who are appointed to preach deliverance to the captives groaning under the slavery of sin, and the opening of the prison to those who are fast bound in misery and iron.

But the office of a Missionary is an office of dignity and honor, because he is the Ambassador of Christ, sent on a mission of mercy; for he is to invite sinners to accept of salvation, and to assure them, in the name of God, that if they will repent and return to Him, He will forgive them all their sins, blot out all their iniquities, write their names in the book of life and guide them in the way everlasting. And surely the Bible, which contains not only the great commission to preach the Gospel, on which the Missionary acts, and the terms and conditions on which salvation is offered, ought to be valued more than any precious pearl, because it contains the plain declaration of the Almighty Creator, that he is willing to pardon the sins of his creatures, and to blot out the record of their guilt from the book of his remembrance forever. "Return unto me, and I will return unto you," saith the Lord: "Wash you, make you clean: put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well; seek judgment, relieve the oppressed; judge the fatherless, plead for the widow. Come now, and let us reason together saith the Lord: "though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." And what was preached by the inspired Prophets under the Jewish dispensation is confirmed by the Apostles of Christ. For the Apostle John, the last survivor of the Apostolic band, declares in his First General Epistle, "If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and He is the propitiation for our sins, and not for our sins only, but also for the sin of the whole world."

But the Missionary may also be excited to deeds of glory and renown, when he reflects that the office which he fills has been filled by many of the noblest spirits that ever dwelt in the human form. For what was the Prophet Isaiah, whose strains of superhuman eloquence have gladdened the hearts of the faithful and given fervor to the piety of the people of God for more than two thousand years, but a prophet Missionary? A Missionary sent on a mission of mercy from the great head of the Church, to call the chosen people back from their wanderings, and induce them to flee for refuge to the horns of the altar and to the blood of sprinkling, so that they might be safe forever from the avenging fires of Divine indignation.

And what was Ezekiel, and Jeremiah, and Daniel, and the goodly fellowship of the Prophets down to the advent of John the Baptist, the last of the illustrious line, but Missionaries sent from time to time to teach the way of salvation, and to entreat the people of God by all the hopes of mercy, not to turn a deaf ear to the offer of pardon sent to them from the great king of heaven; And to pass from the less to the greater, and from the servants of the household to the Son, what, we may ask, was the Divine Redeemer, but a Missionary? For, though he was the Son of God and worthy of the worship of angels and of men, yet he was truly and properly a Missionary. For he was sent into the world on a mission of love and mercy, and therefore a Missionary in the highest sense of the term. Yea, he was the Prince of Missionaries, and could plead a Divine commission, and declare that he was sent on a mission of infinite moment to the welfare and happiness of men. "The Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world." "I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of Him that sent me." And because the Saviour was the chief of Missionaries, he gave to his Apostles the commission to act as Missionaries, and promised to be with them to the end of time. "As my father hath sent me, even so send I you." Let the Missionary, then, reflect on the dignity of his office, and the glory reflected on it by the labors, the lives, and the deaths of the goodly fellowship of the Prophets and the noble army of martyrs who have preceded him; and this, with the Divine blessing, will cheer his heart and animate his hopes in seasons of depression and despondency, when the fruit is yet in the bud, and the prospect of an abundant harvest is far from bright.

PROFITABLE CHRISTMAS BOXES.

At this season of the year, when there is such a general excitement in the Christian community in regard to the selection of appropriate presents, and all the heads of families are engaged in providing luxuries, gratifications and comforts for their children, friends, domestics and dependents, I would beg leave to remind them of a very deserving and unobtrusive class of dependents whose claims and whose destitute condition they never consider, and consequently do not feel it to be an indispensable and responsible duty, as well as a gratification and privilege, to relieve. I allude to our starving and half-clad missionaries and their families. Now I would suggest an easy way,—convince them of our sympathy, and provide them all with comforts at this joyful season. Let a few of the most judicious and influential ladies in each congregation provide two large wooden boxes, and solicit contributions in articles of food and raiment to send to one poor Missionary in our own State, and despatch the other to one in the far West. Many zealous ministers have been obliged to relinquish favorable stations, where they were successfully laboring, because they and their families were perishing for want of food, raiment, and medicine!! When the heads of families are purchasing articles for the use of their own households, let them remember these deserving, and suffering, and neglected members of the household of faith; these faithful servants of Christ. Every congregation could send two Christmas Boxes to enrich and gladden the hearts of these un murmuring followers of their Divine Master, and to enliven the hearts of their little families, and procure them a "merry Christmas and a happy New Year," without impoverishing themselves, in a temporal point of view, and may be a means, by the Divine blessing, of greatly increasing their own spiritual prosperity. If all the Churches would engage in these good works, it would divert their attention from those discussions which lead to Rome and Geneva. "He that doeth his will, shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God." Let us thus walk in the good old paths, by doing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly with our God. Let us thus practically demonstrate that we truly "believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and love one another;" and we shall not be distracted with those contentions and discussions which rend the Church, prejudice those against it who are most favorably disposed towards it, and have prevented multitudes who were inquiring for the ways of truth and peace from uniting with us. Let the ladies evince their benevolence and efficiency by commencing this good work immediately. Zeal and judgment united can conquer all difficulties, and render every duty delightful in the performance, and in the retrospect. I will answer for it, that not one lady will refuse to co-operate in filling these "Christmas Boxes," with good things for those who are spreading abroad the glad tidings of salvation, and blowing the gospel trumpet, to awaken perishing sinners from their death-like slumbers. May that God, "who is love," and loveth a cheerful giver, bless and prosper all those who engage in this benevolent enterprise, in their own souls, in their families, and in their friends.

NATCHES, Dec. 4, 1849.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE BANNER OF THE CROSS:—

Sir,—In your paper of Nov. 17th of the present year, there is an extract from the "Literary World," under the title of "American Biography." This article gives some extracts from the Life of Ashbel Green, V. D. M. &c. &c. among which is one, headed, "A JEST OF WASHINGTON'S." Now Dr. Green expresses an opinion, that this great man, (Washington) was not in his proper element when he attempted a pleasant conceit. "I never witnessed his making the attempt," &c. &c. (See the paragraph.) The remark of General Washington, was this: "Gentlemen, I feel the weight of years; I take a pair of sixes, on my shoulders, this day." The allusion Dr. Green supposes, must have been made to the FIFTY-SIXES used in weighing heavy articles; and thinks the jest "far-fetched and not very obvious." He further states, that Washington entered his SIXTY-SIXTH year, at this time. Now General Washington may have been a very dull jester, as Dr. Green supposed; but Dr. G. himself was certainly a very dull jest-taker. It is so plain that a school boy would have seen it, almost instinctively. In truth Washington explained it. He stated that he entered that day, on his sixty-sixth year; or to use his own words, "I take a pair of sixes on my shoulders, this day," (66)—certainly, not very far-fetched, and very obvious. Now surely if the charge of dullness rests anywhere, it is not on Washington. A READER.

DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

MR. EDITOR:

I have seen, of late, several articles in the Episcopal Recorder respecting the deficiency of funds in support of our Domestic Missions. The first writer chastises the committee, for employing more missionaries than they know they can support, and the latter attempts to account for this want of funds. The writer says, "It is an attempt to conduct missions as a church when we are not at harmony in ourselves." But why are we not so? Evidently, because every one makes himself a standard of doctrine and distrusts all who oppose his views. The drift of the article is, that low churchmen, mistakenly called Evangelical Churchmen, know so well what they hold, and it is so important in itself, that things must be done in their own way, or they can do nothing. Shame on the presumption of such reasoning! We have seen enough of the idea that a man to be Evangelical has only to think and assert himself so; only to be more indifferent to his own church than to any other; only to have a larger indulgence than others because less discriminating and more complying. The writer says, these men cannot and will not support our missions, when they have doubts. We say, then, let them shime all at once. "What liberal donations," he says, "flow yearly from our church into the treasuries of the American Tract, American Bible, and other kindred societies?" Yes, American, not Church Societies! Institutions taking the place of a church and ministry by agencies and workkeys of their own! The boasts certainly, some call them the glories of the land! "There is," he says, "no disposition to hold back from these modes of doing good." All the more shame. Blush that any Churchman can pen, or any Church paper can publish such glorying in our shame! If any person will note it, he will find the doings of the Tract Society, and the Presbyterian S. S. Union more lauded, and more space given to them and their work by some papers in our church, than is accorded to the church and all her institutions. These seem but borne with by her members and journals, never praised but when some work is done out of her. Is this treason, or is it Puseyism? What shall it be called? Where shall we locate our ministers who take agencies for these societies, and leave the service of the church? It will hardly do to call them Romanizers. There is something of the faith and ministry of the church in Rome, but the church is not in these societies, nor her doctrine in any sense. Let these skimmers of charity, these travelling miners, tell where they belong, and where they intend to bring up at last. Let our Bishops unhorse these riders, and make them foot it awhile, and it will not be long before extremes would meet in a happy charity, and the obligations of the Church to her Lord and His servants, be discharged. It is their doing; the distrust and apathy complained of so much in the church. They put a blind on the vision of many, and plant the seeds of uncharity in the hearts of more. They are merciless to a church that is all mercy in her provisions. They turn their backs on the exercise of a ministry that is divine, and accept a ministry from A., B. and C., who have set themselves up to be somebody, and have grown to be so by the sufferance of an unthinking age. The Church appointed by Christ, to minister to men, with a commission to hold on, in her shining way, till He come, is fast being superseded by inventions of men, in the shape of societies, grown corpulent on her treasures, and beginning to deride her pretensions. It is now great I, and little You. A pretty strife it will be at last for supremacy, if God permits the ways of many to prosper. What if we should drop these alliances, and become stay-at-home bodies; should consent to differ a little for the sake of differing less; should try to shine more in our own candle-stick, and let others, seeing by us, rejoice in the light, and add thereto of their own, till our differing and unequal beams should collect into a common sun within us, making our faces shine as did that of Moses, with the blessing of a genial and superior converse; what if we should do this, and more, which it is our duty to do; should begin to think that men who differ greatly from us, differ not in the "Unity of the Spirit," and that, therefore, there is a way of feeding on truth, and loving it which is not our way; that it is not the outward shape and expression we give to truth so much as the inward perception and digesting of the same, which so make it one with us that it is our life and joy? why, then, we might soon dismiss our counteractions, and combinations, and our appropriation of names, expressive that we assume to be better than others; they would say we are, if we were so; we should have a goodness and a soundness needing no propping of our own; but the one spirit of the body of Christ would bear us up, so that we could not sink, nor our light be hid.

A LINE TO "O."

"Leo" has not overlooked, but rather observed with much pain, "O's" repeated reference to the clause on the Athanasian Creed, "not dividing the substance." "Leo" knows too well why that clause is insisted on, and the interpretation which "O." would give to it. A document having no authority is set against the Nicene Symbol. A document bearing a falsehood upon its front is hurled in the face of that "Testimony which God hath given of his Son," which testimony the Synodical Voice of the Catholic Church, speaking by the Spirit that dwelleth in Her, has handed down in the Nicene Creed. High considerations, respect for the glorious standard of the Holy Ghost under which "Leo" "fights the good fight of faith," has prevented him from giving any direct answer to such a challenge. He thinks "O." has committed suicide by sending it.

The so called Athanasian Creed confesses its inferiority to the writings of Athanasius, because it has sought for currency in the Church under the forgery of his venerable name. "Leo" cited it in his article on the word Consubstantial as an argumentum ad hominem, and as a testimony of the theological usus loquendi; just as he cited the writings of Athanasius. He has considered else to do with it, nor will he listen to anything coming to him in the garb of falsehood, as that document comes. "Leo" repeats, that he imputes no fault to "O." for giving utterance to a doctrine which has overspread all Christendom with corruptions.

A LINE FOR "DALETH."

MR. EDITOR:—

Allow me to suggest to "Daleth"—that "figures, analogies, illustrations," prove nothing, nothing positive, whether of interpretation or doctrine. They are valid only when the matter is already proved or conceded:

Also,—that, in Article 4, "the perfection of man's nature" means "the perfect human being;" says Burnet, Christ "took to Him again His whole body." The word "nature" is not used in the Article with the close appropriation given it by Mr. Wilberforce:

Also,—that Article 2 means, that Christ "took man's nature" by taking man's substance "of the substance" of the Blessed Virgin. The "nature," as the attribute, went of course with the living "substance:"

Also,—that, while (to use D.'s language) every human being has "the whole undivided" human nature, no two or more human beings have in common any "whole and undivided" substance whatever:

Also,—that it is not literally true, but only figuratively, that "human nature," regenerate or unregenerate, "lives," whether in this world or the world to come. Only that "lives" really, of which this "nature" is an attribute:

Finally,—that man consists of two substances, body and soul; and that to add "human nature" as a third "substance," is taking a large liberty with both established language and established fact.

MOHAMEDAN AND JEWISH PRAYERS.

The country around was cultivated with the grain called dra and there was every prospect of a favourable harvest. "God be praised," said the Kaid, "for his bounty: last year, in truth, we had a sad prospect for the crops; and had not my master, Seedy Abn Selam E'Slowly, ordered the Jews—God curse them!—to pray for rain, I know not what would have become of God's creatures." "Why did not the Mussulmans," said I, "offer up their prayers?" "So they did," he replied, "and for twenty days and nights; and to the banner of each mosque was affixed a prayer written by the Fekke himself. The prayers floated in the face of heaven, but all in vain; for the prayers of the faithful are like music to God, who is worthy of all praise; and therefore the Almighty, rejoicing in the sweet sound of our supplication, granteth not the desires of our prayers, for he wishes us to continue still to pray. But no sooner is he tormented with the disgusting prayers of Jews and infidels, than he granted forthwith their petitions, in order to be freed from their importunities." Absurd as this may appear, it is, nevertheless, the general belief in Morocco.—Hay's Western Barbary.

Obituary.

DIED.

On the 14th September last, in East Pascagola, at the summer residence of his grandfather, J. Kely Smith, Esq., JOHN H. JAMES, aged 19 years, oldest son of the Rev. J. W. James, former Rector of Christ Church in this place and afterwards of Christ Church in Philadelphia.

Born in this place, his kindred living here, and bearing a name still held in just and loved remembrance, it seems due that some memorial of his death should be inscribed among us. Although an orphan of tender years and cast upon the care of relatives far from the scenes of his birth and childhood, a promising and flattering career was opened to him. The writer of this tribute saw him not long since in New Orleans, engaged in the business of a large and elegant commercial establishment in the heart of the city. In the midst of wealth, pleasure and fashion in that southern metropolis, surrounded by all that fires the mind and lights the hopes or ardent youth, every thing glittering to his eye in that magnificent mart of nations, it is not surprising that he should have indulged in bright visions of distinguished success; and he did! He had able and experienced friends and relatives to shape and sustain his commercial career. But alluring and prevailing as these hopes were, they were soon snatched from his fond view, and purer, richer aspirations engaged his newly awakened vision.

The yellow fever and later strokes of cholera had in feeble his frame and checked the order of his worldly expectations, and now other thoughts and other longings began to occupy his mind and heart. Heavenly influences dawn upon him, and at length, the great power of the Holy Ghost moves in him and he enjoys a happy transformation! He writes to his uncle, Jas. R. Dick, Esq., from New Orleans, in January last, and says: "I begin this year, January, 1849, with a dedication of myself to the service of my Lord and Saviour, and vow that with the assistance of his Holy Spirit, I would live a godly, righteous and sober live for the rest of my days." He had in fact, devoted himself to the ministry. His father's shining example was probably before him. But alas! we say, that perhaps should not say it, he was called away, just as he was entering upon the preliminaries of his course. His plans duly considered, and approved by the experience of the Rev. Dr. Hawkes, he had just entered upon his studies. He was called to a loftier school, to learn there, the wonders of the "True Tabernacle," which the Lord pitched and not man. But not before, (as his grandfather writes,) "he had obtained that, and impressed that, on the mind of others, by his dying testimony, which many, many of 40, 50, 60 and 70 and more, have not accomplished—a perfect preparation for death.

He repeated that he had no wish to live if incapacitated from pursuing his preparation for the ministry. His dying words were, I have "trust in God." "I have faith in Jesus Christ," and these ejaculations he continued until the sounds sunk into softest whispers. And so he died.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Washington, Dec. 17, 1849.

To the Clergy of North Carolina.

Dear Brethren:

The call of the Domestic Committee of our General Missions for funds, to meet the engagements of the past year, is before you. I cannot add to the strength of this appeal, but will only express the hope that you may select some occasion of public worship early in our ecclesiastical year, to bring the subject before your people, and to ask their aid, if it be but the widow's mite.

Faithfully and affectionately,

Your friend and brother,

CITY MISSION.

RIGHT REVEREND SIR: My quarterly Report accompanying this will inform you of the visits in general made to the abodes of the poor and afflicted, besides the sums expended for the relief of destitute families, as well as various other matters. In this letter, permit me to state to you some individual cases that have come under my notice, that you may judge of some features of the Mission that do not appear in my Reports.

During the prevalence of the awful pestilence that visited and afflicted our land during the past summer, I was called upon to see a man suffering from the ravages of the cholera. He was in the prime of life, and had a wife and child, who, with himself, were almost in a state of starvation. Studiously did he conceal his circumstances from all, until he had parted with every article of furniture, as well as wearing apparel, (except what was indispensably necessary) until nothing was left to support him and his family. Having been without employment for a long time, and his food being of the poorest kind and that very stinted, his system could not bear up against the disease under which he was suffering. In a small room without chair, table or bed, the poor man lay on the floor, attended by his wife and a relative, who, although they endeavored to soothe his mind, could do nothing to alleviate his pain of body. He was a Churchman, intelligent, educated and pious. He received the Holy Communion, and expressed himself prepared to abide by whatever was the will of God concerning him. Whether life or death was before him, he was resigned. Still, amidst the consolations of religion, thoughts of leaving his wife and child in a state of suffering and want, gave him much uneasiness. Visiting him from day to day, I found that (notwithstanding his disease) he still knew me, and would fervently join with me in prayer. Notwithstanding the use of medicines and nourishment, he sank under his disease, and while expressing full confidence in the blood of Christ to atone for his sins, his spirit happily departed this life to enjoy a blessed immortality. Through the kindness of Christian individuals, he was buried with becoming decency. It was my mournful duty to read over his ashes the sublime burial service of the Church in which he had been baptized, confirmed, and in which he had fed upon "the spiritual food of the most precious body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ." The Lord, for wise reasons, had afflicted him and his family; but, in the dark hour of trial, raised up for them kind friends who supplied them with what was necessary, and furnished employment. Thus has God, by touching the hearts of some with pity, shown that this dying Christian might in the midst of the severest poverty, confide in Him who has said, "Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive; and let thy widows trust in me."

Sometimes, from the sick room I have to go to the hall of justice and the prisoner's cell. A boy, a native of an adjoining State, during the past summer, left his friends with the ostensible purpose of coming to this City for employment. Whether he had been acquainted with juvenile thieves in his native State, or not, I could not discover. Here, however, he became acquainted with those who soon made him an accomplished thief. The companions he chose, soon removed from his mind whatever good had been sown there by his Sunday School teacher. I received a letter from a relative of his, stating that he was in prison, and requesting me to interfere on his behalf. I immediately waited upon the Civil authorities, and soon learned the nature of the charge against him. After many interviews with the magistrate, and the merchants who had been robbed, I succeeded in getting him released from prison and placed in the House of Refuge. The managers (through their Secretary) very kindly listened to all I had to say for him, and agreed to take him. His relations were satisfied with this, and although they have not seen him since he left home, yet they correspond with me and inform me that he is sensible of his crimes, and gives evidence of a better disposition. This corresponds with what I hear from time to time from the officers of that institution. I am informed that his impatience under restraint is lessened, and his spirit of insubordination considerably weakened. Time will show whether he will prove a good member of society. He is now engaged in manual labor, and will be put into some way of earning his living, and it is hoped that the moral training he is undergoing may be blessed to his temporal and spiritual good. In his early years, he was deprived of both his parents. He knew not a father's guiding hand, nor a mother's pious care. Thrown among evil companions, temptations were laid in his path, and he was allured from the house of God and the Sunday School. By his departure from the path of rectitude, he was soon placed within the walls of a prison. How necessary is it for those who have no parents and teachers, to be kept from the devastating influence thrown around them in large cities!

On one occasion I was visited by a poor widow, in great distress of mind, who informed me that her daughter had left her, and requested my aid and advice. She could not account for the abrupt departure of her daughter, as she had always conducted herself as a kind and affectionate daughter. I at length discovered that she had gone upon the Stage under an assumed name, and thus for a time eluded the vigilance of all who were interested in her welfare. On her being known to be in another city, her distressed mother went to see her and had an interview with her, in which she stated her motives for acting as she had done. Owing to the temporary close of the theatre, she is lost sight of; but it is hoped from the interview I have just alluded to, that her affection to her parent is not lessened, and that by proper means she may be induced to return and live with her afflicted mother. There are many who would blame this young woman. Such should pause before they rashly pronounce judgment against her. Without any one to direct her, she left home with the determination no longer to see her poor mother and herself work for what was not adequate to procure the necessities of life. She thought she would endeavor to procure a situation that would place her mother and herself beyond the reach of want. Not knowing where to go, and without any plan, she left her native city, and after paying her traveling expenses, found herself in a strange city, at nightfall, with seventeen cents in her possession, twelve and a half cents of which she paid for her lodging. The following morning found her wandering about, seeking for employment. Desponding and grieved, and unnoticed by any, she knew not what to do. To return to her home was impossible. To engage in needle work would be but going to that she had fled from. This, however, she sought, but no regard was paid to her application. The following evening found her penniless. Her tears fell fast; her sobs were loud and frequent; but no one heeded her. She was in an agony of mind as she thought of her mother. In this state of mind, she found herself standing near a theatre. The paroxysm of her feeling having subsided, she was calm enough to see that young girls were advertised for to appear in the ballet, and engage in the choruses and processions. What could she do? No friend was near. With very little hope of being accepted, she made an application to the Manager and was engaged. In a few minutes she was upon the Stage, weak, owing to want of food and anxiety of mind. In three hours afterwards she received a sum of money that enabled her to appease her hunger and procure a night's lodging. Her fears of passing the night in the streets, exposed to insult, having been removed, she continued night after night at the theatre and soon became an actress. This is but one of many cases that I have observed where mischief is swift to enter the thoughts of those who are rendered desperate by very limited means of living. Many young girls like her, dissatisfied with the paltry wages earned by needlework, are willing to hazard any trial to better their circumstances. At that particular juncture, when the mind is excited under a sense of wrong inflicted by society, some timely aid rendered to procure articles of clothing, furniture or food, together with the comforts of the divine religion of the Son of God, would change the current of the thoughts, and infuse content and satisfaction to the desponding heart.

Passing along the streets one day, I saw a family, consisting of a man, his wife and three children, standing still without speaking a word to any one or to each other. My knowledge of that class of people led me to speak to them, and I soon observed that my noticing them and enquiring into their circumstances gave them pleasure, as well as hope. I found, on inquiry, that they had been in the City three days, and were almost destitute. Thirty seven and a half cents they paid each night for beds, (if beds they might be called) and in the day time they bought a fourpenny loaf of bread and ate in the streets. They were all members of our Church and have shown since that they are steady, temperate and pious. I went with them and procured a room for them, gave them groceries, and with a little aid made them comparatively comfortable.

These are but a few cases of those constantly occurring. There is no need however to amplify, as my object in writing is to show you how matters are brought to my notice that would otherwise probably not be known to any one.

I wish to mention to you the importance of a temporary home for the destitute, where lodgings and food could be furnished at such a moderate price as to secure, not only the comfort of those who would partake of the benefits provided, but would render it unnecessary to furnish money for food, rent and lodging. I find that lodging houses can be made partly mercantile and partly benevolent. The first cost is great; but they become self-supporting in time, and the money can be repaid to shareholders in yearly or half-yearly dividends. For the poorest, who have a scarcity of fuel, and live in dilapidated garrets and cellars, such lodging-houses would be a protection against the inclemencies of the winter. They would likewise afford a shelter to those who have no home, and who sleep in unfinished houses or market places. A portion of one of such buildings, or separate buildings of a more expensive kind, should be partitioned off in rooms for families, together with baths, cooking utensils and a heating apparatus. The poor who are not in a state of destitution could procure all such conveniences for a far less price than they could give for an unfurnished single room, without fuel or use of cooking utensils. In this better class of buildings some charge must be made; in order to prevent an overthrow of all self-respect and self-dependence. In some cases (of which a committee should judge) it might be necessary, for a limited period only, to furnish room rent at a very moderate charge; but, it should be considered as a general thing that no families can be admitted, except on an express agreement to pay the usual charge. This is necessary, as I find that constantly giving away for nothing but encourages and actually increases pauperism. Connected with such buildings should be a home of industry, where work could be furnished to respectable women at better prices than the present low rate of female labor.

Such a plan would I believe bring about a reformation among the poor, and tend to bring them from that degraded state into which many are sunk through poverty.

I have wandered from my subject, through my thoughts dwelling on some plan for the amelioration of the circumstances of the virtuous poor. In conclusion I would state, that I endeavor, as City Missionary, to carry the blessings of God's house to the abodes of poverty and wretchedness, and to give spiritual relief to those who have no connecting link that binds them to any of our Churches. Many of the baptized of our Church immigrate to our shores. The disappointments many of them meet with, instead of urging them to, too frequently keep them from, the house of God. They are unknown personally to any of the Rectors of our Churches, and consequently have to be sought in the garrets and cellars near the wharves. Among some of these, I have seen religion light up with holy pleasure the eyes of the dying, who, having experienced in our City suffering and want, have been thankful that they received the blessings of the Church of Christ, as they had enjoyed them in their father-land. I have no doubt that there are those who, interested in my Mission, pray God's blessing upon my labors for the promotion of the spiritual good of the poor of this City. I know that a cup of cold water, given in the name of a disciple, shall not lose its reward. Surely, then, God will own what is done in his name—to convert souls from death—feed the hungry—clothe the naked—visit those who are sick and in prison—for his words are "Verily I say unto you, inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

This was the last service of the Visitation. In the course of it the Bishop has ordained 2 Priests, consecrated 5 Churches, officiated 44 times in 41 Parishes, and confirmed 540 persons. In the discharge of these duties he has travelled within the Diocese about 800 miles—to which are to be added the 500 miles of journey to and from his residence in New Hampshire.

We hope to welcome the good Bishop to the Diocese again, as we learn that the Standing Committee have invited him to continue to perform Episcopal Duties among us for another three months—that is, until Easter. If, on his return home, he is able to accept the invitation, it is probable that he will spend several weeks among us in Lent, and hold Confirmations in the cities of New York and Brooklyn.

The Rev. Thomas Applegate, Deacon, has been recommended for Priest's Orders by the Standing Committee of the Diocese.

Letters Dismissory from the Diocese of New York have been granted to the Rev. Samuel L. Southard, to the Diocese of New Jersey, and to the Rev. Richard Whittingham, Jr., to Western New York.

CHRIST CHURCH, DAYTON.

The Church edifice in this parish has recently undergone a thorough improvement, and its interior now presents the appearance of a new and very handsome and convenient building. About fifty of the sixty-four pews are rented, and large and attentive congregations attend upon the services of the Sanctuary.

Its members generally seem to be determined that it shall rise, by the blessing of God, from its past depression, and the prospect of valuable accessions in view of the growth of the city is quite encouraging.

The Rev. J. B. Britton has accepted a call to the Rectorship of this parish at a salary of $800, and entered upon his duties in this improving city of 14,000 inhabitants, on Sunday, the 18th of November, the twenty-third after Trinity. J. B. B.

BISHOP McILVAIN'S VISITATION TO THE PARISHES AT SPRINGFIELD AND URBANA.

On Advent Sunday, Dec. 2d., Bishop McIlvain preached in Christ Church, Springfield, and admitted the Rev. Chandler Robbins to the holy order of priests. The Rev. Chas. B. Stout, with the Rev. Mr. Blake, united in imposition of hands, and assisted in the administration of the Sacrament.

In the P. M., the Bishop preached and confirmed three persons.

Monday evening, Dec. 3d, the Bishop made his primary visitation to the new parish in Urbana, where in the Baptist Church, he read prayers, preached and confirmed five persons.

His address on the origin and nature of this Apostolic rite was appropriate and interesting.

This was the first occasion on which confirmation had been administered in this place. The marked attention given, and the solemn stillness of the entire congregation, which was large, tending much to the impressiveness of the same.

The new Episcopal Church now erecting for this infant parish, is already enclosed, beautiful in all its proportions, we humbly trust it will be the joy of many generations. But eighteen months have passed since this parish was organized. It now numbers about twenty communicants. The Church has been greatly admired by all who have seen it, among whom we may mention our beloved Diocesan.

May the Lord graciously visit this vine of His planting, watering it with the dews of heavenly grace, and may numbers of such as will be saved have it said in time to come—"they were born there."

THE SON OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN.

No. II.—REFLECTIONS.

MR. EDITOR:—

Whether we adopt the usual interpretation of the grand prediction recorded in Isa. vii., or the one submitted in my last paper, that wonderful vaticination points clearly and fully to the Redeemer of the world. The sublime truth was foreseen and foretold, that He, "begotten of the Father before all worlds," all time, is the Son of the Blessed Virgin. Some Reflections on this article of the faith may properly and profitably attend our Christmas celebrations, and are here offered to the notice of the indulgent reader.

The restoration of the sinner to the favour of God, of that God in whose sight no iniquity can dwell, is, in every view, a most profound mystery. It is deeply wonderful, that God, essentially thrice holy, should have a thought even of accepting a sinful creature, to whom innocence is but an imagination, and whose most complete repentance is never without defect. It is wonderful, that the Father gives His Divine Son, the only and eternally Begotten, to effect the recovery of beings so unworthy. It is wonderful, that He, who "was with God," and who "was God," united Himself to human nature, to a human being, "and was made in the likeness of men," perfectly human,—leaving "the form" and prerogative "of God," for the condition of "a servant" to the Creator, and indeed to men. And, to complete this circle of mysteries, it is wonderful that, at the Incarnation of the Messiah, a "body was prepared for Him" in the supernatural way penumbally imparted to the first man and woman just losing Paradise, and broadly and explicitly unfolded to Isaiah. The Saviour of Adam's whole fallen progeny was the 'Seed of the woman,' the Son of the Virgin "highly favoured" of God.

Yet the mystery of the divine Incarnation of Christ, rejected by only a few, is no more incredible than the other mysteries just enumerated. We may as readily believe in the wonder of the mode of His birth, as in that of His veiling divinity in a human existence,—or, in that of God's yielding His Eternal, His beloved Only Son, to ransom us by His agony and death, yea, while we were yet His enemies,—or, in the greatest wonder of all, that a sinful creature can be spared, pardoned, accepted, welcomed, rewarded, by the immaculate and immaculable HOLY ESSENCE. If we allow these exalted articles of the faith,—and they all are plainly taught us of God, so that we cannot reject them without "making Him a liar"—and the last of them, the relenting of the PURE towards the impure, can never be renounced, without annihilating every worthy hope,—if we admit these vital doctrines, we should be only capricious in repelling the further truth, both prophesied and declared fulfilled as clearly as any in the Bible, that the Messiah was born supernaturally, as announced by Isaiah, and St. Mathew, and St. Luke.

Nor is this an unmeaning mystery, an obstacle placed arbitrarily at the threshold of Christianity, but a link in the catenation of wonders arranged for our redemption. We know not all the reasons why Jesus had not a human father. One however may be gathered, and is recognized in our Article 9,—that He might be without original sin, innate depravity. Depravity is inherited (Ps. li. 5; John iii. 6; Luke i. 35; Eph. ii. 3,) by all who have only the human parentage. Christ's parentage was human, yet also more than human: and thus He was untouched by the wrong propensities which exist, and only wait their development, in every infant. By the mysterious Incarnation, Jesus was "that Holy Thing born" of the Virgin, altogether pure from our universal and inherent moral imperfection, thro' which we are "gone from original righteousness and are of our own nature inclined to evil." The Redeemer was "made like unto His brethren in all things" except only sin and infirmity. He had no share in the fallen nature of Adam, but like the pristine Adam, each produced by God Himself, was in complete human perfection; nothing of moral deterioration was born with Him, as there is with every other individual of Adam's race. And, besides being thus free from all original defect, He was also clear from actual transgression; for He "did (committed) no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth."

And this perfect innocence of the Redeemer was required, in order to His being made the Victim for us; and here the doctrine of the Incarnation becomes all-important, practically. Like the old prefigurative sacrifice, He was a Lamb without blemish. Had Jesus been involved in the least personal guilt, personal unworthiness, personal unfitness,—instead of being our atonement, He must either have suffered for His own fault or been in disfavour through natural imperfection; or else, like us, He must have depended on a Propitiation not to be found in the sinner. But He was, in no meaning whatever of the term, a sinner, but always the "Holy thing" which He was born,—the very sacrifice required for unholy man. No guilt ever knew He, except as there was laid on Him the tremendous burden of the infirmities, the follies, the offences, the crimes, of the whole world. Who then would deny the miraculous origin of the "Man Christ Jesus," and degrade Him to the moral standing of those who, by natural inheritance, are sinners? The heart soundly humbled will reject the entire falsehood.

The love of God, inclination wider than self, was the fundamental principle or motive in the creation of other beings. The mercy of God, or favouring love for erring yet reclaimable creatures, is the fundamental principle of kindness to the unworthy, of forbearance and a further trial for all, also of pardon, and of acceptance and reward, for the penitent. These principles, we may humbly think, go to the root of the cases in the mind of God. In, however, the operative working of both these principles, the MEDIATION of the Son of God, His making creation and forbearance and forgiveness harmonise with the intensely perfect purity of God, is the basis of all the Godhead did or counseled out of Itself. And more especially, in the operative working of pardoning mercy, and the consequent helping grace, helping and conquering and crowning grace, the INCARNATION, the birth of the Divine Son of the Blessed Virgin, is of course the groundwork of all the human acts and endurances of Jesus; and the more eminent of those endurances and acts,—His humiliation, temptation, fasting, tears, agony, scourging, crown of thorns, cross, dying passion, resurrection, ascension, intercession at the mercy-seat,—these His works and sufferings effected, and yet are effecting, our salvation and sanctification. His supernatural birth was the Incarnation of the Divine Second Person; and through His Incarnation He was capable of this toil and misery and triumph in our behalf. Through the triumph, also, of the Incarnate Son, through His conquering evil by the agony of the cross, He obtained and confers the saving effusions of the Holy Ghost. And, 'because He was thus born the Son of Man, He hath also authority to pronounce and to execute the final judgment.' So universally doth the grand truth, that Christ "was Incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary," pervade our religion throughout, as absolutely essential, as vital.

By soundness in this article of the faith, we give due respect to the word of God. We are not tempted to expunge the part of St. Matthew's Gospel containing this mystery, and determining the prophesy uttered by Isaiah. Suppose the erasure made. It is contrary to all the ancient authentic copies of the New Testament. Why not mutilate any other part of that volume? If one party rejects God's declaration that Christ was born miraculously, another may discard His record that "the Word was God," verily the Eternal Son, eternally begotten,—another, all that relates to the Atonement,—another, the credentials of the Church, "elect and precious,"—or of the Ministry, God's own ambassadors,—another, the revelation of the resurrection of the body,—another, the warning of the unchangeable perdition hereafter. And why may not the atheist complete the enormity, and cancel every word implying that there is a God, and cull from the Bible worldly morals only? Once begin with the annihilation of a scripture, because it affirms a mystery, and it is mere caprice, not faith, to stop the destruction till all is abandoned. And the only preventive (God forgive the calm expression) is to embrace with perfect heartiness and perfect conviction,—and with earnest prayer that the Spirit will hallow the heartiness,—and the conviction into faith,—the whole Volume, and its whole contents.

The "handmaid of the Lord" gratefully acknowledged the distinction conferred on one so humble. Descended from royal David, the lapse of centuries had brought her to a poor and lowly station,—and she declared both her meekness and her holy thanks, "He hath exalted them of low degree." Eminent is this utterance among the scriptures that whisper or proclaim the benefit of undistinguished fortune. To HER first was it verified, that "the Gospel is preached to the poor." All indeed, in every condition, are invited to accept the Saviour, and obey Him, and share His reward. Yet such are men in prosperity, that, too generally, they will not feel God to be their supreme portion and delight, and the future world incomparably better than the present;—"not many mighty, not many noble, are called," i. e. regard the call, let it reach them,—"how hardly shall they that trust in riches enter the kingdom of heaven!" Let all in such danger, see it, and be humble, and be guarded, earnest continually in seeking the mighty help from above. And let the faithful in worldly darkness be inspired by the honour given to Mary, and by the declaration of her Divine Son, "whosoever shall do the will of my Father, is my brother, and sister, and MOTHER."

And this solemn and remarkable declaration may guard us against undue reverence for the Mother of our Lord. She claimed and predicted that "all generations would call her BLESSED," and that is her due from every Christian. Beyond this hallowed regard, this scriptural and authoritative deference, there can be no sound veneration. To worship her with prayers and praises, is rank idolatry; or, with lower invocations, a lower yet also real idolatry. That she was born without original sin, is a blasphemous fable, derogating from the sole honor of Christ, and weakening the high doctrine of the Atonement, which requires the spotlessness of the Victim. Her assumption into heaven is another fiction. "Blessed"—that is the one distinction of the Virgin mother; and "blessed" be she throughout "all generations." Amen. Yet, "rather blessed are they that hear the Word of God and keep it."

A final (accommodated) view of the mystery before us has been offered, to soothe, to encourage, to animate the burdened and contrite soul under severe depression. When the g dly, "in darkness and in the deep," are made to "possess their former iniquities," the words of the angel may well bring them comfort, "with God nothing shall be impossible." There is pardon for even the greatest sinner. He who hath promised is faithful; and in due season they will reap, if they faint not. And here is the profoundest mystery of all,—that the creature corrupt and guilty can be cleansed and pardoned and immaculately purified, and thus taken (ah, without the Gospel it is morally inconceivable!) to the home and the bosom of THE THRICE HOLY, "dwelling in the overpowering light of sanctity which no faulty man can approach unto." Yet "it is not impossible,"—it is promised, it is covenanted, in the blood of Jesus. "Blessed" then is the penitent and still humble soul "that believeth,"—"for there shall be a performance," through the Son of the honoured Virgin, "of those things which are told it from the Lord."

NASHOTAH.

MR. EDITOR:

Will you have the kindness to publish, for the information of your readers, the following extracts from two private letters, received within a week, one from a lady in the neighbourhood of Nashotah, the other from a missionary in the far West?

"We had yesterday a long visit from two of the Nashotah students; poor fellows, they are anticipating a winter of famine. I had no idea the mission was so poor. They have decided that they must retrench, and I understand they are not even to have sugar. It must be pretty hard to study on such a regimen."

The writer says, "I have not received a dime on my missionary stipend for the last fourteen months. As you may suppose, I am living on the ruinous credit system. I have had to pay ten per cent. on money which I was obliged to have. What is the matter? Where does the evil lie? But I still keep hoping on. If I have my health I can keep up; if not, then a failure must follow."

"For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife by the husband; else were your children unclean; but now are they holy."—1 Cor. viii. 14.

Your remarks, Mr. Editor, on the Rev. Dr. Hare's Sermon called to my remembrance the exposition of the passage above quoted contained in D'Oyly & Mant's Family Bible. Wells, Whitby, and Burdett, are the authors referred to by the English compilers, and to their interpretation Bishop Hobart adds the following sentence from Bishop White:

"The Greek word [rendered holy] is commonly translated 'saints,' which shows that the children of Christian parents have an hereditary right to the benefits of the Christian covenant; the seal of which is baptism."

With the highest respect for the writers named, I am compelled to differ from them in their views of this passage. It will, no doubt, be admitted that Bishops White and Hobart would, if the children of unbelieving parents had been presented by suitable sponsors, have admitted them into the Church by baptism, and after baptism pronounced them "regenerate and grafted in the body of Christ's Church." Such children, therefore, would have had a right to the benefits of the Christian covenant. And would it not have been a perfect right? Would their right have differed from that which is here styled "hereditary?" If it would, what constitutes the difference? Regenerating privileges are alike vouchsafed to the baptized children of the unbelieving and to those of the believing. Unless, therefore, this difference of "right" can be explained, I must hesitate in adopting the exposition of the venerated prelates.

Another objection is, that St. Paul in this verse appears to place the "sanctified" unbelieving parent in the same category with the "holy" children. For the first, he uses the verb Hagiazdo; for the other, the adjective Hagios. The unbelieving parent seems, by the matrimonial alliance, to be made holy in the same sense that the children of the believing are holy. Does it not follow, then, that if these children have an hereditary right to baptism, their unbelieving parent has some peculiar sort of right to the same, growing out of the marriage relation?

It is worthy of observation that the judicious Bishop Seabury, in his able sermon on Infant Baptism, makes no allusion to 1 Cor. vii., 14, while Presbyterian writers generally rely on the verse to sustain their views. Bishop Seabury (p. 113 and p. 119) says, that "the infants of Christian parents have a right to Christian baptism, on account of the faith of their parents, or of those Christian people who have charity enough to bring them to Christ in his holy ordinance;" and that "all such infants as come to Christ, that is, as are brought by Christian people to baptism, have a right to be admitted into the kingdom of God, &c." Calvin says, that as Paul in Rom. ix., 7, 8, "argues that the children of the Jews were sanctified by their parents; so in another place (1 Corinthians, vii.) he teaches that the children of Christians derive the same sanctification from their parents;" and hence he contends for infant baptism. (Institutes, p. 562, Mackenzie's translation.) Witsius: "Even the children of believers have received the Holy Spirit, for otherwise" they could not "be holy, which yet Paul declares them to be." (Of Baptism, in the Economy, iii. 412.) Dr. Dwight of Conn.: "The only appointed way in which children may be offered to God is baptism; the children of believing parents are therefore to be offered to God in baptism." (Theology, iv. 335.) These Presbyterian writers do not seem to have reflected on the objection founded on the Greek words employed by the Apostle.*

A word or two in reference to the interpretation which is sanctioned by the Baptists. In order to parry the argument of the Pedobaptists, they tell us that Hagios, translated Holy, signifies Legitimate. They compel us to infer, therefore, that in St. Paul's view the children of all unbelievers were illegitimate. But, not to insist on the replies which are usually made to this exposition, I beg leave to ask them two questions: First, If Hagios means Legitimate, what does Hagiazdo mean? According to their exegesis, the sentence would read thus: "The unbelieving husband is made legitimate by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is made legitimate by the husband; also were

* Observe the consistency of the Calvinistic system: "Original sin (says Calvin) appears to be a hereditary pravity and corruption of our nature; diffused through all the parts of the soul." "Infants themselves, as they bring their condemnation into the world with them, are rendered obnoxious to punishment by their own sinfulness, not by the sinfulness of another. For though they have not yet produced the fruits of their iniquity, yet they have the seed of it within them; even their whole nature is, as it were, a seed of sin, and therefore cannot but be odious and abominable to God." (Institutes, p. 140.) The Presbyterian Confession of Faith (chap. vi.) declares that the guilt of the sin of our first parents, "they being the root of all mankind," "was imputed, and the same death in sin and corrupted nature conveyed to all their posterity, descending from them by ordinary generation;" and that by this original corruption, we are "utterly indisposed, disabled, and made opposite to all good." In the same Confession, (xxviii.) and in the Larger Catechism (ques. 166), we are assured that infants descending from parents, either both or but one of them professing faith in Christ, &c., are within the covenant of promise, and are to be baptized. One of the proof texts is 1 Cor. vii., 14.

your children illegitimate, but now are they legitimate!" Secondly: Are all children throughout the world who have unconverted fathers and unconverted mothers, to be accounted as illegitimate? If they were so in the Apostle's days, the presumption is that they are so now!

The argument, Mr. Editor, in favor of Infant Baptism, is irresistible without an appeal to the text under consideration. Why, then, should we attempt to strengthen it by relying on evidence so questionable? The meaning of the passage, in the humble judgment of your correspondent, is obvious, and it is this: The members of the Church at Corinth were aware that the term sanctification was used in different senses. It had been applied to persons and things. It had been employed absolutely and relatively. The children of a believing parent, they knew, were, in a certain sense, clean or sanctified. The Apostle, thereupon, advises them to adhere to their matrimonial engagements contracted with unbelievers, the unbelieving husband or wife being sanctified or made clean by the mysterious union, in just the same sense that the children of the believer were confessedly sanctified or clean.

THE ETERNAL SONSHIP.

IN BATTLE WITH ANTICHRIST.

MR. JOHN HENRY NEWMAN—a man who will be forever remembered as marking an era—in the last of those profound discourses preached by him before the University of Oxford, made the following statement: "Not till the thirteenth century was there any direct and distinct avowal on the part of the Church, of the numerical unity of the Divine Nature, which the language of some of the principal Greek Fathers prima facie, though not really denies." It is a melancholy fact, that there was a new definition of the Dogma of the Trinity imposed upon the Church in the thirteenth century—

"O Latio Caput horum et causa malorum!"

It is also true, that the notion then defined was denied, not merely prima facie, but distinctly and intentionally; and repeatedly by the principal Greek Fathers, and some Latin ones too. And Mr. Newman might as well have gone on and said openly and honestly what his words imply, that the definition in question as having been for so long a time unknown to the Church, is unknown to the Nicene Creed. But he spoke, not from himself, as I would hope, but, like the possessed of old, with the breath of Satan, when he uttered that statement. St. Paul distinctly and directly avows a "Numerical Unity of the Divine Nature." He avows it, in opposition to the many gods of the heathen, as the Bible does throughout. If they had many gods in number, and the Apostle in contrast speaks of one God; he distinctly and directly avows one God in number. There is no room for any evasion of this argument. The Apostle says, "We know that an idol is nothing, and that there is none other God but One. For though there be so called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, as there be gods many and lords many; yet to us there is one God even the FATHER, from whom are all things and we for Him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by Him. But this knowledge is not in every body!" Most prophetic sentence—Αλλ' ουκ εν παντι η γινωσκεις! In this passage the Apostle, as well as the Nicene Creed into which it has been incorporated, refers the existence of all things, (as elsewhere all Creatures "visible and invisible,") and thereby Omnipotence and every Divine attribute, jointly to the one Father and the one Son: distinguishing one Person from the Others as clearly as he could any individual subjects whatever, while he unites them in the power of one Divine Majesty or Godhead. That is, he considers the Father, as Scripture universally does, as the one Root and Fountain or Origin of Godhead. And such, too, is the only honest construction of the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, let men assail the statement with what objections and cavils they may. It is the word of Infallible Truth, and must stand. The Apostle enunciates the very truth revealed by our Lord to Saint Philip: "He that hath seen Me hath seen* the Father, and how sayest thou then, show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father and the Father in Me? The words that I speak unto you I speak not of Myself, but the Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works. Believe Me that I am in the Father and the Father in me, or else believe Me for the very works sake." And, again, (St. John v.) to the Jews, who inferred from his saying, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work," that, by calling God His Father, (in that true sense which the mention of the work implies,) He made Himself equal with God: Our Lord answered so as to confirm their inference, and, at the same time, to distinguish Himself from the Father, "Verily, I say unto you, the Son can do nothing of Himself, but what he seeth the Father do; for what things soever the Father doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise." (Let this argument from the common works be compared with the Nicene Creed). Nor is it only that class of works which imply creations: "For as the Father raiseth up the dead and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom He will. For as the Father hath life in Himself, even so hath He given to the Son to have life in Himself. For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son, that all men should honor the Son even as they honor the Father. He that honoreth not the Son (as Son) honoreth not the Father that sent Him." And still, again, in the promise of the Spirit: "All things that the Father hath are mine; therefore said I, He (the Holy Ghost) shall take of mine and shall show it unto you." In these passages, our blessed Lord condescends to state the facts of His Divine

* Because, as Athan. says, passim, "The Son, as being a true begotten Son, is the express image of the Father's person, subsistence, or substance." See the same, in Heb. chap. i. v. 3.

† "There is a vice in our creed, if there is any perceptible obscurity in God's words." (Hilar., de Trin., 7, p. 206.) That is, the only obscurity is in the subject of the words. For, if we fail to perceive the meaning of His words, who spake as never Sonship and Union with the Father, in the form of a series of similar arguments, so as to adapt the high announcement, as far as possible, to the minds of men, and to remove all room for misunderstanding Him.† The fact or doctrine, thus revealed and illustrated, is that which, as I have before said, was called perichoresis by the Greek Fathers. It is also lucidly drawn out from St. John v., by Hilary, Lib. 7. de Trin. It is that mutual indwelling, and close society of Father and Son, in which I affirm, upon the authority of Scripture, the Nicene Creed, and all truly Catholic antiquity, the mystery of the one Godhead lies hidden; but which is so far forth revealed, opened to us, by our Lord's words above cited. It is a unity in which the three Persons are not lost or confounded, but are rather kept so distinct, that we may have the Son, not as a name or relation, but as a substantial person before us; as the corner stone of faith, by whom alone we know or honor the Father. By this mutual indwelling They are one; not by a several subsistence in some third subject, or quasi-entity common to Both, but of Each wholly in the Other. And the idea of any other sort of Unity, is only subtle heresy, which expresses itself in various and most opposite ways—as Sabellianism, Arianism, or Unitarianism—all of which are the same in the principle of one negation. All deny the true consubstantial Son, under pretence of honoring the one Father, or of avoiding tritheism, or some other such foolish idol of their imaginations. But, in reply to this Jewish notion, our Lord says, "He that honoreth not the Son, honoreth not the Father who sent Him;" and He immediately adds: "Verily, verily I say unto you, He that heareth My word (the word He had been delivering,) and believeth in Him that sent Me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life." It is impossible to have any saving faith in the Father that is not fixed first on the Son, by whom and in whom He is revealed.

How the immortal Athanasius used the doctrine here delivered in the words of Truth Himself, in order to prove the Unity of Father and Son to be other than that of a solid simple unit, has already been shown in my No. I. His cotemporary Apostle, the great confessor of Christ's Sonship in the Western Church, speaks just like him. Discoursing on the words "I am in the Father, and the Father in Me," he saith, "Whole Son is begotten from Whole Father; not from anything external to Him, because nothing is before the Son; not out of nothing, because Son from God; not in part, because the fullness of Godhead is in the Son; what is in the Father, that is in the Son; what is in the Unbegotten, that is in the Only Begotten; One from the Other, and Both One. (unum.) The two are not a unit. (unus.) But One is in the Other, because nothing else is in Either." (L. 3. pp. 51, 52.) Also, on the words "'I and the Father are One,' (unum)." That conjunction 'and' does not admit the sense of a unit (unus), and the verb 'are' does not endure a singular sense: (7. p. 179.) that Those which are One (unum sunt) may be believed neither diverse nor singular, no other nature existing in Either, but the property of generation of nativity. (ib. p. 193.) For 'I and 'Father' are names of Things; unum is the expression of nature, because in that respect, what is in both is the same. (ib. p. 196.) In God the Father, and in God the Son, you shall neither number two Gods, because Both are One: (unum) nor shall you preach a single Thing, because both are not a unit. (unus) (p. 201.) To believe that in Father and Son are two God's, is impious; to preach Father and Son a Unitarian (singularum) God, is sacrilege: to deny 'God from God,' are One in the likeness of nature, is blasphemy." (p. 207.) It would be impossible here, as indeed it is useless, to cite his numerous condemnations of a Godhead consisting in One Thing, (una res). I refer to his whole work passim, and especially, to book vii., in which he so luminously discusses the perichoresis, or mutual indwelling, as containing the Mystery, and expressing the fact of the Union of Father and Son. I refer, also, to book viii., chap. 8, of Petrus de Trin., where he proves it to have been the doctrine of the Fathers, that the Trinity, or Divine Nature, is never called by them unus, as though it were a simple unit or Thing, but always unum; one in a generic sense. "For," says he, "if it should be said, Trinitus est unus, God is no longer understood, but one person—which it is not lawful to say, because it is Sabellian and heretical."

WORDSWORTH ON "JOINING THE CHURCH OF ROME."

REV. AND DEAR EDITOR:

The following extract, from the Canon of Westminster's Letters to M. Gondon, an eminent lay writer of the French Church, will be of service at this time, when the apostacy of a few mistaken individuals to the Roman Schism is the general theme of speculation among our "gude folks," who look up to the clergy as their best guides on earth, as well as among those other honest bodies whose fears of certain vague ultramarine influences, lead them to exalt their own intellectual ability to an equality at least with that of their teachers.

The truth contained in the extract, is best presented in the words of an elder and more competent personage than

Rev. J. A. Mervin, ECCLESIAE CATH. DIACONUS.

"I make a broad distinction between yourself, born in France and baptized in the Church of Rome, and remaining in its communion, and those who have been baptized in the Church of England, and fall away from it. Let the Church of England be as defective as they allege it is in means of spirituality and holiness, let her be as corrupt as we affirm the Church of Rome to be, still they cannot prove that she is not a Church, and that she is not the Church in which they themselves have been baptized; and unless they can clearly demonstrate that she has excommunicated them, by imposing on them sinful terms of communion, as we can show that the Church of Rome does excommunicate all those who cannot receive the unscriptural and anti-scriptural additions she has made to the faith of the Apostolic Churches, they have severed themselves from the Church, man spake, it is because we are suffering from the blinding effects of some latent heresy, and, consequently, can see "men only as trees walking."

and are guilty of the heinous sin of Schism. They are aiders and abettors of those who set up alt-r against altar, priest against priest, and bishop against bishop; that is, they are the promoters of "confusion and every evil work." It is in vain, therefore, for them to speak of their "having joined the Church of Rome:" they have joined no Church, nor can they do so. They are wilful Schismatics, and, as such, have put themselves out of communion with the whole Catholic Church. They are "sine matre, sine sede, orbi fide, extorres sine lare,"* like Cain. Let them even possess the knowledge of Apostles, and the faith of martyrs, and the eloquence of angels—yea, let them give all their goods to feed the poor, and their bodies to be burned, yet they have broken the bonds of Church unity,† and therefore they have not charity: for as St. Augustine says: "Non habent Dei charitatem, qui non diligunt Ecclesie unitatem;"‡ and therefore their gifts and graces, whatever they may be, profit them nothing, but only serve to increase their condemnation."§

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1849.

Mr. C. W. James, No. 1 Harrison street, Cincinnati, is our general travelling Agent for the Western States; assisted by J. R. Smith, J. T. Dent, Jason Taylor, J. W. Armstrong, Perrin Locke, W. Ramsay, and G. Steinman—receipts from either will be good.

BISHOP SOUTHGATE requests that all letters and communications may be addressed to him at PHILADELPHIA.

We have read with astonishment, the following article in "The Church," a paper of the Colonial Church, published in Canada. Had it appeared in some one of those blind partizan journals, whose life and soul are eaten out by the canker of political strife, it would have excited in us no wonder, and might have sunk unnoticed to the oblivion which it well merits. If it had appeared in a Journal with which we have had no past connection, it would have claimed no attention from us. But we have so often commended this Church Paper, for its just and manly expression of right principles, so often spoken of it in terms of praise, that we feel bound to proclaim our condemnation of this most unworthy article. Indeed we have never yet had the misfortune to meet with a more mischievous, narrow minded, bigoted and dishonorable perversion of the truth to serve a paltry end, than is afforded by this case. Sad, sad is it to behold our blessed and holy faith degraded, and the religion which points us to the better world, thus rudely thrust in, to turn the scales of a mere political question. Have the people of these United States ever asked for annexation, that their request should be rejected on the score of Atheism? The only action in this matter, comes from those who thus brand us as a nation of Atheists. But we will first give the whole article from "The Church," (the Canadian Church be it remembered) before we make any further remarks. And here it is word for word.

A NATION WITHOUT GOD.

In a recent number of Noah's Weekly Messenger, (edited it may be mentioned by a Jew,) we met with a remarkable illustration of the thoroughly infidel character of the American Republic.

It appears that during the last war between that country and Great Britain, an American privateer had succeeded in capturing two English merchantmen, and carried them into the Port of Tunis, to dispose of them and their cargoes.

This proceeding was protested against by the sufferers on the ground of its being illegal, and an appeal having been made to the laws of the country, the Consuls of both nations appeared before the Bey, when the following scene took place.—We quote the words of the Jewish writer, who evidently glories in his theme.

"What does all this mean, Consul—two British prizes entering our port, and for what purpose?"

"To sell them, your highness!"

"What? against our treaty with England?"

"Certainly not, if there is such a prohibition in the treaty."

The British Consul, a most excellent man, unrolled the parchment, to which a seal of wax was appended nearly as large as one of our Western cheeses, and commenced reading as follows:

"It is farther stipulated and agreed upon, that no European power at war with England, shall be permitted to fit out privateers or other armed vessels to cruise against the commerce of Great Britain, from, or bring prizes into the Tunisian ports."

"Well, sir," said the Bey, "what have you to say to that? Is it not full and conclusive?"

"Entirely so; but it does not apply to us. We are not an European power."

* Tertullian, Præscript. Hæret. 42.

† "Hence," says a Father, "he cannot be a martyr who is not in the Church."—E. C. D.

‡ Contra Donat. iii. 21.

§ Letters to M. Gordon, &c., on the Destructive Character of the Church of Rome, both in Religion and Policy, by Chr. Wordsworth, D. D., Canon of Westminster. London, 1847, pp. 6, 7, let. i.

"That, sir," said the British consul, "Is a mere evasion of the spirit of this section of our treaty. It was intended to apply, and does apply to all Christian powers."

"Very probably, sir; but we are not a Christian power." The Bey raised himself up from his cushions, took a hearty pinch of snuff from a splendid diamond box, and gave us an anxious and inquiring look.

"How will you make that appear, sir," said the British consul.

"Very easily, sir." We then read the following section from our treaty with Tripoli:

"As the United States is in no manner a Christian government, and entertain no hostility towards any denomination, it is hereby understood that no disturbance shall arise between the two powers on any religious question."

As a matter of course this put an end to farther debate. The wondering, and doubtless disgusting Bey gave judgment in favor of the "nation that knew not God," and the ships and their cargoes were forthwith sold to the highest bidders.

Christian subjects of a Christian monarch, who recklessly clamour for annexation, we implore you seriously to mark and digest the foregoing terrible case of national profligacy.

You there behold the people with whom you would seek to be united, disclaiming in cold blood the authority of their Heavenly King, even as they had previously rejected that of their legitimate earthly Sovereign. Like the Mammon-adoring Dutch, of Japan, you view them practically spitting upon them the emblem of human redemption;—and solemnly declaring (if the word solemnly can at all be applied to a proceeding which might be characteristic of the cabinet of Hell,) that the United States is in no manner a Christian government.

If the arch-fiend himself had framed that blasphemous and ghastly document, could he more emphatically have demonstrated the bitterness of his rancour, against the God whose authority he had contemned and resisted?

Let it be distinctly kept in view that the infernal treaty with Tripoli was the act of the United States as a Nation. It was the consolidated voice of the Republic, which virtually declared respecting the Redeemer: WE WILL NOT HAVE THIS MAN TO REIGN OVER US! Small wonder that the poor Jew Noah should have rejoiced in his blindness over this additional slight to the despised and rejected Son of David!

Churchmen of Britain, can any of you be so far bewitched by the Devil's golden sorceries, as deliberately to contemplate an amalgamation with this POLITICAL ANTI-CHRIST? Soberly reflect from whence you will fall, if you should unhappily accomplish such a catastrophe!

At the baptismal font your brows were traced with the eloquent sign of the Cross, in token that you had become liege soldiers of the crucified, and that you should never be ashamed to confess his faith whether before Heathen or Mahometan."

Has the service of Jesus become distasteful to you? Are you longing to be re-baptised in the name of this world's mercantile God? Are you prepared to desert the banner under which you swore manfully to fight, by joining a Government who, to secure some contemptible political advantage, hide the Cross in the presence of the Crescent,—and who, to win favour with the disciples of the false prophet of Medina, deny their connection with the God-man of Nazareth?

If you can bring yourselves to answer these solemn questions in the affirmative, continue to uplift the selfish cry of "Annexation"—but not otherwise!

Our brethren, the Churchmen of the United States, will not, we trust, misconceive the spirit which dictates these remarks. As a branch of Christ's visible fold, they are no more responsible for the political sins which we have been denouncing, than Saint Paul was answerable for the dark idolatries of heathen Rome, where he preached the truths, and administered the sacraments of the Gospel of his blessed Master. Like that inspired Bishop they render willing and scriptural obedience to "the powers that be"—an obedience not contingent upon the constitution or conduct of those authorities. And right certain are we, that were the Church in republican America, circumstanced as her Anglican sister is in this Province, her trumpet would give a sound unequivocal as our own,—and that she would contend, even as we are now contending for a national recognition of the Kingship of Immanuel.

The day is coming, and haply is not far distant, when our beloved sister will no longer have cause to keep silence as regards this great theme. In the crownless and unseparated regions of democratic Columbia the Lion of the tribe of Juda shall yet be politically acknowledged. As to this there can be no peradventure. Hear the magnificent words recorded by the wrapt seer of Patmos:

AND THE SEVENTH ANGEL SOUNDED: AND THERE WERE GREAT VOICES IN HEAVEN, SAYING, THE KINGDOMS OF THIS WORLD ARE BECOME THE KINGDOMS OF OUR LORD, AND OF HIS CHRIST; AND HE SHALL REIGN FOR EVER AND EVER!

The truth is, this article contains such a confused and stormy mob of errors, misrepresentations and fallacies, that we hardly know how to answer them in any order.

In the first place, as to the treaty itself, what are the facts? The treaty referred to, and very incorrectly quoted, is an obsolete one, so entirely forgotten in this country, that we doubt whether one in a hundred thousand of our citizens ever heard of it before. Indeed all with whom we have spoken, well informed on such subjects, have acknowledged their ignorance of it.

We find it, thus described in vol. 2d., p. 380, of "the Diplomacy of the United States," by Theodore Lyman, Jr. "In November, 1796, a treaty of friendship was made by Joel Barlow with Tripoli, under the authority of David Humphreys, minister of the United States at the court of Lisbon, "It is signed on the part of the United States, only by Joel Barlow, the Agent Plenipotentiary of the United States." The eleventh article reads thus, not as The Church quotes it, "As the government of the United States of America is not, in any sense, founded on the Christian religion; as it has, in itself, no character of enmity against the laws, religion, or tranquillity of Mussulmen, and as the said states never have entered into any war or act of hostility against any Mahometan nation, it is declared by the parties, that no pretext, arising from religious opinions, shall ever produce an interruption of the harmony existing between the two nations."

Our readers will please note the difference between the treaty itself and the pretended quotation. We will say nothing in reference to such peculiar quotations. Mr. Barlow's object seems only to have been to show that there was nothing in the Constitution of our government which prevented us from making a treaty of good faith with Mussulmen. He expressed this too strongly, but it must be remembered, that he addressed himself, not to the sharp apprehension of "the Church," but to the more obtuse understanding of the Tripolitans.

This treaty lasted less than three years. In the year 1805 a new treaty was formed. In this the objectionable article was amended thus: "As the government of the United States has, in itself, no character of enmity against the laws, religion, or tranquillity of Mussulmen," &c., stipulation is made that they shall not go to war about their religious differences, and provision is made that "the consuls and agents of both nations respectively, shall have liberty to exercise his religion in his own house!" A strange provision in a treaty made by "a nation without God!" The amount of this article is, that the American government had not "that character of enmity," &c., which made it necessary to engage in a crusade against Mussulmen on account of their faith. And, doubtless, this was all Mr. Barlow meant to express. He merely intended to say that we had no established form of religion. That we were not, like the powers of Europe, committed to the support of any peculiar form of Christianity, and therefore disqualified, by previous obligations, to enter into any treaty with Mussulmen. And certainly the express omission of the assertion that our government was not "founded on the Christian religion," seems intended to correct any such misapprehension. So that from this amendment we may gather a positive proof that Christianity is solemnly recognized by our government.

On this head we conclude, in the first place, that this obsolete treaty, if it meant all The Church declares, broken and annulled half a century ago, would prove nothing against our present national character. While taken in connection with the formal amendment of its objectionable article, it becomes a convincing proof that the American government does solemnly claim for itself the character of a Christian power.

Need we adduce other arguments to prove this? We can hardly think that even the author of this slanderous article doubts it. If he does, it is either because he is grossly ignorant, or blinded by prejudice. Let us then state, in brief, a few reasons.

I. In the first place, then, our general government recognizes its dependence upon God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. In every Message of our Chief Magistrate, this dependence is declared most solemnly. During the late visitation of pestilence, our President, of his own accord, recommended a day of fasting and prayer to Almighty God. And the earnest petitions of thousands in ENGLAND, could not obtain from their government a similar recognition of the Divine Sovereignty. The English papers then loudly praised our Christianity, at the same time delaring that we set an example to them—and now, because of an old and obsolete treaty, we are "a nation without God!" Again, both our Houses of Congress have Christian chaplains, our army and navy are supplied only with Christian chaplains. A strange waste of money for "a nation without God!"

II. Our State governments all recognise Christianity by official acts. Their State Legislatures, for the most part, have Christian chaplains. Their Governors, for the most part appoint an annual Thanksgiving day to Almighty God, owning His supreme rule on earth. Not long ago, the Governor of South Carolina officially recommended all to offer up their prayers and thanksgivings through Jesus Christ our Lord. At this the Jews took umbrage, and made a protest. The Governor answered them and defended his expression on the ground that our government was a Christian one, and recognized no other faith.

III. Christianity has been recognized by judicial decision, to be part of the Common Law of the land. Judgments to this effect have been given in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, (See Sergeant and Rawle's Reports, vol. 2. p. 394.) and also in New York. In these cases, offenders have been fined and imprisoned for speaking blasphemously of the Holy Scriptures, and of our Blessed Saviour. Justice Duncan of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, says: "Christianity is, and always has been, a part of the Common Law of Pennsylvania." And, (in Johnson, viii. 390,) we find a case, in which Chief Justice Kent presided, where this truth is laid down on principles which apply to the Common Law of the land. By this it is shown, that "Blasphemy against God, and contumelious reproaches, and profane ridicule of CHRIST, or the Holy Scriptures, are offences punishable at the Common Law, whether uttered by words or writings." We wish we had room to give in full the noble opinion of Chief Justice Kent, by which he sustains the judgment in this case, based on the principle that Christianity is protected by the law of this country. This is shown by the statute against the violation of the Lord's day, and "the act concerning oaths," &c.

IV. The great mass of our people "profess and call themselves Christians." Unworthy many may be of the name, but have they no such exceptions in Canada? The idea that the people of Canada have such religious superiority, is a joke which would be spoiled by any serious reply! "Sam Slick" would enjoy this. We would like much to know what proportion of the inhabitants of these provinces are sheltered under the Establishment? And yet for all, we are "a nation without God," and our Godly neighbors are afraid that we may make them also Atheists! Why, Mr. Editor the annexation fever has made you delirious, and so you do not write with your usual rational sobriety! Let us here assure you that while we thus condemn your want of reason, we agree with you in the conclusion to which it would lead. We do not consider you Atheists, but we consider annexation would be so unequal a match, that we hope, for our country's good, its consummation may be long deferred. We cannot but think what a time there would be at Washington, if your Parliament were added to our present Congress.

Had you not concluded your violent political article with that appeal to us in particular, as brother Churchmen, we had seen no cause to make this response. But you mistake entirely the spirit and feeling of Churchmen here. We are American Churchmen, and we desire no change in the relations of Church and State. If the State was to offer us such an unholy alliance, the offer would be rejected with scorn. We want no such mill-stone hanged about our necks. We have seen too much of the sad consequences resulting from such a union. Filial sorrow has often oppressed us, when we have beheld your noble Church, ruled by crooked State policy—its laws enacted by its bitterest adversaries—its Bishop's appointed by party influence—and their high offices degraded to the low use of party spoils. You assert, in fact, the monstrous proposition, that a State without an established Church, is "a nation without God!"

We hold that a Church ruled by a State composed of Jews, Infidels, and all kinds of so-called Christians, is a Church ruled by the God of this world. The Church in this land, though not allied to the State, is identified with our national character and institutions, and no compliments to her at the expense of these will ever be acceptable to her. We owe much indeed to the State, which, while it protects us in the enjoyment of all our rights, never interferes with our enjoyment of them. The prosperity with which God has blessed our Church in this land, proves that she can flourish under a Republic, and that standing on the Eternal Rock, she needs not the feeble arm of the State to support her. We deeply regret that in your effort to excite an unjust hostility to our country, among your own people, you have, at the same time, used arguments which may arouse, among our people here, prejudices against the Church of our love. If these are the strongest arguments you can bring against annexation, we fear you have a hopeless cause to defend.

INTERCOMMUNION BETWEEN THE ENGLISH AND AMERICAN CHURCHES.

MY DEAR SIR:—During the past summer I took advantage of a somewhat extended long vacation to visit a portion of the United States, and of the British Provinces of America. My own duties and studies, and a correspondence of some years' standing with our Colonial Bishops and Clergy, had made me naturally anxious to see something of the Western World; and the wonderful facilities for a voyage across the Atlantic, which are afforded by the Cunard Steamers, determined me at length to gratify what I trust may be called a pardonable curiosity. I have no intention, however, of inflicting upon your readers a detail of the ordinary occurrences, rather than events, of an Atlantic voyage and an American tour—such things happen, more or less, to every traveller alike, and though hardly more than enough to supply materials for a few familiar letters, are not unfrequently expanded into three volumes of post octavo.

Unless, therefore, I should receive some very tempting offer from a London publisher, I have no intention of adding another journal to the many already in existence, by various authors an authoresses, about men and manners in America. Still, I must confess myself to be so far affected by the prevalent contagion of authorship as to be anxious for a small space in your Magazine to express my feelings on one particular point; I mean, the intercommunion between the English and American branches of the Reformed Catholic Church. Wherever I travelled in the States, whether with or without letters of introduction, I was most kindly and hospitably received; and were this the fitting place and occasion, I could refer with pride and gratification to gentlemen of European reputation who took pleasure in showing civility to a stranger and an Englishman. But my special object is to record the marked kindness and attention which I received, as a Clergyman, from the Clergy and Laity of our common Church in America. To them my card alone seemed a sufficient introduction, and a claim for whatever kindness or hospitality they could show me. They seem to feel that the bond of Church membership constituted a natural connexion between us. Thus, wherever I passed a Sunday, I was invited to take part in the Church Services of the day, and I have only to regret that I heard but few of their preachers, in consequence of being so constantly called upon to occupy the pulpit myself. It certainly was a great privilege and comfort, while some thousand miles away from England, to find myself so entirely at home in church—to join in the old familiar Prayers—to hear the Lessons read from the same Authorized Version—and to sing the Lord's song in a strange land. I had the honour, during my stay in the country, to become more or less acquainted with a considerable number of the Clergy, and with several of their Bishops. It is no part of my present purpose to testify (as I could do most conscientiously) my belief that they are severally occupying the talents committed to them in the Lord's household well and faithfully. I wish rather to confine myself to the subject which I have above indicated, and in connexion with it to say, that each of the seven Bishops to whom I had the honour of becoming known, made me feel, by the cordiality of his reception and greeting, what Bishop McCoskry was kind enough to express in words when I first presented myself, that I was "not a stranger at all."

One characteristic anecdote I may be pardoned for relating, because it so aptly illustrates my present subject. On my way from Boston to New York I made a point of visiting Rhode Island, which has been made classical ground by the residence and labours of Bishop Berkeley. There happened on the day I was there to be a Convocation of the Clergy on some diocesan business. I had requested the Rector of Newport to order a carriage to take me after service to the "Dean's farm." Having accomplished my pilgrimage, settled my account at the livery stable, and taken leave of Bishop Henshaw and his Clergy, I embarked on board the steamer for New York. The day after my arrival there I received a letter from the Rector of Newport, apologising for the oversight of "not paying the driver," enclosing a note for three dollars, which was the amount of the fare, and begging me "to believe that Rhode Island Churchmen will gladly show kindness to a Clergyman of the Church of England, especially to one who is Secretary of a Society to which we are so much indebted."

I was really glad to accept this unusual, but most practical token of goodwill from an American brother, whom I am never likely to see again, both on account of the primitive kindness of the act itself, and because it is a memorable instance of that feeling of brotherhood which was exhibited in various ways by others. He will, I am sure, forgive me this public acknowledgment, out of respect for the motive which has dictated it; and I purposely avoid the risk of offending the delicacy of others, by withholding any particular mention of the little presents and keepsakes which on several occasions I received at parting.

I very frequently heard a regret, if not a complaint, expressed that so very few English Clergymen thought it worth their while to visit America; and although it is not to be expected that excursions across the Atlantic can ever become common, yet assuredly, where leisure and the other requisites can be commanded, the trouble and expense of the voyage will be well repaid. To say nothing of the cities, lakes and rivers of America, the people and their institutions well deserve an attentive study. But over and above all these objects of general interest, the English Churchman will have the opportunity of seeing how the Church in that land is enabled by God's providence and blessing to take root and flourish, without any of the external advantages which belong to it at home. The Mother and the Daughter Church may learn from each other lessons of wisdom, devotion, and self-denial; and these lessons will be best taught by a better understanding and a closer communion.

I do not therefore consider it extravagant to say that an interchange of visits between the members of the English and American Churches may be made conducive to most important ends.

Personal acquaintance tends powerfully to remove prejudice and to strengthen the bands of good fellowship; nor does it seem at all improbable, that on the harmonious working of the two main divisions of the Reformed Church will depend in a great measure the religious condition of that predominant race, English and American, which seems destined in the order of Providence to cover more than half the globe with a people speaking our common tongue.

Perhaps I may be thought to have indulged too much in general observation, yet I wish to add one more, and that of a political kind. It cannot be doubted that the Church in each country is a main security for peace and order; and it is not too much to hope that the communion yearly becoming closer and more intimate between the members of the Church on both sides of the Atlantic may tend to moderate political passions, and infinitely to diminish the chances of war. But I will not pursue these speculations.

I was anxious to say what I have now said, both out of gratitude for the kindness which I experienced in the United States, and for the other reasons of greater moment, to which I have adverted; and I would conclude with bespeaking the good offices of my brethren at home to such visitors as may come to us from across the Atlantic, were I not well assured that such a plea is altogether superfluous.

I am, my dear Sir, yours very truly,

ERNEST HAWKINS.

CONSECRATION OF THE BISHOP ELECT OF INDIANA.

For the following full account of this most interesting ceremony, we are indebted to a clergyman of Indiana.

We most heartily congratulate the Diocese of Indiana on having thus obtained a Bishop of its own, and one from whom so much may justly be expected. We need hardly add, that the new Bishop has our most hearty wishes for his welfare, and our earnest prayers that richest blessing may crown his labors in the wide field of usefulness upon which he is entering.

CHRIST CHURCH, INDIANAPOLIS.—The presiding Bishop having appointed the consecration of the Rev. George Upfold, D.D., Bishop elect of the diocese of Indiana, to take place on the third Sunday in Advent, in this Church, arrangements were made by the Rector and Vestry to receive and accommodate the Bishop, Clergy, and Lay members of the Church, who were expected to be present at the solemn and interesting service. The Church was opened for divine service on Thursday evening, when the prayers were read by the Rev. N. W. Camp, D.D., the Rector, and the Rt. Rev. B. B. Smith, D.D., Bishop of the diocese of Kentucky, preached a sound, forcible, and eloquent sermon from xvi. chap. St. Luke, 23d and 34th verses. The services were conducted on Friday evening by the Rev. R. B. Claxton, D.D., Rector of Christ Church, Madison, assisted in the lessons by the Rector. And after singing a portion of the 67th Psalm, the Rt. Rev. Jackson Kemper, D.D., who, for more than fourteen years, has been actively engaged as one of the chief missionaries of the Church, preached from xiii. chap. of the Hebrews and the 8th verse, "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever."

Bishop Smith and the Rev. George Upfold, D.D., Bishop elect, were present on the occasion.

Divine service was conducted on Saturday evening by the Rev. George Fiske, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, assisted in the lessons by the Rev. Dr. Claxton, and after singing the 82nd Psalm of the selection, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Smith preached a practical sermon from the iii. chap. of St. John, and part of the 7th verse, "Ye must be born again."

The Rt. Rev. Bishop McIlvaine was present on this occasion, as well as the Bishop elect.

THE CONSECRATION OF THE REV. DR. UPFOLD.—This interesting event, of so much importance to the welfare of the Church, and particularly so to the prosperity of the Church in the diocese of Indiana, took place in Christ Church, Indianapolis, on Sunday, the 16th of December, 1849, being the third Sunday in Advent. The Church was crowded, before the commencement of divine service, by a most respectable congregation, assembled to witness one of the most solemn and imposing services of the Episcopal Church.

Divine service commenced at half-past 10 o'clock, when the morning prayers were read by the Rev. George Fiske, assisted in the lessons by the Rev. N. W. Camp, D.D. The Rt. Rev. Charles P. McIlvaine, D.D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the diocese of Ohio, then gave out a portion of the 99th Psalm; after which the ante-communion service was read by the Rt. Rev. B. B. Smith, D.D., Bishop of the diocese of Kentucky, the presiding Bishop, and the portion of the Scriptures appointed for the epistle was read by the Rt. Rev. Cicero S. Hawks, D.D., Bishop of the diocese of Missouri, and the Gospel by the Rt. Rev. Jackson Kemper, D.D., Missionary Bishop of the North-west. The 97th hymn was then sung by the clergy and the congregation, when Bishop McIlvaine preached a sermon appropriate to the occasion, from iii. chap. of the Epistle to the Ephesians, and the 8th verse, "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ."

Immediately after the conclusion of this admirable sermon, worthy of the preacher and the occasion, the Bishop elect was presented to the presiding Bishop, for consecration, by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Kemper and the Rt. Rev. Bishop Hawks.

The presiding Bishop then called for the testimonials in favor of the Bishop elect, when the Rev. Dr. Claxton, the Secretary of the Standing Committee, read an extract from the journal of the Diocesan Convention, giving the account of the election of Dr. Upfold as the Bishop of the diocese of Indiana, by the clergy and lay delegates, assembled on the 29th of June last. He read also the testimonials of the said delegates in favor of the Bishop elect, as well as the testimonial of the Standing Committee of the diocese of Ohio. The testimonials of the other Standing Committees were not read, but the Secretary read the list of them, and stated that they were in the same form and words as that from the diocese of Ohio.

The presiding Bishop then required the Promise of Conformity to the Doctrine, Discipline, and Worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church, which was made by the Bishop elect in a distinct, clear, and audible voice.

The presiding Bishop then moved the congregation to pray that the divine keeping might rest upon their labors, and upon the person whom they were about to send forth, by reading the usual exhortation, when Bishop McIlvaine read the Litany.

The presiding Bishop, sitting in his chair, then addressed the several questions to the Bishop elect, which were responded to in a manner that clearly indicated that the reverend gentleman, to whom they were addressed, was deeply impressed with the weight of the obligation by which he was about to bind himself anew to the service of the Church, in the high and holy office to which he had been called by the suffrages of his brethren.

The Bishop elect was then robed, by the Rev. Robert B.

Croes and the Rev. J. L. Harrison, Presbyters of the Diocese, when the four Bishops present said the "Veni Creator Spiritus," and then, after offering up the solemn prayers appointed for the occasion, the presiding Bishop, with the Bishop of Ohio, the Missionary Bishop, and the Bishop of Missouri, laid their hands on the head of the Bishop elect, and solemnly consecrated him to the office of a Bishop in the Church of God, as the first Bishop of the diocese of Indiana. The Bishop of Indiana was then received within the chancel, and immediately commenced the labours of his arduous mission, by stating that the money collected at the offertory would be applied to the support of missionaries within the diocese, and the Bishop said, in substance, that he hoped that the collection would be such an one as would be worthy of the object, and of the respectable congregation gathered together on the occasion.

The presiding Bishop then proceeded with the administration of the holy communion, which he administered first to himself, and then to the four Bishops, and the five Presbyters present on the occasion. The holy communion was then administered by Bishops McIlvaine, Kemper, Hawks, and Upfold, to more than fifty persons, when Bishop Hawks offered up to the Throne of Grace the concluding prayers of the communion service, and Bishop Smith the last prayer of the consecration service, and pronounced the benediction.

The weather had been very inclement, and the streets were wet and muddy, from the recent thaw; but, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather and the condition of the streets, the church was crowded to excess, by one of the most respectable congregations ever seen in Christ Church, Indianapolis.

Thus Bishop Upfold has been consecrated to the office of an Apostle and one of the chief shepherds of the flock of Christ, and most heartily do his friends wish him success, and most confidently do they believe that he will be assiduous and faithful in performing the duties of his office, and in building up the Church in the Diocese, which has been with so much solemnity and so many prayers committed to his charge. On Sunday morning, the service of the Church was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Camp, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Claxton, after which Bishop Upfold preached an eloquent and highly impressive sermon, from 6th chap. St. John, and part of the 68th verse, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life."

The sermon having been concluded, the 90th hymn was sung, and the Rev. Dr. Camp read the preface to the confirmation service, and presented three candidates to receive the Apostolic rite of confirmation. The Bishop confirmed three candidates, and delivered a brief, but highly practical address to them, and urged them by some of the most cogent and powerful reasons to advance in the Divine life, and to look to the Redeemer for grace to enable them to persevere, steadfast unto the end. The Bishop then closed the services and dismissed the congregation with the benediction. He left this morning for Cincinnati, from whence he proceeds to Richmond, where he expects to consecrate St. Paul's Church on Thursday, the 21st inst. And he intends (D. V.) to be in Madison on the 7th February, to consecrate the church-edifice recently erected there, which is represented by good judges and persons of taste, to be one of the best specimens of the style in which it is built, west of the mountains.

The estimation in which Bishop Upfold is held by the people of his present flock, may be learned from the fact that four of the members of his congregation travelled from Pittsburg to Indianapolis to be present at his consecration.

INDIANAPOLIS, DEC. 18, 1849.

TUPPER'S ANGLO-SAXON.

The first volume of this new periodical has just been received by Mr. Moore, 193 CHESTNUT-STREET, opposite the State House. The design of the work is to promote mutual good-will among the widely-dispersed communities of Anglo-Saxon origin, and to make them all better acquainted with each other. The plan thus allows a very great variety of subjects. The character and purpose of the Anglo-Saxon open its columns for antiquities and history, commerce and literature; for every thing which can interest, unite, and benefit the Englishman and American, the Canadian and Australian; the South African and the Anglo-Indian; the dwellers by the Essequibo, and the millions in the islands of the sea! That writer, who has anything important to tell, and who can rise above local topics, feelings, and prejudices, may, through its pages, address all who speak our language. Of the volume already published, it is not easy to say, whether its design or execution should be more highly praised; especially when we bear in mind the difficulties which beset a new Quarterly. The matter, type, paper, and embellishments, are all alike good. The parts that are issued contain many choice articles written by Mr. Tupper himself, thus giving the numerous admirers of the "PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY," an opportunity of keeping up a delightful intercourse with a favorite author. An Anglo-Saxon map gives additional value to the work; showing, at a glance, the wide diffusion of our race and language. It is to be hoped that this great enterprise will meet with a generous patronage in America, for, when many are willing to cause strife and disunion, it is the duty of all good men, by supporting a publication such as this, to promote peace and brotherly kindness. It is pleasing to see with what warmth the English Press, metropolitan and provincial, applauds and encourages this undertaking; and it is yet more pleasing to notice the friendly spirit with which many editors speak of the American people as a great branch of the Anglo-Saxon family. The sight of this volume and a perusal of its contents must assuredly lead many to become subscribers.

The yearly subscription is five dollars.

Obituary.

We regret that our account of the consecration of the Bishop of Indiana, is accompanied by the following intelligence. The mother entered into her eternal rest the day before her son assumed that office which brings, with its higher dignity, increase of care and labour. We take the following brief, but excellent notice, from the Pittsburg Morning Post.

On Saturday, the 15th instant, Mrs. MARY UPFOLD, in the 85th year of her age. Her funeral will take place this afternoon at half-past 2 o'clock, from the residence of her son, the Rt. Rev. George Upfold, on Cliff street. The friends of the family are invited to attend.

Though mingled with regret that so pure a spirit has flown, the decease of this most estimable lady is accompanied by all the consolations which flow from a virtuous life and a happy death. Spared to an advanced age—adorned by every Christian grace—revered and loved by a wide circle of friends, her transit from earth to heaven was calm and tranquil as the passage of happy health to sweet repose.

May her departed spirit be permitted to rejoice over the sacred offices which, this day, elevate her gifted son to the highest honours of the Church and consecrate his faculties to the service, in a larger sphere, of the immortal interests of his fellow man.

DIED, in this City, on Friday, Dec. 21st, the Rev. JOHN GORDON MAXWELL, Rector of Emanuel Church, Kensington.

Our departed brother had lately returned from Europe, whither he went for the improvement of his health. God had ordered it otherwise. While we must mourn the loss of a faithful and devoted fellow-labourer in our Master's vineyard, we must own that our sorrow is to him "joy unspeakable and full of glory." Mr. Maxwell largely shared the love and esteem of all his brethren, and has left an earthly record of faithfulness in his high calling which assures us that our sad farewells were followed by those words of happy welcome, "Well done, good and faithful servant enter, thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Died, on Sunday last, CLARA LOUISA eldest daughter of the Rev. JOHN COLEMAN, D. D., in the 10th year of her age.

The readers of the Banner will join with us in our deep sympathy with the parents, whose Christmas joy has thus been overcast by the "shadow of death." Yet is it consoling to think that the dark emblems of earthly sorrow may be twined with the evergreens which speak to our afflicted hearts of "life and immortality."

Dear little child, so gentle and attractive, thy voice which would have lent increased joy to an earthly festival, is now joined to the melody of that shining throng, who sing "as it were a new song before the throne!" The parents who have now consigned, in the blessed hope of immortality, five of their little flock to an early grave, are thus comforted by the voice of God's own Word. "These are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. These were redeemed from among men, being the first fruits unto God and unto the Lamb. And in their mouth was found no guile; for they are without fault before the throne of God."

CORRECTION.

In an article on DOMESTIC MISSIONS, in the last Banner, the words shime all should have read shimeall. Our Printer did not get hold of the writer's object, which was to turn this transient substantive into an intransitive verb.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have been obliged to defer again several communications. We take them in the order of reception, not of merit. Among these are "the Wealth of Earth," and "the account of the Schuylkill Convention," "Dela," &c., &c.

CITY MISSION.

An interesting report of Mr. Evans will be found in another column. His work, which strongly commends itself, is also warmly recommended by the Bishop of the Diocese, to the favour of Churchmen.

A HINT.

We are sorry the following could not be seen in time for Christmas, but our lay readers will perceive that it will answer just as well for NEW YEAR'S DAY. The Eagle, from its emblematic character, is decidedly to be preferred as a gift of love.

A GOLDEN DINNER.—A clergyman of our acquaintance in this city, received the following clever note yesterday morning.—Newark Advertiser.

"Dear Sir: Not having a turkey for my minister's Thanksgiving dinner, I send him two eagles instead. Yours truly."

New Publications.

Messrs. Stanford & Swords have just published, under the title of "Church Service," the Prayer Book and Lessons, in one volume. It is in a most convenient form for use, and very attractive in appearance. As a meet companion to this, they have also published,

THE CHURCHMAN'S HEAVENLY HOURS; or, daily approaches to God, in a series of prayers, meditations, and hymns. Selected from the most eminent writers.

This little book will be found a most useful help in private devotions.

Also, QUESTIONS ON THE GOSPELS. Advent to Whit-Sunday, by the Rev. R. Bethel Claxton, D. D., Rector of Christ Church, Madison, Indiana.

These questions seem prepared with great care and judgment, and the book will be found a most useful one in Sunday School and family instruction.

RECOLLECTIONS OF DEPARTED FRIENDS, by the Rev. Wm. Berrian, D. D. Rector of Trinity Church, New York, Stanford and Swords.

This is a most interesting collection of biographical notices of some of the distinguished among the Clergy and Laity of New York. Dr. Berrian's position brought him into intimate relations with them, and he largely shared their confidence and love. All the notices, and it is a most difficult kind of writing, are distinguished for the beauty of their style, and marked with discernment and good taste in the delineation of character. We shall recur with more particularity to this very interesting work.

We have not had time to examine, and we have no space to notice, two other works, by the same publishers. "THE WHOLE DUTY OF MAN, laid down in a familiar way," an English work, republished: and HISTORY OF THE AFRICAN MISSION, with memoirs of deceased missionaries, and notices of native customs, by Mrs. E. F. Henning. The title of this latter work will commend it to those interested in the subject.

FROM ENGLISH CHURCH PAPERS.

The newly-appointed Bishops of Norwich, Llandaff, and Madras, are to be consecrated the second Sunday in the ensuing month, (December) by his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, at Lambeth Palace.

The Tablet of this week contains an ordinance of Dr. Wiseman, Roman Catholic "Vicar Apostolic of the London District," enjoining that, "Votive Masses and Offices of the Conception of the B. V. M." the word Immaculata be joined to the word Conception, and that, in the public recitation of the Litany of Loretto the words Regina sine labe originali concepta be always added.

ITALY.—The return of the Pope still remains doubtful. One account states that he will re-enter the Holy City early in December, whilst another states that the French soldiers are vigorously engaged in making their quarters comfortable.

A FEW PLAIN WORDS TO ATTENDANTS ON THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

"Let all things be done decently and in order."—1 Cor. xiv. 40.

My friend, allow one who feels a deep interest in the prosperity of true and pure religion, to address a few words to you, in relation to your position as an attendant on the worship and services of the Church. The subject on which I propose to speak can scarcely be called religion itself; but since the Gospel is intended to exert its influence over our daily thoughts and conduct, and since God often causes the well-being of his Church to depend on circumstances apparently small in themselves, we can seldom fail in doing good or harm just in proportion as we attend to or neglect those things which many are inclined to consider trivial. It is a wise saying, that "he who is careless of little things, shall perish by little and little." How many parishes have been injured, how many clergymen have been obliged to forsake their posts, how many souls have been lost, in consequence of some error or inattention on the part of the congregation? something which at first appeared to be trifling, but which proved to be the prolific seed of great and uncontrollable evils. In order, therefore, that such unhappy consequences of want of thought may be avoided more frequently than they are, I wish to call your attention to your position and duty as a member of an Episcopal parish; and this I do the more readily, when I consider how many there are attending our services who were brought up under a different form of ecclesiastical government, and who come to us, not only with their former opinions and predilections still unaltered on many points, but with their minds, likewise, still uninstructed as to the peculiarities of the Church. Such persons frequently have not the means, if they have the desire, of fully informing themselves as regards our laws and government; and they fall into sad practical errors which they would willingly avoid if they but knew what was right and proper. Such persons, then, in common with all others, will find in the following lines a brief outline of the chief duties and responsibilities of an attendant on, or officer of the Church.

A PARISH, in its perfection, consists of: 1. a congregation; 2. a body of vestrymen and wardens; 3. a clergyman, with a church building; and all incorporated and united to the Diocese, according to the civil law of the state, and the ecclesiastical canons provided for the purpose. Each of these parties have their peculiar duties.

1. Let us consider, in the first place, the congregation. By this term is meant all persons who regularly attend upon the services, and consider themselves as connected with the parish, whether or not they are communicants. Now when we assume any character or connexion with our fellow men, there necessarily arise certain duties from such a connexion. We have voluntarily relinquished, in consideration of some expected good, a portion of our original liberty. We place ourselves in a position where others are induced to depend upon us, and where, according to our conduct, we may produce happiness or unhappiness to others, as well as to ourselves. He who becomes a member of a political body, or a voluntary society, virtually binds himself to certain acts, and to give a certain portion of his time, influence, or money to the support of that body. So he who connects himself with a parish, in a like manner is virtually bound to do what he can for the support and prosperity of it. Now this principle does not arise so much from piety as from common morality. It is one of those facts which men, when not misled by self-interest, are always willing to acknowledge and to act upon, and which the world expects to see carried out by all consistent characters. It is the foundation of all social existence. If you are not religious, there are perhaps only two direct modes by which you may add to the welfare of the Church with which you are connected. 1. The first mode is one which is often sadly neglected. Each male adult, under certain restrictions answering to naturalization, has a vote, either in its councils, or in the election of its representatives: and annually various officers must be elected. There are the wardens and vestrymen to be elected by the parish votes, and the delegates to the Diocesan Convention to be chosen by the same, or by the vestry, according to the peculiar custom of the diocese. The first body, the vestry, is intended to represent the congregation, as the executive in the temporal and pecuniary affairs of the parish. The delegates are annually to sit in council with the Bishop and clergy, and with them to make the laws, provide the ways and means for the Diocese, elect the Standing Committee and deputies to the General Convention, and, when there is no Bishop, to choose one. Each parish, each person in the parish is equally interested in such acts. Once elected, the vestry can neither be changed or interfered with till next year, and therefore it is the duty of every one to be ready to give his vote at the appointed time. I once knew a parish containing about five hundred persons, where a vestry had not been elected for over three years, merely from the negligence of the voters in not meeting on the proper day. The consequence was, that the church building had got sadly out of repair, and the temporal affairs were either altogether neglected, or mismanaged by one more active, but unsteady, individual just as he pleased. Every clergyman, of experience in country parishes, must recollect instances where, owing to the same cause, the vestry has become a mere name, and neither influence, respect, nor power any longer attach to it. No one feels responsible; no one collects the salary, or pays debts; and the whole effort of the minister to do good is paralyzed. If, therefore, as a member of a parish you would do your duty, you will make it a point to be present, and give your vote on the proper occasion. The election always takes place on Easter Monday or Tuesday, and due notice is given by the clergyman. The time required to vote will seldom exceed half an hour in a year; and by sparing this short period from your business, you will give strength to the parish, uphold the clergyman's hands, feel a greater interest in the Church, and, perhaps, prevent those from being chosen who are incapable of doing their duty, and who are sometimes elected solely from the reason that there is no one else who appears to take sufficient interest in the subject. 2. In the second place, you can help to support the clergyman, and pay the incidental expenses connected with the Church. And this, too, is often neglected in a most surprising manner. If you are not a communicant, still you must feel some interest in religion, or you would not attend. Perhaps a good early education, and a moral feeling; perhaps a pious wife, or a young family; perhaps a personal attachment to the minister, and a pleasure in hearing him, induce you to go to church. At all events, whatever your motive may be, you receive some benefit, which you could not receive were there no clergyman. You have value received. It is therefore only fair that you should give something for it. If, Sunday after Sunday you sit in church, and give nothing, you are taking that which is of value to you, and making no return; and surely this is most repugnant to an honorable mind. But how much more so is this the case when you consider the position of the clergyman. He is excluded from all the ordinary means of making money which you possess; he is wholly dependent for the support of himself and family upon his promised salary; and if he be defrauded of it, he and they must suffer, and, as has sometimes occurred, be brought almost to starvation, while his love for the souls of his people, dislike of change, or debt, disincite him to forsake them. He is a man of education; his education has been expensive; he has spent many years and much money in study, in order that he may be able to teach you lessons of the highest wisdom; he labors hard; for, whatever the vulgar opinion may be, few, if any, professions or businesses are so laborious or full of anxiety as a clergyman's; he is never remunerated, at the best, equal to his ability, compared with secular employments. The sermon you sit and hear has probably cost him many days of thought and study, and many hours' labor in writing; and you receive all this, and every blessing that the public maintenance of Christianity can confer, and make no efficient return. In any other profession, such conduct would not be submitted to. You could not expect a lawyer to give you his opinion, much less plead for you, without a fee; nor a physician to wear himself out in prescribing for his patients, and yet get nothing for it. And why? Because their knowledge is their capital, and the use of it is the only mode by which they can gain a livelihood. The one saves your property, the other saves your life, and you pay them handsomely; but when the clergyman labors no less hard to save your soul, and toils and prays to do you good, and make you happy both here and in eternity, you are content to take all you can get and make no return, although he may be suffering for the very necessities of life. His profession prevents his pressing the subject on you, as others can do, and you take advantage of his position.

But let us reduce it to figures. Suppose you have a wife and two children. These, with yourself, make four persons in all who receive direct benefit from the Church. Pew rents and subscriptions vary, in country and city, from ten to sixty dollars a year. Let us suppose that you pay twenty dollars, a very small sum to the majority of persons comprising our congregations. For this amount you have at least two services on Sunday, and probably one during the week, besides others on extra occasions, as Lent, Christmas, &c., making about one hundred and seventy full services in the year. Perhaps you have a baptism, perhaps a funeral, taking up a couple of valuable hours of the clergyman's time; you expect him occasionally to make parochial visits; you have attendance at your bed should you be sick; consolation, should you be afflicted; you have a Sunday school and books for your children, and for yourself you have the society of a man of education and piety, and all for twenty dollars, or five dollars a piece, a year, or not three cents for each of you for each regular service during that time, excluding every thing else. To a concert, or a travelling lecturer, you would think little of paying half a dollar for half the labor expended, and not a tythe of the benefit you may receive from your clergyman in every service; and yet how many there are who begrudge even a cent for this purpose, who contribute nothing at all! When the subject is reduced to this position, it undoubtedly appears different to you from what it has often done. Change places with the clergyman; suppose yourself to have given up every thing in order that you may do good in the world, and toil constantly for the benefit of your fellow-creatures, amidst the sneers and ingratitude of the ungodly, and the coldness and backbiting and slander of many who profess to be better, and then ask yourself how you would feel, if those who reaped so much good and pleasure from your labors, never gave you anything to render your path, full of self-denial at the best, a little easier and less anxious? And consider how it would be if all acted in this way. How could a clergyman be supported at all? when would there be any public preaching of the Gospel were all to refuse payment? And I will not suppose you to be so ignorant of the blessings of Christianity in a mere social light, as not to perceive that in this case we should soon be carried back to anarchy and darkness.

And yet why should others do what you feel disinclined to do? Why are others to pay, that you who will pay nothing may be blessed? If you receive the benefit, direct or indirect, you are as much called upon to sustain that benefit as any one else can be. 3. But if you acknowledge religious responsibility, I may press other motives upon you, in order to induce you to be liberal. The Bible has made it your especial duty to support the ministry of God. You can appreciate the full benefits of the Gospel. You profess not only to value your soul, and Christ's salvation above the whole world, but likewise to love and reverence your minister, as the appointed ambassador of the Most High God. He confers on you blessings which, as a Christian, you acknowledge to be the greatest that you can possess; and he affords you the services of a Church, which, if you be a true Episcopalian, you love with all your heart. In one word, next to God, he is your greatest benefactor. The converted heart is always a liberal heart; and therefore you have a thousand motives to give liberally to your clergyman and the support of the Church, of which the worldly man is deficient. And yet, how niggardly do professing Christians often support their clergyman. How often do they keep him and his family in perpetual straits, barely removed from that of absolute debt and necessity, while they themselves are enjoying in profusion the temporal blessings of God. This should not be so among Christians. This could not be so, did men and women calling themselves Christians, really consider their duty, and really walk in the footsteps of their Lord and Master. The Church can never fill her appointed sphere till congregations cease to seek how little they need give their minister, and begin to compete with each other who can make him most comfortable and happy. 4. But not only does the duty of supporting the clergyman fall on the congregation: it is likewise their duty to pay PUNCTUALLY. When you remember that your clergyman has nothing else to depend on but what he receives from you; that the clergy, as a body, are notoriously inefficient in pecuniary matters; that his house rent is called for quarterly, and must be paid in money; that his servant, his grocer, his butcher, his tailor, and many others, all want their money; that if he must buy on credit it costs him much more than if he paid cash down; you will see how great an inconvenience he is put to; how great a hardship and mortification you oblige him to suffer when his salary is irregularly paid, even if he should get it all at last; while to you it is probably just as easy, with a little management, to pay five dollars a quarter in advance, as twenty dollars at the end of the year. If all must be paid at once, let it be paid in advance, whereby you will save your minister not only anxiety, and oftentimes humiliation, but also absolute cost.

Let this be remembered, that if a congregation harrass a clergyman about his temporal affairs, they must expect him to be deficient in his parochial duties. No one whose time is occupied in providing for his bodily wants, and doing the duties of a servant, can bring a quiet and steady mind to the preparation of his sermons; nor, while he feels that his people are neglecting him, in a point where they might so easily render him comfortable, can he meet them with the same feelings, nor labor for them with the same zealous energy that he would otherwise do? so that God, by a natural law, causes the congregation to suffer the most of the two, in proportion as a starving soul is worse than a hungry stomach, for their neglect of duty. If the people starve the clergyman's body, God will send leanness into their souls. 5. If you are religious, you can assist your clergyman in many other ways. You can pray for him. All men want the prayers of their friends; especially so a clergyman, whose duties are so responsible and important. Even St. Paul, an inspired apostle, continually asks for the prayers of his converts, that he may be enabled to preach boldly and do much good. You can avoid speaking evil of your minister, and making much of things really trifling which displease you: a frequent source of ruin to a parish, and a sin which, when it exists to any extent, often undoes all the good a clergyman can accomplish. A clergyman's character should not even be suspected. You can induce others to attend Church, and place the benefits both of it and of pure religion before your acquaintances in a manner from which the clergyman is excluded. Many seem to think that as it is a clergyman's profession to be religious, and his interest to fill his pews, all he says to them is from mere selfishness, and they pay no regard to him, while a few words from a pious layman have great weight. You can assist in the Sunday school and the choir, and thus in many ways make yourself useful. You can find out the sick or penitent, let your clergyman know of them, and afford him assistance where pecuniary means are necessary. But on these heads I need not enlarge. You are undoubtedly instructed regarding them by your own pastor; and if you be truly walking in the Spirit of God, and if you truly love the Church, these things, and many others, will naturally arise of their own accord. C. F.

FATA MORGANA,

A person, in the streets of Reggio, with his back to the rising sun, and his face toward the Straits of Messina, sees columns, arches, castles, palaces, villages with trees, plains with flocks and herds, armies of horses and foot, passing in rapid succession. When the air is hazy, they are all vividly coloured.—Brewster's Optics.

From Reggio's streets, when the traveller's eye,
Turns to Messina's waves of glass,
The towers and trees, that behind him lie,
In loveliest colors, before him pass.

So from the heights of a green old age,
When we turn to the past, in its haze of tears,
We see in its clear, recording page,
The vanishing visions of life's young years.
